sia, A. M. 3501. M. Valerius the Brother of Poplicola, and P. Posthumius Tu-War with the bertus were Confuls. Now the Sabines made depredations in the Roman Territories, and proceeded fo far in their Injuries that it ingaged the Parties in a War: Marcus by the Counsel and Affistance of his Brother obtained great Honour in his undertakings. He overthrew the Sabines twice, in the later of which Battels were flain of them thirteen thousand, and not one of the Romans lost. Wherefore befides Triumphs this was given him as an addition of honour, to have an House built for him in the place on the publick cost. Besides, whereas all the doors of other Houses opened inwards, they would have this of his House to open outwards toward the Street, as a mark of Honour in this respect, that he was ever ready to move for the publick good. Indeed all the Gates of the Greeks are faid most antiently to have opened this way, and that by Testimony of the Comedies, wherein they that are going out first knock within, that such as either go by or stand near, may prevent being hurt of the Door, which was cast forward into the Street. The next Year, wherein Poplicola was Conful the fourth time, and his Collegue T. Lucretius Tricipitinus, the whole Nation of the Sabines with the Latines conspired against Rome, which was also much disturbed by Superstition, for that all the Women with Child miscarried of mutilous Births, and nothing came into the World perfect. When these things much dejected the minds Milias classius of the Romans, another erected them, and afforded confiderable incouragement to the War. Appins or Actins Clausus, an eminent man amongst the Sabines for Riches, Valour, Virtue, and Eloquence, being much against the War, was therefore maligned by his Emulators, as favouring the Romans, and defigning to bring his Country under their Yoak. His Enemies gaining credit with the Vulgar, he feared to put himself upon Trial, and therefore raised a Commotion, which retarded the War. Then did Poplicola invite him to Rome, whither he came with five thousand Families of his Friends and Dependents. The Families were made free of the City, and to every man affigned two Akers of Ground by the River Aniene; but to Claufus himself twenty Akers, and the degree of a Senator. Having got this opportunity, he so improved it, as to become equal to the greatest, and railed his House so much, that the Clause afterwards called Claudii, became inferiour to no one Family.

22. His Revolt much more exasperated the minds of his Country-men to the War, who coming with an Army to Fidene, placed in Ambush two thousand Foot, and then fent some Horse to make incursions, commanding them to retreat, Sect. as if they fled, and fo draw on the Romans into the fnare. Poplicola, having notice hereof by certain fugitives, divided his Army into three parts, and taking the advantage of a mist, fell upon the Sabines on so many sides, and did such execution, as the nearness of Fidena only hindred the destruction of them all. The Romans, besides the advantage of much plunder, obtained that good by this Victory, to be furnished with courage for all affayes; yet imputed they the whole merit to the Conful, and sticked not to say, that he delivered into their hands their Enemies, blind and lame, only to be dispatched with the Sword. Having triumphed, and given up the charge of the Commonwealth to the two new Confuls, Agrippa Menenius Lunatus, and Publius Posthumius, shortly after he died, finishing his life, as he had lived, in great grace with the multitude whom he had so flattered. The People, as if they had nothing at all requited him when living, but owed him yet his whole reward, decreed he should be buryed at the publick charge, every one contributing a small piece of money, Some fay, that he was so poor, as he left not enough to bury him. The women by universal consent mourned for him, as formerly they had done for Brutus, an whole year. He was by a special Decree buried within the City, (which honour (faith Dionglius) hath only happened unto him to this day) and that privilege was also granted to his family. But now, (Plutarch writeth) none of them are there interred: the Funeral is only drawn out thither, and the Coffin being fet down, one puts under fire, and presently again takerhit away, showing, that the deceased bath a right there to be buried, but on his own accord quitteth the privilege. This being done, the body was carried away.

23. The same year that Poplicola died, the Sabines provided of numerous Forces, invaded the Roman Territories, as far as the City walls. The Confuls taking the field against them, Posthumius was entrapped in an Ambush, and escaping narrowly himself, lost many of his men, which defeat struck the Citizens with great terror, who now ran to the walls, expecting the Enemy would fall upon the City. But nothing being attempted in this kind, they marched out, refolving to redeem their credit; and Posthumius, much more concerned in honour than the rest, so behaved himself, as he made amends fully, and both the Confuls obtained a notable Victory, which had been completed by the flaughter of all the Sabines, if the darkness of night had not interposed. The Senate ordered the Confuls to return in pomp; Menenius with full honour in triumph, fitting in a Chair, drawn in way of a Charlot, but Polthumius, because of his late defeat, in a more humble manner, which the Romans called Ovation, fo named (faith Festus or Paulus from him, as he from Verrius) from the letter O, which the Soldiers in way of joy were wont to eccho at their return from a Victory; or corruptly pronounced for the Greek word Euaste, as Dionysius con-Oration what, jectureth. Ovation differed herein from a Triumph properly fo called, that the Diangle

General entred not the City in a Chariot, but on foot before his Soldiers; for the Robe interwoven with Gold, he only wore the Pratexta toga, the ordinary habit of Confuls and Prators; neither had he a Scepter, but only Laurel; and on his head a wreath of Myrtle, when the War had not been denounced, or fi-nished without bloodshed. The year following, wherein Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, and Opiter Virginius Tricoftus were Consuls, the Sabines were overthrown in a great battel at Curs, ten thousand and three hundred being flain, and about four thousand taken, which defeat caused them to beg peace, and purchase it with Corn, Money, and part of their grounds. Whillt Sp. Caffins did this good fervice against the Sabines, his Colleague subdued the Camarinaans who had revolted, and having put to death the Authors of the injury, fold the reft, and razed their

24. The year that followed, being the first of the seventieth Olympiad (wherein Nicaus of Opus (a Town of Locri) was Victor,) Myrus executing the Annual Office of Archon at Athens) had for Confuls Posthumius Cominius, and T. Largius. Now all the Latines (to the number of thirty Cities, faith Livy) conspired against Rome, by the procurement of Mamilius Octavius, son-in-law to Tarquinius (who at prefent was with him at Tusculum) though Valerius the Roman Ambassador pretended to answer to such accusations as were made, and laboured to diffwade the feveral People of Latium. In the mean time also the Slaves at home contrived how to feize upon the Capitol, and burn the City, but were discovered, and nailed to crosses, The following year wherein Ser. The Senate would not make War upon the Latines in general, knowing many amongst them were inclined to Peace, and thought it sufficient to block up Fidena, for which they fent out Manius with a strong Army. The besieged implored affistance of the Latines, who in their general meeting heard also the complaints of Tarquinius, and though they were much importuned by some amongst them, yet they only ordered the Ambassadors to be sent to demand the reception of the King, and the removal of the siege from Fidene, which was done also meerly to give time, giving the Romans a years time to confider of the matter, and taking fo large a space for to make preparations, in case the overture were rejected. Tarquinius and Tarquinius his Mamilius having little hopes to prevail this way, feeing that the minds of the generality were averse from War, endeavoured to bring his right about in an easier way, by raifing in Rome an unexpected and intestine difference betwixt the rich and poorer fort. 25. For at this very time, as Dionysius writeth, a great part of the common People, especially the indigent and such as were burthened by usury, did not like of the present state of affairs, which dissatisfaction was caused by the extravagant course of Creditors, who seizing upon the bodies of their Debrors, used them no better than Slaves purchased with money. Tarquinius not being ignorant hereof, fent certain of his friends with Gold, who gave them some in hand, promiling more after the King's restitution, and procured thereby a conspiracy of many poor Citizens, with fuch Slaves as had been offended with their Mafters the year before, for the severity shown towards their fellows. The matter was discovered to Sulpicius, who after he had returned a denyal, though very civilly, to the Latin Ambassadors, by a wile drew the Conspirators into the Forum; where incompassing them about, he put them all to the Sword. The stirs being thus allaied for a time, the Confuls of this and the following year looked abroad, and, allaied for a time, the Commis or this and the following year nonced ableat, and, in the next, Fident was yielded up to T. Largius Flavus. Hereat the Latins A. M. 3044 were exceedingly frartled, and now all railed on their principal men, for that F. G. 313 no order had been taken for relief of the Town. Tarquinius and Mamilius fo im-Dmii 21, proved this opportunity, that all the Cities (twenty four in number, as they are coming to the Polyman and the Commission of the Com reckoned by Dionysius) decreed War against the Romans, ingaging that none Anvances should for sake their associates, nor make Peace without common consent, sea-T. Lartius ling it with an Oath, and direful curses against fuch as should break the League, Russes, Cost. who were to be held as Enemies by all the rest. They gave liberty to Tarquinius and his fon in-law to levy what Forces they thought convenient, and that they might have some kind of pretence, sent a message to Rome, whence the Senate returned a ftout and refolute answer.

26. Great were the preparations of the Latines; the Romans fending round about, could make no friends, and yet were not dejected, but trufting to their domestick strength alone, were thereby rendred much more resolute and couragious, as fuch upon whom lay a necessity of being valiant. But a great difficulty was found in lifting Soldiers; for the poor and those that were surcharged with debt, of which there was a great number, being cited, would not appear, faying, they had nothing to do with the Patritians, except their debts were remitted by Decree of the Senate, nay some talked of leaving the City, and exhorted one another not to flay in that place, where no good thing was communicated to them. The Patritians by good words laboured to appeale them, but all in vain; so that the Senate fell into a serious debate about so weighty a matter. Some were for a free remission of the debts, after the manner of the Athenian Sifachthea, as the only way to remove all prejudice, and beget a fair correspondence betwixt Nobility and Commons. Others condemned this as too great a condescention, and which would encourage them to like Seditions for the time to come, thinking it the better way to lift fuch as would give their names, and not at all value the reft, who though gratified at present, would hereafter be unserviceable. Betwixt these extremes several other ways were propounded; but this at length prevailed, that nothing should now be determined, but the War being happily finished, the Confuls should report it again to the Senate, and in the mean time all futes and process concerning debts were to cease, that Magistrates might make effectual provisions for the matter now mainly incumbent. This expedient, though fomething it wrought, had not fufficient strength to end the difference; and therefore the Senate was put upon another exigent. Whereas by the Law of Valerius, power of life and death was taken away from the Confuls, and all constrained, by an appeal to the People, so that Sect 1. no man could be forced to the War, It feemed necessary to create a Magistrate, who for fix Moneths should rule as absolute above the Laws, and from whom should lye no appeal. Thus having renounced Monarchy in effect, they had again recourse to it, and shewed as well the necessity as excellency of ir.

27. This Supreme Officer was called Dictator, either for that he was dictus, (a) De Ling. or named, by the Conful, according to (a) Varro, or rather from dictating, or Latial 49. 56. The Dictator. or named, by the Contain, according to Copy of the Etymology (b) Dionysius (b) Lib. 5. Shewing and commanding what was to be done, which Etymology (b) Dionysius (c) Parro quo approveth. Spartianus faith, it was an ordinary Magistrate of Festius in voc. old Latium. Dionysias bringeth the Testimony of Licinius Macer for this opi-opimates. nion; yet he thinketh the Office sirst taken from the Greeks, who had their (4) Let Anti-Alymneta or extraordinary Kings made upon fome urgent occasion, with absolute Power. The Dictator was created upon some urgent occasion of War or Sedition, for fixing a Nale in time of a Plague, to hold the Comitia for electing of Consuls, celebrate Games, make inquisition, choosing Senators, or in sum, when there was need of a fodain and extraordinary command. The manner of his creation was not, as of other Magistrates, by the Suffrages of the People; but, at the command of the Senate, the Conful named some one of Consular Dignity whom he pleased, in the Night, and who was approved by the Auspicium, or divination from Birds, a Ceremony observed ever in the election of some Officers. The occasion being many times sodain, they could not stay for the Suffrages of the People, and the defign being to restrain, or constrain, the Multitude, many times, he was not to be chosen out of their Body, although sometimes these Rules were not fully observed, either through the absence of the Consul, or some other respect. L. Cornelius Sylla alone was named by the Interrex, as C. Casar by the Prator; both which nominations Cicero in his Epistles conceiveth done contrary to right and order. The Authority of the Dictator was exceeding large. He had Power of Peace and War, to levie Porces, lead them forth, and disband them, and act all things according to his pleafure, without referring them to the Senate. So that not only had he the Power of both Confuls (whence the Greeks called him Diffipatos, or double Consul) but more also, in that upon his Creation all other Magistrates, except the Tribunes, laid down their Offices, and the whole Government was left in his hands. He could punish as he pleafed, without all appeal, and for the oftentation of his Power, had twenty four bundles of Rods carried before him, with as many Axes, or Hatchets, as Plutarch and Polybias do teftifie; although Livie diffenting from them, will have Sylla first of all others to have had twenty four Bundles. Hence this Office came of a Deity. 28. It was necessary, according to the Roman Government, that this extraordinary Power should be bounded by certain Limits, wherein might lie redress of Inconveniencies thence arising. Six months were the time affigned for its duration, and never was it lengthned, except for meer necessity, as might be instanced in Camillus, L. Papirius, and Fabius Maximus: for the perpetual Dictatorships of Sylla and Cafar were notorious Violations of the Laws. And not only the time but the place also was limited, it being unlawful for the Distator to stir out of Italy, left being out of fight, he should take advantage at the distance of place, to attempt some new matter; and this constitution was never violated but once whilst the old Commonwealth stood, by Attilius Collatinus. He was not to come on horse-back, but march continually on foot, to shew, saith Plutarch, that the Roman strength lay in the Legions, or rather to teach him Humility. Now because in great Expeditions this could scarce be observed, he formally before his departure asked leave of the People that he might ride, as Livie informeth us. But those restrictions were inconsiderable, in respect of the Appeal which afterwards came to be made from him to the People. Festus in these words Optima Zex, faith, that first the power of the Magister Populi, or Dictator, was full or absolute, as that of Marcus Valerius; but afterwards an Appeal lay from this Magistrate to the People. Livie seemeth also to hold out the same thing, where he bringeth M. Fabius in behalf of his Son thus speaking to L. Papirius the Lib. 8. Dictator: Seeing that neither the authority of the Senate, nor mine age, which thou goes about to bereeve of my Son, neither the Virtue and Nobility of the Master of the Horsemen named by thy self, prevaileth with thee; nor yet Prayers and Intrea-

Sect. 1. ties, which are wont to appease an enemy, and the anger of the Gods: I appeal to the Tribunes of the People, and the People it self which I make our frage, (seing thou regardess not the fragment of the Army and Senate) which done can do more than thy Distarossipi, I shall see whether thou with give place to that Appeal to which the Roman King Tultus Hossilius yielded. Hereupon the People assembled, and the Tribunes were present at the meeting. Papirius denieth neither the Power of the one nor the other, but continueth resolute for the punishment of the Master of the Horse-men, who had fought in his absence contrary to his Command, shewing how all discipline else would be destroyed. A way was found out to preserve the Honour of both Offices, the power of People, Tribunes and Dictator, with the strength of Discipline. For the People betook it self to intreaties, and was seconded by the Tribunes. Whereupon the Dicator pardoned the party, granting his Life to the request of those, who, as he confesseth. might have commanded it.

29. At what time this Appeal was brought in, or how long it continued in Force, seeing that Sylla and other Distators made use of the old and absolute Power, is uncertain. It is probable, that the People being overwitted in ratifying the Decree of the Senate (as Dionysius telleth us they were) grew sensible, how they had thereby given the Power again out of their Hands, it being lawful for the Senate at any time when they should pretend a necessity, and that for the bridling of the People it felf, to give order to the Conful to name a Dictator, and therefore refumed its antient Power of Appeal, without which no lawless Freedom could be enjoyed. But in the declining condition of the Commonwealth, when Dictators grew more imperious, their Soldiers more disfolute, and the Tribunes of the People especially more Factious, and opportunity might be wanting for it to exert that right which as yet it had not given up to any other. If what Dionysius writeth of the Dictators being approved by the People after the Confuls nomination be true, the State stood in less need of the Appeal; but it being not possible for a Multitude never to miltake in its Opinion of a Person, this defect might at length be experimentally discovered, and thence a recourse had to that remedy which was ever certain whilst it could be applied. By these cautions and restrictions, with the modesty of the Romans; this Grand Office was for four hundred years managed for the publick good, as it was accounted, till Sylla, and afterward Cafar, converted it into a Tyranny, as the multitude counted it, and rendred the very name thereof fo odious, that after Cafar's death, in the seven hundred and tenth year of the City, when M. Antonius, and P. Cornelius Dolabella were Consuls, a Law was made (from the The Migifur former Conful called Lex Antonia) whereby it was for ever banished. The Therest, because they were of less value than these Magistri, were named Magistratus, as from albus Albatus. If the Dictator was absent, the Master of the Horse-men executed his place in the Army, but if he was present, he commanded the Horse, yet so as to be obedient to the Dictators Orders, and not to Fight, either contrary to, or without his Command. In the fecond Punick War, M. Fabius Buteo was made Dictator for filling up the Senate, without a Mafter of Horse-men. But he alleged, that he could not approve of two Dictators to be at the same time, nor a Dictator without a Master of hors-men, and having perfected his work on the same day laid down his Office.

30. Concerning the time of the first Dictatorship, Authors differ in the space of two years, and do not fully agree about the Person. Dionylius, a grave, faithful, and wary Author (by confent of the most learned fort of men) referreth it to the two hundred and fifty fifth year of the City; but Livy, and most Latine Authors affign it to the two hundred and fifty third. Dionyfius faith expresly, that T. Largins Flavus was the first Dictator, being Conful that year. Livy faith it could not be certainly known from antient Authors who was the first, yet confeffeth that the most antient mentioned Largius, and upon good Grounds approveth of their opinion rather than that which maketh M. Valerius the Son of Marcus yet living, and Grand fon to Volefus the first of all, which Festus seemeth to follow. Livy mentioneth no other cause of the Original than a falling out with the Sabines, and the conspiracy of the thirty Latine Cities, putting off the Sedition till after the finishing of the Latine War; but as there can little hold be taken of one who an- Sect. 1. certainly relateth matters; so no need would there have been of an absolute Authority for the Latine War, if no stir had been made in the City, all giving their names with alacrity, and obeying the Confuls, as in former Wars. And if the Confuls had been suspected to savour the cause of Tarquinius (as some wrote they were) then new ones might have been made in their rooms, nothing being prevalent to alter the ordinary form of Government, but a necessity of absolute Power for a time; and no ordinary accident about War could make this necessity; so that compulsion must have been the end, and the taking away that help from the multitude, which was unalterably given to it against the Consuls by the Valerian Law. Thus might the Nobility, if they had had that duty, have feen cause to repent in time of their Kings banishment.

The Persian Empire.

31. T. Largius, the first Dictator, having named Sp. Cassius for his Master of 7. Lugius the horf-men (who had born the Office of Conful in the seventieth Olympiad) caused Axes to be carried before him with the Rods, as had been wont, till the time of Poplicola, before the chief Magistrares, both Kings and Consuls. Having with these and other Ensigns of power terrified the Seditious, he began the Census after the Pattern of Ser. Tullius, according to the Tribes, taking the names and ages of fuch as were Ceffed, and of Children. In a fhort space, fear of losing freedom of the City, and Estates, so prevailed, as one hundred and fifty thousand and seven hundred of such as were ripe of age gave their names, which he distributed into four parts, whereof taking one to himself, he gave the rest to his Master of hors-men, and two others, one being to continue in the City for the defence thereof. This done, he fent some who underhand dealt with the several Latine Cities, and procured them to suspend the War, and make a Truce for a year, notwithstanding all that Manilius and Sextus Tarquinius could do to the contrary. Then returned he home with the Army, and e're his fix months were out, the Confuls being appointed, laid down, no Citizens being killed, banished or otherwise chastized by any grievous punishment; which carriage was imitated by his Successors, until the third age from that wherein we live, faith Dionysius. But in the time of our Fathers four hundred years from the Dictatorship of Largius, L. Cornelius Sylla first of all others behaved himself cruelly in this Office, so that the Romans conceived then what before they had cause to be ignorant of, that the Dictatorship was a Tyrannis.

22. When the Truce betwixt the Latines and Romans was ended, both parties prepared for the War: The former were against their wills, 'tis said, drawn Dionyl. lib. 6: in by the interest of Mamilius; but the later with all cheerfulness imbraced the opportunity. The Romans thought fit a Dictator should be Created, and accordingly Virginius the Senior Conful named A. Posthumius his Collegue, who chole for Master of horf-men T. Ebutius Helva, and hasting his Levies, divided his Forces into four parts, whereof one he kept to himself, assigned the second to Virginius, the third to Ebutius, and the fourth to Sempronius, who therewith was to defend the City. News being come that the Latines had taken the Field, the Dictator with speed marched to the Lake Regillus (at this day called Rego di Santa Severa) in the Country of Tusculum, where he fortified his Camp against the Enemy, who as yet had not united his Forces, and expected Affiftance from the Folici. The Roman Army divided into three parts incompaffed the Latines, who endeavoured to beat off Ebutius from an Hill he had feized on betwixt them and home; but he kept his Ground in despight of them, and fortified himself. The Latines hereupon being hindred from all Provisions, resolved to fight; the Dictator at first was minded to end the War without Blood. by familhing his Enemies, but understanding that the Volsci were expected within three days, changed his resolution. The right Wing of the Latines was led by Mamilius, the left by Sextus Tarquinius, and the middle Battel by Titus Tarquinius his other Son. On the other fide against Mamilius stood Virginius, Ebutius was opposite in the right Wing to Sextus Tarquinius, and the Dictator led the middle Battel against Titus, and the Roman Exiles. The Romans brought into the Field twenty four thousand foot, and one thousand horse, but the Latines fourty thousand foot, and three thousand horse. When they joyned, both parties missed of their expectation; for the one trusting to their numbers; and the other to their Valour, thought to bear all down before them. The Dictator gave the first opportunity of Victory by over powring Titus, after which, though Mamilius and Sextus omitted nothing requisite to valiant and able Captains, yet both lofing their Lives, their followers were

The Latines

Sect. 1. discouraged and overthrown; scarce ten thousand escaping home of the whole number. Of the Romans fell M. Valerius, whose dead body his two Nephews by his brother Poplicola, Publius and Marcus, endeavouring to get off, were also

33. After the Fight, the Volsei, whom the Latines had expected, arrived at the Camp, which leeing full of dead bodies, and learning the iffue of the battel. fome of them were for falling on the Romans now weary, but another party prevailed to fend Messengers to the Dictator, to tell him they came to his assistance, thereby to ingratiate themselves with the Conquerours. But the Dictator convinced them of falshood by their Letters which he had intercepted, and giving leave to the Mcsengers to return, whom the multitude would have pulled in pieces, resolved on the morrow to fall on them; but in the night they deserted their Camp and fled. From the place of this action the Dictator obtained the firname of Rhegillensis.

34. The Latines fent to deprecate the anger of the Roman State, laying all the blame upon their Nobility. The Ambassadors managed their work with such earnestness and humility (casting themselves at the Feet of the Senate, and making great lamentations) that the motion of Largius prevailed in their behalf for the former League to be renewed. This was the end of the War which in behalf of the Tarquins had been carried on for fourteen years: Tarquinius himself being only left behind of all his stock, now almost ninty years old, for that the Latines, Hetruscans, and Sabines, refused to harbour him, as also all other neighbouring Cities which were free, went into Campania to Aristodemus the Prince of Cume, with whom he shortly after died. Of the man we may judge charitably, because his story was only related to posterity by his bitter Enemies. However, his banishment our Religion must censure as Rebellion. And such were the ftirs, feditions and tumults afterwards, and fo many changes and rechanges, as if the Reader feriously consider them he will see that the Romans suffered much for want of Monarchy, and the contrary Government did not contribute to their happiness. That this may appear, he hath here a fuller view of their changes than in any other modern Writer.

35. The Romans now freed from this War, fell into a grievous fedition in the City, the Courts of Justice being again opened by the Senate, and the process against debtors revived. The Plebeians alleged they were not able to pay their debts, by reason of their losses sustained in the late Wars through want of tillage, and plundring of their Cattel by the Enemy. Their Creditors replied, that these losses had also befallen them, which made the remission of the debts impossible; and so neither fort would yield at all, but many tumults were raised, wherein the parties did not abstain from blows. Posthumius the Dictator perceiving some expedition to be necessary for the quiet of the City, created Confuls for the following year, and laid down his Office. The Confuls were Appius Claudius the Sabine, and P. Servilius Priscus, who being of the Dictators mind as to the War, resolved to go out against the Volsei, who had affisted the Latines against the State, and now were making preparations for War; when they came to make Levies none of the Plebeians would give their names, complaining that they having already undergone the heat, and danger of the War, both for liberty and dominion, they were by their fellow Citizens at home kept in bondage (it being the custom then for Creditors to make use of them as Slaves bound in fetters) and many times cruelly beaten, till they could pay their debts. They cried out, that the fecurity of the common fort was more provided for in War, and amongst their Enemies, than in Peace, and with their friends. The disagreement of the Consuls amongst themselves added to the present distemper; Servilius being willing to comply fomething with the defire of the poor, but Appius inveighing against them with great bitterness, and earnestly urging force and rigour to be the most suitable means for appealing these tumults. The Senate was forced to betake it felf to the popularity of Servius, who with fair words drew the people out against the Sabines, and when he had by this good fervice deserved a Triumph, the honour was denied him through the suggestions of his Collegue to the Fathers, for that by bearing with the multitude he impaired the Dignity of their Order.

36. After the finishing of the War the common fort thought again of their own concernments, and expecting performance of what Servilius had promifed, Appius exacted the payment of debts as rigorously as ever: This doubled the people's rage, and made them carry on all things by force, so that they refe CHAP. IV. fcued their Companions out of the hands of Sargeants, and holding fecret councils by night, denied to the succeeding Consuls to take up Arms, till they could have a relaxation of their burthens. This putting the Senate to a stand, Appius still urged that nothing was to be granted to the rabble, and procured a Dictator to be created. When most looked upon him as fittest for the time, the Confuls judged quite otherwise, and made choice of M. Valerins the Brother of Publius, and fon of Volesus, a popular man, being perswaded that the terror of the Office alone would do the work, and that a man of mild temper would best manage it. The Dictator told the People, in case they would freely follow him, not only what they justly required concerning their debts, but other rewards also, and by this means lifted ten Legions against the Volsei, Equi and Sabines, who were all up in Arms, which being brought under, he divided amongst his Soldiers some grounds taken from the Volsci, but requesting of the Senate, that his and their promife might be made good, was checked for his love to the multitude, and because he was an old man above seventy, being unfit as he faid to contend, he laid down his Office. The People hereat much inraged, kept private meetings, and confulted how to seperate themselves from the Patritians, which when the Senate perceived, they gave order to the Consuls not to disband the Armies, pretending that the Sabines and Æqui had conspired against Rome. The Soldiers being bound by the Oath taken at their lifting (called by them Sacramentum, and ever strongly observed) could not forfake their Standards, but the Confuls having their Camps near to each other, they all went into one by the advice of one Sicinius Bellulus, and taking away the Enfigns from the Confuls, departed to the Mount called afterwards Mons Sacer, lying three miles from the City beyond the River Aniene, now called

37. Notice hereof being brought into the City, filled all places with marvelous tumults. The Patritians were in great fear lest War should be made upon them; the Plebeians grew exceeding high, and many flocked to the Army, though the other hindred it as much as possible. The Fathers had also great ftrife amongst themselves, while some pleaded for the multitude, and others would hear of nothing but carrying the matter through by strong hand. But the former fort prevailed to fend a meffage to the Armies, defiring them to return home; promising that for the future all things should be forgot, and the Senate would be ready to reward their faithfulness and serviceableness to their Country; withall, the Ambassadors had it in charge to know the utmost of their defires. To the message nothing would be returned but disdainful words, and high complaints, fomething mixed with threatning language, which more grieyoully afflicted the Fathers, not knowing what way to procure a reconcilement; and now would not fuch as they had by their authority and interest hitherto retained in the City, be with holden from going to the Army. The time for creation of new Confuls was now at hand. The old ones appointing the Comitia, no Candidates (so called because they appeared in white garments) would fland for the Office, nor any accept of it, till at length the Confuls appointed by their fole authority Posthumius Cominius, and Sp. Cassius, who had born it before, and were equally in favour with the Nobility and Commons. They having entred on the Calends of September (fooner than usual) in the seventy. second Olympiad (wherein Tesicrates of Crotone was Victor, and Diognetes Archon) first of all consulted the Senate about the return of the Commons. Agrippa Menenius a man of great wildom and temper, being first asked his opinion, by all means possible exhorted the Fathers to a composure. He shewed what necessity there was of it in regard of the Roman Dominion, which could not be either preferved or increased without the inferiour fort of People, and made it clear, that they could not expect to have any of better temper than the present were, for as much as all, who foever they were, who by their labour and blood obtained power and Soveraignty of the City, would expect to be sharers in its advantages. He pressed the danger they were now in from their Enemies round about, and having used other motives, concluded with his advice, that they would fend messengers with full power to treat and conclude what they should find convenient, without any more confulting the Senate.

38. After Menenius spake M. Valerius, and upbraided the Senate for not giving him credit when he foretold these distempers. He advised them to cure the Wound while it might be healed, shewed what reason the Commons had to be concerned more of late, because of the Dictatorship, which took from them

Sect. 1. their former Appeal, as also for that the Senate had denied the honour of Triumph to Servitus when they defired it for him, because he was suspected to favour them, and for that neither he, the Conful, nor he himfelf the Dictator, could at all profit them in what had been promifed. He enveighed against the avarice and cruelty of Creditors, and particularly fell foul upon Appius for his rigour, and raifing a Faction, which if others were not wife to prevent, would utterly destroy the Commonwealth. Lastly, he commended the advice of Menenius, and desired it might speedily be executed, so as whatever the Commons required might be granted. Applies a man of an high Spirit, most studious of the Patrician Desired. tian Dignity, and also of a sober and venerable carriage, being asked his opinion next, in excuse of himself recriminated Valerius. With great animosity he noted the ambition and fenfelefiness of the multitude, admiring that any of the Fathers should be so absurd, as having denied remission of debts to them when friends, would grant it to them now Enemies, who would not * rest here, but require also a communication of honours, and what not? fo that at length the *Note. The Prophecy power would come into the hands of the rabble, and the Commonwealth degenerate into a Democracy. He leffened, or rather endeavoured to remove, the cerning the lawles rabble. danger which threatned either from the Armies revolt, or the hoftility of old lawles rabble. Enemies. He endeavoured to perfwade them, that they were able enough to reduce them by force, having their Wives and Children in the City; and alleging for further confirmation of this, that the multitude were without any perions of good conduct, whereas the Patritian order abounded with experienced Commanders, concluded with this advice, neither to fend any message to them, nor remit them their debts, nor do any other thing which might shew the least fear or trouble: If they would lay down their Arms and returning into the City, submit to the Senate, then moderately to determine concerning them; feeing that all fools efpecially the Vulgar, are insolent against such as condescend, but cowardly towards those that resolutely demean themselves.

39. The wife speech of Appius so inflamed those of his party, especially the younger fort, that nothing could be determined for the heat of contention. This put the Confuls upon dismissing the Senate for that time, admonishing the younger fort to carry themselves more respectfully and modestly for the time to come, or else they would neither use them as Advisers nor Judges, but prefer a Law for limiting a certain age for Senators. The graver men they exhorted also to concord, letting them know they had a way to end the controversie, by referring the matter to the decision of the People, which had right to judge of it, as a case about Peace and War. At the next meeting the antient men were of the fame opinion as formerly, but the younger modeftly referred themsclves to whatsoever they should determine, so that the major part by far, being wearied with the cries and follicitations of those who had relations in the Army, rather than any reason, notwithstanding Appias stuck close to his former resolution, resolved to follow the advice of Menenius, who with nine others were commissionated with full power, both by Senate and People, to compose the difference. At first the offers of the Commissioners could not be heard through the infligation of two cunning and turbulent fellows, Sicinius, and L. Funius, who conceited of his abilities, affected the name of Brutus also. Menenius, to give full fatisfaction, promifed that fuch as were unable to pay their debts, flould be dicharged both from obligation and imprisonment, and for the time to come matters of this nature should be ordered by the joynt consent both of People and Senate. Then adding the Fable of the several numbers falling out with the belly, as confuming all which they provided, and thence the ruine and decay of the whole body, he so improved it to the present occasion, likening the Senate to the belly (which digesteth and distributeth sustenance to all the rest, though they provide it) that the whole multitude convinced of the necessity of Union, cried out,

He should lead them home without delay. 40. Little wanted of their departure without any other fecurity than the bare word of the Commissioners. But funius Brutus a Plebeian formerly mentioned with held them, faying, that they were gratefully to acknowledge the kind offers of the Senate; but whereas some men of tyrannical spirits might reserve their anger to a convenient opportunity, the Commons wanted fuch good fecurity for the time to come, as might defend them from the unreasonable malice of great ones, and he moved, that they might have certain Officers created yearly out their own body, whose power should only be to give relief to such Plebesans as were injured, and Suffer none to be defrauded of their right : and therefore not to refift the Confuls, as some thought. This being received by Sect. 1. the multitude with great approbation, was infifted on to Menenius, and his fellows, who thought not fit to admit of a matter of fuch large confequence, Without leave from the Senate, and demanded time to know the pleasure thereof. The Confuls reporting the matter, Valerius thought this favour was to be granted to the Commons, and, though Appius opposed it carnestly, crying out, calling their gods to witness, and truly foretelling what calamities they would bring upon the Commonwealth, yet the major part inclining to Peace, it was carried for them, and the Commissioners were sent back with the resolution of the

By that awe which their Sacrofanet Magistracy struck into all men improved

Sect. 1. through their prompt boldness (very common in men of meanest condition) they took advantage to inlarge their bounds. Valerius Maximus writeth, that at first Lib. 2. ca. 2. it was not lawful for them to enter into the Senate, but they had Seats placed Exemp. 7before the Door, where examining the Decrees of the Fathers, fuch of themas they suffered to pals they signed with the Letter T. But nothing in Dionysius is more common than their speaking in the Senate, and their contentions with the Members thereof in that very place at the very time, and that in the Infancy of their Office. However these fellows at first presumed not to Tyrannise and diflurb all, as afterwards they did, they prefumed not at first to assemble the Senate, which afterward they did in the two hundred and seventy seventh year of the City, and in process of time to dismissit also, when called by another. Within a fmall time they affembled the People, preferred Laws, executed their fawcy

The extrava- Decrees against the Magistrates themselves, commanding the Confuls to be carried to Prison, (especially after the enacting of the Hortensian Law, whereby the Plebiscita obliged the whole Roman people) for that they were the chief Officers of the Commons.

43. Great were the Seditions and Tumults, which turbulent Spirits backed with fuch liberty, ftirred up; so as notwithstanding their first end was to preserve right, Lucan rightly termeth them Turbantes jura. Sylla was the first that bridled their extravagancy, by depriving them of liberty to prefer Laws, to make Orations, and obtain any Office of Magistracy; but after his death Aurelins Cotta by a new Law restored the latter privilege to them, and all the rest they recovered when Pompey and M. Crassus were Consuls. Their Power thus recovered they kept till the Emperors swallowed it up themselves, and left them little more than a name, which continued till the time of Constantine. As for the Enligns of their Office, they wore not the Pratexta, had no Lictors or Sargeants, neither used they a Curule Chair; only a fort of Beadle, called Viator, went before them. For want of these Ceremonies, as because they entred not at the beginning of the year, and laid not down their Office upon the Creation of a Dictator, which others did, Plutarch writeth that some held them to be no Magistrates, but rather a curb and restraint to such. Lastly, besides these Tribunes, and the Tribuni Celerum formerly mentioned, there were afterwards many other forts, as Tribuni Militum, and Tribuni Erarii, during the Commonwealth: under the Emperours are found Tribunus Voluptatum, Tribunus Matrimoniorum, Tribunus Chartariorum, Tribunus Provinciarum, Tribunus Fori, and Tribunus Scholarum, concerning which Caffiodorus in his Epistles, and Lipsus in his Commentary of the Magistrates of old Rome are to be confulted.

44. The Commons having got from the Senate a confirmation of the Office of Tribunes, obtained further, that they might yearly chuse out of their own body two, to be as Ministers to these Officers; to judge certain causes referred to them from the Tribunes, take care of publick buildings and provisions. These were first called the Ministers and Assistants of the Tribunes; but afterward saith Dionysius from one of their Duties had the name of Ædiles. Many things of great consequence were committed to their trust, being very much like to the Avoranomi amongst the Greeks. Festus acknowledging that in the beginning Ædilis was a Magistrate who took care both of publick and private buildings, yet faith he was fo called, quod facilis ad eum plebis aditus effet. Truer is the derivation which Parro giveth, agreeable to that of Dionysius; that they were named Ædiles, from Æde: the buildings, of which they took care, or those particularly, wherein the Plebiscita were kept, of which they had the over-fight. This later Etymology is rendred by Pomponius, who in his second Book of the Original of Law, describing the several Offices of Magistracy, maketh the end of the constitution of the Ædiles to have been, that they might take care of that House where the Decrees of the People were laid up. Whence soever the word was derived it came out of Latium, being a name of certain Magistrates in the Latine Towns, as was also Dictator and Duumvir, as some observe out of Spartianus. To these Ædiles Plebis, who were instituted in the two hundred and feventy first year of the City, at the same time with the Tribunes, were added two more out of the Patritian order one hundred and seventeen years after, called for diffinction Adiles Curules, because they used the Curule Chair, whereas the other only fate on Benches, as the Tribunes and Quaftors. The occasion of creating those shall be shewn in its place, the end was only then for celebrating of Games.

45. This number continued till the time of C. Fulius Cefar, who in the feven ated also out of the Patritians. They were called (a) Cereales from Ceres, being appointed to take care of, and make Provision for Corn. This number of fix (a) Died lib. 43. thus diffinguished, continued till the time of Constantine, as is probably conjectured, and were as most other Offices of Magistracy taken away by him. The Ediles, faith (b) Ciero, are the Curators of the City, of Provisions, and of folern Lights.

Of the City, because they looked to publick works and Temples, made provision against Fires (which Augustus seemeth to have charged upon them saith Lipsus) had inspection over Funerals, and such like Rites of smaller moment; over Marriages and Adulteries, Baths, Aqueducts, Sinks, and Streets, both for repairing and cleanling of them. Of Provisions, for that they had the over-fight of all things to be fold, men, and other Creatures, determining, judging, and censuring by their words and Edicts. Of folemn Games, and only folemn (not votive and private ones) as the Ludi Florales, Circenses, Megalenfes, Romani, &c. Sometimes at their own charge they made these shews. and ever examined the Fables written before they were acted. And (whether from this inspection of Play-books it came or no is uncertain) they feem to have been Licensers and Judges of other Writings, being ordered by a Decree of the Senate, as (c) Tacitus telleth us, to burn the Papers of Cremutius Cordus. (c) Annal. It is further (d) observed, that the Generals when they returned home after some (d) Janus Victory, delivered up the Corn and Provisions which had been made prize to Galielman. them, as the Captives to the Pretor, and the Money to the Quaftor. All fuch Victuallers as offended against the Laws, as also Monopolizers and others that transgressed in this kind, they accused to the People, and with the Fines celebrated Games, made Presents to their Gods, or some publick works. Cariolano, ty, and presently laid Siege to Corioli a strongly fortified Town, and the head of the Nation. The Antiates coming to the relief of this place, he left part of the Army to continue the Siege under the Command of Titus Largius, and with the other went to give them battel. Largius attempting to from the Town, the Inhabitants fallied out, and charged the Romans fo furiously, that they forced them back into their Camp: all but a few whom C. Marcius, a Patritian of great Nobility, and greater Valour, kept about him. This Marcius with fo fmall a Company received the violence of the Enemy, and doing great execution, forced him at length into the Town, and following himself rushed in with him, whereat the besieged were so afrighted, that not confidering their own numbers, they fled to the contrary part of the City, and suffered him to let in the rest of the Army. When the Soldiers now fell to plunder, he suffered them not, but hasted to the Battel to help the Conful, and with the good news of his fuccess to chear the Army.

observed, that they took care that none but Roman Gods, and those after the Roman manner only, should be worshipped.

47. He defired of Cominius that he might be suffered with his men to fight a gainst the middle Battel, wherein the chief strength of the Enemies lay, which obtaining, he shewed there more valour than formerly, and was the greatest cause of the Victory. The day following the Conful gave him extraordinary commendations, and a good share of Booty before it came to be divided amongst the Soldiers; but he would accept of nothing except an Horse, which gained him greater Honour from the whole Army, and moved Posthumius to bestow the firname of Coriolanus upon him for his incomparable valour shewn at that place. The Volsai were by this overthrow forced to submission, and made their Peace.

This year was the League of Amity and Confederacy renewed with the Latines A. M. 3315. with all chearfulness, because they had been faithful in the late Sedition and War, V. C. 2 6 1. and had fent to congratulate for the Peace made betwixt Nobility and Com-Dati 29. mois. The Senate for this Civil Union decreed supplications or thanks to their 59, ceffe 2. Gods, a third feria or Holy day, to be added to the other two Latine Feria, where cio cost. of Tarquinius had dedicated one, when he conquered Hetruris, and the People the other after the banishment of Tarquinius. In this Consulship died also Merippa Menenius, whom the People out of gratitude resolved to bury at the publick charge, every man contributing fomething, because he died poor, and when the Senate would needs defray the charge out of the Treasury, they bestowed the money upon his Children. Now also the Census being celebrated above one hundred and ten thousand heads were Cessed.

48. The year following wherin T. Geganius Macerinus, and P. Minucius were Confuls, a great dearth fell upon the City, the effect of the late Sedition. For, the Commons having departed a little after the Autumnal Æquino-Etial, about the time of fowing, the Country was forfaken of Husbandmen; Dienny, 1.7. the richer fort betaking themselves to the Patritians, and the poorer to the Army, and the division continued till a little before Mid-winter. All the middle space of time there was no tillage, though it was most proper for fowing, and for fome time after the agreement, it could scarce be renewed, for that Slaves had run away, and there was great scarcity of Cattels by these means, for the year following they were little beforehand in Corn, either for feed or provisions. This put the Senate upon fending into feveral parts of Italy, and also into Sicily, to buy Corn. But notwithstanding their care, the multitude being exceedingly pinched with Famine, raifed tumults, getting together by companies, and laying all the fault upon the Fathers, as if by their wilful neglect they had in this way revenged themselves. The Volsei being acquainted with this new Sedition, and the weak Estate of Rome, conspired how to improve the advantage; but were diverted by a grievous plague, which fo raged, as Velitre a Noble City of that Country was almost utterly exhausted, the small remnant of the Inhabitants whereof gave up themselves to the Romans, desiring they would fend a Colony thither.

49. Of this advantage the Senate was very glad, to leffen the multitude of the City, and the poor were content to inhabit to fertil a place; but when they confidered the danger of infection, they were again discouraged, and wrested this to fo bad a sence, as to make it a design to destroy them. But the Senate laying a great penalty upon fuch as refused to go, many obeyed and went thither, as also to Norba a Latin Town. This inraged more such as staid behind, being still pinched by the famine, so that raising great multitudes, they called the Tribunes into the Comitium. Great strife hapned betwixt the Confuls and them; The Tribunes affirming they had promifed not to interrupt them in their discourses to the People, to which the other answered, that it was only when they called the People together, not when the Confuls themselves did it, as now they had done, to promife them all fair accommodation from the Senate. Hereupon Brutus, who being fo great a stickler before, was chosen one of the first Tribunes, devised a Law, which under such a penalty new Law in chosen one of the first Tribunes, deviled a Law, which under such a penalty behalf or the as the Tribunes should impose, forbad any one to contradict or interrupt them, Tribunes. when they fpoke to the People. Such as could or would not give fecurity for the payment of the fine, were to be put to death, and their goods be facred to Ceres. If any controversie arose about the fine, it was to be determined by the judgment

And this a

50. This Law being enacted by the fuffrages of the Tribes, caused greater disturbance; the Senate refusing to ratifie the resolves of the People, and the People the Decrees of the Senate; yet proceeded it not to any greater inconveniency than words, and some blows without weapons. For the poor broke not into the store-houses of the rich, but were content to purchase victuals at an excessive rate; and when money failed were contented with Roots and Herbs: neither did the rich deal harfhly with the poor, but carried it towards them as indulgent Fathers, fo that we must say, it was the infirmity of the Government, and not any bad disposition of the People which caused the Seditions. The Confuls, to divert their minds, and ease the charge, offered to lead them out into the Enemies Country, but sew or none would give their names; is that Martius Cortolanus with some Patritians, and a few of their Clients made incursions, and returned home loaden with booty; the knowledge whereof made the poorer fort murmur against their Tribunes, who had diffwaded them from the Expedition. The following Confuls M. Minucius Augurinus, and A. Sempronius Atratinus, fa mous for their abilities both in War and Peace, bent themselves, by making orovision for Corn, to allay the present distempers; though not with wished success. They procured much to be imported, and this Summer returned those that were fent into Sicily, with a great quantity of Wheat, whereof half they bought at a very cheap rate, and half was bestowed on them by Gelon, the Son of Dinomenes. Now the Patritians confidering how to dispose of the Corn; some were for felling it to the poor at case rates, thereby to win upon the multitude, but others urged they were to be harfhly used and afflicted; and the Corn to be fold to them on dear rates; that by necessity they might be brought to sobriety, and become subject to the Laws.

51. Amongst these was Coriolanus the chief, being offended with the Com- Sect. 1. mons, as was given out, for a repulse at the last election of Consuls. He had been ever an extraordinary affertor of the power of the Nobility, which made the People afraid to chuse him; but now incensed he much more shewed his inclination, openly declaiming against the innovation of the multitude, and exhorting others to refift the petulant endeavours of the Tribunes and rabble. The Confuls calling together the Senate, he inlarged himself in a fet speech to this purpose, and pressed that by force they should take away the Tribunelbip, as the only means for the recovery of the State; concluding with his opinion, that no favour at all should be shewed to the multitude in the sale of Corn. Some were offended with this freedom, perceiving what inconvenience it would bring; but others approving of it, the Tribunes who were present (fay both Dionysius and Plusarch) ran forth, and crying out, called the People together, and declared to them the effect of Marcius his speech. The multirude inraged, would have violated the Senate instantly, but that the Tribunes stayed them, laying the whole blame upon Marcius. They fent some Beadels for him to come and answer it before the People, but they returning with nothing but ill words, they Put all into 2 went themselves, and commanded the Ædiles to apprehend him. These were Brutus and Icilius the first Tribunes, who going to do what was injoyned, were repulfed and beaten by the young Patritians he had got about him. This put all into a flame, the whole City being gathered together and ready to defroy it felf; but by the wildom of the Confuls the matter was put off till the following day. Then the Confuls laboured to heall the breach, confirming as from the Fathers, what was formerly granted to the Commons, and palliating as much as might be the supposed offence of Marcius. The Tribunes answering, inveighed against the Senate, as desirous to break their faith, and laying open the fault of Marcius, concluded the action with a Decree of their College, That he should be forthwith cast down headlong from the Tarpeian Rock. For, having given him liberty to speak, he was so far from recanting his former speeches, that he slew out into the fame invectives, as they were termed 52. The Ædiles laying hands on him, the Patritians again rescued him, the fober part even of them taking it ill he should be condemned to death without due process, and the more understanding fort of the Commons not approving of the attempt; fo as a great tumult being raifed, the Tribunes nulled their former Decree, and fet him a day wherein to answer, and stand or fall by the judgement of the People. In the mean time the Senate, by felling the Corn at moderate rates, and by intreaties, fought either to procure the tryal to be utterly laid afide, or at least to defer it till the wrath of the multitude should be appealed, which was also to be imployed in a War against Antium. When the former could not be done, and the War was blown over, the Consuls being very unwilling to let the People take so much upon themselves, as without Decree of the Senate first had (according to the antient Custom) to pass their judgment in any case, procured the Tribunes first to sue out such a Decree, on this condition. that they might be heard speak their minds, and each Senator before he gave his judgment, swear folemnly, as was usual in judicatury process, to deliver what he thought most behoveful for the Publick. The Tribunes then argued much in the behalf of the Commons, who they faid had undergone the heat of all Wars, both in the time of Kings, in the expulsion of them, and fince in the inlarging the Roman Dominion; in confideration whereof, they could not in confcience have leffer privileges than of late they had obtained. They aggravated by feveral circumstances the Crime of Marcius, who in so high a manner had gone about to infringe them, and therefore as well for maintenance of right, as the fafety of the City, they defired he might be left to the justice of the People. Appins Claudus stifly impugned the Decree, arguing that the Senate would be enervated, and the Commonwealth betrayed, if they granted to the People power of judging

53. M. Valerius, and other popular men made a better construction of the People's defire, thinking they would use this power moderately, and in opposition to Appius his politick reasons, strangely conceived it would make for the security of the Commonwealth, and particular Members thereof, if the Commons were admitted to some share in the Government, that so it might neither wholly life in the Patritians nor Plebeians, but be tempered and poised betwixt both. He urged, that they had allayed the Kingly Power, by giving it to two annual Magistrates, and that therefore there was no fear of its degenerating into Ty-

Sect 1. ranny, being also awed by the overfight of three hundred most prudent and worthy persons, of which the Senate consisted. But for the Senate it self, there was no curb; so that it might afterwards (though of the present Members he had no cause to judge so) draw all things into extremity, and indeed ruine the State, except the People might be admitted to have an hand in the judgment of fuch faults as concerned the Commonwealth, as when any was accused of moving Sedition, affecting Tyranny, Treason, or the like crimes; because the more folemn and severe the Tryal was, ambitious men would be the more terrified from such attempts. The generality inclining to give up the man, Marcius demanded of the Tribunes whereof they would accuse him. They confulting with themselves apart, knew not well how to form an Impeachment out of his former words, which might pass with the Senate, and therefore answered, they would lay the affectation of Tyranny to his charge. Hereat he very chearfully put himfelf upon Tryal, not refusing the severest punishment, if it could be proved; and a Decree of the Senate passed accordingly, time being given him till the third Market day, to prepare for it. For a Market was kept once in nine days, at which time the People that lived in the Country, came either to Traffick, receive Justice, or give their Suffrages in such matters as either primarily concern'd them, or were referred from the Senate. When the day came, a greater multitude of Country-men than ever formerly was feen, early in the morning placed it felf in the Forum, and the Tribunes called the People to the Comitia Tributa, or Assemblies of the Tribes, severing each Tribe from another by cords. Now it having been the Custom for the People to give their Suffrages by Centuries in the Campus Martius in Arms, and under their Centurions, the Patritians called hard for them, and protested against this innovation; but by the other way of Centuries brought in by Servius, the ordinary fort of People being excluded, (for that most commonly the two first Classes carried it from the other four) the Tribunes would in no case suffer it, and the Crime of Coriolanus feeming to concern all alike, at length they obtained the confent of the Patritians

to this innovation. 54. Minucius the Consul beginning the action, declared the worth of the person now to be judged, and exhorting the People to mildness, fignified that the Senate became petitioners in his behalf. Sciences one of the Tribunes said, he would neither betray the liberty of the People, nor fuffer another to do it; therefore if the Patritians would, as they pretended, fubject him to their judgement, he would give forth the balls without any more to do, to which the Conful replyed, they did fo, but on this condition, that he should answer to the charge of the affected Tyranny, and therewith protesting, went down. Sicinius then ripping up all that ever Coriolanus did, that might any way make for his purpose, laboured to put a bad construction upon it. But when the party came to speak, he so related what particular services he had done the State, and shewed the Skars received all over his Body; withal, those that he had faved in the Wars, made fuch lamentation in his behalf, that the People generally cried out he was to be discharged. Then Decius another of the Tribunes ftepping up, faid, that feeing the Senate, as the Conful alleged, had absolved Marcius from those words he had spoken in their house, and suffered him not to be accused for them, he would wave his words, and come to actions, by which he would make good the charge. There was a certain Law that all Booty and Plunder got in War, should be appropriated to publick use, fo as no General was to meddle with it, but give it up into the hands of the Questor. Now, whereas no man ever brake this Law, or so much as spake against it, this Marcius, faith he, hath dared to contemn it; for when in the late incursion into the Territories of Antium, we had got great plenty of Slaves, Cattel, and Provisions, he neither delivered these things up to the Qua-Stor, nor payed any money unto the Treasury, but divided all the Booty amongst his friends, which could not but be taken as an argument that he intended to inflave his Country, it being the Custom of Tyrants, this way to procure themselves instruments for their purpose. Though he had done this not with any finister intention, but for the service of his Country, at such time as all were full of Seditions at home, and the Enemy from abroad wasted the Roman Territories; yet the multitude interpreted it in the same sence as Decius, and the whole matter was quite changed; he being abashed at so unexpected a charge, and the Confuls and Patritians utterly to feek what to answer. The Tribunes named perpetual banishment, and gathered the suffrages of the Tribes,

55. This was the first sentence passed by the people upon any Patritian, and henceforth the Tribunes were wont to fet the day to whomfoever they pleased; whereby the power of the Commons was inlarged exceedingly, and the Interest of the Patritians was more and more diminished; Plebeians at length being admitted into the Senate, Offices, and Priefthoods, which in former times were only communicated to the other: the Senate partly against their wills and by constraint, partly by a wife foresight giving way to it, as will be seen in due place. Marius being accompanied home with the lamentations and tears of many, faluted his Mother, Wife, and Children, as they made pitiful complaints, and without any appearance of trouble, bidding them bear their condition cheerfully, straitway departed out of the City, attended only by a few Clients, and without any thing to bear his charges. He went to An pionifins Halitium, and there in the habit and posture of an obnoxious suppliant betook sanass. 1. 8. himself to Tullus Aitius, a man of royal condition amongst the Volsci, both for Nobility, Riches, and Valour, whom he knew to be his greatest Enemy in that Nation, because in battel they had often challenged each other, and out of Æmulation added a private to the publick hatred. But knowing him to be of a magnanimous mind, and most willing to catch hold of any advantage against the Romans, he cast himself at his feet, bidding him either avenge his Countrey of him, or elfe him against Rome, which by her unnatural carriage toward him had forfeited all duty and fervice that she might have expected at his hands. Tullus imbracing him with fingular kindness, resolved to make use of his great abilities. Marcius advised that some fair pretext might first be fought for War, and for that purpose sending many of the Volsei to behold the solemn Games at Rome, caused one to go to the Consuls, and accuse them of having some design against the City, that so they forcing them out on a sudden, might be faid to have broken the peace. This accordingly succeeding (for the Confuls commanded all by Proclamation to be gone before Sun fet) Tullus fo aggravated the matter to his Country-men, that he procured them to fend to Rome to demand back all the Towns and Territories which by War had been taken from

56. The Senate taking the message in great scorn, answered, that if the Volsi first took up Arms, the Romans would last lay them down. Tullus then perswading the Volsci to the War, procured Marcius to be joyned with him as General, with full power, who presently invading the Roman Dominions, wasted all such grounds where ere he came as belonged to the Plebeians, not fuffering any thing to be touched which belonged to any of the Nobility. His design was accomplished; for this raised great envy and malice against the Patritians, who upbraiding the people that they had banished unjustly so considerable a man, were accused with greater indignation, that to be revenged for former injuries they had procured Marcius to invade the Countrey, feeing they were idle spectators, when others were undone, and kept their goods, being out of all danger of the War. Coriolanus leading home his men richly laden with Booty, was feat out shortly after with one half of the Forces, and taking by furrender the Town of the Circeians, a Roman Colony, thence invaded the Latines, who being Confederates with Rome fent thither for relief; but the common people were averse to the War, and the Consuls being almost out of their Office were unwilling to begin any thing; fo that the Messengers were dismissed without any satisfactory answer. Marcius then by storm took Tolerium, Lavici, Pes, and Bola, which he plundered, and made the Inhabitants Slaves. Such as yielded he mildly treated, but having flormed Bola, which lay within thirteen miles of Rome, he put almost all to the fword that were of age. The Volsci now so admired him, that such as were left to defend the Towns would not stay, but all slocked to him, owning him only for their General. At Rome there was nothing but confusion, all being in despair, and seeking no relief any other way then by venting their spleen one against another : but when news came that Lavinium was befieged, it made a marvelous, yet abfurd change in their minds. The people now cried out that Coriolanus was to be restored by a repeal of the Decree for banishment, but the Senate utterly refused to affent to it, and plainly forbad it in full house; either for that they defired to oppose the people in all things, or would not have his reftitution afcribed to the Commons; or elfe were incenfed against Marcius, who was become Enemy to all, though to his restitution, the custom requiring that the Fathers should propound. Marcius hereupon rose from before Lavinium, and marching towards Rome it self. pitched his Camp at the Ditches of Clalia, five miles from the City. This forced Senate and People into agreement, all in common being feized with horrour and amazement, so that it was agreed a Message should be fent to him, offering him his restitution. The Messengers were Patritians, and such as for their love to him he had most cause to favour; but though with all advantage possible they made their address, yet he received them with wonderful severity in a Council of Officers, and gave them this answer, that if they would expect Peace, they should restore to the Volsci all Towns and Territories taken away in War: and make them free of the City as the Latines were: and he would give them thirty days time to consider of it. Hereat the Captains of the Volsci, especially Tullus, took occasion to malign him, though he employed this time of Truce very profitably, fubduing feven great and ftrong Towns. When the time was out, and he returned, another Message came to him, desiring that refraining himself he would draw off the Volci, and then confult in common; for they would do nothing by constraint or fear: but if he thought the Volsci were to be gratified, they would yield to him if they would lay down their Arms. He replied, he carried himself not as General of the Volsci, but as a Roman Citizen, and defired, that, having a respect to justice and moderation, they would return within three days with a grant of what he had formerly demanded; else he must proceed in his enterprize. Hereupon the Senate, in so great a Tempest which threatned all, betook them to their facred Anchor as they accounted it, and ordered all the Pontifices, Priests, Governours of their superstitious Houses and Augurs, in their several habits, should go and befeech him to compose the matter: but neither was Marcius moved with this Pompous train; but required they should either accept of the terms, or expect hostility to the utmost.

58. The Priests being returned, the Citizens were warned to be ready at the Walls, thence to repel the Enemy if he came, for that no other hope remained, than what time, and viciflitude of Fortune might afford. The whole City being full of Tumults, trembling, and amazement, the Women flocked to the Temples, but the most, and especially the chiefest, made their supplications at the Altar of Fupiter in the Capitol. Amongst these was Valeria the Sister of Poplicola, into whose mind came this device, that they should go to Veturia (fay Dionysius and Livy) or Volumnia (saith Plutarch) the mother of Coriolanus, and procure her, with Volumnia (fay they) or Virgilia (faith he) her daughterin-law, to go, and interceed for their Countrey. Veturia earnestly pressed to undertake lo pious a work, answered, they had little hopes to obtain their fute, for that her Son had never fent to fee them fince his departure, being fallen out with his own family as well as his Country; yet she was ready to improve that interest she had in him, and set forth towards him with her daughter in-law, and two Nephews. Coriolanus feeing the women come, refolved fully to give them a denial, but when he perceived his Mother amongst them, he descended from his Tribunal, and went to meet her. Having courteoutly received her with his Wife and Children, he gave ear to her request, which she made with all the Oratory that she could compass out of the impending ruin of his own Country, and the infamy which would necessarily follow a fruitless attempt. When herewith the could not prevail, the put him in mind how much Nature, together with a careful education of him in her Widdow-hood, had ingaged him to obedience, and in conclusion cast her self down at his Feet which she imbraced and kissed. He presently lift her up, and cried out, Mother, thou hast got the A. M. 3517. Vistory, advantageous to my Country, but destructive to my self, and accordingly 0: 7; and drew off the Polse into their own Country, who were variously affected V.C. 186.

Some blamed both him and the Action: others that were studious of Peace 5, Mails did neither; and fome, though they condemned the thing, yet absolved the man, Sex. Paris who was constrained by so great necessity to do it; yet none refused to obey his orders, but followed him, more through the authority of his Virtue than of 59. But when he was come to Antium, Tullus, the great Emulator of his Glory, supposing he had a sufficient advantage against him, required him to lay down his Office, and give an account of his actions to the People. He refused to re- Sect. i fign his place, except commanded by the People to do it, unto which he faid he was not afraid to give an account of any thing he had done, at that prefent. The people being called together, the principal of Tullus his faction infligated them against him, but when he rose to speak for himself, those turbulent spirits for shame gave way, and all sober and peaceable men openly declared they would hear him candidly, and judge him according to right and equity. Tullus then fearing the man's eloquence, and fufficiently apprehensive how much repute the very Crime objected would bring him (for they could not feem to be injured by him in not taking Rome, without confidering that he had brought things to that pass by his incredible valour and dexterity, that they were near taking of it) would not expect the judgment of the multitude, but crying out with his complices, that the betrayer of the Volsci was not to be suffered to hold the Tyranny over them by refusing to lay down his Office, rushed out, and slew him in the place. Though no man flood up in his defence, yet that this wicked act displeased most, it presently appeared. For upon report of his death they came generally out of the Towns and buried him honourably, adorning his Sepulchre, as of a General and a famous Warrier, with Arms and Trophies. Such was the end of the Eminentest Man of that age for valour, who by his four rigidity procured extreme hazard to his Country, and destruction to himself, whilst he preferred private revenge before publick good, and yet would not ftoop to any provision

60. At Rome upon Marcius his retreat was fuch exultation, as is suitable to the joy of those that are rescued from utter desolation. The Senate Decreed to the women what honours they would ask, but they only defired they might build a Chappel to Women's Fortune, in the place where they had delivered their Country, which was done at the publick charge, and they at their own dedicated the Image. When the death of Coriolanus was heard, there was neither expression of joy nor forrow further than this, that the women were permitted to mourn for him ten months: the longest time allowed by Numa for the nearest relations, according to Plutarch. The Consuls not long after took the field with a confiderable Army, but had no occasion to make tryal of it; for the Volsci and Aqui joyning their Forces together resolved to take the Romans unprovided; but in their march they fell out about a General, of whether Nation he should be, and from words to blows, in such a manner that they fought a great Battel, and if night had not severed them, one party had been utterly destroyed. The year following the new Confuls, C. Aquilius and T. Sicinius, overthrew, the one the Hernici and the other the Volsei, amongst whom fell Tullus Actius, a man of personal valour, but no good conduct. Their Successors, Proculus Virginius, and Sp. Cassius took the field with the Legions; the Aqui falling to the former, as the Folici and Henrici to the later. The Folici prefently asked Peace, having in the last battel lost the flower of their strength, and after them shortly the Hernici, refusing any more to contest for equality with the Romans. Cassius having received money and provisions, as from such as confessed

61 After a long debate, the Fathers resolved they should be received into amity, and that Cassius at his discretion might prescribe the conditions of the League, confirming whatfoever they should be. Cassius returning home, asked, and obtained a Triumph, though he had neither taken any City, worfted any Enemy, nor had any Captives or Spoils for ornament of the folemnity, which possessed men with an apprehension of his arrogancy, and procured him envy. After his triumph he published as conditions of peace, the very same that were granted to the Latines, which gave great distaste, it being conceived an unworthy thing to make strangers equal in privilege with their kinsmen the Latines; fuch as could allege no merit, with those who had exceedingly well deserved of the State: the Patritians took it also disdainfully that he would determine fully on his own head a matter of fuch weight, without asking any of them his advice. His rhree Consulthips, and two Triumphs, made him seem to himself far superiour to any of the same rank, so that no less than the Principallity would now content him. Knowing that the ordinary way to it was to gain the favour of the People, by some great act of kindness, he resolved upon that course, and first to divide amongst them certain publick grounds, which through the neglect of the Magistrates, had been seized on, and possessed by the rich. The success themselves conquered, gave them truce, and referred them for conditions to the

Sect. 1. might have been dubious had he stayed here; but he would also have the Latines into the Lot with the Hernici his new denizons, that he might procure the Favour of those Nations. The day after his Triumph, calling together the People according to the Custom, he recalled to their memories the great services he had done in his feveral Confulfhips: how in the first he had subdued the Sabines, in the second reduced the Commons into the City, after the appealing of the Sedition, as also received the Latines into fellowship and Communion: in the third, the Volsei of Enemies were made Friends, and the Hernici, a great and powerful Nation, received into close and inward confederacy. By these discourses he infinuated, as if above all others he took charge of the Commonwealth, and so would continue to do. And he concluded with a promise to do more for the Commons, than any man ever did who was most in favour, and that should presently appear.

62. The day following, he called together the Senate, which was very much troubled at his Speech, and declared, that because the Common People were very useful both in procuring Dominion, and defending Liberty, it was convenient to divide to them those publick Grounds, which were most impudently held from the State by some Patritians, and pay the money back out of the Treasury, that they had laid out for that Corn, which being given freely to the City by Gelon the Tyrant of Sicily, ought to have been divided amongst the Inhabitants. The Fathers heard him with great disdain, and rejected the motion, his Colleague Virginius grievously acculing him as leditious. For several daies after, Cassius discour-fed of this to the People, and Virginius held the Senate consulting how to withstand him. The Tribunes of the People at length, either for that they were jealous of fome defign, or were displeased that they themselves had not first propo-fed this thing, withstood it, alleging it was an unjust thing that what they had dearly purchased with their Labour and Blood, should be common to Strangers as well as themselves. As this raised some difflike, so Cassius again drew them to his party, by propounding that the Grounds might be divided amongst such as had most need, and by urging that it was better to have a little, than by expecting much to be frustrated of all. As the People were thus perswaded to and fro, C. Rabuleius one of the Tribunes found out a way, which for the prefent ended the dispute. Virginius pretending that he was for a division of the Grounds, but not unto Foreiners, hoping that these would ever be joyned; and Cassius being both for Citizens and Strangers; he took them both at their words; for the one and the other yielding there should be a division, he bade the People accept of that. and defer that wherein they differted to another time,

63. For fome days after this, Cassius kept his house, pretending sickness, and studied how he might cause his Law, called Lex Agraria, to pass by force. For this purpose he sent for the Latines and Hernici to be present at the Comitia, that he might carry it by greater number of Voices, so as the City was filled with them. Virginius hereupon made Proclamation, that all fuch as dwelt not in the City, should depart within a fhort time prefixed, and Caffius caused it to be proclaimed, that all fuch as were free should stay till the matter were determined. No end of the contention appearing, the Fathers feared it might come to Blows, or further inconvenience, and therefore affembled to make some effectual provision for the pub-

64. After a little debate they came to this resolution, that ten men of Confular dignity should be created to survey the Grounds, and declare how much of them was to be let out to farm, and how much divided to the People. That it should be declared, that for as much as it was inequitable for the new Affociates, or Denizons, to expect part in fuch Lands as were gained to the State before their admission, if any afterward should be got by their assistance, to each several People should be affigned it's portion, according to the League. That for the choice of the ten men, and the distribution of the Ground, the succeeding Consuls should make provision. This Decree being published to the People, appealed all, and frustrated the design of Cassius.

His defign

65. In the year following, being the first of the seventy fourth Olympiad, A. M. 2521. noble young men, Cefo Fabius, the Brother of the Conful, and L. Valerius the Grand-son of Poplicola, being Quastors, and thereby having authority to assemble the People, fet a day to Calfius the late Conful to answer in the Comitia to the charge of affected Tyranny. Then in full Affembly did they lay open his actions; how he had bestowed upon the Latines the third part of the Plunder, who thought it happiness sufficient to be made free of the City: then the Hernici, who could expect no less than to be deprived of their own Lands, he chose rather to make Friends than Subjects, and Citizens than Tributaries. whence both grounds and plunder being divided into three parts, two of these must go to Subjects, and Strangers, so that if it were found necessary afterwards to give others the same privilege of the City, the Roman Citizens being by right Lords of all, should not have remaining one third to themselves. They aggravated this with the management of the business, as his doing all without confulting the Fathers, and against the interposition of the Tribunes. That these things tended to the defigned establishment of a Tyranny, they proved from the money and arms wherewith the Latines and Hernici had furnished him. as also from the company of front young men of those Nations which he had about his person. In testimony hereof they produced several credible persons, both Citizens and Affociates, who averred it. To these the People giving cre-He is con-demed, and with many Friends and Clients accompanied him in mourning habit, and in-put to death terceded for him; notwithfranding all his fervices and the latest accompanied him in mourning habit, and interceded for him; notwithstanding all his services, and the honour obtained by them, they would not at all pity him, but out of extream hatred to Tyranny condemned the man, and that to death, left being banished, he should procure the State fuch trouble and danger as Marcius lately had done. Therefore judgment being passed, the Questors presently led him to the Rock near to the Forum, and thence call him down headlong in the fight of the People, this being the then ordinary kind of punishment. His Estate was conficated, and his house razed. Some would have had his Sons also put to death, but the Senate refused to use such feverity, and at Rome the children never fuffered for their Father's fault, although for high Treason, till the Marsian War, wherein those that broke the custom miscarried, and he who destroyed them restored it to the State, as Dionysius observeth, who disliketh the practice of some of his Countrey-men the Gracians, in killing, or condemning to perpetual banishment the fons of Tyrants

The Persian Empire.

66. By the death of Caffius the Patritians were more elevated, and the Commons grieved after they faw this, and confidered how ferviceable a man to their interest, as they foolishly thought, they had cut off. They now called hard for the Execution of the Agrarian Law, but the Senate being refolved to put it off, caused the Consuls to make provision for an Expedition. None would give their names, and the Tribunes interpoling hindred the Confuls from punishing any but it being given out that a Dictator would be created, the multitude fearing to fall into the hands of Appius, lifted themselves, and so Cornelius wasted the Territories of the Veientines, as Fabius those of the Equi. The year following, being the two hundredth and seventieth of the City, when Nicodemus was Archon at Athens, the Patritians procured Cafo Fabius one of Cassius his accusers, and L. E. milius, to be created Confuls, during whose Office all was quiet at home, the Volses renewing the War upon the Romans. Fabius was fent to the affistance of the Latines and Hernici whom they had invaded, and Æmilius led the other part of the Forces to Antium, where he was worsted by the Volsei, and being forced to desert his Camp, had with his whole Army been cut off, but that his Colleague in good time fent some choice Companies to recruit him. For the next year M. Fabius Brother to Cafo, and L. Valerius Son of Marcus, who put Caffins to death, being Consuls, proposed it to the Senate to fill up the Army at Antium. A Decree passing for new Levies, the People refused to be listed, calling for the division of the grounds, and one of the Tribunes withstood the Confuls. This put them upon this device, to fit in the Campus Martius, where who for the tribunes cutting his trees, and pulling down his house; or if he hird grounds, by driving away his Cattel, or other ways, the Tribune not being able to do them any good for that the power of his Office was confined within the walls, so as it was unlawful for them tolye one night out of the City, except in the Latine feria, where all the Magistrates for the common fafety were wont to facrifize in the Albanian

> 67. This forced the Commons to Submit, and so the Consuls making Levies led out the Legions, Fabius to the defence of the Affociates, and Valerius against the Volsi; who ingaging with him in battel, came off on equal terms; and

Mount unto Fupiter.

Sect. 1. afterwards neither part were forward to fight, It was believed in the City, that the Roman Army wilfully neglected an opportunity of Victory, out of hatred against the Consul, whom they despised as a man of no experience, and in revenge against the Fathers who had so long frustrated their hopes about the divifion of publick grounds. At this time one of the Veftal Nuns Opimia by name, being convicted of Incontinency, was flut up within the ground in the Forum, and her corrupters scourged and put to death. At the next election of Confuls there was great contention, the Patritians having a defire to prefer fome in whom they could confide, and particularly pitching upon the fon of Appius, a man of the same temper with his Father, and the Commons as much labouring the Contrary. When the Confuls held the Comitia, the Tribunes interposed, and when the Tribunes called the People together, the Confulls would not fuffer any thing to be done, contending that it belonged to their Office. Both parties being incompassed with those of their Factions, railed, and sometimes came to Commotions in the City. hand-cuffs, fo that worse threatning, and the Senate consulting what was to be done, some moved to have a Dictator named, who might first correct all diftempers of late brought in, and then deliver the power to men of approved integrity; but a middle way pleased; to create Interreges for holding of the Assemblies. The first was A. Sempronius, who for his five days governing affairs in a peaceable manner, the other Magistrates having laid down, created according to the manner Sp. Largius. He in the Centuriata Comitia made Consuls with the well liking of both fides, C. Fulius a favourite of the Commons, and Q. Fabius now the second time elected, a man addicted to the power of the great ones. In their Consulship the Equi and Vientes invaded the Roman Territories, and did much hurt. Against the later they were sent with the Legions, after some contest with the People (who were hardly drawn in by Largius, because the Senate had now deferred the execution of the Agrarian Law five years) and harrazing the Country returned home with much spoil; neither was any thing else of moment done that year. 68. The year following (which was the first of the seventy fifth Olympiad, wherein Xerxes made his Expedition into Greece, Callias being Archon at Athens) Diengl. 1.9. had for Confuls C.eso Fabius again, and Sp. Furius, to whom came messengers from the Latines, desiring assistance against the insolence of the Aqui; and all Hetruria was reported now to be in Arms at the defire of the Veientes. The Confuls were ordered to affift the one, and suppress betimes the other; but when they came to raife men, Icilius one of the Tribunes interposed upon the old pretence of the Agrarian Law. The work being hereby hindred, Appius advised the Senate to set one Tribune against another, by drawing over some of them unto their fide, as the only way to abate the power of that Office now fo facred and inviolable. This course both at present and afterwards was effectual, and the Confuls with their Armies departed each one into his province; Furius against the Aqui, and Fabius into Hetruria. Furius harrazed the Enemies Country, and returned home with great Booty. Fabius, though an able Warriour, was so hated by his men, that when they had in battel routed the Enemy, they refused to pursue or do any thing more, but departing against his command to their Camp, thence also marched home, left they should procure him the honour of a Triumph. The following Confuls Cn. Manlius, and M. Fabius, again were both fent to carry on the War in Hetruria, where they held the Soldiers in the Camp fo long, till the Enemy was ready to fall upon it, and for shame they defired to be led forth. Fabius taking this opportunity, upbraided them with their disobedience to the Conful the last year, in that place; and shewing them how little cause he and his Colleague had to trust them, having sufficiently humbled them, led them forth. A greater and longer battel was never fought by the Romans, who were thought to be Victors only, because the Hetruscans, the night following, forsook their Tents. Manlius was flain, and for that cause his Colleague refused the Triumph, faying, it was not right for him to take the Laurel at his Funerals. Having disbanded his Army, he laid down his Office two months befor the time, because his wounds disabled him for service; and by the second Interrex in the Comitia, were declared Conful Cafo Fabius his brother (who having extraordinarily deserved in the late battel, was now honoured with this Office the chird time) and T. Virginius.

69. Virginius being fent into Hetruria against the Veientes, was overpowered by them, and had loft his whole Army, but that Fabius upon the intimation of his extreme necessity came out of the Country of the Equi, and brought him off. When the Romans were retreated, the Veientes made excursions very Sect. 1. near the City, to the great loss and disparagement of the State. The Senate found it necessary to have a constant Guard upon the Borders; but the Treasury was low, the Tributes of private men were not fufficient for this new charge, and it feemed that none would give their Names willingly to fo conftant a Work. When they were at a stand, the whole Family of the Fabii, by the procurement of

The Persian Empire.

The Family of the Conful, voluntarily offered to take both the charge and trouble upon it felf only, which was gratefully accepted. The Fabii then under conduct of Marcus the last year's Conful, fortified a Castle near the River Cremera, and not far from Veii. Their whole number was at first four thousand, whereof their Clients and Friends made up the greater part, and of fuch as bore the name of the Family there were three hundred and fix: afterwards another Company followed. being led by Caso Fabius the Conful. Out of this Castle, which they named Cremera from the River, they made excursions, and much endamaged the Enemy. This caused the Veientes again to implore the aid of all Hetruria, which making preparations, news came that the Æqui and Volsei also had agreed upon an invasion. The Senate hereupon ordered their Armies to be provided, whereof L. Amilius the next years Conful led one against the Hetrusci, with whom joyned Cafo Babius as proconful. C. Servilius the other Conful, marched with another part against the Volsei: and Ser. Furius with the third against the Agui, having also the power of Proconful. Furius no less happily than sodainly finished his work. Servilius rashly managing his affairs lost many men, and not daring to adventure all in a Battel, drew out the War in length; but Amilius giving Battel to the Veientes and their Affociates, overthrew them, and then storming their Camp, forced them to beg Peace.

70. Having purchased a Truce by the grant of Provisions for two months to the Confuls Army, and fix months pay, they had leave to fend to the Senate. The Fathers upon reading of Amilius his Letters, who advised them by all means to finish the War, resolved to make Peace, and left the Conditions thereof to him. He having a respect rather to equity than the profit of the Conquerours, made a League with them, neither taking from them any Grounds, nor any more Money, nor receiving any Hostages to secure their obedience, which procured him much evil will, and deprived him of the due honour of a Triumph. They ordered him to affift his Colleague against the Volsei; but he complaining grievoully of them to the People, and fuggefting to the Multitude that they were angry, because the War was finished, out of a desire to have the Peoples thoughts diverted from the Agrarian Law, disbanded his Army, as also that of Furius, and hereby afforded much matter for contention betwixt the Nobility and Commons. The year following, being the first of the seventy fixth Olympiad, wherein Scamander of Mitylene was Victor in the course, and Phadon Archon at Athens. the new Confuls, C. Horatius, and T. Menenius, found some obstruction in the Levies; the Commons still complaining that the Agrarian Law was not executed. But necessity cut off the dispute, eleven several Cities of Hetruria having declared against the Veientes, for making Peace without publick consent, and forced them to break it. The pretence was, for that the Fabii were not drawn off from Cremera, who fending Intelligence to the Senate of this intended breach, it ordered Menenius to march into Hetruria, as Horatius against the Volsci. While Menenius loitered in his Expedition, Cremera was taken, and the Fabii all cut off. Some wrote that it was by an Ambush, as they were returning to Rome, to sacrifize for the whole Family, according to their custom. But others delivered more probably, that being accustomed to make depredations, they were drawn into Snairs by the Hetruscans (who caused herds of Cattel to be driven thither, where they had bestowed a sufficient quantity of men) and being overpowred, were all at length destroyed, though with the great loss of the Assaliants, except such as they hadlest to keep the Cattel. These were so far from being discouraged at what had befallen their Fellows, that they also stood it out to the last man, enduring all extremity, and fighting when halfdead, with Weapons wrefted from the Hands of their Enemies.

71. A Tradition remained to posterity, that three hundred and six of this Fa. mily being cut off, none remained except one Boy, who for his youth could not serve in the Expedition. Dionysius sheweth the Vanity hereof, by these reasons. 1. All except one could not be unmaried, or without Children, for an antient Law commanded all at a legitimate age to marry, and provide for Posterity, which being diligently observed till their age, the Fabii alone would not contemn:

Rathers living transposition for the state of the provision of the p Fathers living, yet would it be a prodigious thing to suppose that none of them left any Son as yet an Infant, a Wife with Child, or a young Brother. This is true, that of the three Brothers, Cafo, Marcus, and Quintus, in the Family of whom the Confulship had continued for seven years, Marcus only left a young Son, befides whome none of this Name afterwards being famous, thence the report might rife that none else was preserved. The Veientes having recovered the Castle, went confidently against the Roman Legions, which lay incamped not far off, and as was thought might have relieved the Fabii, but that Menenius the Conful out of envy would not make use of the opportunity. They took the advantage of his unskilfulness, and seized on an Hill near unto him, where placing a Guard, they made Sallies upon the Camp, and so straightned it, that they brought him to fight upon very unequal terms, and put his Army to the worst. The Romans for look their Camp, and fled in so tumultuous a manner, that had the Veientes not been too greedy of Plunder, they might utterly have destroyed them. The day following they invaded the Roman Territories, and came as far as the Hill Faniculus, two miles from the City, whereon they feized, and thence made excursions to the great difgrace of the Romans. Horatius the other Consul returning from the Volsci, overthrew them twice, and gave the People some refpit from their fear. The following year two skilful men in Military matters, Sp. Servilius and A. Virginius, entred the Confulship after the Summer solftice in the month Sextilis. Now the Hetruscan War, though difficult enough, feemed profitable, compared with domestick Affairs; for the feizing upon the Mount, and the depredations thence made had hindred Tillage for the last Winter, and no Traffick having been for that time, there was fuch fearcity of Corn that the City was brought into extream want, containing one hundred and ten thousand men of ripe age, as appeared at the next Cenfus, befides Women and Children, Slaves, Merchants, and Artificers (for no Roman Citizen was allowed to keep a Victualling-house, or to exercise any fordid Trade) thrice as many. The People made great Tumults, and were ready to take away violently the provisions of the rich: the Tribunes also made great disturbance. 73. The Confuls laboured to fatisfie the poorest fort by buying in all they could, and caufing fuch as had Corn to fellit, till their Levies were finished. Then led they out by night against the Enemy, and passing the River before day, unexpectedly fell upon him, and got a bloody Victory: after which the Mount was for fak-Mountain fined en by the Garrison, which having no relief sent in, retired to Veii. This War being ended, Menenius the last years Conful was called to an account, and concarriage of the demned in a pecuniary Mulct for fuffering the Fabii to miscarry, whom the people fo gratefully effeemed, that they hated all who feemed to have been to blame as to their defeat, and placed the day thereof amongst their Nefasti, or unlucky ones, wherein no good Work was to be begun. The following year also, when Servilius was out of his Office, he was called before the people, for that in the last Battel against the Hetruscans, he had so unadvisedly pursued the Enemy, as thereby to lose the Flower of his Army; but the Mans abilities being considercd, and his own defence with that of his Collegue weighed (who defired either to fland or fall with him) he was acquitted. This year and that following, the Veientes were fo overpowred, having been overthrown in Battel together with their Affociates the Sabines, and now closely befieged, begged Peace once more, and having with a whole years pay for the Confuls Army, and money for two months provision purchased leave to send to the Senate, obtained a Truce for fourty years. The next year being the first of the seventy seventh Olympiad, wherein Dates an Argive was Victor, and Chares Archon, L. Æmilius Mamercus the third time, and Vopifcus Julius were Confuls. Their Confulship was very turbulent through the attemps of Cn. Genatius Tribune of the People, who required them to divide the Grounds formerly Decreed to the people by the Senate.

Because he could not compel his Superiours, he set the day to Manlius and Furing, the last year's Consuls, to answer before the People, why they did not divide the grounds, prefending some reasons wherefore they ought to be questioned more than others, though it was now twelve years fince the paffing of the Decree, and alleging, that except the prefent Magistrates were quickned by a sence of punishment inflicted upon others, they would never fer upon

74. The Patritians exceedingly startled at so bold and impudent an attempt refolved by force of Arms, if fairer means would not prevail, to protect the accused, and the City might have been in blood had not Genatius died suddenly that very morning, no fign of violence appearing on the Body. This allayed the fury of the milititude, and the Sedition might have been quite appealed, had the Confuls born their fuccels with moderation, and confidered what was fitting for the time. But making new Levies, they would force one P. Volero, who had before time been an Officer, to go in the prefent expedition as a Common Soldier, and when he alleged that he ought not to be compelled fo to ferve, for that he had not deferved it by any offence, they commanded him to be strip't and beaten. He flying to the affiftance of the Tribunes appealed to the People, wherewith they not being at all moved, he became a Tribune to himself, with blows repelling one or two Lictors: and when the Confuls fent all their Officers to take him, fuch Phbeians as stood by calling one upon another rescued him from their hands. This diverted mens minds from thoughts of Land, and raifed a zeal for privilege and liberty; the Patritians complaining that the Chief Magistrates should be so contemned, and the Plebeians alleging it was a great breach upon their right for a Roman Citizen not to be heard when he appealed to the people, but scourged like a Slave: and they demanded Justice of the Senate against the Consuls; with these stirs, without any other thing of moment, was their Confulfhip paffed over. For the following year Volero an impudent fellow, obtained, though a man of meanest condition, to be Tribune, having made himfelf popular by relifting that Office, which was once equal to the Kingly, and promiting that he would clip the power of the great ones. He proposed a Law for holding the Alfemblies of Tribes at the Election of Tribunes, instead of the other of the Curia, betwixt which there was this difference. In the Curiata Comitia were fuch things treated on, and confirmed by the suffrages of the Curia, as the Senate had first Decreed, and that with the Austicia; for except the birds predicted good, the Comitia were null and frustrate. But the Tributa Comitia were managed without any confulting of the Senate, without the fuperflitious observation of birds (called Auspicia, and observed at the Election also of Patritian Magistrates) and all things were determined by the suffrages of the Tribes gathered apart.

which time the Patritians improving all their interest, Volero resolved by force to keep them from the Comitia, and the Confuls from difwading the thing, because they carried mighty highly, and with their friends, and Clients, took up a great part of the Forum. He was prevented by a grievous plague, which like a Torrent carried away multitudes, so as his year being out before he could accomplish his design, by his great promises he obtained to be Tribune again, as also his two Collegues who sided with him in this enterprize. The Fathers to ballance him procured to be made Conful Appius Claudius, the Son of Appius, absent, against his will, and to their own prejudice. His Collegue was T.Q. Quintins Capitolinus, of a contrary disposition. Appius was all for Wars, that by expeditions the multitudes might be diverted from Seditious Attempts, the effects of idleness; and Quintius contended that causes were not to be sought for, left the ordinary fort being forced to unnecessary War, should break out into rage, and trample Magistracy under their feet; and the Government being his, faith Dionystus, this month, he prevailed. But Volero renewed his endeavour for the Law, and thereto added, that the Adiles should be ele-Eted by the Tribsta Comitia, as also whatsoever should concern the Commons, might be transacted, and passed in them, which tended to no other than to transfer the power from the Senate to the people. Appins now earnestly pressed Lila

76. Quintius to this purpose made a seasonable Speech in the Assembly, and fo far prevailed, that the Law as unjust had been laid aside, but that his Collegue used, though just and true, yet unseasonable words, speaking to the Commons, not as free Citizens, who had an hand in making, and abrogating Laws, but as a rabble of base persons. He upbraided them with unthriftiness, defrauding of their Creditors, revolting from the Confuls, and voluntary Exile; as also perjury, and rurning of the Weapons taken up in defence of their Country, into its bowels. He said, it was no wonder that such as they were should proceed thus from one wicked Act to another, inflancing in their feditious Attempts for the gaining of the just power of the Patritians, Having spared no contumelious, or afronting language, he came to that which gave most offence : that the State would never be at rest so long as the Tribunitial power remained; for as much as it was impossible that what took its Original from violence, iniquity, fedition, fear of a Civil War, and other abominable things, could produce any profitable effects. He concluded with an affeveration, that as long as he was Conful, he would neither fuffer this, nor any other Law to pass without approbation of the Senate, and this he would stand by, both with Words and Deeds also if need should require; so that, if never before, they should learn in his Office, of what force was the Confulthip. Then stood up C. Lictorius, the principal man amongst the Tribunes, and in answer to his accusations related what labours the Commons had fultained before, and fince the banishment of Tarquinius; how, for all this pain and danger, they were not made partakers of any thing which they had obtained by their blood, till forced to seperate from the Patritians. That then they got this Office of Tribunellip, as a protection for the poor, with other Laws afterwards, as of judging the Patritians, and translating the fuffrages from the Centuriats to the Curiata Comitia, all which he accounted nothing. Then reproving Appius sharply, he told him he would shew him of what force that Office was upon which he had trampled, and the power of the people called by him fordid. and without House or Harbour. Having spoken this, he swore most solemnly Is command- that he would, and not live except the Law paffed, and commanding filence, when all men expected earnestly what he would do, he fawcily required Appius to depart hands on him. Appius being defended with a company of front young men, a great and unfeemly Contest followed with railings and thrustings to and fro: and at length it came to blows, and casting of stones. The Conful Quintius by his intreaties throwing himfelf into the middle, and the more grave Senators hindred the tumult from proceeding to further inconvenience, which was ended shortly after by the night. Several days were spent with mutual recriminations; but at length the Tribunes and People feized on the Capitol, and there kept watch night and day. The Senators were very follicitous what to do, both in respect of the danger, and the difference betwixt the Confuls; for Quintius thought the Commons desiring no unjust thing, were to be gratified; but Appius would rather die than yield. Quintius taking great pains, at length procured the Tribunes to refer the Law to the discretion of the Senate, which after a long diffwa-The Law past fion of Appius, and perswasion of the Tribunes, permitted it to be put to the question of the Comitia, wherein the Commons readily passed it. After this, the Confuls were fent out with the Armies; Quintius against the Aqui, whose Territories he wasted, and he returned with honour, which his Soldiers were careful to purchase for him; but Appius going against the Volsi, bore himself so austerely towards his men, that they would not obey him, but out of harred, and to procure him an ignominious retreat, when they came to fight, retired to their Camp without striking a stroak, and no more could he draw them forth against the Enemy, so that he was constrained to depart homewards, and in his way put to death fuch Centurions and Enfigns, as had been faulty, with every tenth man in the Army. Some were beheaded, and some knocked on the head with clubs: this decimation being an usual punishment amongst the Romans, of such as had forsaken or lost their Colours.

78. The following Confuls Q. Valerius again, and Tib. Æmilius, being both Sect. 1. well affected towards the Commons (the former out of envy to the Patritians, for that they had denied his Father a Triumph, and the later because he would reconcile himself to the multitude, offended by him for accusing Cassius the Author of the Agrarian Law, when he was Quaffor) promifed the Tribunes to promote in the Senate the division of publick grounds. The Tribunes in confidence of their affiftance, came into the Senate, and spake very mildly in favour of the Law, which the Confuls would not contradict, left they should feem to feek after contention, but asked the ancienter Senators their opinions. L. Valerius Father to the Conful, preffed the division of Lands; but Appins so severely and plainly withstood it by feveral invincible reasons, that he carried it against the other, for which the Tribunes fet him a day to answer before the People for his life. The crimes were: That he gave ill advice against the Commons, raised Sedition, laid violent hands for footh on the Sacrofanct Body of the Tribune, and being General of an Army had received a defeat, and returned with ignominy.

He croffeth

answer for his The Patritians exceedingly concerned, left nothing unattempted to fave him, and defired him, that giving way to the time, he would take the habit agreeable to his condition; but he flatly refused to do any thing poorly, or unworthy of his Ancestors, adding, that he would die a thousand deaths rather than touch the knees of any, as was the custom of Supplicants. He forbad his friends to supplicate for him, faying, his shame would be doubled, if he saw any do that in his behalf, which he himself disdained to do. Giving out many such like speeches, he neither changed his apparel, nor his countenance, nor remitted any thing of his antient magnanimity, but when he faw the whole City earnestly intentupon his Tryal, a few days before the appointed time he killed himfelf. His friends gave out that he died of a natural death, and the Body being brought forth into the Forum, his Son was there ready, and asked leave of the Confuls to commend him in a funeral Oration, according to the cuftom. The Tribunes commanded the body to be taken away without any ceremony; but the People was thereat displeafed, and fuffered the young man to perform this last and usual Office of honour to his deceafed Father.

79. For this and the two following years the Romans fought successively against the Æqui, Sabines, and Volsei. From the later was taken Antium, being surrendred to T.Quintius Capitolinus the Conful who placed therein a Garrison. In the following year, wherein were Confuls Tib. Émilius again, and Q. Fabius (fon to one of the three brothers, that with their friends and Clients died at Cremera) the Tribunes made new stirs about the Agrarian, and Æmilius furthering the business, the Senate to gratifie the multitude, decreed that some part of the Lands lately taken from the Vollei and Antiates, should be divided. Yet not many would give their names, being unwilling to forfake their native Country, fo that the Colony was made up out of the Latines and Hernici. The Confuls marched, Æmilius against the Volsci, and Fabius against the Æqui; both had success: the later forcing the Agui to beg Peace, the conditions whereof were left to him by the Senate. But the Aqui receiving the Fugitives of Aatium, suffered them to make excursions into the Territories of the Latines, and refused to give them up. whereupon fucceeded another War, though the Romans obtained a bloody Victory, in the third year after the making of the Peace. In the next Confulfhip which was executed by L. Ebutius and P. Servilius Priscus, fell a more grievous A most grie- plague upon the City than ever before hapned. It first consumed almost all Cattel, and from the Country came into the City, wherein it swept away an innumerable company of flaves, and a fourth part of the Senators, and amongst these the Consuls, with most of the Tribunes. Livy writeth, that the Adiles fupplied the place of Confuls. The difease began about the Calends of September, and continued that whole year, sparing no Sex nor Age.

80. When this was known by the neighbour Nations, the Volsei and Equi, war with the supposing the time of destroying the Roman Empire to be come, provided all things for a Siege, and to divert the Romans invaded the Latines and Hernici their affociates. These sending to Rome for aid, Eubutius was already dead, and Servilius as yet alive, in small hope affembled the Senators, who were brought half dead in their Litters to the Court. They gave them liberty to defend themselves, which doing, when the Enemies had wasted their grounds at their pleasures, they marched for Rome, but contrary to their expectations, found it sufficiently guarded, though with fick and feeble men. When the next Confuls were created, L. Lucretius and T. Veturius Geminus, the Pestilence ceased; and all things

Sect. 1. being quiet at home (for the Tribunes making adoe according to the custom about the Agrarian, were commanded by the people to defift, and expect better times) they invaded those who had taken advantage at the publick calamity. They had good fuccess abroad, and better near home, when the Aqui in their absence came and thought to have surprized the City. For understanding the Walls to be furnished with armed men, and four Cohorts of fix hundred apiece to frand before the Gates, they altered their course when they came to Tusculum: but Lucretius met and gave them battel, which they were hafty to imbrace before the coming of his Colleague. For a time they fought couragiously; but seeing a band of men behind them, which came from a certain Castle, they thought it had been the other Conful, and fearing to be inclosed ran away, having loft both their Captains, and many other valiant men. Afterwards without any let, the Confuls wasted the Territories both of the Æqui and Volsci, and returned home at the time of the Comitia: Lucretius in full Triumph, and Veturius in the other called Ovation, by decree of the Senate, with the like Pomp in all things, except that he entred on foot, and not in a Chariot; which words conclude the ninth Book of Dionysius his Roman Antiquities. 81. For the year following (which was the first of the eightieth Olympiad, wherein Torymbas the Theffalian was Victor, and Phrasicles Archon) P. Volumnius and Ser, Sulpitius Camerinus were created Confuls, who having nothing to do abroad, imployed themselves at home in defending the power of the Patritians against the Commons, now much instigated against it by their Tribunes. They were come so far, as to affert, that it was most agreeable with the constitution of a free State, for the Citizens to have equal power in Government. The People now would have all things done by the prescript of Laws, whereof as yet there were none written, the Kings having judged according to their own discretion, and the Consuls by certain presidents of those Princes formerly in power. The least part was recorded in the Books of the Pontifiees, which none A. M. 3545could come at except the Patritians. C. Terentius or Terentillus Arfa according to Livy, Tribune of the Commons the foregoing year, had endeavoured to circumferibe within certain limits the power of the Confulfhip; but left. the matter unfinished, because the greater part of Citizens were imployed in the War; the Confuls on fet purpose drawing it out in length, till the Comitia. Now the whole College of Tribunes renewed the attempt by the procurement of A. Virginius one of the number; the whole City being divided about it. Much contention there was in the Senate, betwirt the Tribunes and the contrary Faction; but at length, not doing any good in that place, they called the people together, and proposed a Law, that ten men might be chosen in Lawful Affembly, fuch as were most eminent for Age, prudence, and dignity, and who especially respected their repute, and honour; that these men should publish Laws both concerning private and publick business, by which right should be prescribed, both to private Persons and Annual Magistrates. The Question they put off till the Trinundinum, giving any one leave to speak freely, either for or against it.

82. The Patritians extraordinarily moved, that the Senate's authority in this matter was utterly neglected, both by fair and foul means laboured to hinder the debate: casting the meanest fort like Slaves out of the Forum, who minded cas gaining their private commodity more than the publick Peace. Amongst those sticklers Cafo Quintius the Son of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, was principal, one of great Nobility, beautiful in person, and very stout and expert in War. Him the Tribunes refolved to make an example to all young men, and called him to answer for his life before the People. He refused to answer, except at the Tribunal of the Confuls; but his Father earnestly intreated for him, recounting the several eminent fervices he had done for the State, and imputing this mifcarriage to his youth, and indifferction. The multitude plainly declared by figns, that they were ready to gratifie him, which when Virginius perceived, knowing, that if Cafo cfcaped without punishment, the infolence of the young Patritians would be intolerable, he procured M. Volscius, one of his Colleagues, to tell a feigned flory, how in the time of the Plague he and his brother returning from a friends house in the night, were set upon by Ceso and his drunken Companions in the Forum, who killed his brother outright, and left Volscius himself half dead. He added, that both the Confuls dying of the Plague, he could have no fatisfaction, and in the fucceeding Confulfhip, whenfoever he cited Cafo before the Magi-frates (as feveral could bear witness) he received nothing but blows. This so in-raged the multitude, that they had torn him in pieces, but that the Confuls and Sect. i forme of the Tribunes kept them off. His Tryal then was deferred, not without a great controversie, whether he should lye in prison, or be out upon Bail, the out a gleace later whereof was at length accepted by the interpolition of the Senate, and he fled Flieth and is

into Hetruria, leaving his ten fureties to pay the money, which was exacted of them by the Tribunes, who also condemned him. His Father fold the greatest part of his Estate to reinburse the sureties, and content with a small quantity of ground beyond Tiber, and a little Cottage, furtained himself very laboriously by the help of a few flaves; for grief and poverty abstaining from the City and his friends, and neglecting to divert himfelf with publick folaces. 83. The Tribunes were much croffed in their expectations. For the calamity of Cafo was fo far from moderating the infolency of the young Patritians, that they grew much higher, opposing the Question both by words and deeds:

fo as in this Confulfhip the Law could not be preferred. For the following year P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus, were created Confuls; and the Commons made the same Tribunes as the year before, who perceiving the Law was not by perswasion to be enacted, sought to terrifie both People and A plot of the Confuls. They caused various rumours to be spread, that Enemies had hatched a great confipracy against the Commons, then coming into the Senate, there affirmed it, pretending they had letters from some friends to assure them of it. They faid certain Senators were in the plot, but that the greatest part confisted of the order of the Equites, which it was not feasonable then to name; but they had designed in Conjunction with Caso Quintins the Exile, to murder the Tribunes with others by night, and then at their leafure to rescind whatever had been granted by the Senate to the Commons: In conclusion they defired the inquisition of so grievous a design might be committed unto themselves. The Senate being very follicitous, Clandins the Conful (who was fully perswaded that what the Tribunes went about was the only conspiracy) by ripping up their designs concerning the Agrarian Law, and the bad success of their endeavours which put them upon this Exploit, fully convinced the Fathers how the matter stood, especially when they would neither name their friends from whom the Letter came, nor the Meffenger : and though the Tribunes highly complained of him, and the Senate, unto the People, yet the most sober amongst the Commons were fatisfied with his reasons. Whilst the heat of this contention remained, the City fell into fuch danger from outward Enemies as never before, which, faith Dionysius, had been foretold by Sibyll's Books that it would arise out of intestine division, and was likewise signified by the prodigies of the foregoing year, when besides strange sights and noises, it rained pieces of stells, of which some were devoured by all sorts of birds before they sell to the ground, and the restcontinued long upon the Earth, without either change of colour

Herdonius a Sabine with four thousand men seized upon the Capitol, search on the and called the Slaves to their liberty. At this time of extream danger, the Capitol. Tribunes made what diffurbance they could, instigating the multitude not to fight against the Enemy, except the Patritians would ingage by Oath to create ten men for the making of Laws, and fuffer the Commons to live with them upon equal terms of privilege. Claudius would have wholly omitted them, and carried on the War by the Patritians, and their Clients only, but Valerius thought it necessary to have a closure in the body before it should go about to defend it felf from outward attempts, and therefore promifed with an Oath, that if the people would chearfully carry on that War, as foon as peace was restored, he would permit the Tribunes to put the question, and indeavour to satisfie the which is te. defire of the Commons. Claudius then being appointed to look to the City, Valerius on all fides fet upon the Capitol, which was taken by storm, though he lost his life, having omitted neither the part of an able General nor valiant Soldier; For though he had received many wounds, yet he gave not over, till climbing the Walls a great stone was tumbled down upon him, which took away his life. The War being ended, the Tribunes required of Claudius to make good the promise of his Collegue; but he deferred the matter by several pretences, and at length alleged he could do nothing of himself. He appointed then the Comitia for Creation of a new Consul into the room of Valerius. The Patritians were very follicitous to get fome chosen that would defend their interest, and resolved upon L. Quintius Father to Cafo, lately banished, who at the day appointed was chosen by all the Centuries of the first Classis, as well Equites as the

They that were sent to fetch Quintius into the City, found him at Plow without as much as a Coat Quintius made about him, only in his Truss, and a Cap on his head. Seeing the company make towards him, he wondred what it meant, but being told by a Viator that run before, he put on other apparel, and in a feemlier habit presented himself. Being faluted not by his own name, but by that of Conful, invested with Purple, honoured by the Fasces, and other Ensigns of Magistracy, he was defired to begin his journey, whereat paufing a little he answered with tears: Then for this year this little field shall be unsown, and we shall be in danger of want. After this, taking leave of his Wife, and commending his houshold affairs to her care, he departed for the City.

85. Quintins restrained the Tribunes from preferring the Law, by denouncing, that except they were quiet, he would lead out all the Citizens against the Vol-(ci. When they faid they would not permit him to make Levies, he called the people, and put the younger fort in mind of their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had bound themselves to the Consuls to follow whitherfoever he would lead them, and not be wanting to the Majesty of the Roman people. He affirmed they were all obnoxious to him by this Oath now he was Conful, and fware he would animadvert upon Offenders according to the Laws. Herewith he commanded the Standards to be moved out of the Erarium, and told them that to make them know they should have no leafure for Tribunitial Actions in his Confulship, he let them understand, he would not return out of the Enemie's Country till his office was at an end, and bade them prepare for wintring in the Camp. The multitude terrified hereat, defired him to forbear this rigour, and he did it upon this condition, that they would not moleft him for his whole time, but fuffer him to fpend it in administring Justice. He behaved himself with such Prudence, Justice, painfulness, and courtefie, that the Commons thought they flood not in need now of any new Laws, and the Senate was defirous to have him Conful for the following year, to oppose him to the Tribunes, who executed that Office now the third time. But as he approved it not in them, so he himself would not commit the same fault as he counted it, and in the Affembly speaking much against such as would not quit their Office when their time was finished, swore most religiously, that

mer laborious course of life. 86. The year following the Equi surprized Tusculum, which action caused a War betwixt them and Rome, wherein they were worsted, together with their friends the Volsci, and forced to beg peace. But in the next Consulship they were drawn again to revolt, and making War upon the Latines, by Gracchus Clalius their

Captain, an industrious man, who had improved the power granted him by his Country almost to regallity. He drew the Roman Army into so disadvantagious Dianglis at the a place, that it was thought convenient to make a Dictator, which was L. Quin- practicularity tius Cincinnatus. The Messengers found him newly dressed; for when he espi-

he would not accept the Confulfhip till he had laid down his prefent charge. Having finished a new Election, he betook himself to his little Cortage, and his for-ed the company, suspecting they came to him, he left the Country-work he was in hand with, and put on his better Clothes. Seeing himself made Dictator, by the trapped Horses, the twenty four Axes, the Purple, and other royal Enfigns, he was fo far from being delighted with this honour, that he faid with indignation : This year's Crop will also be lost by reason of mine imployment,

He overthrow- and my family must be famished. When he came to the City he incouraged the people, and named Mafter of Hors-men, L. Tarquinius, a man of no great esteem by reason of his poverty, but a good Soldier: Having gathered together the Forces, he gave Clalins battel, and beat him into his Camp, which having befleged some time, he forced the Aqui to give him up, with other incendiaries, to be punished with death according to their deferts, as also to pass under the Fugum (two Spears fet in the ground, and a third laid over upon them in form of a pair of Gallows) in token of fervitude; and because they had the year following without any provocation plundred Tusculum, to suffer him to deal in the like manner with Corbio. The choicest part of the plunder he caused to be carried to Rome; the rest he gave to his own Soldiers, and those of T. Quintius the Oneftor, faving, that the other of Minutius the Conful, who had been beficged by the Enemy, ought to be content that they fell not as a prey into his hands.

Having caused Minutius to lay down his Office, he returned to the City with a more illustrious Triumph than any Captain before him, (the General of the Aqui, and other Eminent Prisoners in Chains preceding his Chariot) having o- Sect. 1 verthrown a ftrong Army, and plundered, and fortified a City of the Enemy within feventeen days after his Creation. That absolute power which he might have kept for fix months he presently resigned, having first given an account of his administration. And when the Senate and his private friends would have enriched him with publick Ground, Plunder, and Contributions, he utterly refused it, and betaking himself again to his finall Cottage, preferred a laborious life before Kingly power, for that he pleafed himfelf more in his poverty, than others in the abundance

87. The year following, the Sabines, whose grounds the other Conful Nanting had wasted, as also the Equi, were in Arms, having retaken Corbio, against whom when Levies came to be made, the Tribunes again withflood them, being all new Created the fourth time. Hereupon the Fathers with weeping eyes fignified to the People, that being forfaken by them, who hitherto had filled themfelves their Children, they would go forth and fight against the Enemy in their own persons, wherewith the multitude being fore moved, and Virginius seeing that do he what he could they would give their names, he averred it to be the refolution of the Commons to live and die with them; only they defired fome reward for all their pains and danger, which was, that they might live in equal freedom. If this could not be granted, they waved it, and defired another thing, which he was fure would not intrench upon the Senate's privileges. The Conful affirming the thing should be proposed if they would but refer it to the Senate; he defired that the number of the Tribunes might be increased unto ten. The Senate debating the matter, C.Claudius, the fon of Appius the Elder, spake against it; alleging, that the Commons would never be fatisfied; but Quintius, who now bore the greatest sway, commended the opinion of Appius, that the * only way * vide sard to cross the design of the Tribunes was to set them one against another; and if so, Parse, 66. it would make more for the Interest of the Senate to have their number increafed. Accordingly a Senatus Consultum was drawn, that it should be lawful for the reased to ten. Commons to increase their College of Tribunes to the number of ten, and it was presently confirmed by the People. After this the Sedition being appealed, the Confuls levied Forces, and managed the War successfully against the Sabines and 88. dred and ninty eighth after the account of Varro, had for Confuls M. Valerius V.C. 280. and Sp. Virginius, who having nothing to do abroad, had too much employment 10. in the City. Before this time, the Tribunes only reigned in the Affemblies, neither taking upon them to call together the Senate, nor give their voices therein. But now they ventured to affemble the Fathers, by the procurement of Icilius principal of the College, an industrious, and eloquent man, who presumed to make a further innovation in the State, requiring the Aventine Mount for the People to build upon, which being a mile and an half in circuit, was not as yet fully inhabited, but publick, and full of wood. The Tribune moving the Confuls to procure a Decree of the Senate for his new project, and they deferring the matter, an Apparitor was fent from the College to cite the Confuls before it. He applying himself to one of their Lictors, was beaten, and sent back, which so inraged the Tribunes, that apprehending the Lictor, they led him to the Tarpeian Rock, the Confuls, though much troubled, not being able to refcue him; for that none could hinder the execution of what the whole College refolved; all they could do was to defire some of the Tribunes themselves to interpose. But this could not be effected, they having resolved at the beginning not to diffent from one another, that thereby they might preserve their Authority inviolable. As concerning the Lictor, then they answered they were resolved, yet they put not the that order should be driven by just indignation to attempt some thing extraordinary. Having then assembled the Senate, the Consuls sharply reprehended them, but Icilius excused what had been done to the Lictor, by the sacred Laws, which forbade all, both publick and private, to cross a Tribune. By a premeditated Oration he endeavoured to shew, that he had not unjustly assembled the Senate, and when he had feemed fufficiently to have answered the charge of Alawfordi the Confuls, he mentioned the Law: That what private men were possessed of, vision of cer- and was justly gotten, sould remain unto them; what ground by force, or fraud, was already furnished with buildings, the expense of building being considered by

arbitration, should be recovered to the use of the People, and what was yet publick be divided amongst them. He shewed that this Law would be exceedingly profitable for the suppression of all Agrarian Seditions, forasmuch as the Commons would be fatisfied with possessions at home. No man differenting, except C. Claudius, a Decree of the Senate passed for it accordingly.

Differtions

89. The remainder of the year was spent in building. For the next were created Confuls T. Romulius and C. Vetuvius; Icilius and his Colleague being continued in their Office: The civil diffentions supposed to be removed by the late Law, were again revived, and the forein Enemies of the Commonwealth were in Arms, to the greater profit than discommodity of it. For such a viciffitude now there was, that Peace brought Sedition, and War procured Concord, which the chief Magistrates apprehending, wished for nothing more than external motions, and when there was Peace abroad, fought occasion for War; as understanding the growth of the Citie's prosperity to be procured thereby The present Confuls were of this mind, being jealous of the beggerly and idle multitude. And their opinion was right, that they were to be diverted; but there they failed, that whereas in so ill a Crass of the State, they ought to have proceeded gently, they admitted the excuse of none who defired exemption from the War, but severely inflicted penalties upon all; which gave occasion to the Tribunes to make diffurbance, crying out, that they violated the privilege of their Office, by imprisoning such as appealed to it. From mutual revilings fometimes it came to blows, both parties being berounded with those of their faction, and the people not fully complying with the Tribunes in their demands they went into the Senate, where they required, that the Confuls might either law down their Offices, or answer to their Crime against the Sacrosanct Tribunitial power before the People. The Senate determined nothing, feeing it dangerous to diminish the power either of the Consuls or Tribunes, at which the later much discontented, returned to the multitude. Some were for departing again from the Patritians; others more moderate, would expect the course of Law against those who had violated so facred an Office; and a third (the most fober party) disliked this as well as the other, for that the Consuls were the Supreme Magistrates; and thought it meeter to punish their Abettors. If the Tribunes had not at length reftrained their anger against Senate and Confuls, the City that day had destroyed it self, so intent were both parties upon Arms and War. But they fet the Confuls a day to answer before the People, and then were prevailed with to let the matter fall, telling the Commons that they remitted what concerned themselves for their sakes whom they ought not to deny it, but would revenge the injury done to the whole, to prevent an ill 90. This was by promulgating the Agrarian Law, which hitherto had lavn dormant for thirty years, to which another was added of equal right, which the former year could not be passed. Having with an oath promised to prefer these Laws, they appointed a day for the Comitia, wherein having first themselves spoken largely, several others related what good service they had done for the Commonwealth, and laboured to shew how unworthy a thing it was for them to be defrauded of those grounds, which by their labour and danger they had gained, and admitted to no part of reward. The multitude gladly hearing fuch dif. courses, none more affected mens minds than L. Siccius Dentatus, a man of admirable shape, fifty eight years old, and furnished with military eloquence, for a feditious attempt. He told them, he had ferved his Country in the Wars fourty years, and been an Officer thirty; fometimes a Centurion, afterwards a Tribune. He was raifed to that honour by Sicinius the Conful, for defending the Enfign of his Cohort, when the Centurion was flain, for which he was also adorned by his fellow Soldiers with a golden Crown. In another battel, wherein the Tribune of the Camp was struck to the ground, and the Eagle (or Standard) taken, fighting for the whole Legion, he recovered it and faved him, for which the Tribune would have given him his place, but he refused it, and the Conful made him Tribune of the first Legion, which Office was then void. Having thus purchased himself honour; to maintain his credit he spared no labour, nor resused any danger, being ever rewarded by the Confuls with spoils, crowns, and other rewards and honours.

91, In short; during those fourty years, he had fought one hundred and twenty The archievements of Size battels, received fourty five wounds, all before and none behind, whereof twelve that cins Dintains. day wherein he fought against Herdonius, who seized upon the Capitol. As for reCHAP. IV. wards after the feveral battels, he had obtained fourteen Civick Crowns Sect. 1 (which faith Gellins, were bestowed upon him who had preserved the life of a Citizen, and were made of Oake, because the most ancient meat was thought to be the fruit of that tree;) three Murals (which were given by the General un-Lib. 5. a. 6. to him who first mounted the walls, and entred a Town, being adorned with an image of the battlements) and eight Golden Crowns; besides eightv three Golden Chains, fixty Golden Bracelets, eighteen pure Spears, (which were Spears having no iron at the ends of them, being also called Hasta donatica, and Hale gramines,) and twenty three Horse trappings, whereof nine were for kiling Enemies that he had challenged to fingle Combats. To this relation of Dionysus, Gellius addeth a Crown, called Obsidionalis (which was given to one who Lib. 2.6. 11; had freed the prefenter from a Siege) and increaleth the number of Bracelets to above one hundred and fixty, that of Spears to twenty two, and the other of Horfe trappings to twenty five. He calleth him L. Sicinius Dentatus, and writeth, that for his incredible atchievements, he had the appellation of Achilles Romanus.

92. Siccius proceeded, faying, that though he had fought fo many years, ferved in fo many Expeditions, received fo many wounds, and helped to gain fuch large Territories for the Roman People, yet neither he, nor his fellow foldiers partakers with him in the same dangers, had received any portion of those Lands, being possessed by others, who could neither shew title nor merit for them. After this, he accused the Patritians of having put Cassus death, for no other cause than favouring the Commons, as also of privily murdering Gent. tius the Tribune, eleven years after, which had terrified others fince from fuch attempts as his were. He mentioned the affronts lately made to the Tribunes, and concluded with an exhortation to the multitude, to free themselves from this Tryanny of the great ones, by passing the Law without giving heed to the dissawions of any. The Assembly was so moved by his words, that they seemed impatient of any thing to be said against it; but Icilius rising up, after he had extolled the worth of the man, faid, it was neither just, nor agreeable with the cuftom of the City, to hinder any one from speaking against the Law, especially such an one as afferted right, and opposed violence. He adjourned then the Comitia till the next day, when he commanded all to be present, who would speak any thing against it. The Patritians meeting at the Consul's house in the evening, resolved, if they could not with words, by deeds to hinder the passing of the Law, and betimes in the morning took up the Forum, spreading themselves all over to hinder the uniting of the Commons. The Comitia being full, those that spake could not be heard, some incouraging, bout the Law, and others interrupting them with great clamours. The Confuls protested against this carriage, and that if any violence succeeded, the Commons were the procurers of it; and the Tribunes answered, that they had heard long such discourses as they were now making. The day being far spent; the People required the ballots; but then the young Patritians hindred them from uniting in their Tribes, and fnatched away the pots and ballots, beating out of the Forum the Officers attending for the gathering of Suffrages. The Tribunes crying out, and casting themselves into the throng, they gave way to them, where ever they went, but hindred fuch as would have followed, and rendred their Office thereby unferviceable. At length the Patritians prevailed against the passing of the Law, by the means of three Families especially, viz. the Posthumii, Sempronii, and Clalii, most eminent for Nobility, Riches, and Clients, who, also,

> 93. The Tribunes confulting how to vindicate their cause, the most moderate opinion prevailed, that neither the Confuls, nor any other Patritians, fave those of the three Families now mentioned, should be called to answer before the People; and not for their lives, but estates, for resisting the Tribunes in preferring the Law. The Patritians gave way to it, and having redeemed the estates, restored them to the owners. Afterwards, when the Tribunes again went about to prefer the Law, news came that the Enemy was on his march to Rome, as far as Tusculum, which place only stopped him, but could not long hold out. Levies now being to be made, according to a Decree of the Senate, the especially hindred the confirmation of the Agrarian by a Plebiscitum.

Tribunes endeavoured to hinder them, but another Decree being published, that the Patritians with their Clients, and fuch as voluntarily came in, would undertake the War; some for shame, some for plunder, and others to gratifie the Nobility, gave their names; and amongst the rest Siccius himself, whom followed a Cohort of eight hundred old Souldiers to do him honour, though excused 456 Sect. 1. from warfare by the Laws. A ftrong Army being prefently raifed, the Eas Conque-

nemics retired, and were followed by the Confuls to Antium, where the Armies lying incamped one against the other, the Æqui, confident of their strength, at length provoked the Romans to fight. Romulius having then the command, fent for Siecius, as the ftory goes, and gave him order with his Cohort to go a certain way, and fall behind upon the Enemies Camp, intending either to difgrace him upon refufal, or deftroy him by fo impossible an undertaking. When Siccius laboured to shew him that the thing could not be done, he upbraided him with his speeches used in the Comitia concerning his own exploits, and objected to him pretended valour. Herat he undertook the matter, and giving all to understand his case, departed with his men all weeping, to the regret of the Army, who expected of these eight hundred to see no man return alive. Siccius led them not the same way as the Consul thought, which being mountainous, would have brought certain destruction to them ascending, but another through a Wood, by which they came upon the Camp of the Equi, where it was forfaken of the guard, now gone to behold the fight of the two Armies, before this time joyned. Falling in with a shour, the Equi supposing the other Consul present, for sook the Camp and fled, after which Siccius and his Cohort marched down towards the battel, whom the Enemy discovering on their back, and knowing their Camp to be taken, were also discouraged and fled: The Romans pursued them till night, and did great execution, but none fo valiantly demeaned himself as Siccius Dentatus. 94. Siceius having lodged himself and his men in the Enemies Camp, the next day fet it and all the fluff therein on fire, and with haste marched for Rome, on purpose to deprive the Consuls of the honour they expected. Coming into the Forum, he related to the Tribunes and People the whole paffage, how he and his old men being deftined to ruin, had obtained the Victory. Hereby he not onely ingratiated himself with the People, but procured the displeafure of the Senate also against the Consuls, who were denied the honour of a Triumph. The Commons gratified Siccius in the highest measure they could, making him one of their Tribunes for the following year, wherein Sp. Tar-peius, and A. Ternius (or Thermus rather as Gellius hath it) were Confuls. The first he did relating to his Office, was to set the former Consuls a day to answer before the People, for violating the power of the Tribuneship, and deviling the destruction of him and his Souldiers: and so resolved was the whole College, that the judgment passed without interruption intended by the Patritians, and they were both condemned in a pecuniary mulct. The prefent Confuls were hereby rendred more inclinable towards the Commons; fo that they procured a Decree of the Senate, and a Law passed in the Centuriata Comitia, that All Magistrates should have liberty to punish such as violated their authority, which was formerly the privilege of the Confuls onely. But the mulct was not left to their discretion, provision being made, that it should not exceed the worth of two Oxen, or thirty Sheep, which Law was long observed by the Romans. After this, the Tribunes propounded to the Senate, that Laws might be made, which the Citie shoud use for ever. After a grave debate, the advice of Romalius twadetn the Senate to fub. the late condemned Conful prevailed, who contrary to the expectation of both parties spoke in behalf of the thing propounded. He said, he was for the interest of the Patritians as long as there was any hopes of its continuance, but finding things in fuch a condition, as it must necessarily decline, he thought it wisdom to comply with that necessity, and advised that Ambassadors might be fent to the Greek Cities in Italy, and to Athens, thence to fetch fuch Laws as were most excellent, and besitting the Commonwealth. After their return was to be propounded to the People the choice of Law-makers, what their power should be, for how long, and what other things should appertain to them. Siccius extraordinarily affected with the mans ingenuity, faid he was now friends with him, and remitted his fine; but he refused to forbear the payment of it, because already facred to their gods. A Senatus Consultum being made, and confirmed by a Plebiscitum, Ambassadors were chosen to fetch Laws from the Greeks. These were Sp. Posthumias , Ser. Sulpicius, and A. Manlius, to whose use Gallies were assigned, and surners chokn to nished at the publick charge, as was suitable with the Majesty of the Roman 95. fing the Office of principal Archon, the three hundredth year of the City being Sect. I and Sext. Quintilini were Confuls. Now fell a greater plague than ever had been known, upon both City and Country, which swept away Quintilius the Conful, and Sp. Furius chosen in his place, with four Tribunes, and many Senators. The fucceeding Confuls were L. Menenius and P. Sextius, who took care for Corn to supply the City, which laboured under a famine, by reason that the grounds lay untilled the former year. In their year the Ambassadors returned out of Greece with Laws, presently after which the Tribunes required, that according to the Senates Decree, law-makers might be appointed. The Confuls knowing not how to deny them, yet unwilling to weaken the interest of the Patritians, deferred the matter, faying, that the time of the Comitia was at hand, after which they would labour, joyntly with the Confuls Elect, in the business. The Tribunes were content; but when the Comitia were past, wherein Appius Claudius, and T. Genutius were chosen, they grew idle, and neglected the administration of affairs, as now belonging unto others: and Menenius was fickly, pining away, as was thought, by melancholy; of which Sextius took advantage, pretending he could do nothing by himself. The Tribunes then betook themselves to the Consuls Elect, and though they had not yet entred upon their Magistracy, importuned them to gratise the Commons, by proposing great honours and rewards. Appius being elevated with the hope of a new kind of Magistracy, grew popular, and perswaded his Collegue to a compliance, so that Sextius was forced to call together the Senate, and propound concerning Laws.

96. Many things were spoken, as well by those that desired a new model, as others, who thought it sufficient to rest satisfied in the customs of their Country. But the opinion of the defigned Confuls prevailed, which Appius the principal of the two delivered, being asked his advice, according to the cuftom, before any other Senators. Their fense was, that ten men out of the chief of the Senate were to be Elected, whose power continuing for a year should be the same with that of the Kings and Confuls, and all other Magistracies cease till they might be renewed according to Laws: in the mean time the ten men, or Decemviri, were to administer Justice to private men, and model the Commonwealth. When the day came wherein this Senatus Confultum was to be confirmed by the People, the defigned Confuls refigned their Office, for which they were exceedingly admired, and remembred in the choice. In the Centuriate Comitia were created App. Claudius and T. Genutius, late Confuls Elect, P. Sextius Consul for that present year, the three Ambassadors who setched Laws out of Greece, P. Posthumius. Ser. Sulpitius, A. Manlius, and one of the former year's Con-The Diamoiri fuls T. Romulius, who had been condemned by Siccius the Tribune, and afterwards was the author of this popular act : besides these, out of the Senate C. fulius, T. Veturius, and P. Horatius, all of Consular dignity. The Tribunes, Ediles, Quafors, and all other Magistrates were for a time devested of all power. Instead of Horatius, Livy mentioneth P. Curiatius.

The acts of the Decomini

- 2. The Decembiri having taken upon them the Government, in reference to a new constitution, agreed that only one of them at one time should have the Fasces and other consular Ensigns. He assembled the Senate, confirmed the Decrees, and did other things agreeable with chief Magistracy. The rest (to lessen envy) differed little in habit from private men, having only an Accensus, or fort of Beadle, going before them, which Livy addeth to the relation of Dionyfius. They succeeded by turns, for a certain limited time, till the year went about. The present Possessor of the Fasces only faith Livy, but all of them as Dionysius seemeth to mean, judged private causes together with publick ones belonging to their Subjects, and affociates. All things they managed with fuch Justice and moderation, that the Commonwealth seemed most happy under them having no need of appeal. Appius above the rest grew exceeding popular by his familiarity with the ordinary fort; so as in a manner he carried away the praise from the whole College, for he had a further delign than any of the
- 3. At length having made a model out of fuch Laws as were brought out of Greece, and their own Country's Customs, they proposed it to the view of all men in ten Tables, that any one might make exceptions; liberty being given to private persons to inform the Law-makers, who consulted much with the Nobility about the work. When all approved of them; a Senatus Consultum paffed, nemine contradicente, for the ratifying of these Laws, and the question being put to the People in the Centuriata Comitia, they were confirmed most religiously in presence of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Priests. Then were they ingraven in brass, saith Dionysius and others, in Ivory saith Pomponius the Lawver, and proposed to the publick view in the most conspicuous part of the Forum, as Minos of old, according to Plato, and long after him Solon caused his Laws to be written in Tables by the Athenians called * Cyrbes and Axones. The year being al- * KúpCeis & most out, the Decemviri moved the Senate about the Comitia. After a great de- Afores. bate it was refolved to continue this kind of Magistracy for the following year; because something seemed yet wanting to the new model, through the shortnels of time allotted to the work; but especially for that by this Office the Tribuneship was suspended, of which the Patritians had cause to be most jealous. The Commons thought they had good reason to concur with the Fathers in this choice, and the day for holding the Comitia was appointed.
- 4 The most antient and honourable of the Fathers stood for this Office, fearing that if turbulent spirits were possessed of it, they might have a great advantage against the State. Above all others was Appius extolled to the Skies, the Commons labouring earnestly to retain him in his Sect. 2. place, for that none had behaved himself better than he. He desired to be excused, pretending he had rather be discharged of so troublesom and ingrateenjarobation full a work. At length overcome as it were by the intreaties of the people, and the professed miners are sometimes, and by according all others, as conditioned by owing him ill will for his publick spirit, made way for himself and his friends. In the Centuriata Comitia he was made December the second time, and with him was joyned Q. Fabius Vibulanus, who had been Conful three times, a man hitherto of unblameable carriage: out of the other Patritians by the procurement of Appins were created M. Cornelius, M. Servilus, L. Minucius , T. Antonius , and Manius Rabuleius, persons of no great Eminency; and out of the Commons Q. Petilius, Cofo Duellius, and Sp. 5. Appius, a man more popular than any Magistrate that ever governed, either King or Conful, with his nine Collegues, entred his Office on the Ides of May, which faith Dionysius hapned in the full Moon, according to the course whereof months at that time were observed. The first thing the December idid, was mutually to agree and consirm by Oath to be of one mind, not to hold the Assemblies, but perpetually to retain the power in their own hands : to admit none into their number, and to be of equal power and authority amongst themselves : to make use of Senatus Consultum's, and Plebiscitum's, but rarely, and never except in case of necessity, acting most things by virtue of their own power. On the first day (which to the Romans was ever Festival and Religious) after their superstitious Ceremonies were over, they all appeared with regal Enfigns, which exceedingly terrified the People, especially the Axes added again to the Rods, which Poplicola had laid afide, and none of his Succeffors the Confuls used in the City. By this fear they fought to procure themselves security, each of them getting about him a company of frout young men, fuch as were most addicted to

6. Some preferring their private commodity before the publick good flattered them, and even amongst the Patritians themselves those were not wanting, who though Eminent both for Birth and Estate patiently bore the oppression of their Country. The December indulging their pleasures, exercised now their authority with all licentionfies, nothing valuing the Roman Senate and people. Being both Legislators and Judges, many Citizens they unjuttly put to death, and deprived others of their Estates, whose causes were all formally judged, that they might have some shew, and pretence of Justice, accusers being suborned out of their Dependents, each one affording all affiftance herein to his Collegue, Such private persons as in their sutes feared their cause were constrained to joyn themselves to the party of their Judges; so as it came to pass in a short time that most of the Citizens were also corrupted. Such as were offended with the extravigancy of the ten retired themselves, expecting the Comitia for the Creation of new

Laws to the

7. The December added two Tables of Laws to the ten that were made the year before. Amongst these new Laws there was one which forbad marriage betwixt the Patritians and Plebeians, for no other cause as Dionysius conjectureth, than left the families being joyned together, concord should enfue betwixt the two orders. These Laws thus by accident, faith (a) (4) Lib. 2 Pomponius, came to be called the Laws of the twelve Tables, being written Dig. de Oriby the December; through the personal on of one Hermodorus an Ephesian, ein Jrit. as some reported, then banished into Haly, concerning which person (b) 100 ultimates and others are to be consulted. These Laws being established, it folds the second lowed, that disputations and controversies of the Court should be necessary, Strabolib. 14for as much as an interpretation was to be built upon the authority of the Learn-The original ed. This differentiation, or this unwritten Law, framed by the Learn-of the civil not called by any peculiar name, as all other parts. not called by any peculiar name, as all other parts, but by the common one of fus Civile, or Civil Law only. Besides, out of these Laws, at the fame time almost, were composed certain cases, wherein men contested one with another, which cases, lest the People should make them at their pleasure, were to be certain and folemn; and this part of Law was called Actiones Furis;

or Cafes at Law. Thus almost at the same time these three forts of Laws arose, viz.

the Laws of the twelve Tables; from these slowed the Civil Law: and from the same

Sect. 2. were composed Cafes at Law. But the knowledg of expounding all these, and the Cases themselves, were kept by the College of Pontifices, who appointed yearly those that judged Private Persons, which custom the People used almost one hundred years. Afterward, when Appius Claudius had propounded, and reduced these Cales into form, (c) Gnaus Flavius his Scribe, and the son of a Libertine (or (c) confile of one whose father was once a Slave) stole the Book, and gave it to the Peo, Valu. Mar. ple, which accepted to thankfully of the gift, that he was made Tribune of the Acceptance Commons, a Senator, and Bailis curulis. This Book was called Fus Civile Fla-Not. Ant. vianum, as the other Fus Civile Papirianum. Yet Flavius added nothing of his cient pa Ma. own to the Book. The City increaling, and there being as yet wanting certain rue. forts of Cases, not long after Sextus Alius composed other Cases, and gave a Book to the People called fus Ælianum.

8. There being now in the City, the Lex or Law of the twelve Tables, the Mow the parts Fis Civile, or Civil Law, and the Cales of Law, it came to pass, that the Mow the parts Commons disagreeing with and seperating from the Patritians, appointed Laws of their own making, called Plebiscita. After their return there being a great controversie about these, it was thought good to receive them also for Laws, and fo it was enacted by a Law preferred by * Hortensius the Diotator; fo though * Vide Livithere was a difference in the form of making a Law (called Lex) and a Plebifei- 4, Gilliam tum, yet the authority was the same. Then for that it was difficult for the People 4.15. 6.26. to meet, because of its multitudes, necessity it self devolved the care of the Commonwealth upon the Senate. So the Senate began to interpose, and whatsoever it refolved was observed: and that Law was called Senatus Consultum. At the fame time the Magistrates also administred Justice, and that the People might know what they would determine concerning any thing, and to fore-arm themselves, they published Edists, which Edists of the Prators constituted the fus Honorarium, fo named from the honour and authority of the Prator. Lastly, as the course of affairs reduced the making of Laws to fewer fashions, at length it came to pass through several Factions, (viz. of Sylla, Marius, Pompey, and Casar) that there was necessity of the Commonwealth's being governed by a single person. For the Senate not being able to govern all the Provinces, a Prince was ordained, and what he appointed was taken for Law. So that in the Commonwealth of Rome, all Law was either fo constituted by a Law called Lex, as that of the twelve Tables; or properly called fus Civile, which being unwritten, consisted in the interpretation of the Learned; or Cases of Law, which contained the form of Pleas; or a Plebiscitum made witout the authority of the Fathers: or the Edict of a Magistrate, called fus Honorarium: or a Senatus Consultum, which without a Law (Lex) was ordained by the fole authorizy of the Senate : or Principalis constitutio, which the Prince himfelf enacted.

9. These things are written by Pomponius in this narrative of the Original of Law; for the better understanding whereof, it is to be noted, that the word Fus fignifieth all Law or Right in general, and is that Genus whereof Lex is but a species, being defined by (a) fujisnian the Emperour to be (a) su nilethat which the People of Rome upon the qualtion put by a Schatorian Magistrate man institute (for example a Consul) did enast. As for the twelve Tables, they were in the consult is furnished with Laws, partly borrowed from the Gracians, partly added at the diferetion of the Lawmakers, and partly the fame as formerly were in use. Of the first fort were such especially as concerned private interests. Of the fecond was that which forbad mariage betwixt the Nobility and Commons. And of the third, that Law which from Dionysius we formerly mentioned to have been made by Romulus, giving power to a man to call together his Wives Kindred, and judge her for drinking Wine, or dishonesty: this is attested to have been taken into the twelve Tables by (b) Pliny; and (c) Gellius (b) Lib. 14: also hinteth as much. From (d) Ausonius is observed, that these twelve (c) Lib. 10: Tables were divided into three parts, whereof the first contained what be(a) Justiplies or if any one be taken with this gloribus Philosophy, I will speak more boldly, these Sect. 2. are the fountains of all his diffutes contained in the Civil Law (Jure Civili) and Laws (Legibus.) Though all be displeased, I will speak what I think : that little Book of the twelve Tables alone, in my opinion excelleth the Libraries of all the Philolophers (if one view the Fountains and heads of Laws) both in weight of authority and copionsness of advantage. In another (f) place he writeth, that (f) De Legions when he was a boy, they were wont to learn the twelve Tables as some necessary Poem. Lastly, a Collection of the fragments of these Tables out of approved Authors (fuch especially as conduce to the explication of the Institutions, and of Antient Law with deep Antiquities) hath been made by I.Crifpinus, to which the Reader is referred. 10. But (to return) the December at the usual time of the Comitia bidding farewel to the Customs of their Country, and the new Laws, neither regarding the approbation of Senate nor People, continued themselves in power for the year following, which was the third of the Decemvirate, the first of the eighty third Olympiad, according to Dionysius, wherein Criso of Himera was Victor, Philifeus being Archon at Athens. They so ordered the matter shortly, as even all the confiderable part of the Citizens, (Patritians and others) they either killed, or forced to quit the City. This pleafed them well enough, but the Sabines and Æqui thinking it a fit time to attempt some great matter against Rome, invaded the Territories thereof, and of the Latines. The December much troubled hereat, after a confultation how to make refiftance feveral ways, found themfelves conftrained to affemble the Senate, wherein Appius with a premeditated They affemble Oration propounded the matter of the War. L. Valerius Potitius, the Son of him that belieged the Capitol, and Grandson of Poplicola, first arose, and though he was commanded by Appius to forbear, flew high against the tyranny of the present Usurpers. He being forced to filence, was seconded by Marcus Horatius Barbatus, great Grandson of the Collegue of Poplicola, who having expressed great indignation, the December incensed with his biting words, threatned to cast him down headlong from the Rock. All the Senators at this cried out as at a breach of their privilege, and made a tumult, whereat the Ten repented of what they had faid, and excused themselves, saying, they deprived none of the liberty of fpeaking to the matter in hand, but interrupted Seditious Orations, which they might do by their power of Confuls and Tribunes received from the People, not for a year only nor any limited time, but till the work of Laws should be finished, untill which time they were resolved to act, and then give an account of their administration. Appius having delivered this in the name of all, asked the opinion of C. Clandius his Uncle.
(d) Justiplies longed to the Religion of the Romans, the second what concerned the pub-tabula quod lick, and the third the rights of private men. Great are the commendati- to Santote ons which many give of them, but the most Eminent is Cicero's Encomium, that quatrum Siwe name no more. Disputing under the name of Crassus, in (e) one place he tum, Populi thus speaketh : If diversity of Studies please any, in the twelve Tables there is a great communicated Image of antiquity: because the antient use of words is known, and certain kind of acti-(e) Lib. 1. de ons declare the Life and Custom of our Ancestors. If any look at Polity, you orante. Shall find it all in the twelve tables, which describe all the interests and parts of the State:

11. Claudius beginning his Oration with the occasion of their meeting, fitly shewed what was the occasion of it. The War he demonstrated to be begun by no other inducements than what the prefent diffempers of the State afforded, which were bred by the arbitrary and tyrannical carriage of his Nephew, and his nine Companions. He made out what these distempers were, and by virtue of his relation to Appins, took upon him, after a sharp reproof, by the nearness of their blood, their Ancestors, and the December's Father with all that was dear ad religious to them both, to conjure him, that putting a ftop to his ambitious course (destructive to himself as well as the publick) he would relign his usurped power, and restore the Commonwealth to its former government and liberty. Appius answered him not a word, which so moved him, that with tears he fignified he would depart to Rhegillum, the feat of his Forefathers, and there continue till that fell upon the Decemvirate, which he gueffed would happen in a fhort time; for as much as he could not endure to behold his Nephew degenerate fo much from the antient worth of their Family. As concerning the War, he advised the Fathers to resolve nothing, till the accustomed Magistrates were first created. The graver and more eminent fort of Senators that spake after, were all of this opinion, which made the Ten resolve to ask none now according to their age, as the Custom was, but M. Cornelius called upon his Brother Lucius to deliver his opinion. He attributed all that had been faid against the Decembers to envy, saying, it was because the speakers themselves could not compass the Office, and laboured to shew, that it was most foolish Counsel to resolve upon new elections, which would require time, and defer the War that threatned ruine and defolation. By preffing the danger very close, and urging what necessity there was of committing the War to the management of the December, he drew almost all the younger

Sect. 2. fort to his party, there being many even in the Senate from whom fear wrested compliance. After all these, the Decemviri gave Valerius leave to speak, whom first of all they had interrupted. He professed he was of Claudius his judgment as to the whole, and answered all the reasons of Cornelius by one propofal; that a Dictator might be instantly named, shewing, that if they missed of this opportunity, they could not expect again to be affembled by the Decem-

12. Few that delivered their opinions after him remained unconvinced, and many were changed from the sense they had before delivered. He required then of the Ten, that the matter might be further considered of, and all might have liberty to recall their votes, which caused a great contest betwixt him and Cornelius, who defiring that the Decemviri might have the command in the War, cried out, that the thing was already decided in a legal manner, and defired the parties might be counted. Much heat being shewed by both, the Fathers were also divided, which advantage the Ten took to do what they pleased. Ap pius then formally declaring for what cause they had been assembled, told them they were divided according to the three feveral opinions of Claudius, Cornelius, and Valerius, every one having had liberty to speak his mind freely : and feeing that most had approved of what Cornelius had propounded, he declared his party to have overcome. Then commanded he the Clerk to draw up a Senatus-Consultum, whereby power of railing Forces, and commanding them, was given to the Decemviri; and therewith the Senate was dismissed. They were by this kind of Victory rendred more confident, and imperious, as having now in their own thoughts established themselves, by having an Army at their command, which Valerius had advised the Fathers earnestly to beware of. Horatius and Valerius made provision for their own defence, by gathering togeuse of the Se- ther their Clients and dependants, and Claudius, as he had said, departed into the Country of the Sabines; whose example multitudes following, left their native feat, with their Wives and Children going into voluntary exile. The Decemviri troubled hereat, endeavoured at first to hinder them by shutting the Gates, but again fearing they might out of fury attempt fome dangerous thing, they let them depart, but feized on fuch goods as they left behind, having accufed them of defection. These things being added to the former miscariages, incenfed much more both Patritians and Plebeians against them. Yet had they proceeded no further in fuch like outrages, they might probably for a much more longer time have fecured their power, through that influence which the mutual emulation of these orders afforded. For the Plebeians were glad to see the high spirits of the Patritians dejected, and the Senate void of all power: on the other fide, the Nobility rejoyced that the Commons had loft their former liberty, having not the least help, because the Tribunitial power was taken away. But they neither using moderation in War, nor temperance at home, constrained all to unite for their destruction, which followed certain hainous offences committed against the Commons.

They lead out

13. They divided their Army into three parts, whereof one remained with Appius and Oppius in the City, the two other their Collegues led forth against the Sabines and Agui. The later forced the Romans to forfake their Camp, and shamefully to fly, which caused great rejoycing in Rome amongst the Enemies of the Decemviri, so that Appius fearing some attempt, wrote to his Collegues in the Army, by one means or other to destroy their known adversaries, which was effected upon diverse. But at Rome, Siccius Dentatus, the Roman Achilles as he was named, amongst others spake much against the Captains as Cowards, and unskilful, which Appius understanding, with good words per-fwaded him to go as Lieutenant or Legatus to the Army then lying at Crustus meria against the Sabines. He not suspecting what was designed, undertook the employment, for that the Office of Legatus was most facred and honourable amongst the Romans, having the authority and power of a General, and the inviolableness and veneration of a Priest. When he came to the Camp he was fent out with one hundred men upon fervice, who had order to kill him. He fought with them all, flew fifteen, and wounded twice as many, fo that finding it too difficult a task to kill him by hand-ftroaks, they threw Darts and Stones at him, and thereby at length, and at a diffance, performed what was injoyned them. Though the murderers according to agreement gave out he fell by the Enemie's hand, yet the Soldiers fetching him off to give him honourable burial, by feveral circumstances plainly perceived the truth, and demanding Justice against the inftruments, when that was put off, and they concealed, they easily understood who were the principal cause, and thought of nothing more than how

14. The Army lying at Crustumeria and Fidena being thus incenfed against the Decemviri, another wicked act of Appius caused the other which lay incamped at Algidum against the Æqui, not only to think of, but fully to effect a revolt. There was one L. Virginius a Plebeian, who had a Daughter the most Beautiful of all Roman Women. The Maid being but young and at School near the Forum, Appius as he passed that way fell in Love with her in such a meafure as by no means could he allay his brutish passion. Marry her he could not. being a Plebeian, neither could he hope to obtain her for his Concubine : there remained then no other way for him to enjoy her, than by procuring M. Claus dius one of his Clients to challenge her as his Slave, fo that the matter being brought before him to judgment, he might judge her so to be. Claudius laid his claim, by affirming the was the true and natural Daughter of his Slave, and that the Wife of Virginius, now dead, her felf being Barren, procured the Child. and brought it up for her own; which though he and others knew well enough; yet being young, he had not opportunity till now to right himfelf. The pretence was fo impudent, as railed the indignation of all persons no otherwise concerned than as in the publick liberty. Numitor the Maid's Uncle by her mother, and Icilius the Son of Icilius one of the first Tribunes of the Commons, to whom the was already contracted, fufficiently evidenced the truth; but Appius being bent upon his lustful design, would hear no reason, and had not a tumult hapned out of the indignation of the multitude, would have given her up in the hands of Claudius, till fuch time as her Father could be fent for from the Army to defend her cause. Being hardly drawn to put off the matter till the next day, and not giving any more time, wrote to Algidum to hinder Virginius from coming, bidding Antonius Commander of that Legion to confine him, left he should hear any thing of his Daughter. But Numitor, and the brother of Icilius, prevented the Letters, and Virginius pretending the death of a near Relation, getting leave to depart, through by mays returned to the City, fearing a pursuite after the arrival of the Letters, which accordingly hapned, but he thus evaded it. 15. Virginius then was present in the morning to the great astonishment of

Appius, when his Daughter was commanded to be brought forth. He proved the Maid to be his own Daughter, and no suppositious Brood; but Appius, a man of no great natural abilities, besides the brutish, corrupted by the greatness of his power, and inflamed with the excess of his passion, neither constdered the defence of Virginius, nor was moved by the bitter tears of the Virgin, being angry at the pity of the standers by, who apprehended the case of Father and Daughter no otherwise than as their own, as if he himself were more to be pitied, enduring more for her beauties fake than she herself. Interrupting those that spake in her behalf, and commanding them silence, he told them, that this was not the first time he had had knowledge of this matter, for that Claudius his Father being a Client to their Family had committed him yet a Boy, when he died, to his protection. In the time of his Guardianship he said it had been cleared to him how Numitoria had procured the Girl of Claudius his Slave, but he thought it more convenient to let the matter rest till Claudius was grown up, either to take, or fell her as he should like best. Since he came into imployment he had not medled with his Clients affairs, but he himself it seemeth making an inventory of his goods, and having notice of this Slave, now challenged his right, and accordingly he both witneffed, and judged him to be the right Lord and owner of her. Great out cries and lamentation being made, as well by the by-standers as the Virgin's relations, Appius commanded all to depart, and gave order to Claudius to take possession of his Slave. Virginius, feeing there was no way but to yield to the Tyrant's lust if his Daugher lived, defired he might speak with her a little aside, as to take his farewell, which being granted, he drew her, hanging upon him, and pitifully be-wailing her condition, towards a Butchers stall, whole knife taking into his hands, he faid, Daughter, I will fend thee to our Ancestors, both free, and of bonest repute; for the Tyrant will not suffer thee to be either here; and therewith he stabbed; and dif-

Sect. 2. of four hundred Plebeians following after. In the same posture he came to the Camp at Algidum, holding the knife, which together with his Cloaths was all bloody. Calling the Soldiers together, he took occasion from his own misfortune to let them see in what condition their liberty stood, and with urgent reasons perfwaded them to revolt from the ten, and redeem their country. They being conscientious, as to their Sacramentum, or Military Oath, whereby they had sworn not to forfake their Leaders, but follow them whitherfoever, he told them they were discharged from any Obligation, because the Law for the Oath supposed the Captains should be created according to the Laws, which the ten were not, having usurped the power ever fince the last time for the Comitia. Being satisfied herewith, the Army departed, fome few Centurions only remaining, and took up its flation in the Aventine Mount, and the next day fortifying the Camp chose ten Captains, whereof M. Oppius was the Chief. Presently there came a great party from Fidene, and joyned with them, being offended with the murder of Siccius, and they chusing also ten men out of their Body, to the twenty the whole matter now contended for was referred. Appins in the mean while having gone by force to suppress the tumult he had raised in the City, was overpowered by the faction of Valerius and Horatius formerly mentioned, and now perceiving that most of the Odium lay upon himself as the principal cause, he kept himself in his house. Sp. Oppius therefore assembled the Fathers, at which time came the Captains from Fidena, requiring that the revolters might be punished. L. Cornelius accordingly moved that they should all be remanded back to their charges, which if they obeyed, the Ring-leaders only were to be punished, but if they refused, the Senate then should consider how all those Procureth the might be dealt with, who had betrayed their truft. But the Fathers were too destruction of sensible of present grievances, to hear the motion of such corrupt interest, and were prevailed with by Valerius and Horatius, to make Peace with the Army (which by this time was departed to the Holy Mount) on condition that the same form of Government should return, as was in being before the creation of the De-

17. Valerius Potitus, and M. Horatius Barbatus, both Inheritors of popularity, were created confuls in the Centuriate Comitia, who (according to their promife to the Commons when they procured them to lay down Arms, that they would by all means possible procure their benefit) preferred divers Laws to the regret of the Patritians. One was, that fuch Laws as the Commons enacted should pass in the Comitia of the Curia, wherein they were more prevalent than the Patritians, as those in the Centuriate, by reason of their influence upon the Equites, and the richer sort of Plebeians, were ever too strong for the multitude, by reason of the distribution of the feveral Classes into Centuries formerly shewn. After this the Tribunes, whereof Virginius was one, thought fit to call the December to an account. Virginius being appointed the accuser of Appius, insisted most, saith Livy, upon that Law, which commanded the defendant to have liberty till fuch time as his or her Slavery was proved, which Appius had gone about to violate in his Daughter's cafe. Before the Tryal, being committed to Prison, for that no Bail would be taken, he was there found dead, as fome thought fecretly made away by the Tribunes, but as they and others gave out, having hanged himself. After him Sp. Oppius, as next to him in guilt, was accused, and being condemned, died the same day in Prison by his own hands, saith Livy. The other eight banished themselves, and Claudius the pretended Master of Virginius was driven out after them : with which Justice the State was fatisfied, and indemnity given to all others. Things thus feeming to be fetled, the Consuls took the Field against the Equi, Volsci, and Sabines, against whom their fuccess was such, as deserved a Triumph, but the Senate gave them a repulse, being grieved at the Laws they had made in behalf of the Commons. Claudius also the Uncle of Appius accused them of the murther of his Nephew, and other violent courses taken against the Decemviri, and their party, whereas all ought to have been (according to agreement) buried in oblivion. The Confuls appealed to the People, and complaining much of the Senate, procured by the help of the Tribunes a Law to pass for their receiving the privilege of Triumph

18. The Commons by all the privileges already obtained, were but more inflamed with a defire of greater, each morfel out of the prerogative of the Patritians, adding unto their appetite. After three years they required to be made partakers of the Confulfhip, which hitherto the other had enjoyed, being elected in the Sect. 2. Yet the mul- Centuriate Comitia, wherein they themselves had the power. The Tribunes provided a bill for making the People free, and at their own choice, whether they would create Patritians or Plebeians at every election, which thing the Senators bearing most hainously, as seeing their privileges utterly ruined thereby, thought all things to be endured, rather than the Law should pass. The Allies of Rome now fent for aid against the Equi, and Sabines, who invaded them, and news was brought that the Veientes and Ardeates would revolt; but the Tribunes those Popular Tyrants hindred all Levies, suffering none. that refused to be lifted, to receive punishment; neither could the Senate prevail with them, to defer the matter till the War should be ended. The Confuls in so difficult a time held a private conference of certain Senators, whereof Claudius, according to the genius of his Ancestors, was all for resistance, urging that nothing was in this matter to be yielded to the Commons, who went about to change the conflitution of the State, and thereby were Enemies to it. But T. Quintius shewed what inconvenience force and Civil War might bring, and the rather, for that their Ancestors had made the Tribunes inviolable, by a Curse laid upon themselves and Posterity, in case their persons were hurt, or the conditions then fworn to in their behalf should be broken. When the rest were all of his opinion, Claudius proposed an expedient as seasonable in so great necessity. He advised by no means to suffer the Consulship to come into the hands of Plebeians, but to create certain Governours in the room of Confuls, fix, or eight, whereof an equal number at least should be Patritians; for hereby they should feem not to take too much power to themselves, and yet not give up the other Office, wherein lay the fecret of their prerogative, to be managed by base and unworthy men. When this project marvailously pleased all, that nothing might seem to be designed beforehand, he advised the Confuls not to ask them the graver men their opinions first, as the custom was, when the Senate should meet, but the younger and most popular : and he appointed T. Genutius the Conful's brother to propound this way of reconciliation at his private

19. When the Senate was affembled, Canulcius the Tribune, who chiefly profecuted the matter in hand, without preffing it, inveighed against the Confuls, as holding fecret meetings, and hatching clandestine deligns against the State: and those Senators who had not been called took the thing in some distain. But the Confuls protefting their innocence by an Oath, faid they would also by deeds declare it, and therewith gave any of the younger fort leave to speak, and when none rose up asked Valerius first of all his opinion. He advised the Fathers to favour the Commons, who had deserved so well both in acquiring dominion, and in getting and preserving liberty, and urged that the City could not be free if there were not an equality of right; yet for that the War was now urgent, he defired the thing might at prefent be forborn till that was finished, upon promise that then the Law should be propounded. Horatius being asked next, and others, feconded him, and at length Claudius being defired to fpeak, that he might conceal the defign, according to his own cultom, and that of his Family, flew out into invectives against the Commons, and advised that the Law might never pass, neither then nor ever after. A greater tumult following, T. Genutius was asked his opinion, and as of himself propounded the expedient, that fix Governours might be chosen, three out of each order, who having confular power, when the time of their Magistracy should be expired, then the Senate and People meeting together, might refolve whether they would have the fame Office or that of Confuls for the following year; and what was concluded by most voices, should prevail at the end of every year. This was gladly embraced, both by Senators and Tribunes, and leave given to any Plebeians to stand for the new Office. But so fickle a thing is desire The fickle and without reason, and so easily changing into the other extreme, especially of the multitude, that those who so earnestly before sought that the chiefest Magistracy the multitude. might be communicated to their body, threatning else to leave the City as formerly, and take Arms, when they had their defire, were glutted with it, and changed into the other extreme. For many Plebeians standing for the Office, and using their utmost endeavours to be preferred, they thought none of them worthy of that honour, but bestowed it upon eminent Patritians only, who appeared as

This num. orie. Jain ber of Collegues, together with the mixture of Plebeians who afterwards preffed in, procured, that although they had both the power and enfigns of Confuls, yet their privilege and dignity feemed unlike, whence a Tribune in way of contempt called them a Proconsular Image, and P. Manlius the Dictator, shewing that a Mafter of horf-men was inferior to a Conful, compareth his power to that of theirs. Having been for some years created, and for others laid aside, at length in the three hundred and eighty eighth year of the City, they were quite cast off, at what time Q. Sextius a Plebeian was admitted to the Consulship. But these first Tribunes having held their Office seventy three days, then were constrained to lay it down, for that the Augures found some flaw in their election, and the Government returned into its former course, the Senate naming T. Quintius Barbatus, who in the Comitia created L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus, although it be doubtful, to fay truth, whether there were Tribunes only, or Tribunes and Confuls both for this year.

time, and T. Quintius Capitolinus the fifth. This year were the Cenfors made, Officers who being but contemptible at the beginning, role to great dignity The Cenfors, and power. Their original and power might have been more clearly difcoand here Diony- vered, but that Dionyfius his History is here in the beginning of this story brofor his history ken off, the remaining part being loft, to the great dammage of the studious is booken off, in Antiquity. For not to speak of his smooth style, and the Artick purity therepartbeing loft of, he hath therein delivered the Antiquities of Rome from the first Original, with fuch diligence, that he seemeth in this respect to have excelled all Writers, both Greek and Roman. For what Latin Authors have neglected, as vulgarly known amongst themselves, as Sacrifices, Games, Triumphs, Enfigns of Magistrates, the universal discipline of the Roman Commonwealth, the Census, Auspicia, Comitia, that difficult distribution of the whole People into Curia, Classes, Centuries, and Tribes: further, the authority of the Senate, and Commons, with the power of Magistrates, he of all others hath delivered most accurately. That these things may be better understood, he compareth them with the Customs of Greece, as where he speaketh of Clients, Its commenhe occasionally maketh mention of this relation amongst the Athenians and Theffalians, as C.e/ar also writeth it to have been ordinary amongst the Galls. He compareth the Roman Dictator with the Harmostes of the Lacedemonians, the Archons of the Thessalians, and the Elymnetes of the Mityleneans. The Laws of Romulus, Numa, and Servius, had perished but for him, as also the knowledge of the Original of Rome in a great measure: and so choice are all his Collections, that they tend, as to the inftruction of the Reader in the depth of State Mysteries, so also to his acquiring or retaining a religious awe of Provi-

he feemeth to have derived his choicest Antiquities. These things render a sufficient account, why he is made use of in the History of Roman matters, rather than more urgent business, the Senate procured out of their own order two pecu- Sect. liar Officers to be created, who were called Cenfores, because according to their Censio or estimation the People was cessed, saith Varro, or because every one accounted himself worth so much, quanti illi censuissent, as they judged, or estimated, according to Festus.

CHAP. IV.

23. At the beginning they were created for five sr, because according to Servius his constitution the People were to be ceffed at ever Lustrum, which conteined fo many. But their dignity and power fo increasing, that they seemed of too long a continuance, nine years after, in the three hundred and twentieth of the City, by a Law which Mamercus Æmilius the Dictator preferred, the duration of their Office was confined within the term of one year and an half. Though their Office at first was only to take an estimate of mens Estates, and defcribing all publick and private riches, to diffribute the People according to their Livius lib. 3. wealth into Classes and Centuries; yet within a while they came to have inspection into manners also. For they upon misdemeanour put out of the Senate, took away publick Horses, and cast out of the Tribes. The former kind of punishment was inflicted upon Senators, the second upon Equites, and the last upon meer Plebeians. Their removing Senators, was by paffing them by at the new election. For, such Senators faith Festus, as were passed by in former times, were lyable to no diffgrace, because as the Kings chose and substituted is vota Pratewhom they pleased, so after them the Consuls and Tribunes Military, such as riti, they had greatest interest in; first Patritians, and then after Plebeians, till by the Tribunitial Law of Ovinius, it was ordained, that the Cenfors out of every order or rank, should (curiatim) elect the most worthy into the Senate, whence it came to pass, that such as were passed by or removed, were noted with ignomi-

24. As for the difgrace which they put upon Equites: It was the cuftom for every Layers at the publick Cessus to appear before the Cessus with their Horses in Vide Platatheir hands. If they approved of them, they bade them pass by and lead a combification way the Horse; if they determined otherwise, they took away the Horse, and parasitan is way the Horse; if they determined otherwise, they took away the Horse, and parasitan is commanded him to be fold. The third note of diffgrace concerned the Plebei-Livium lib. 29. ans, whom they either removed from their own Tribe into another less honourable, according to Livy, or made them Ærarii, and registred them in the Tables of the Carites, whereby they were deprived of their Centurie, and remained Citizens only in this respect, ut pro capitibus suis tributi nomine ara solverent, as writeth Asconius Pedianus upon the Oration of Cicero against Q. Cacilius, called Divinatio, which disputeth who ought to be admitted the Accuser of Verres. Gellius telleth us what was meant by the Tabula Caritum. The Carites (inhabitants of Care in Tuscany, once called Agylla) we understand to have been first Lib. 16.19. 12. of all made Municipals, without any right of suffrage: and it was granted them that they might receive the honour of being free of Rome, without any trouble or burthen, for that they received the Sacra (or Idols) of the Romans, and preserved them in the Gallick War; that is, when Rome was taken by the Galls, as Livy hath the flory also in his fourth Book. Hence were those called Tabula Caritum, vice versa, wherein the Cenfors caused such to be registred as they depricontaining view verys, where the conjust causes your vow recognition as any approved of the right of Suffrage. Although these several sorts of punishment respected the several ranks of men, yet sometimes those of higher degree rashed of all or most of them, so that Senators might not only be passed by, and Equites deprived of their Horses, but lose their Tribes also, and be reduced to the condition of Ærarii.

25. This Office being committed to the prudent management of able perfons, became effectual to the repression of such vice, as fell not under the particular cognisance of penal Laws. Private faults, and domestick miscarriages were by them noted, with fuch actions sometimes as now would not simply incur the censure of precise illegality or indecestcy. Some of their questions upon Oath were such as these : (a) Hast thou a Wife according to thy mind! to which one once making a jefting answer, was made an Ararius. A (a) Let A. Sect 2. Because he looked to himself, but Statius to his horse; for which irreverent anfwer he was registred amongst the Erarii according to the custome. Now Statius was a fervile name, given by the antients to most Slaves, whence Caeilius the famous Writer of Tragedies was called Statius, though it was afterwards as it were turned into a firname, and he called Cacilius Statius. They were wont also to take away horse from very big and corpulent men, as unfit for service, but (b) Gellius observeth, that this was no punishment, as some thought, but a taking away of the employment without ignominy. This Cenfus was (b) Lib.7.622: was managed in the Campus Martius, and it being compleated, the Lustrum was made, with prayers for the publick fafety, and a facrifice of the Suovetaurilia formerly mentioned. The power of the Cenforship remained untouched (although the power of the Cenfors was weakened by restraining their time to a year and a half, though they were named every fifth year) untill the Tribuneship of P. But afterwards (whether by reason of the corruption that was crept amongst Judges, or for other reasons) Metellus Scipio the Conful procured Clodius his Law to be abrogated, and so the antient Vigour of this office returned. Lipsius writeth, that under the Emperours it was diminished, and lay for dead

Then the form of the State being changed after the victory of Acti- pag. 127. um, Augustus having the care of manners committed to him by the Senate, looked to nothing more diligently than the Cenfus, for thrice he performed it, not onely in reverence to Roman Citizens, but all Subjects of the Empire, with fuch care and diligence as none ever before him. Under Tiberius and Caligu-Sunon, in Acla the Census was not observed, but under Claudius the seventy fourth Lustrum gaille. was celebrated. Being intermitted during the reign of Nero, Vespasian renewed it, and celebrated the feventy fifth Cenfus. Domitian named himfelf amongst his other titles Perpetual Cenfor, but made no Lustrum, fo that for an hundred Idem in Doniand fixty years the Census was intermitted till Desius the Emp. created Valerian tians. The Dictator fummoning Malius to appear, when he would not obey, Ahala killed him in the Forum, and was justified for so doing by Quintius, who commanded his goods to be fold, and his house razed. It should feem from Livy that Ahala escaped without punishment : But Cicero and Valerius on the contrary affirm, that he was banished by the incensed multitude. This hapned in the three hundred and fifteenth year of the City after Varro's account. Valerius and Livy fay, that the Area of his house for a memorial of his punishment had the name of Æqui-Melium.

28. The Tribunes inraged about the death of Malius, procured for the year following Tribunes Military with Consular Power to be created now fix years feektorevenge after their Institution, hoping that into the number of fix fome Plebeian might creep, which thing would give them an opportunity to revenge the death of bringing in treep, which thing were created, and their expectation unanswered thereby. This year Fidena, a Roman Colony, gave up it felf to Tolumnius King of the Veientes, and by his Instigation murdered the Ambassadors sent thither. For this War Mamercus Æmilius was named Dictator, who overcame the Enemies in battel, wherein Cornelius Cossus a Tribune in the Army, slew, and spoiled Tolumnius, thereby obtaining Opima Spolia. Varro thought they were called Opima ab opibus for their riches; but Plutarch thinketh rather ab opere, be- In Romale & cause the confecration of them was granted to a Captain, who with his own hand Marcello flew the General of the Enemy. They were confecrated to fupiter Feretrius, fo called, because the Trophy was carried in a Feretrum, or certain little carriage, as some thought, at that time there being many Greek words in use with the Latines, or a Feriendo, from Jupiter his smiting with Thunder-bolts, or else from the blows given in battel. This honour of carrying in Triumph the Opima Spolia hath only thrice hapned to Roman Captains faith Plutarch untill our time. First to Romulus, who slew Acron King of Canina; secondly to Cornelius Cossus, who killed Tolumnius, (the Etruscan in one place he calleth him, and the Tyrrhenian in another) and thirdly to M. Marcellus, who so killed and spoiled Britomartus (in one place, but Virdumarus in another) King of the Galls. A controversie there was of old, whether any but a General from a General could take Opima Spolia, which maketh Livy Apologize for what he writeth in honour of Coffus; but Varro wrote, as (*) Festus witnesseth, that a Manipu- + in Voc. 29. Two years after this, Fidena was taken by another Dictator, A. Servilius, through the working of a Mine. But when the Confuls had kept the power four years, they were forced to give way to the Tribunes Military, for the Creation whereof, though the Tribuni Plebis prevailed, yet the Chief of the Commons miffing all this while of being joyned with the Nobility in the honour, were much offended. At the end of two years the Senate took occasion from the War wherewith the Agni and Volsci threatned Reme, to bring in Confuls, which also gave way to a Dictator, A. Posthumius Tubero, a-Confuls 4gainst their wills, through the power of the Tribunes. He finishing the War fuccesfully, laid down his Office. And in this year wherein T. Quintius Cincinnatus the fon of Lucius, and Cn. Fulius Menio, were Consuls, Livy by a gross mistake would have the Carthaginians to have passed over into Sicily the first time, by an occasion of the disagreement of the Islanders amongst themfelves. After five years the Commons prevailed to have Tribunes Military created the fifth time, four in number, who shewed how unprofitable the equal command of many in an Army is, and gave occasion to the making of a new Dictator. For, Fidena having now again revolted, and joyned with the Veientes, three of those Tribunes were sent against it and them, and the fourth left to Govern the City. When they came to ingage with the Enemy, One cried A pilinge left to Govern the City. When they came to ingage with the Enemy, One cried flewing the Fight, but another fail of Jay, and each one being of a feveral mind, matters were excellency of a flewer of the City was fruite. at length brought to that pass, that the Roman Army fled. The City was struck

Æmilius being named Dictator, appointed for his Master of Hors-men A. Cornelius Cossus, who obtained the Opima

30. By the prudence and valour of these two Fidene was retaken, and sacked after the Hetruscans were overthrown; and the Dictator returning to Rome in Triumph, laid down his Office when he had held it seventeen days. For three years the Tribunes Military continued, at the end whereof the Senate took occasion at the War which threatned from the Volfei, and at their absence, to bring in the Confuls again, notwithstanding the Tribunes of the Commons opposed it. But C. Sempronius, one of these Consuls, managing this War very carelesty, the Tribunnes thence took advantage, and the Tribunes Military again refumed the Chief Power. This was for one year, at the end whereof the Senate again procured Confuls to be made. When this year was exspired, there was so great contention about two Questors, which the Commons would have created out of their body, that the State fell into an Interregnum, L. Papirius Mugillanus being Intervex for a Composure procured the Tribunes Military to be again admit-Trionnes Milited, and four Questors for the following year to be created, either out of Patritians or Plebeians, as the People should think fit in their Comitia; but this fatisfied not the Tribunes, nor the better fort of Plebeians, not one of this order being preferred (though fome flood) either as Tribune Military or Quaftor. In the second year after this, the Slaves conspired to set fire on the City, and seize upon the Capitol; but the plot was timely discovered. The Tribunes Military held the Government for feven years, and then another Interregnum because of the Contention following, Fabius Vibulanus the Interrex brought in Consuls

31. The Tribuni Plebis according to their custom made a bad construction hereof, and having now and then mentioned the division of publick grounds, preffed it earnestly with an extent now to all that at any time had been gotten by War. The Patritians no less vigorously opposed it, and the Tribunes hindred the Levies of Soldiers, fo that with much ado, and upon extream neceffity only could the Confuls procure any to oppose the Equi and Volsci, who now made incursions. In the fifth year the Commons being croffed in their intentions by the Senate, of resuming the Tribunes Military, created three of the Quaffors of their own rank, and the chief amongst them designing to be created Tribune Military for the next year, stickled hard for that kind of Government. Tribunes Mi. The Senate at length was constrained to yield; else no opposition could be made against the former Enemies, who now again made inroades into the Roman Territories, and by confederacies exceedingly strengthned themselves. For this cause also, though much against the mind of the Tribunes, a Dictator was named, who overthrowing the Enemy in one battel, wasted his Country and returned. In the third year after this, the two orders were fomething reconciled, by the Plunder of a Town taken from the Volfei, and especially by a Decree of the Senate for the publick pay of the Armies (with brass money) before which time every one bore his own charges in the War. But fuch was the contentious disposition of the Tribunes, those grand incendiaries, that they drew this into Odium, as grievous to fuch who had formerly maintained themselves in the Wars, and now were to pay others. They effected, that for a time the pay was denied, and after three years they procured a Plebeian (P. Licinius Calvus) to be chofen amongst the Tribunes Military, wherein they mightily applauded themselves, and readily permitted the pay of the Army to be gathered. Lieinius carried himfelf so well in the Office, that for the year following all the Tribunes Military save one, were Plebeians.

32. For these several years the War abroad was carried on with the Hetruscans, with various fuccels, and Veii the principal of their Cities was befieged, no less in compass than Athens, and exceeding wealthy, being within twenty miles of Rome. Its Inhabitants, called Veientes, had in behalf of the Fidenates, waged War with Romulus, afterwards being conquered, had feven times rebelled, and ever perfidious in time of Peace, always wasted the Roman Territories. They compelled the Fidenates also to rebel, perswaded them to kill the Ambassadors, and the Romans thither sent to inhabit, for they vied with the Romans themselves for power and riches. They had moreover injured the Ro- Sect. 2. man Ambaffadors, and not once procured Hetruria to rife against the State: wherefore the People offended with io many injuries, resolved utterly to destroy Veil. Whereas the Soldiers until this time, were wont in Summer only to be abroad in War, and Winter at home in the City, now were they constrained both Winter and Summer to continue the Siege. The feventh year thereof drawing towards an end, the Tribunes Military were blamed of remiffness, so that for the following year new ones were created in their rooms. Amongst them was Furins Camillus, who having got much credit in the battel fought with the Æqui and Volsci under Posthumius Tubertus the Dictator, was honoured other ways, as by being created Cenfor; in which Office he caused the Batchellors to marry the Widdows of fuch as had loft their lives for their Country, and first of all others obliged Orphans to pay Tribute, for that the depending Wars, especially the Siege of Veil, were very chargeable to the State. Being now Tribune Military the second time, he did nothing against Veii, it having tallen to his lot to repress the Falerienses and Capenates, who disturbed the Romans in their enterprize. Platatio in At length in the tenth year of the Siege, they created him Dictator, as the most fit canille.

Made Dictaperson they had to finish it.

CHAP. IV.

33. Camillus appointed Cornelius Scipio to be his Master of Hors-men, and first overthrowing in a great battel the Falisci and Capenates, went against Veii. Finding it full of difficulty to take a place of fuch strength by storm, he wrought a Mine up into it, through which his Soldiers iffuing, he eafily furprized it. Being elevated by fo great an atchievement, whereby he had thus subdued the corrival of Rome, in the tenth year of the Siege, he triumphed in a Chariot drawn by four white Horses, which his Country-men thinking proper only to the King and Father of their gods, were much offended at it: and indeed no man neither before nor after him (faith Plutarch) affumed to himself so much honour. Being offended with this carriage, they found themselves as much concerned in another matter. The Tribunes of the Commons proposed a Law for dividing afunder the Senate and People, whereof the one should stay at Rome, and the other remove to Veii; this parting as they thought, being a ready means for the enrichment of both, by the possession of two such considerable Cities. The Plebeians now many and rich vehemently pressed it, and the Pa-multitude into other courses. Having contracted an alienation of mind from incurrent the them upon these accounts, another thing cast him into an absolute hatred, and the multivale, that if not upon a just, yet a plausible pretence. He had made a vow, that for hindring if he took leii, he would dedicate the tenth part of the Plunder to Apollo, but of Partitions when the City was taken, either because he was unwilling to displease the Soland Plebeians, diery, or forgot it, the thing was omitted. After he had laid down the Office of Dictator, he moved the People in it, and the Priests reported that the facrifices portended the anger of their gods, which must be appealed by gifts; fo that the Soldiers who had already spent what they had got upon their necessary ufes, were forced upon oath to restore the tenth part, wherewith a present was made to Apollo. Because there was little Gold in the City, the women contributed their ornaments, in way of requital whereof the Senate decreed, that at their burial they should also be commended by funeral Orations, which before this had not been tritians judging it would prove the overthrow of the State, as earneftly op

34. The Tribunes again moving for a separation, the War with the Falisci opportunely fell out to divert the multitude, for which Camillus was chosen Tribune Military with five others. He befieging the Falerii, who inhabited a strongly fortified City, the School-master thereof drew out his boyes into his Camp, and offered to give them up into his hands, which treachery he fo far detelted, as to cause the Pædagogue to be stripped, and put Rods into the hands of his boyes, wherewith they drove him back into the Town. Herewith the Falerii were so affected that they yielded, and the Senate referring them for conditions to Camillus, he only fined them a fum of money, and received them with all the Falifei into friendship. But the Soldiers who hoped to have enriched themselves with the plunder of this place, enveighed grievously against him, and now the Tribunes pressing again the Law for seperation, he used fuch freedom in opposing it, that they out of revenge accused him of having pilfered the plunder in the Hetruscan War, whereof some brazen dores had been, as they faid, feen in his house. The multitude now upon several accounts 0002

So that not having any way to evade their displeasure, he went into exile, lifting up his hands He goeth in- towards the Capitol, and praying, that if he was unjustly and meerly by the lust and malice of the multitude banished, they might sodainly repent it, and that it might appear to all men, how much the Romans stood in need of. and defired his presence. Being gone, he was fined fifteen thousand Æra, which fumm in filver made up one thousand and five hundred Denarii. For Es or brass was then used for money, and Denarius thence had the name, for that it contained ten Affes thereof. But within a while it fell out, that Camillus was both miffed and defired according to his wish.

35. Many thousands of the Galles called Celta, finding their own Country too narrow for them, with their wives and children left it, to feek out new lears. Some of them passing over the Sea, pierced as far as the Riphean mountains. and placed themselves in the utmost limits of Europe; others took up their habitation betwixt the Pyreneans and the Alps, near the Senones and Celtorii. These a long time after having tasted of some Italian Wine, were surjously transported with a defire of inhabiting so rare a Soil, as brought forth such fruit, and passing over the Alps, got into their power all that Country once belonging to the Etruscans, and which reached from the Alps to both the Seas: for, that the Etruscans once inhabited all this Country, Plutarch proveth thence, that the Northern Sea was named Adriatick, from Adria, one of their Towns, and the Southern, Tyrrhenian, from the Tyrrheni the same with Hetrusci. At this time the posterity of those Galli Senones under the conduct of their King Brennus, besieged Clusium a City of Hetruria, whose inhabitants sent to Rome, desiring of that State to in-The Gallasbe- terpole, by fending Ambassadors and Letters to their unjust oppressors. The Sefiege tinstam. nate performing this neighbourly part, the Galles required part of the Territories of the Clusini, who were, as they faid, unable to manage them all, and Brennus not condescending to any other conditions, the Ambassadors (all three of the Fabian Family) in great anger went into Clusium, and caused the Inhabitants to make a fally out against the besiegers. It happed, that in the fight Fabius Ambustus one of the three killing a Gall, whilst he disarmed him, was discovered; whereupon Brennus conceiving just indignation, broke up his Siege, and marched towards Rome. 36. Yet because he would not seem to proceed unjustly, he sent thither, requiring that the Ambassadors might be given up to him, as having broken the Law of Nations. But favour so far prevailed above equity, that the matter being referred from the Senate to the People, no fatisfaction could be had from either : nay the Ambassadors on the contrary, were with three others created Tribunes Military, for carrying on the War. Brennus then continuing his march, and

Romans at Alia. breathing revenge, was met by the Tribunes at the River Alia, eleven miles from the City, who scarcely striking one stroak, quickly betook them to their heels, and their Army after them. The Galles purfued them, being amazed at the flight and cowardize of those who had already obtained for their valour a great name in the World; but were aftonished when they found the gates of Rome open, and none upon the walls to make refiftance; for it had been refolved to quit the City and fecure the Capitol. The greater part of the People departed into the adjoyning Country; the rest possessed themselves of the Capitol, all but certain old men of Senatorian degree, who in their robes placed themselves in the Forum, resolving to take fuch quarter, as the disposition of the Enemy would afford them. Brenmus at first fearing some stratagem, after he perceived all to be clear, entred the City. His Soldiers were amazed, to fee the grave Senators fitting without fear in the Forum, and hurt them not, till one handling the long beard of M. Papirius, the old man struck him with his staff upon the head, whereupon the Gall flew him, and then all the reft were killed, with all of both Sexes and all Ages that were found about the City, which was also now burnt to the ground, and the Capitol

He objected his condition of banishment, and refused to act, except by commission from those in the Capitol, whom he confidered to be the body of the Roman State yet furviving. There was

By this time as well the besiegers as besieged were well wearied, both parties for want of provisions, and the Galls by reason of a Plague which raged amongst them; so as (having once attempted to surprize the Castel, by climbing up the Rock, they were discovered by the crying of the Geefe, confecrated to Funo, and repelled by the valour of one Manlius efpecially) they agreed for fifty Pounds of Gold to arife and depart. Yet fo covetous were they, that they took out the God as it was weighing, and added to the weight, which being complained of, Brennus cast in his Sword also, crying Ve victis. which afterwards became a Proverb. But in the mean time came Camillus, and nulling this compact, as made without his confent, who before was Dictator, and therefore alone had power of making Peace, overthrew them in fight, and did Overthroweth them and ref- fuch execution upon them in pursuite, as what remained of them, was overpowered and cut off by the Country. Thus Rome, which was unexpectedly taken by the Galls about the Ides of the month Quintilis, was more unexpectedly recovered about the Ides of February, so that as Plutarch writeth, the Barbarians held it feven months, in the three hundred and fixty fifth year of the City, and the fixteenth of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

38. The Tribunes now renewed their importunity about removing unto Veii, which caused the Senate to procure Camillus his holding of the Office of Dictator, though contrary to the custom, for the whole year. He with gentle language appealed the multitude, shewing them, how unworthy a thing it was to for lake the feat of their Ancestors, and of their Country rites (which were appropriate to the same place) for to inhabit a conquered and enslaved City. Then was Rome rebuilt in great hafte, whereby afterwards it became rather an heap of houses than a well ordered Town, and that the watercourses formerly laid in the streets, now ran for the most part under private houses. Camillus having laid down his Office was forced the year following to reassume it, because of the Volsci, who now took Arms, as also the Æqui and Etruscians, all which he overthrew, and forced the Volsei to yield themselves after the War had continued with them for seventy years. In the third year after this he overcame them again, Living lie. 6. and with them the Hernici and Latines, whereof the later had ever from the battel at Rhegillan Lake been trusty and faithful until now: and from the Etruscans he recovered two Towns which they had taken from the Allies of Rome. This he did being Tribune Military, though envied by M. Manlius, who having done special service in the Capitol, by repelling the Galls, obtained the Sirname of Capitollinus. Being naturally haughty and ambitious, he was herewith puffed up, so as to extenuate the deserts of Camillus, and by ingratiating himself with the common fort, through paying their debts, and railing against the great ones, plainly to aim at the Soveraignty. This together with the War depending with the Volsai, which was also aggravated by the defection of the Hernici and Latines, caused the Senate to resolve that a Dictator should

The multitude much afflicted hereat, took mourning Garments, and made fuch diffurbance, that after fome time he was fet at liberty. But holding private meetings in the night, and growing more bold in his defign, the Senate committed it to the care of the Tribunes Military, whereof Camillus was one, (as afterward in cases of great exigency to the Consuls) to take care that the Commonwealth should receive no dammage. Being then brought to his Trial again in that place, whence a view of the Capitol might be had, he would ever point to it, and put the People in mind of what he had done there for them; whereupon Camillus caused his Judges to remove without the gate, into the grove called Lucus Petelinus, where being no fight of the Capitol, he was condemned. He was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian Rock, the place both of his honour and infamy: and it was decreed, that none of the Manlii should afterward be called Marcus.

Commons, now again exceedingly increased. Their Tribunes incensed them against the Patritians, and the contest was sharpened by Fabius Ambustus one of this order, who having married one daughter to a Patritian and another to a Commoner, this took fuch diftafte at her husbands condition, being void of honour. that Fabius told her he would so order the matter, that the same dignity should be communicated to her house, as was to that of her Sister. From this time he consulted with Licinius Stolo her husband, and L. Sestius, about the preferring of a Law, for making one Conful out of the Commons. These two being made Tribunes of the People, laboured fo vigorously about it, that after long and great contention it came to that pals, that for five years they fuffered no Supreme Magistrates to be created. Nine years this dispute continued, those two continuing Tribunes still, and the matter had come to another separation or worse, but that Camillus reconciled both parties. He was made Dictator the fourth time, faith Plutarch, for this purpose, but finding the multitude too stubborn, which threatned to Fine him except he complied, he again laid down his Office. The Senate then caused another Dictator to be named, and under him Licinius Stolo preferred a Law, which forbad any man to possess above five hundred Akers of ground, and afterwards being found himfelf to have above, was punished by virtue of his own constitution. Whilst the Contention was on foot about the Consulship, news came that the Galls, many thousands in number, were marching from the Adriatick-Sea towards Rome, which composed the difference for the present, and made them cast their eyes upon Camillus as Dictator the fifth time. He being near eighty years of age refused not the employment in this time of great danger, and perceiving the Galles to fight with Swords, striking at the heads and shoulders of their Enemies without any art or dexterity, he furnished his men with light iron Helmets, and bound their Targets about with brafs, teaching them how to fence, and receive the stroaks. By this device he rendred the swords of the Galles fo unferviceable, that giving them battel at the River Aniene, he eafily overthrew them, in the twenty third year after he had recovered Rome from their 41. After this Fight the Romans despised the Galles whom before they fo exceedingly feared, that whereas by a Law immunity from War

the Galles. Camillus in his retreat had Velitra given up into his hands; but having now finished his warlike exploits, a very considerable one remained to be performed by him at home. For at his return he was received with fierce and impatient Contests betwixt the Senate and Commons about the Confulship, and retaining his power, that thereby he might serve the interest of the Nobility, an Officer was sent from the Tribanes to pull him down from his feat in the Forum, and bring him before them. His attendants repelling the man, fuch a noise and tuniult followed as never before had been known, the multitude crying out, pull him down. Yet he laid not down his Of. fice, but departing to the Senate house, had a serious debate with the Fathers about the matter, and after great and various Contention, that party prevailed which granted to the Commons that one of the Confuls might be crea-Procure to the ted out of their Body. For this they defired, and obtained of the Com-Commonsthe mons, to have a Prator created yearly out of the Patritian order for administration of Justice in the City. By this agreement a good understanding being revived betwixt the parties, for as long a time as the infirmity of the Government could bear, a Temple was dedicated to Concord, which Camillus had vowed, moreover a fourth day was added to the Latine Feria, and the greater fort of Games were folemnized, which when the Ædiles of the Commons refufed to manage, the young Patritians offered themselves, and the Senate procured also of the People that two Patritians every year might be made Addies, who from the Chair called Cella Curulis, had the name of Addies Curules. What their Office was hath been shewn before. As for this Chair, Lib. 3.440.18. Gellius writeth, that antiently fuch Senators as had born a Curule Office, were for honour's fake wont to be drawn to the house in a Chariot, wherein was a Chair in which they fate, and which thence (from the Chariot or Currus) was called Curulis. But others think that both the Orthography of the word, and the difmension of the thing crossed this derivation, and that it was called Carulis rate Chair was. from Cures, a Town of the Sabines. The form of it upon old Coins represents that of Spanish Chairs, used by Princes as Chairs of State: It had also crooked Feet, as Plutarch

42. But as for the Prator, there were two causes of the Creation of this Officer: Æmulation and Use. The former was wrought in the Patritians by the Commons, who now had wrested into their own hands the Consulship. The later was brought about by reason that the Consuls were for the most part imployed abroad in Wars, and therefore there was a necessity of a Magistrate, whose peculiar work it should be to administer Justice in the Citie. The Pretor was so called a praeundo, as write both (a) Varro and (b) Cicero, and a (a) Prator digreeable with this Etymology it was once the name of (c) Confuls also, as dissays prairet we shewed before, and of all, or most other Magistrates, Civil or Military. It jure execution. is probable, that this name, as the other of Dictator, Adilis, and Duumvir, Aquo Lucilius, might come out of Hermia, there being fuch Officers there of old, as Spartianus, High prain. feemeth to hint, and otherwise may be gathered. There being but one created at the Ling, Lat. this time, viz. in the three hundred and eighty eighth year of the Citie, afterward (b) Vida cp., about the five hundred year another was added, who administred Justice un- hujus sett. to strangers, so that for distinction the one was called Prator Urbanus, and the Patager. I. other Peregrinus, the former being in Dignity above the other, and his Conflictutions with ormain called fus Honorarium, as we shewed before out of Pomponius. This same Au. Magistratus thor (having shewn, that after the bringing in of this Pretor Peregrinus; the cities Pretor into Pretor Peregrinus of the Pretor Pereg December for judging of Causes, the Triumviri for coyning of Brass, Silver, rem appellant and Gold, the Triumviri Capitales for keeping of Prisons, and the Quinqueviri runt unde & Pratorium tafor both fides of Tiber for executing what belonged to Magistrates in the even-birnaculum int ings (at which time they were not to be abroad) were created by degrees) diction, & in writeth further, that Sardinia being made a Roman Province, after that Sicily, pratoria, & then Spain, and after Gallia Narbonensis; so many Prators were made as there were bodie quoque Provinces, who partly governed at home, and partly abroad. Lipfius more par- toria ticularly affirmeth, that in the five hundred and twentyth year of the City, Sardi- afforius P.s. nia and Sicily being both made Provinces, there were two added, who as the dianus in Parformer two affifted the Confuls in administring of Justice, so these in the govern-urbis. ment of the Provinces. When Spain (Hispania in the plural number) was subdued, in the year five hundred and fifty feven, two more were added. So there were in all fix Prators, whereof two onely remained in the Citie, and the other, as foon as declared, departed into the Provinces, as they fell to them by lot: this order continuing till the examinations called Questiones Perpetus were appointed, at which time the Senate resolved that all the Prators for the year of their Office should continue in the Citie, and judge some controversies, either publick or private.

43. Pomponius proceedeth, faying, that Cornelius Sulla appointed other publick Examinations or Inquisitions : As, for example, De falso, De Paricidio, and de Sicariis, for which he added four Prators more; but Lipfius faith he is mistaken in the number, proving out of Cicero that he made but two. C. Julius Calar appointed other two, as also two Ædiles called Cereales, and afterward fixteen Prators, as appeareth from Dio, who also relateth the Triumviri with greater liberty to have made fixty four. Augustus filled up the number to fixteen, faith Pomponius, though first Lipsius will have him to have confined the number to twelve. Claudius added two, who were to judge onely concerning Fidei Commiffa, as the Law term is. Titus took one from the number : but Nerva restored and appointed him to hear and determine Causes betwixt the Exchequer and private persons. Another was appointed by M. Antonius Philosophus, called Prator Tutelaris. So, in all there were eighteen, till, as the Empire decreafed, they decreased also in number, and at length were reduced to that of three by a Law of Valentinian and Marcian. As for the Office of Prators, the Prator Urbanus, who was also called Prafectus Urbi (though a Prafectus was afterward onely chosen for the Latine Feria, in the absence of the Confuls executed their Office in the Senate and Comitia. But three things especially belonged to them: Games, Sacrifices, and Fudicature. The former onely continued to them in a manner when the Empire decayed. Their Judicature was either in publick or private matters. Private causes concerning meum and tuum, two onely handled, viz. the Urbanus and Peregrinus; Publick or Criminal maters were managed by all the reft, who yet had their feveral and diffinct Crimes, one or two, which they judged; and yet fometimes in their Provinces they managed Civil matters also. They had the same Ornaments and Enfigns of power as the Confuls; onely but fix Lictors apiece, whereas the

Sect. 2. other had twelve. In respect of their power and honour, as also because they were created by the same Auspicia, Livy calleth them the Collegues of

44. The first Conful out of the body of the Commons was L. Sextius, by Liv. lib. 7. whose Law the privilege was obtained; the first Prater Sp. Furius, the son of Camillus, and the first Ædiles Curules were Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio. To Sextius was given as Collegue from amongst the Patritians L. Æmilius Mamercus, and so the Consuls again returned after twenty three years, these being the eighty eighth pair as they are found in Livy, and the Tribunes Military were for ever laid aside after fourty eight courses of that Office, and fifteen changes from the Confulship to it, and from it to the Confulship.

Besides these changes of Government in Rome, there were the two Grand ones from Kings to Confuls, and from Confuls to the Decemviri; and to this time from the first of these alterations had intervened twenty Dictatorships, besides the feveral Interregnums. The first Interregnum was extraordinary, being betwixt the reigns of Romalus and Numa, when the Senate governed for the space of a year: the other were ordinary, and continued but for five days under particular men, at the end whereof another was elected, and called Interrex, having for that time the power of Confuls. All these changes of Government, except the Interregnums betwixt the Reigns of the Kings (whereof none but one is confiderable) hapned to the Commonwealth of Rome within the space of one hundred and thirty four years, scarce so many having completely passed from the banishment of Tarquinius, to this alteration in the Consulship, It is not in vain to have made these observations, that the Reader may plainly see the ridiculous fickleness, weakness, and danger of the Roman Government after that it came to be Antimonarchical.

45. In the beginning of the year, news came of the Galls their meeting together, who had before been dispersed through Apulia, and of the intended revolt of the Hernici; but all preparations were deferred by the Senate, because it troubled them that any thing should be done by a Plebeian Conful, and there was a great filence with a general intermission of business as in some great Vacation. Only the Tribanes were not filent, because that for one Plebeian Conful the Nobility had got three Patritian Magistrates, who sate as Confuls in their Curule Chairs, and their Pratexta: especially were they concerned about the Prator, who administred Justice, was a Collegue of the Confuls, and created by the fame Afficia. Modefty therefore fuffered not the Fathers to create both the Adiles Carales out of their own body; fo that it was agreed first that every other year they should be chosen out of the Commons; but afterwards they were elected promifcuously. The year following fell a grievous Plague upon the City, which took away, besides great multitudes of the common fort, One Cenfor, one Adilis Curulis, and three Tribunes: And who was more than all, Camillus himself now died, having born the Office of Conful more than once, been five times Dictator, having Triumphed four, and done fuch things as he defervedly was written the fecond founder of Rome. The Plague raging both in this and the following year, gave place to no means that were used, so that all mens minds being superstitiously bent, the Stage-playes were brought up to appeale their impure gods. The Actors were fent for out of Hetruria, in the language of which Countrey Hifter fignifying a Player, thence was derived the Roman word Histrio: these Playes were very barbarous and antick at the first. Two years after this the ground cleaving a-funder in the Forum, M. Curtius is faid to have rode into the hole, and fo being swallowed up, purchased conquest for his Country, according to the Declaration of their gods. After this there was action abroad with the Hernici and the Galls. One of these provoking any one Roman to a single Combat,

T. Manlius accepted of the challenge, and killing his Enemy took a Torques or Chain from his neck, whence he and his posterity obtained the Sirname of Torquatus. In this fight the Galls had the worst, so also three years after, and eight years after that, when M. Valerius a young man, and Tribune of the Soldiers, fighting with another Gall, as Manlius did, had the fame fuccefs. As he was fighting a Crow came, and fitting upon his head, with beak and wings affifted him in his Combat, whence he had the Sirname of Cor-vinus. At this time also were several Victories obtained against the Latines and Hetruscans. 46. But, (that we may joyn domestick affairs with those of the Camp) after the Commons

Commons had enjoyed the Confulship nine years, the Patritians took it from Sect. them again, out of disdain that the year before C. Marcius Rutilius a Plebeian had been Dictator. Hereat the multitude was so inraged, that at the end of three years more, the Senate was forced to restore the Office, and because Usury again was grown exceeding burthensom to the poorer fort, they appointed five men to order the payment of debts out of the Treasury. For the following year also one of the Cenfors was chosen out of the Plebeians. Hitherto were the Wars of the Romans as it were at their Gates : now they were removed further off, and henceforth continued longer: For in the four hundred and twelfth year from the founding of the City, and the fourty fixth from its reftauration, began the War with the Samnites, a People of Italy, * descended from the Sabines, from whom also they had their name, Strabol. 6. or from Saunia or Sannia, which in the Greek Tongue fignific Spears; or from p, 228.6. the Hill Sannium, where, as they came from the Sabines, they feated them-

The Samnites having unjustly molest- 6.46. ed the Sidicini with War, they betook themselves to the Campanians for succour. These being luxurious and effeminate, were easily worsted, and sent to Rome for aid, their Ambassadors imploring it with tears, and giving up themselves and Country into the hands of the Senate and People. The Senate was at first unwilling to use any force, for that the Samnites were their friends in confederacy; but upon the importunate cries and prayers of the Ambaffadors, and the scornful denial of the Samnites to abstain from the Territories of Capua and Campania, their request was granted, and the Confuls sent forth, the one to Capua, and the other into Samnium, where the Samnites were or verthrown in both places, and many thousands of them flain: For, in Campania, Valerius after a bloody Battel became Mafter of their Camp. In Samnium Cornelius having unwarily led his Army thither where they lay in wait for him, P. Decius a Tribune in the Army, possessed himself of an hill above the Enemy, who much wondring thereat, applied themselves thither, and so gave liberty to the Conful to draw forth his men into a more convenient place. Then

47. This defeat, together with the inroades made upon them the next year. drew them to a Peace, the Sidicini being left to their mercy. They defired that the Latines and Campanians might be commanded not to affift the Sidicini; but because the Senate would not deny that these Nations were under their command., and were also afraid to provoke them, so ambiguous an answer was made, that the Samnites being left but dubious, the Latines and the other thought themselves so far disobliged as to rebel. T. Manlius Torquatus now Consul the third time, with Decius Mus his Collegue, was sent to chastize the Latines. Upon dreams which they both had, that one General on the one part, and the Army on the other, belonged to the Dii Manes and Tellus Mater, they agreed, that in what part the Roman Army should be diffressed, he under whose command it was should devote himself, and that strict discipline should be observed, so that all were forbidden to fight without orders. The Army being forely put to it in Decius his wing, he devoted himfelf, devoteth him- and rushing into the midst of his Enemies, after great slaughter made lost his life. L. Sect. 2. Papyrius Crassus for Dictator, who appointed L. Papyrius Cursor his Master of Horf-men; but nothing memorable was done. The Confuls for the following year, T. Emilius Mamercus and Q. Publius Philo, overthrew the Latines, who had rebelled because of the grounds taken from them. Publius, by whose conduct and auspicium the Victory was obtained, receiving into amity fuch Cities as had been worsted, Æmilius led the Army against Pedus, which received supplies from several places. Though he had the better in all skirmilhes, yet the Town holding out, and he hearing that his Collegue was returned home to his decreed Triumph, he also left the Siege, and departed to demand that honour. The Senate was offended, and denied to permit him the honour, except Pedus was either taken, or furrendred, which caused him out of revenge all the year following to joyn with the Tribunes against the Fathers, his Collegue not opposing it, because a Plebeian. The Senate having a defire to be rid of them, commanded a Dictator to be named, but it belonging to Amilius to name him, he whose were the Fasces for this month, named his Collegue, who appointed funius Brutus his Master of Horfmen. And his Dictatorship was very grievous to the Nobility, being full of invectives against them, and procured three Laws, whereof Thevery con- the first altered the very constitution of the State. This was, that the Plebiscita should bind all the Quirites, or the whole People comprising all ranks, and degrees. The second, that such Laws as passed in the Centuriata Comitia, should be proposed by the Fathers before the Suffrage. The third, that one of the Censors at least should be a Plebeian, whereas now it was come to that pass, that both might be such. Thus did the Government of Rome devolve fast to a Democratical temper, the interest of the Patritians being now quite broken by the force of the former Law (which proved as a Les talionis to them, and as a punishment for their rebellion against their Kings) in the four hundred and fixteenth year of the City, after Varro's account, which fell in with the first of Arses King of Persia, and the twenty third of Philip King of fet up in the Forum; an honour but rare in those days. The several People of Latium, had several conditions of Peace set them. To Antium was sent a new Colony, and the old inhabitants were forbidden the Sea, had all their longships taken from them, had leave to enter themselves in the Colony, and were made free of the City. The ships were partly brought into the Roman Arcenal, partly burnt, and with their Roftra or beaks was the Gallery or Pulpit for Orations adorned, which was built in the Forum; whence that Temple was afterwards called Roftra. The year following Minutia a Vestal Nun was buried quick in the Campus Sceleratus, which I believe, faith Livy, had its name from Incest; for so the fault of incontinency in those women was termed. And in this same year Q. Publius Philo was made the first Prator out of the Commons; the Senate not regarding now what hapned in this kind, because they had been overpowered in things of greatest consequence. Now also a War arose betwixt the Aurunci and Sidicini, whereof the former were constrained by the other to forfake their antient feat, and depart to Suessa, which was afterwards called Aurunea. The Aurunei had given up themselves to the Romans, who thereupon ordered them relief, but the Confuls deferring it, this fell out in the mean time. But the next year the Sidicini and the Aufones who inhabited Cales were overthrown, and Falerius Corvinus now the fourth time Conful for the following year, and the greatest Roman Captain of this time, took Cales also, where a Colony was placed. In the second year after the taking of Cales, the Census was solemnized, and two Tribes added, Meria and Scaptia,

In the year following, above one hundred and seventy women were put to death for the art of poyloning, being discovered by a she Slave, whereas heretofore there had been no inquisition made after this crime, which therefore was accounted such a prodigy, that a Dictator was made for fixing of a nail, which they had read in their Annals to have been a remedy for the diffempers of the State, when the Commons seperated from the Patritians. Then did he begin to Distance of maintained him in his former Dignity. Then did he begin to Distance of Purfuit, and returned to Hecatompolis in Partibia, where his Soldiers being tickled with a Rumor that the Macedonians should have leave to return home, roused him with a Rumor that the Macedonians (hould have leave to return home, rouzed him up from his Idlenes and Luxury, to which now he began to give way after the Personal Flam falthion: but they were at length quieted, and perfwaded by him to perfect the work thus far carried on in Afa. Leaving then Craters in this Country with some Grie, a, 3.

Forces, he marched into Hyraania which Naharaner had siezed on, who yielded it up, and himself to him. After this he Invaded the Mardt, a neighbouring People, who, not being wont to be thus provoked by any, made refisence with 8000 Men, and intercepted Bucephalus his most beloved Horse, which, being given him by Demaratus the Corinshian, when unfadled, would fuffer none to come on his had, $456. back, and when adorned, none but the King himself, whom to receive he bowed down. Alexander exceedingly moved with the loss of him, after he had flain, and $1.6.4 and taken most of these Men, cut down all the Trees, and threatned the Nation with under the defendence of the force the Horse: so that for sea they did is, and which is not been so the defendence of the force the Horse: so that for sea they did is, and ter destruction in case they did not restore the Horse; so that for sear they did it, and with him fent their Prefents, and asked Pardon by 50 Messengers.

2. Returning back, he received 1500 Men which had been fent out of Greece to Darius with 90 Ambasladors. Over this Party he made Captain Andronicus, who brought them to him, and then went on to Zadracarta, the Principal City of Hyr-Whether the cania, where he staid 15 days. Hither Thalestris, Queen of the Amezons, is said, cortet place of the cania, where he staid 15 days. Queen of the with 300 Women, to have come to have Issue by him, which Story, though it be lexandre of came to him delivered for a truth by fome, yet is there better ground to suspect its frequent in neither Ptolomy the Son of Lagde, who was then with him, and wrote his Acts.

neither any other good Author of those times approved of it: and Alexander Limfelf in his Letters to Antipater, wherein he gave him an account of his Affairs, mentioned how the Southian King offered to him his Daughter in Marriage, but not a word of this Matter. After this, he returned into Parthia, and purposing now to go against Bessus (who in Battria had taken upon him a Royal Robe, and the Name and Title of Artuxerxes King of Persia) he thence removed into the Country of the Arii. Satibarzanes the Governor thereof meeting him at the City Suinto the Cour- fia, he confirmed him in his Place, but after his departure he revolted from him, whereby the King was conftrained to March back against him, which he hearing fled with 2000 Men towards Beffue; fo as Alexander following him some time, but in vain, reduced the Country to obedience, and returned to his former Expedition. Then came he into the Country of the Zarangei, which was governed by one Barfaenies. who having had an hand in the Murder of Darius, now fled into Inche, when the was afterwards fent, and put to death. Here in this Land of the Zarangei (or Di urga) was a Conspiracy against Alexander discovered; first by Dymnus to Ni. on achieved to to though he fwore fecreey, communicated it to Zeballinus his Brother. Zelallinus (car Ceballinus) acquainted with it Philotas the Son of Parmenio, who, delaying to il it to the King, either through heedlefiels, or on purpole, thereby procured me destruction of himself and family. 3. For, Ceballinus suspecting him to be in the Plot, because of his delay, discovered the matter to Metro a young Noble-man, and Master of the Armory, who acquainting the King therewith, he prefently caused them all to be apprehended, Dymnus knowing wherefore he was called, killed himself. Ceballinus cast all the Lin Continu blame upon Philotas, who denied not that he had been told of fuch a Bufiness, but faid Protection he revealed it not to the King only through neglect, and because he esteemed it of Distinct at no Consequence. Being brought to the Rack, he either confessed the thing as it drives like Philotos put to death for was, or feigned a Story, and wrongfully accused himself to escape the extremity of 3. Torment; after which he was put to death. Now was Parmenio his Father, a Man of 70 Years of Age, Governor of Media, one who had done especial service for the King, and his Father Philip. Alexander, either for that he feared he was privy And Parminio to the Conspiracy, or thought it not safe that he should out-live his Son, sent one away with speed, who delivering a counterfeited Letter to him as from Philotas, slew him asheread it. Amongst others that were put to death for this Conspiracy, was Alexander Lyncestes the Son-in-law of Antipaters, who had conspired the destruction both of Philip and Alexander, and for his Treason been kept in Durance now Three Years. This being done, the King proceeded in his Expedition against Beffus.

4. Though the Soldiers condemned Parmenio, and his Son while living, yet they pityed them when dead, and conceived great Indignation against their Judges. Alexander understanding this, that he might know their several Minds, gave out, that he was fending into Macedonia, and whofoever would, might have an opportunity thereby to write to their Friends. By their Letters, all which he caused to be opened, he knew who were discontented and ready to Mutiny, and all those he gathered into one company, left they should corrupt the rest, setting over them one Leonidas an intimate friend of Parmenio. The King in his March came to the Country of the Arimaspi, or Agriaspa, called also Energeta, say the Greeks, by Cyrus the Great; for Diodorus at that when he went against the Scythians, they furnished him with Provisions in his contaction? great necessity. He used them very curteously, bestowing upon them Money, and any as much Ground as they would ask, which was not much: And here he heard that divisant. Satibarzanes, being returned from Beffus, had withdrawn the Arii from obedience. Against him he sent 6000 Greekish Foot, and 600 Horse, under the Command of Erygius and others, who joyning Battel with him, he pulled down his Helmet, and challenged any one to a fingle Combate. Erigius accepting of the Challenge, flew him in the Place, and then his Soldiers, who had followed him rather by Constraint, than out of any good Will, yielded themselves. Alexander having staid among the gainst Bissis. Energetæ 60 days, passed on, and in his way subdued the Gedrossans, the Drange and Dragogi, as also Arachofia, where he got that Army into his Power of which Parmenio had the Command, confifting of 6000 Macedonians, and 200 Genelemen, belides 5000 other Greeks, and 600 Horse.

5. The next People he passed through were the Paropamisade. This being in the Palich the Winter-featon, his Army fuffered extreamly through the Coldness of the Climate: Thence he came to the Mountain Caucasus or Paropamisus, (as that part of it was repartifies. called) which he passed in 17 days, and built some Cities about it. Bessie had now A. M. 3677. in Badiria about 8000 of the Inhabitantsupin Arms, who thinking that Alexander V. 6, 436 would rather turn towards India than come against them, kept with him, till they alexander is plainly perceived that the King Invaded their Country: Then they all betook them to their own Homes, and Bellie with his other Followers patied over the River Oxus into the Country of the Sogdians, being still accompanied with Spitamenes and Oxyartes, in whose fidelity he confided. But Alexander Invading Battria, after he had taken divers Cities, had the whole Country yielded to him 5 after which he patled to the great River Oxus, but in his way was so distressed for Water, that his Army languished; and when it came to the River, so many drunk intemperately, that he loft more Men thereby, than he had formerly done in any Battel. E're he paffed the River, he fent home 900 Mwedonians and Thesalians, the former being Old and Wounded, and the latter the remnant of the Volunteers: those he rewarded, and gave thanks to fuch of the rest that remained as were willing to serve in the Wars yet behind. He passed over the River upon Skins and Bladders joined together. wanting Materials to make a better Bridge, and came to the place where he heard Beffus lay with all his Forces. Beffus was now for laken by his Friends, for Spitamenes conspiring against him with Dataphernes and Catanes, snatched the Diadem from his Head, tore Darius his Robe from off his Back, and gave notice to Alexander, that if he would fend any of his Captains with some Forces, they would deliver him up, Biffur deliver- A'exander fent Ptolomie the Son of Lagus, and one of his Guard, who brought him ed up to him. to his Presence in an Halter, whence he was delivered to Oxyartes the Brother of Darius, to be tormented to death in that Place where he had most wickedly flain his Sovereign, his Lord and Master.

4. About this time he utterly destroyed the City of the Branchida, with all its Strate 1, 1. He destroyeth Inhabitants, in revenge for a fault committed 150 years before. For, Xerxes & 14. the Branchides flying out of Greece, they betray'd the Treasures of Didymean Apollo into his hands; and for this, not daring to ftay behind, they left Miletus and followed him, who gave them this place, where their Posterity dearly paid for their fault. After this, he marche to the River Tanais, (another than that which severeth Europe from Aga) falling down from the Mountain Caucasus into the Hyrcanian Sea. Here some of his Soldiers going forth to gather Forage, were intercepted by the Enemy, which to the number of 20 or 30000 betook himself to an Hill, and thence was beaten down and Cartins & Arewasted to 8000, yet with great difficulty, and hazard to the King himself, who received a Wound in his Thigh. Thence in four days he marched in a Litter to Mara-Cometh to canda, the chief City of Sogdiana, where leaving a Garrison, he over-ran the neighbouring Territories; and shortly after came an Ambassage from the Scythians, called Avii, who thereby gave up themselves into his power. But in the mean time the Barbarians of Maracanda flew the Garrison of the Macedonians; being, together with the greatest part of the Sogdians, drawn back by those that took Besses, who also got to their Party some of the Bactrians and Susians. Alexander sent to suppress them Spitamenes and Catenes, who had delivered up Beffus; but they confirmed them in their Rebellion, and became Leaders in the Revolt, giving out, that the Badrian

Horse was sent for by the King on purpose to be made away.

7. To reduce these Revolters, Alexander presently sent Craterus, who besseged Csropolis the chief City, so called, because built by Cyrus the Great; and he himself besieged another called Gaza, which he took, and put all of ripeness of Age to the Sword, for a terror to their Country-men. After this he reduced feveral other Cities, and then went to the Affiftance of Craterus against Cyropolis, which was defended by 18000 Men. Here he lost many a valiant Soldier, and by a stroak of a Stone on his Neck was fell'd down senseles; but this excited his natural Vigor, so that out of Indignation he fer furiously on, and presently took the Place. Eight Thousand of the Inhabitants were flain, and the rest retiring into the Castle, shortly after yieldded for want of Water; and then one City remaining only of Seven, whither the Barbarians had fled, he reduced that also in a short time. Spitamenes now had shut himfelf up in Maracanda, where he belieged the Macedonians in the Castle. Against him he sent a Party; and began to build a City upon the River Tanais, which being raised in few days, with a Wall fix Miles in compass, he called after himself Alexandria. Stythian King, inhabiting beyond the River, fulpedring, fent his Brother with a Par- 12. driamage ty of Horse to beat away the Macedonian Forces, and demolish it. Coming to the 1.4. narrowest place of the River, they not only cast over their Darts, but opprobrious Speeches, which to incenfed Alexander, as though he was extream ill, and for fome time had not been able as much as to speak to his Soldiers, yet he resolved to pass

8. With admirable industry he got over his Men, partly in Boats, and partly upgainst the S.y. on Bladders, notwithstanding the earnest opposition of the Enemy, whom he put to the Rout, and, though he was very much indifpos'd in his own person, pursued them 20 Furlongs, then fainting, he commanded his Men to follow the Chace as long as they day would permit. The want of Water in this Place was fuch, that the Army was thereby exceedingly diffres'd, and the King himself drinking of fome that was corrupt, fell into a Diarihea. But not long after the Scythians fent to excuse themfelves, denying that the War had been undertaken by their general confent, but only by a certain Party that lived upon Robbery. Giving themselves up into his hands, he difinited the Ambatladors curteoufly, and with them the Prisoners he had taken. By this time Spitamenes had cut off the Party fent against him, which Alexander understanding, in three days time Marched 1500 Furlongs to Maracanda, whither he had notice that he was returned; but bearing of the Kingscoming, he fled amain, and was purfued for some time, but to no purpose. Alexander then dividing his Forces, over-ran the Country which had revolted, and gave Command, that all of ripe Age should be put to the Sword, for a terror to others, by which severity fell 120000 of the Inhabitants of Sogdiana. Leaving Peucolaus there with 3000 Foot, he departed to Bactra, (a City to called from the River Bactrus, which runneth through it, being otherwise named Zartaspa) where he caused Bessus to be brought to the Head of his Army: Here he made his Nose and Ears to be cut off, Fig. purific and then fent him to Echatane to be Judged and Executed by Sentence of a Council of or his ex- of Medes and Persians. Thus Diodorus relatesh the Story; but Plutarch writesh, fon. That by Alexanders Command, the Boughs of two Trees being first drawn together, and he made fast to them both, they then were suffered to return to their natural site, and he was thereby pulled afunder.

9. Having much encreased his Forces by the coming in of fresh Supplies, he once decision. more over-ran the Country of the Sogdians, as yet not fully fubdued, and the five parts of his A:m/ afterwar is met and united at Muracanda, whence he fent Hephastion to lead out Colonies into the Cicies of Sogdiana, as Canus and Artabazus against the Scytlians, for to them he heard that Spitamenes was fled, who with a Company of Bactrians and Segdians, and about 800 Horse of the Massagetes, got a Castlenear Bactra into his Hand, then came against Zaria pa, or Bactra, and by an Ambush cut off many of the Defendants in their Sally out against him. Upon Canus his Approach the Maffagetes fled, but he purfued and killed many of them. Alexander having subdued more of the Sogdians, returned to Maracanda, whither the King of the European cartingling. Scythians inhabiting above Bollborns, fent to him, offering his Daughter in Marriage; esp. 1. or if this liked him not, he defired, that the principal Muedonians about him might contract Affinity with his Nation; moreover he offered to come in Person and receive his Commands. After this, Alexander Hunted in the Forrest of Bazaria, which had been untouched for four Ages. Herein a Lion coming upon him, Lylinachus (who afterwards Reigned, and had flain a Lion e're this) went about to stave him off; but the King forbad him, and receiving the Beaft, flew him at one stroak. Four Hundred Beafts more being killed, he Feafted his whole Army, and again repaired to Maracanda, wherehe flew Clytus.

10. In a Feast (to which he had invited him) being heated with Wine, he fell of Idem. ibid. commending his own Acts, and therein hare I to high, as to speak scornfully of the derianas lib things performed by his Father Philip. Who therefore ran him through, and killed him out-right, having a little before defigned him to the Government of Sogdiana in the room of Artabazus, who excused himself by his Old Age; For being the Son of Dropis, and Brother to Hellanica Alexander's Nurie, he had done good Service to both Kings, and was now an Old Soldier. Alexander, when he came to himfelt, confidering what he had done, would have made way for following him by his own Hands, and when he was hindred by his Friends from violent Attempts, would have done it by fasting four days. On the fifth, his

Attendants brake into his Tent, and comforting him, caused him to eat. The Macedonians judged Clytus rightfully put to death, and decreed he should not be buried; but he commanded this lost Office to be performed to him. Leaving a good Guard with Canus to defend Sogdiana, and take Spitamenes if he should come that way in Winter, he marched to Xenippa, where, after a sharp Encounter, he received the Bactrian Exiles, who having revolted, had betaken themselves to that Place, lying upon the Confines of Scythia. In the Spring following, being the Tenth Year of his od. 113.48.28. Reign, he fet upon a Fort in Sogdiana, fituate upon a Rock, 60 strong by Nature V. 6.427. through its excessive heighth, that the Defendants counted it invincible, (many having Alexand. 10. fled thither out of the Country) and upon his Summons, Arimazes the Governor, who held it with Thirty Thousand Armed Men, demanded if the Micedonians could flie? But he proposed large Rewards to such as would first mount it, whereby certain young Men being Animated, made a shift to climb and help one another up, and being got to the top, the Befieged were amazed, and thinking their Number greater than it was, yielded the Place. In this Fort amongst others was Oxyartes the Satrapa or Governour (who had revolted from Alexander) with his Wife and Children. Of his Daughter Roxane the King was fo enamoured, as he shortly after Married her, and perswaded the great ones about him to take them Wives out of that Place. 11. He thence departed into Naura (or Parataca) where he understood that many Barbarians had possessed themselves of another Fortress, situate as the former, and Fortified moreover with an exceeding deep Ditch. This yielded to him through the persuasion of Oxpartes, and then with his Horse he cleared the Country of the Revolters. About the same time Spitamenes coming into Sogdiana, was encountred drisaus. by Cenus, who drew from him the Naturals of the Place, and the Bactrians, so that he had only left him a Company of Massagetes. Those flying with him into the Wilderness, when they heard that Alexander pursued them, cut off their Captains Head, and fent it to the King, though some write, that his own Wife cut it off, and prefented it to Alexander, who detesting the Treason, commanded her to depart his Camp. After this the Dubx, who had revolted by the procurement of Dataphernes, delivered him up, and returned to obedience, and Craterus with Polysperchon having finished the War against the Revolters in a short time, they all met at Battra. Alexander was now so puffed up, as to require Divine Honours from his Followers; which Callifthenes the Philosopher stifly refusing to give him, felt the effect of his Ambition.

12. It hap'ned that the King hunting on a time, one Hermolaus a Gentleman of his Guard, and Scholar to Calisthenes, killed a wild Boar, which Alexander himfelf intended to have struck, for which he was beaten by his Command. The Young Man bearing the difference most heavily, as also Sostratus his inward Friend, they confipred Continuations. with others of the Guard to kill the King, which to perform, they agreed, that one Platarth in night they would all watch together. It was long e're they could so change their cour- Alexand. Ofes as to bring this about, but at length having done it, it chanced that the King fat cap. 18. up drinking all that night, so then the matter being frustrated, was revealed by one Arrianus lib. of them, and they were all stoned to death. Now whether any of them accused 4. Callisthenes, as some reported, or Alexander did it himself, he was made away, though as to the manner of his death, they who were present themselves agreed not in their Relation. Callifthenes was the Scholar of Ariftotle, and the Son of his Coufin germane, of so severe a temper, that he could not order himself according to his Masters directions, who when he sent him to Alexander, advised him, Either very plefantly, or very rarely, to converse with him, that so he might be either more acceptable valor Max. for Lis discourse, or safe by his silence. Aristotle also himself seemeth to have been lib. 7. cap. 2 threatned in a Letter written by the King to Antipater in Macedonia.

13. Alexander had e're this time resolved to make War upon India, and bound his Conquests with the East. That he might not leave any impediment at his back, he commanded 30000 Men to be raifed out of the Provinces, that he might have them both as Soldiers and Holtages. Out of a conceit of the glory of the Expedition, he adorned the Shields of his Soldiers with Silver Plates, their Horses with Golden Bridles, and their Armour was fet out with Gold and Silver. Leaving then Amyntas in Pattriana with 3500 Horse, and 10000 Foot, he set forwards in the Spring, leading an Army of 120000 Men. In tendays he passed over Cancasus and came to Alexandria, which he had caufed to be built in the Country of the Parapomijada, whence he marched to the River Cophenes, and fent to Taxiles to meet him, who came with fuch Presents as India afforded. Dividing now his Army, with one part of it he fent Haphestion and Perdicas another way, with Command, that when they came at the River Indus, they should provide things necessary for passing over it. He with the other invaded the Appians, Thyreans, and Arafacans; and croffing the River Choe, the first City he came at opposed him. He himself and Ptotroining the invertible, the first only see take at opposed that the lace, and putting all the Inhabitants to the Sword, burnt it. In the Country of the Africas he got a Booty of 40000 Men, and 230000 head of Cattel, whence marching to contact the sword in the story of the Country of the Co ward the Grureans, with difficulty he passed over the River Grureus. Invading 116. 12. the Assacrians he took the City Massaga, the King whereof being lately dead. his Mother Cleoplis Reigned, and by the profittution of her Body to Alexander. procured a confirmation in the Kingdom.

14. After this, he took Bazira, and Nora was forfaken by its Defendants, who betook themselves to a strong Rock called Aornos. This Place was exceedingly Fenced by its wonderful height, and the River Indus which ran by one fide of it; as also by deep Pits and craggy Rocks, by reason whereof the report went, that Hercules himself attempted, but could not take it. The Story of Hercules inflamed the King with a defire to mafter it, who having first taken several other Places, brought his Forces hither, and by means of an Old vian, who shewed him the only Passage closely Befieged it. By incredible diligence he filled up the Ditches, so as he could bring his Men to fight, but yet he was not able to ftorm the Rock, and therefore refolved to starve them out, leaving a way for their Escape; and they seeing his Resolution, took the advantage; but many were flain in the Pursuit. Taking order then for the full clearing of the Country, he passed on to the River Indus, near to which he hunted Elephants, and continuing in the Plains thirty days for the Refreshment of his Army, Sacrificed to his gods, and Celebrated Games and Exercises. Now Hephedium and Perdicear had finished all things necessary for passing the River; and not of this only, but others allo with one (almost) and the same labour. For, divers Rivers running through India (asbesides Cophener, Coer, and Indus; Hydasper, Acelines, Hyarotis, Hyparus, and Ganges) they so framed the Boats, as they might eafily be taken in Pieces, and being conveyed in Carriages, be as eafily, upon occa-

15. In the Eleventh Year of his Reign, and the Fourth after the Death of Dacroffeth the rius, in the Spring, Alexander passed over the River Indus, and was received above his Expectations. For, Omphis, or Mophis, King of the Country, had per- d. M. 3699; fwaded his Father, when yet living, to fubmit himfelf, and now having fucceeded in V.C. 428. the Kingdom, met him in the way, and gave it up into his Hands, who restored it to Alexand 11. him, and permitted him to assume the Name of Taxiles, common to all Kings of that Country, of what Family foever. Coming to Taxila the Metropolis, he was fumptuoully entertained, and receiving great Gitts, gave also very liberally, to the diddin of those about him, of whom Meleager in his Cups congratulated with him, that at length in India he had found a Man worthy to receive from him in way of free Gift 1000 Talents. Alexander remembring how he had repented the killing of Clytus, contained himself, but not impertinently answered him, that Environs Men are nothing else than their own torment: The next day Abijarus King of the Indians inhabiting the Mountains, and who together with Porus had Wars with Taxiles, by Amballadors gave up himself and Kingdom. Alexander leaving a Garrison in Taxila, marched towards the River Hydaspes, beyond which Reigned Porus: Thinking by the terror of his Name to affright this Prince into obedience, he fent to him before-hand, willing him to pay Tribute, and meet him on the Frontiers of his Kingdom, to which he answered, that he would do the latter only, and that Armed. Near unto Porus Reigned another of his Name, and his Nephew, who out of hatred to him, fent Ambassadors, and gave up all he had into the hands of Alexander.

16. The Boats formerly spoken of being conveyed from Indus to the River Hy- continuatoridasper. Alexander with Taxiles, Everal other great Persons of the Country, and bisdons 5000 Indians more came thicher: Bansantes the Governor of the Drange being pre-doing 1.3 fented to him in his way, whom he afterwards put to death for his Treason towards a 19. 6 Darius. On the opposite Bank of the River lay Porus with an Army very great in- Plutarehis deed, though the diffention of Writers about the numbers almost equal the bigness of it. He had his Elephants ready to affright the Horses, and keep the Army from landing; which Alexander perceiving, made as if he intended to pass the River at the place over against which Porus stood, leaving some there to make a noise, as if he ftill remained, and in a dark and rainy night got into a little Woody Ifland, which lay lower down the River, whence in the morning, though with much difficulty (through the rifing of the Water by abundance of Rain) recovered the further Bank, where he defeated a Party led by Porus his Son, who by some is faid in this Ingagement to have loft his Life. Porus, understanding this, drew down his Battel in the form of a City, whereof the Elephants, being many in Number, were as Walls. They grievoully distressed the Macedonians for some time, and the Indians continually retired to them as a Bulwark; but at length being driven up close together, they made great flaughter of the Indians themselves, whom Alexander also encompassing with his Men, did great Execution upon them. Porus himfelf, a Person terrible to encounter (his height, as is said, being five Cubits, and his bredth fuch as his Armour extended it to the proportion of two lufty Men) fought himself most valiantly, and encountring Alexander hand to hand, slew his Horse under him, so that he was faved meerly by the interposition of his Guard, many of his Men having faln at his fide.

17. Porus gave not over as long as he had any to stand to him; when all had left him, he retreated on his Elephant most stately to behold. As many of the Indians were flain in the Chace as had been in the Battle, by reason that Craterus and others, who had been left behind, came in afresh to the Pursuit. Alexander having a great defire to fave their King, out of respect to his great Valour, sent after him Taxiles the Indian, whom perceiving to come towards him, he ran at him with his Lance as his Ancient Enemy. But others being still sent, and amongst the rest Meroes an Indian, Porus hearing his Voice, and being fore diffressed by thirst, stood still, and then alighted from his Elephant. Alexander coming on spake to him first, and asked him what the thing was which he defired, to whom he answered, that he might be used like a King. The other replyed, that this should be done for his own sake, and bad him ask for his own Commodity what he pleafed, to which he made answer, that all things were contained in his former demand. "With this the Conqueror was so well pleased, that he received him into the number of his Friends, and restored to him his Kingdom, inlarged with new Territories. Alexander hoping that by his late Victory all India was laid open to him, intended to fail into the Ocean; and perceiving there was in this Place much Wood, he caused such a quantity to be cut down, as might fuffice for the building of Ships. He gave order also for the building of two Cities: one in the place where the Battle was fought, which he called Nice, and another on the other fide of the River, named Bucephalea after his Horse Bucephalus,

18. Leaving Craterus to perfect these Cities upon the River Hydaspes, he marched into the Country adjoyning to that of Porus, which having fubdued, he bestowed cornes lib. 9. on him, and allo the Kingdom of the younger Powis, who out of fear of his luncle on had now fled, with as many as he could draw after him to the Gangarids. After this he conquered several Nations beyond the River Hydraotes, and Invaded the Cutheans, who together with the Oxydrace and Malli opposed him, of whom in the Siege and Storming of the City Sangala perished 17000, and about 70000 were taken Captives. These Cutheans had a Custome, that when any Man died, his Wife was to be buried with him, to which the wickedness of one Woman that poisoned her Husband gave occasion. The City Sangala was destroyed, and their Lands given to certain Indians, who lived in the form of a Common-wealth, and had formerly given themselves up into the hands of the Conqueror. This severity made other Cities without any reliftance furrender themselves. Then advanced he into the Kingdom of Sopithes, who meeting him with his two Sons, with a Rod of Gold Adorned with Precious Stones, delivered up into his Hands himself, his Children, Kingdom, and all he had. Having received back his Kingdom, he magnificently entertained Alexander and his whole Army. Amongst several other Presents, he gave animals to him 150 Dogs begotten of Tigers, as is reported, and of great strength and activity, as 6.1. appeared by four of them which were let out upon a Lion extraordinary for ftrength and bigness.

19. Ere Alexander stirred from this Place, Hephettion returned to him from his continuition, Expedition, (having fubdued India in a great compass that way he was sent) whom piddras he received with Hopour suitable to his worth. Afterward he departed into the drians. Kingdom of Phegeus, (or Phegelus) who also submitted himself, and receiving the Conqueror, entertained him very magnificently. After two days he marched toward the River Hyphalis (or Hyparis) taking Phegens and Porus along with him. Agyrammes (or Xandrames) provided of 20000 Horse, 200000 Foot, above 2000 Chariots, and about 4000 Elephants. These things seeming incredible to the Macedoman, he asked Porus of the truth of them, who confirmed what the other had faid as to the ftrength of that King, but withall added, That being by a Barber be-gotten on the Queen, who had killed her Husband that he might Reign, he was for this cause despised by his People. Alexander now considered the labours and perils undergone by his Soldiers, who from the beginning of his Reign had followed him Eight Years; withall, how of late for 70 days together they had been forely diffredfed by Rain, Thunder, and Lightning; that he might oblige them, he gave them the Plunder of the Enemies Country, being very Rich; and in their absence gratifid their Wives and Children. Then after their return to the Camp, with a premeditated Oration he laboured to perfwade them to undertake the War with him against the Gangaride, but in vain.

20. For, Canus the Son of Polycrates, answered him in such a manner, ashe might eafily perceive how contrary the affections of the Soldiers were to the Expedition. After which, as Arrianus writeth, he kept himself close in his Pavilion for three days, and would admit none of his Friends to his Presence. Then sending for his Officers, he told them, That feeing the Minds of his Men were averse from proceeding any further, he intended to return home; yet, e're this, he had Sacrifized for palling over the River, but finding that the Intrals of the Beaft were not lucky, he fethed himself in a purpose to retreat. He caused twelve large Altars of fifty Cubits heighth, like to some Warlike Towers, to be erected near the River, whereon he Sacrifized according to the custom of his Country, and he celebrated Games in the Grounds adjoyning. After this he caused to be made a Ditch 15 Foot broad and 10 Foot deep, whereon, of the Earth, he raifed a confiderable Wall, making the compass of his Camp seem three fold larger than indeed it was. He commanded the Foot, that each one in his Tent should set two Bedsteads of five Cubits apiece, and the Horsemen to make theirs with the Mangers of their Horses as big again as they were wont to be. He caused Arms, Bridles, and other things to be framed after the same proportion, to amuse Posterity with a false appearance of a Gigantick proportion of his own Person and his Followers.

21. He returned the same way he came, setling the Government of the Provin-He retreateth ces in his passage, till he arrived at the River Hydaspes. Ever since his departure hence, the weather had been rainy, which spoiled much of his new City Bucephalea; but he caused it to be repaired; and here died Censs his trusty and faithful Friend, but one who had grieved him by his Answer to his late Oration. Downthis River Hydaspes he resolved, according to his former purpose, to Sail into the Southern Ocean, and therefore providing for fuch Places as he should leave, he reconciled Porus and Taxiles by affinity contracted betwirt them, and made the former, King, not of that Country only lying betwixt Acesines and Hydaspes, which formerly he had given that Country only ying octwist are me. and 1.3 pages, with Acessar and Hyphasis he to him, but also of such free Nations, as lying betwist Acessar and Hyphasis he had lately subducd. Having increased his Army by a new supply sent him out of the West, he divided it into three Parts, whereof two he committed to Craterus and Hephastion, commanding them to march on either side the River, down which he failed with a third in a Fleet of 1000 Vessels. Looling from shoar about the beginning of November, he first landed upon the Coasts of the Sibari, who being reported to be descended of those Greeks that with Hercules attempted the Storming of the Rock Aornes, claimed Kindred of him, and submitted themselves. Making Excursions into the neighbouring Countries, he destroyed many thousands of the Inhabitants that would not yield; and then returning aboard, hasted against the Oxydrace and Malli, who, as he heard, had carried their Wives into their strong Towns, and intended refiftance.

The Indians having gathered together 80000 Foot and 10000 Horfe, ut fight, thewed themselves near the River, having chosen their General out of the Oxydrace, Orifin. who made many Fires, and used other vain attempts to affright the Macedonians; yet as foon as these began to Arm, either out of fear, or by reason of dissention amongst themselves, away they fled to the craggy Mountains. Alexander then marched with all speed, through a large, dry, and barren Country, against the Malli, to defeat them e're they should join with the other; and coming unexpectedly upon them, many he flew, both in the Country, and those strong places which he stormed. After thishe marched to the River Hydraotes, where he killed many of them, and thence to a City of the Brachmans, whither he heard that some of them had tled: This he took, with the Castle into which they retired, as also the chiefest City of the Malli, whence they fled beyond the River Hydraotes, on the Bank whereof they drew up into a Battalia. He followed, and with his Horse skirmished a little, not thinking it fit to engage with them in Battel, being 50000 in number, till the Foot came up. Then they betook themselves to the next fortified Town, where by his hardiness he ran into extream danger.

23. Demophoon his Priest acquainted him, how that by his art, great danger was portended to his Person, and therefore he advised him, either to omit, or at least to defer the fiege. But he rebuked the man, because hereby he weakned the Valour of his Souldiers, and dividing them into two parts, fet upon the Town, whereat the Defendants left it and fled into the Castle. The King with those about him broke open a Gate, and entred first; Then he commanded Ladders to be set to the Castlewall, which being but flowly performed, he took one from a Macedonian, and rearing it mounted himself: after him went up Pencestes, who bore usually his Shield before him, (which being taken out of the Temple of Pallas at Ilium, he would always have fo carried) and after him Leonatus by the same Ladder, and one Abreas by another. The Argyraspides also, (or those who used the silvered Shields) sollicitous for the Kings safety, mounting hastily broke the Ladders, and thereby hindred others as well as themelwes. The King upon the Wall was laid at with Darts on every fide, and when his left arm was wearied with holding his Target, his Friends would have had him leap down again unto them, who were ready to receive him in their Arms. But by an unparallel'd attempt he leaped down on the other fide into the Fort, where if he had not by good chance light upon his feet, he might prefently have been flain or taken. But caffing himfelf to fall upon them, and feeing a Tree hard by, he applied himself to it, so as he had it on his right hand, and the Wall on his left.

24. None of his enemies were so hardy as to come near him, only they plied it with Darts afar off, whereof the greatest part being kept off by the Boughs and Leaves of the Tree, the reft he received on his Target. But the Indians drawing felf innoes-nearer, threw showers of Darts upon him, and with stones broke his Helmet. Being spent, and not longer able to stand, he fell upon his Knees, whereupon despising him they came to him; and yet he so received them with his Sword, as two fell down dead before him, and after this he killed their General who boldly fet upon him; then none would venture to approach nearer, but plied it with Darts afar off. By this time those three that mounted the Wall after him were got down, and fought floutly for him, of whom Abreas was shot in the Face and fell, the King also in the Breast with an Arrow, which piercing through his Armour near his Pap, some affirmed, that Blood and Breath iffued together out of the Wound, and he fwooned, being covered by Pencestes with his Shield. Now the Micedonians brake into the Castle, and put all to the Sword, sparing neither Sex nor Age. They carried their King out on a Target, not knowing whether he was alive or dead; but shortly after he came to himfelf; and his wound was dreffed, (fome fay by Critobulus the Physician, others by Perdices) out of which much Blood iffuing, he fwooned again, and that very thing faunched the bleeding. While he fayed a little in this place, a report flew to the Army then lying with the Fleet at the meeting of the two Rivers Hydraotes and Acefines, that he was dead, and it gained fuch belief, that the Lettershe fent were taken but as counterfeit. Therefore he hasted to the Camp, where he presented himself

25. Having escaped this great danger amongst the Malli, (for amongst them it was, and not amongst the Oxydrace as some have mistaken) and returned to his Fleet, he failed down the River, and on the fourth day came to a place forfaken of its Inhabitants, but convenient for to make some stay in. Here he rested many days for the better curing of his Wounds, and employed his men this while in building of Ships. Hither the Malli and Oxydrace fent to ask pardon, and submit themselves. After which he failed further, and came to the confluence of Hydraotes and Acelines, the former whereof loseth it self in the later. Proceeding further, he came through Acesines into Indus, subduing a certain People in his way who lived in a Free State; and here he made Philip Governour of the Malli and Oxydraca, with all the Country down to this place, wherein he also gave order for a City to be built. Following on his voyage, he arrived at the Country of the Sanbesta, (or Sabraca) who living also in a popular way of Government, were very populous and strong, and hearing of his coming had got together 60000 Foot, and near 8000 Horfe, but upon a fight of his Fleet they let fall their courage, and fent fifty of their Principal men to ask Peace. From this place on the fourth day he came to the Seat of the Sogde, who also yielded themselves; and here by the River Indus he caused to be built another Alexandria, which he furnished with convenient Havens and Arfenals. Thence he and subdeeth failed down with such expedition into the Country of Musicanus, that he was upon him before he heard of his coming; therefore the Indian met him with fuch Gifts as his Country afforded, and gave up himfelf with all he had into his hands, acknowledging his fault that he had no fooner done it.

26. Having here commanded Terreites, whom he had fet over the Paropamifada, to be put to death, for abusing that People by a coverous and tyrannical Government, he caused a Fort to be raised in the chief City of Musicanus, wherein he left a Garrison, because the place seemed very convenient for keeping the Neighbouring Nations in Obedience. Leaving Musicanus in his former power, though not authority, he failed down to the Presti, another Indian Nation, over which ruled Oxycanus. Here he stormed two Cities, in one whereof their King being retired into the Castle, sent to him to beg pardon, but too late; for e're the Messengers could come at Alexander, two Towers fell down, which made way for the Macedonians, and oxycanus, who entring, killed Oxycanus amongst the rest; which being reported to the other Cities, they all yielded themselves. After this he came into the borders of the Brachmans, whose King Sabus (or Sambus) caused the Gates of his Principal City to be opened, but afterwards revolted at the inftigation of his Subjects, fome of whom paid dearly for it in a certain Town wherein they were taken, Sambus himfelf with thirty Elephants escaping. Some of them were upon pain of death to answer to certain hard Questions, which having done, they were dismissed with rewards, as Plut arch informeth us. But ere this, Musicanus had revolted, against whom Pithon was fent, who overpowering him took him Prisoner. He was Crucified in his own Country by Alexander's Command, with all fuch Brachmans as had drawn him

27. Returning to the River Indus, in the fourth day he came to a City of the Brachmans, called Hamatelia, the Inhabitants thereof hearing that he was invincible, poisoned the Heads of the Arrows, trusting to their own valour, and the natural strength of the Place. He sent a party, which by approaching their Walls, and then retreating, drew them forth, by which stratagem, of 3000 he took 1000, and killed 6co. Many of his own men died, and those who survived were brought into extream danger, amongst whom was Ptolomy the Son of Lagus. He being almost ready to dye, the story goeth, that Alexander in a Dream had an Herb shewed to him, which drunk, and outwardly applied, helped against the Poyson; the truth being, that the virtue of this Plant was by some declared to him, and this story seign-strability 15. ed out of flattery. For all this, the belieged yielding, had indemnity granted to them, and then came Meris King of the Illand Pattalena, which he gave up into the Conquerors Power. Alexander restored, and sent him back, commanding him to provide all necessaries for his Army; but failing down thither he found that he had left the City, and retired to the Mountains, with all his Subjects, both of Town and Country. Alexander fent some Horsemen to perswade them to return, which accordingly diverse did. Then did he order Hephastion to build a Fort in the City, and fent a party to dig Wells in that Coast of the Country which wanted Water. The Enemy fell upon these men out of the Wilderness, and killed many of them, which forced the King to fend others for a fupply. Now had he almost failed 10 months when he came to Pattalena.

28. At this Island the River Indus parteth into two branches, whereof both retained the name as far as the Sea it felf. * Alexander taking the right hand failed down that Channel, his Army being led according to the cultom, near the Rivers fide. The next day arose such a Tempest, as exceedingly distressed the Fleet, some Ships being driven to far as fearcely could they be recovered; whereupon for some time the King stayed here at a certain Island, and sent men on shore to take up some Natives to be their Guides. Coming lower, where the Chancl was very broad, another Tempest forced them into a certain Creek, where as great a fear seized on them, and so much the greater, because they were unacquainted with the occasion of it. It hapned, that the Tide being exceeding high (as it is at this day at Cambaia, where the River Indus falls into the Sca) all the Grounds near the River were overflown, Is difficiled except certain Hills, which appearing like fo many Islands to them, the Mucedonians fivom, and left their Boats. When the Water fell again, the Veffels were left on the dry ground, some being overwhelmed, and others turned upon their sides. But the River according to the course of the Tide overflowing again at the due time, fuch Vessels as stuck fast in the Mud were lifted up unhurt, but those that the Water found otherwise placed, were either dashed against one another, or miscarried very of another Island below, by the Indians called Cilluta, but by him Scillastis near which he must needs sayl down into the Ocean. Hearing that it was large, and very Commodious to harbour in, he gave order for the Fleet to go thither, but he himself proceeded further, to search whether there was an easie passage at the Rivers fall for the whole Navy into the Sea. Having passed some 200 surlongs, he discovered another Island, and then returned to the Fleet, where having sacrifized to fome gods, he went back, and performed this fervice to others after another fathion, faying, he was commanded to to do by the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon. Sayling out of Indus into the Ocean, he facrifized Bulls to Neptune, and after the burning of Incense cast out a Golden Vial with Golden Cups, into the Sea, praying for a prosperous voyage to his Navy, (which he intended under command of Nearchus his Admiral should sayl through the Ocean into the Persian Gulf, and so up Euphrates and Tigric) and that no mortal after him might pass the bounds of his expedition. Then returned he up the River to Pattala, whither he found Pithon come with the Forces, and purposing to leave half the Fleet at the City (at this day called Pattala in Cambaia) he commanded Hephastion there to make a Haven, and provision for shipping. He himself sayled down the stream on the left hand, which first led him to a Lake, where he left Leonnatus with most of the Souldiers, and with 20 Ships passed through this Mouth of Indus into the Ocean.

30. His defign was to see whether the Fleet might not best sail this way into the Sea; and he fatisfied himself that it might. Then did he Travel up the shore, and caused Wells to be digged thereon to furnish the Navy with Water. Returning then to Pattala, he fent part of his Army to dig more, and going to the Lake, he caused Havens to be made, and provision for Shipping: he also left there a Garrison with necessaries for 8 months. At this time the Etessar winds in this Country blowing from the South (though in other places from other quarters) hindred Navigation, wherefore he was constrained to leave Nearchus at Pattala with the Fleet till they should cease. He journyed through the Country of the Arabita (or Arbita) to the River Arabius (or Arbis) digging Pits on the shore for the use of the Fleet in its passage by these Coasts. Nearchus and his followers were two months after Alexander's departure driven out by the Inhabitants of Pattalena, and compelled to begin their Voyage e're the season of the year well served. Coming to the mouth of the River, they were forced to cut through a Rock (for some way) such a Ditch as by the help of the Tide might convey their Ships fafe into the Ocean. The Arabita hearing of Alexander's approach, fled into the Mountains, to that without opposition he passed over the River Arabins, and came into the Country of the Orite, of whom killing some, and taking others, (because they had not submitted themselves) he thence marched into the Borders of the Gedrolij, with whom the Orite had joyned, but upon his approach fent and begged peace, which he granted, on condition that they would depart to their dwellings. He fet over them Apellophanes with whom he left Leonnatus one of the Keepers of his body, with a party of Horse and Foot to expect the coming of the Fleet, and in the mean while to build a new City, and fettle the affairs of the Country.

31. In this paffage through the Country of the Gedrolij, greater loss and damage hapned to him than in all his expedition through Asia besides; because, what for want of Water, by excess of heat, ill diet and hunger, he carried not out the fourth Altxander past of those Forceshe brought into India. Yet was not this loss fustained through feth the Coun-ignorance; for fome tell us he knew of the danger very well; but hearing that this the following th ble difficulty. desire to pass through it, and in the glory of his adventure to excel them. After incredible trouble undergone, for 60 days, he came to Pura the chief City, where (as it was time) he refreshed his Army, and thence marched towards the Borders of Caramania. Hither news came that Philip, Governour of the Oxydraca, and of other Indians, was killed by the Mercenary Souldiers; but that his death was revenged upon them by the Macedonians; whereupon he wrote to Taxiles and Endemus to take care of the Country, till fuch time as he could fend one to succeed Pkilip. Coming into Caramania not far from Persia, he animadverted upon the Governor, as upon Cleander and Sitalces, who being fent to kill Parmenio, had after his death committed grievous outrages upon the people in those parts. He also punished Ozines and Zariaspes, who had solicited the Persians to revolt, and Heracon, who had rifled the Temple at Susa: here also he made Peucestes one of the Keepers of his Body, they being before this feaven in number. In the mean time Neurchus having polled the borders of the Arabii, Orita, Gedrolij, and Ichthyophagi, came into the Persian Gulf, and arrived at Armusia (now called Ormus) where understanding that his Master was but distant but five days journey, he went to him, and having made a report of his Voyage, returned presently to the Fleet, with order to pass up to the mouth of Euphrates, and thence row unto Babylon. 32. It being now very good fayling, Alexander sent Haphastion by Sea into Per-

Phradates allo, who had been Governor of the Madi, Hircanians, and Tappri, was here put to death, for affecting Kingly power. But, Penesifer who protected the King among the Malli, and as a reward had been received amongst the Keepers of his Body, was now further made Governor of Persia, and thereupon fully conformed himself to the fashions of the Country.

33. Alexander had a great defire to fail through Euphrates and Tigris, into the Persian Gulf, to compass about Arabia and Africk, and so to pass through the Straights Autaming leading into the Mediterranean, (now called the Straigths of Gibraltar) for which purpose he commanded Wood to be cut down in Libanus, to be carried to Thap-Jacus in Syria, and being made into Ships, thence to be conveyed to Babylon. Not long after, Nearchus brought the Fleet up Palitigris to a Bridge newly made for the passage of the Land-army, where for the meeting of both the Armies, after fix months fayl; Alexander facrifized, and celebrated Games. Thence marching to Susa: the Provinces by their Deputies there accused many of their Officers, besides other Offences, of violating their Temples. He caused them all to be put to death, without respect to any former friendship, and with them Cleander, Situlces, and Heracon, whom he had formerly condemned in Caramania. This severity noised abroad, netled many that knew themselves faulty; Some scraped together much mony and fled, and others that commanded the Mercenaries revolted, which caused him to fend up and down Asia to disband the Stipendaries, who being thus put out of imployment, robbed all over, and at length met at Tenarus, a Promontory of Lacoma in Greece, whither many of their Captains fled to them. Alexander now married Statira the Daughter of Darius, and gave her younger Sifter Drypetis to his beloved Hephastion, having a great defire that his Children might be Cousins to him. To some 80 more of his Commanders he gave Wives of the Daughters of the chiefest Medes and Persians, and to them assigned Dowers. He made one great Wedding-feast for himself and them all: and to the other Macedonians that had married Wives in Alia he gave gifts.

34. Moreover he paid the debts they had contracted in Asia, and because they were unwilling by giving up their names to let him fee how bad Husbands they had been (for they suspected him of such an intention) he caused the mony to be given them, without taking account to whom, and this expence reached not fully 1000 Talents (as appeareth from Diodorus, Curtius and Plutarch; though Justin and Arrianus mention 20000) fo that as Curtius observeth, this Army which had conquered fo many Nations, brought more Victory than Booty out of Asia. He also rewarded them severally, as they had done him most eminent service; and to Pencestes, Leonnatus, Nearchus, Onesicratus, Hephæstion, and other Keepers of his body, he gave Golden Crowns. But this did not fatisfie the Macedonians, fo as to keep them from mutining. For, having failed the River Eulaus to the Sea, thence to the mouth of Tigris, and up this River as far as Opis, he there calling them together, gave liberty to all who were rendred unfit for fervice, either through age or being maimed, to return home, promising great rewards to such as would voluntarily ftay and finish the War with him. Though he intended hereby to gratise them, yet they made a bad construction of it, as proceeding from contempt of them and their fervice, and counting them unfit for War. They called also to mind how he used the Persian Habit and Customs, as did some of his Favourites; that the barbarous Nati-The Macedo ons were admitted amongst that Troop called his Friends; and that he had lately

mians mutinic caused 30 and more young men to be picked out of the Provinces, whom trained up in the Discipline of Macedonia, he called Epigoni, or his posterity. Considering these things, and thinking that he now despited their Persons, Fashions and Countries of the countries of try, they all defired to be disbanded, and bade him go alone to the Wars with his Father Hammon, feeing he fet so light by his Souldiers.

35. The King inraged, prefently caused thirteen of the Ringleaders to be apprehended, and drowned in the River; and reviling the rest, bade them all be gone home. Then entring his Palace, for that day and the next he would admit none to his presence. On the third, having confined the Macedonians to their Tents, he called fuch strangers to him as followed his Camp. Their faithfulness to him and the former Kings he commended, he related what favours he had shewed them, and told them he now took them as fellow Citizens, gave them the Arms of the Macedonians, and would have the Kingdom of Europe and that of Asia the same thing. Out of them he chose 1000 young men, to whom he committed the charge of his Person in the Court; he bestowed the commands of the Army amongst them, and made choice of some, whome naming his Kinsfolk, he permitted to kis him. These things cut the Macedonians to the heart, and made them seriously repent of their rashness. Coming to the Palace, they cast down their Arms at the Gate, and with great lamentation defired to be admitted, offering to give up the Incendiaries, and defiring him rather to kill than thus difgrace them. He refused to admit them, but they continued ftill two days, and as many nights before the Gates, professing that they would not depart till he had compassion on them. On the third day perceiving them thus humbled, he came forth to them, and Callines after mutual weeping, told him, that it troubled them to know others received into his Kindred, and themselves excluded from it. He answered, that he received them also, and so would call them thenceforth; then he offered himfelf to be kifled by as many as would. Being thus received again into favour, they returned with great joy to their Tents, and afterwards were feafted by him, together with Persians and others, to the number of 9000 Guelts.

36. He difinified now fuch as were unferviceable for the Wars (though some say it was not till a little before his death) to whom he paid not only their arrears, but gave them money to bear their Charges, and a Talent to every man besides. He fent home with them Craterus his beloved Friend to govern Greece and Macedonia in the room of Antipater, who was to bring over a supply of men. Then made he He comet to a progress through several places, and came to Echatane the chief seat of Media, Edutant in where Hephastion by drinking got a Feaver, and then impatient of a strict diet, died Midia, where in seaven days. In the absence of Glaucus his Physician (who was gone to the Theatre to behold the Sports) he eat his Dinner, and after it drank a Cup of cold Wine, which, as it was thought, increased the diftemper. Alexander took his death most heavily, fasted three days, and refused to be comforted. He commanded the Physician to be Crucified, befooke an universal Mourning, wherein even the Cities shared by the removal of their Ornaments from the Walls. He ordered Perdiccas to convey the body to Babylon, where he intended him a most sumptuous Monument, and refused to fill up his place of Captain of his thousand Friends, lest his name should be forgotten, by which he would have the Company still called. Then, for diversion, he made War upon the Coffai, a People bordering upon the Oxii, who having stood out against the Persians, despised him also, because of their valour, and the strength of their Country, fituate upon the Mountains of Media. Yet for all this, and the coldness of Winter, he brought them under within 40 days.

37. Having a great desire to sail the Caspian Sea, he sent Heraclides with divers Ship-carpenters into Hyrcania to build Ships, and then he took his way towards Babylon. Being distant from the City two or three dayes journey, the Chaldeans fent to warn him that he should not come into the City, for they were told

Then they defired him that he would not enter with his Face upon the West; but it being difficult not so to do, by reafon of the Fens about the City, having flighted their former advice, he also rejected this. At the celebration of the Olympick Games, he caused it to be proclaimed, that all Greek Exiles might return home, except fuch as were banished for Sacrilege or Murder, againft which the Albenians and Altolians only made resistance. Then celebrated he the Funerals of Hephestion with vast magnificence, and sacrificed to him as an Heroe. After this he made great preparations for Shipping, intending also to invade and conquer Arabia, which, hearing it was no less than India, he sent some to dis-

> he passed through Euphrates into Pallacopa, a River, which being supplied with Water from the former, thereby hindreth it from overflowing the Country. Here he opened the paffages, made a new one towards the Lakes, and coming into the Borders of Arabia, built there a City. Then deriding the Chaldeans, for that he had both entred, and failed in fafety from Babylon, he thither returned, and liking the City exceedingly, intended to make it the Seat of his Empire; though it was but for a short space, as it fell out. For, having set up feasting and drinking very late one night, as he was departing to go to Bed, he was again invited by Medius a Thesfalian to another carowze, where challenging, and being challenged, he drank for much Wine as put him into a Feaver, whereof he died the eleventh day. Some have Vide prett delivered that he was poyloned by the procurement of Antipater, who suspecting he Platestan & Diedena S was through the malice of Olympios called out of Macedonia for no good towards, use Fift. 32. himself, sent his Son Cassander with Poyson to be delivered to Iollas and his other Sons, Athenander that then waited on the King. Indeed Cassander was not at all favourable, as he ought describing to have been, to the Interest of Alexander's Posterity, as neither to his Reputation; Saturnal dilege and coming to him a little before his death, he did but little ftrive to fuit his humour. cap. 21. For feeing the Barbarians adore him, and unacquainted with fuch a fight, he burst forth into laughing, for which Alexander caught him by the Hair, and knocked his Head foundly against the Wall, as Plutarch telleth us. But as for matter of Poyson, the long lying of his Body in fo hot a Country, during the contentions of his Captains, betrayed no symptoms thereof, and therefore others give no credit to the report. Moreover, the course of his sickness presenteth us with no such symptomes, as it is described to us by Plutarch and Arrianus out of his Diaries.

38. While these preparations were making, and an Haven digging at Babylon,

39. On the 18th day of the (Macedonian) month Dæssus (May the 12) he slept in a Bath, because of his Feaver. The day following he returned to his Bed-Chamber, and spent it with Medius at Dice: then being washed at night, and having finished his devotions, he supped something liberally, and all the night was much distempered. On the 20th day he washed, and having sinished a solemn sacrifice, in the Bath heard Nearchus relate the Story of his Navigation, and of what he had seen in the Ocean. On the 21st having done the same thing his Feaver increased, and he had an ill Night. The day after he was held with a sharp Feaver, and was removed near the great place for swimming, where he discoursed with his Officers about supplying Vacant places in the Army with the sittest persons. On the 24th his Difede increasing he sacrificed, being borne out to the place, and communded the principal of his Officers to stay in the Court, and the rest to watch before the Gates. Being removed into the Inner Palace on the 25th day he rested a little; but the Feaver abated not, and when the Captains came to see him he spake not a word. So he passed over the 26th day, whereupon the Macedonians thinking him to be dead, came with great noise to the Door, and compelled his Friends to let them in; so in their Coats every man of them passed by his Bed-side. The same day Pithon and Seleucus were fent to the Temple of Serapis, to ask if he should be removed thither, and received answer, that he should continue where he was. On the 28th day towards the evening he expired. Though he fainted by the violence of his Disease; yet leaning on his Elbow, he reached out his Hand to all Souldiers that would touch it in their paffage, and (which feemeth incredible) continued in the same posture he had cartius lib. 10 fet himfelt, till the whole Army had faluted him. 40. The Souldiers being all gone, he asked his friends about him, whether they

Blood Maccdonia would shed in this Controverse, with what stangeters and bloodshed curius at seit would make him a Parentation when he was dead. At length he commanded his prd. body to be buried in the Temple of Hammon, and when his friends asked him to whom he would leave his Kingdom, he answered, to the most Valiant. Yet having taken his Ring from his Finger, he gave it to Perdiccas: whereby all conjectured that he commended his Kingdom to him till his Children should grow up. Again, Perdiceas demanding of him when he would have Divine Honours given to him, he replied, then, when they (his followers) were happy: which were his last words, and a little after he expired. He lived 32 years and eight months, reigned twelve, and Tollin Cartic. also eight months. He died fix years and ten months after the murder of Darius, as Diedous. in the first year of the 114 Olympiad, A. M. 3681, 322 years before the Æra of Christ. Sifygambis the Mother of Darius having with some patience born the loss both of her Son's life and Empire, when she heard of Alexander's death refused to live any longer. So, refraining from all fustenance she died the fifth day after.

CHAP. II.

Of such things as hapned after the Death of Alexander amongst his Captains, till their Cantonizing of his Empire into their particular Kingdoms, and their taking the Stile and Title of Kings upon them, Containing the space of 17 years.

Ome have written that Alexander by his Testament, distributed the Provinces amongst his several Commanders. So the Author of the first Book of Machabeer affirms, and the Excerpta Chronologica of an half Barbarian, as Valefius terms him, published by Scaliger. Alexander, he faith, coming to die wrote his Testament, that every one of the Princes of Alexander might Reign, all of them in their own Provinces. But Quintus Curtius, Arrianus and Diodorus Siculus sufficiently refute this Fable. Curtius writes expresly, Some have believed that by the Testament of Alexander the Provinces were distributed; but we have found the fame of that thing, though it be delivered by Authors, to have been vain. Alexander, though he had taken several Wives, yet left but one Son already born of Barline, the Daughter of Artabazus a Perlian, and another in the Belly of Roxane, the Daughter of Oxyartes. His Son called Hercules was despised upon his Mothers account by the Captains, who much fcorned the Conquered Nations. He had a Sifter named Cleopatra, Widow to the King of Epirus, and their Uncle, who was flain in Italy; and a base Brother called Aridaus (begotten on Philinna a woman of Larissa) who Married Eurydice the Daughter of Amyntas, whom being the right Heir, and his Nephew, Philip kept from the Kingdom of Macedonia, after he had exercised the Office of his Protector, and on him bestowed a Daughter of his own in Marriage. This Amyntas bore patiently the want of the Kingdom all Philip's time, but in the beginning of Alexander's reign, with the loss of his life, attempted something. His Title through the prowess of the two late Kings was utterly forgotten; Cleopatra (as a woman perhaps) was not thought of. Arideus neither by birth, personage, or qualities was fitly endowed; yet upon him the election fell, for want of a better, because the Captains were at a loss what course to take.

2. For, Ptolomy, the Son of Lagus (as he was called; but reputed the Son of Philip, who, as it's faid, having used the company of Arsinoe his Mother, put her off in Marriage to Lagus, when great with Child), rejecting the Title of the half Persian Brood, though as Alexander's Children they should have been considered, was for the Captains their taking the rule upon them, and deciding all things by Vote of the Caprains a-bout the Suc- major part. But as he might think this course most likely to serve his own ambition so Aristonus perhaps on the same grounds betook himself to the words of Alexander, which he interpreted as meant of Perdiceas, because, saying, that he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, at the point of death he delivered to him his Ring. He was seconded by many, who either bore good will to Perdiccas, or out of fear that he would carry it, would not venture to oppose him. But he would needs make a shew of modesty, thinking thereby the more to indear himself, whereat Meleager an envious man, and one who bore to him a particular grudge, took advantage to inveigh against him, and disturbed all Councils, by perswading the Souldiers that whosesoever was the Empire, they had the best Title to the Treasure. During the uproar Aridaus was mentioned, and his Name laid hold on by some peaceable Spirits, who labouring betwixt the Parties wrought a composure for the time, wherein yet Perdicas had the better of his Adversary. It was agreed, according to the delire of the Infantry, that Aridaus, the base Son of Philip, should be King, and for a simulation as he was flupid and dull (rather through the practifing of Olympias upon him, as some thought, than any Original indisposition) Perdiccas was made his Protector, and Commander of his Forces, who hereby in effect was King for a time, though that Title, with A. The care of the Burial was committed to one Arideus (not the King, though some have so mistaken) another of the Captains, who spent two years in making preparation for it, which made Olympias tax the late ambition of her Son, and bewail his

Protomy get-teth politeflien therein, partly by his fair carriage towards the Inhabitants, and partly by the power of an Army, which he raifed by virtue of 8000 thousand Talents. Hearing that Perdiccos had an intention to deprive him of his Government, he contracted affinity with Antipater, and making away Cleomenes his Lieutenant, because he was much addicted to the Protector, fortified the Country. Antipater was now employed in War in Greece, the Lamian War against the Athenians and Ætolians, who refused to receive their Exiles, as was hinted before, and so diffrested him in Battel, that he was forced to fly to Lamia, a City of Pthiotis. Here Leostenes the Athenian General belieged him; but when he perceived him forfaken by the Ætolians, he issued out, and slew him in the charge, being an excellent Souldier, and one who had deserved well of Greece. Leonatus Governour of the leffer Phrygia, allured by promife of his Daughter, came over to help Antipater; but marching through Theffaly was driven into a Fen by the Gracians, and there flain. At his mishap Antipater (who coming thither the day after, united his Forces with his own) is faid to have rejoyced, because he had de-Padicas lub termined to make himself Master of Macedonia. At this time Perdiccus taking the King along with him, went against Ariarathes of Cappadocia, whom getting into his hands, he Crucified, and fubduing those Countries which Alexander had passed by, gave them to Eumenes, according to agreement. Craterus not long after pulled over into Mucedonia, to the affiftance of Antipater, with 10000 Macedonius, and 150 Per Jans, which Force united to the Army of Antipater, overpowered the joynt strength of the Greekms.

7. Alcetas, with those Macedonians he commanded, flatly refused to fight against them; and Neoptolemus envying Eumenes the chief command, plainly revolted. After this, some were sent to seel Eumenes, but he answered, that he would rather die than betray his trust, whereupon Antipater and Craterus divided their Forces. Antipater marched towards Egypt to joyn with Ptolomy, and Craterus staied to oppose Eumenes, with whom fighting in Cappadocia, his Horse stumbled, and was run through with a Lance, and after the fight died of the wound: Neoptolemus also grapling with Eumenes was flain by him. By this time Perdiccas with the two Kings came to Pelusum in Egypt, where though Ptolomy purged himself of the crimes objected against him, yet he would pursue his enterprize, though contrary to the inclination of his Soldiers, his end being hereby to be brought about. Divers of his friends prefently forfook him; yet he fet upon a Castel near the Nile, and not being able to gain it, marched away and came over against Memphis, where the River parting into two streams, maketh an Island very convenient for the lodging of his Army. Endeavouring to bring his men into it, he lost 200 in the Ford, for that those who first waded over so removed the fand at the bottom, that the River was too deep for such as followed. Yet did he command those who had got safe over to return; of whom part were drowned, some carried down the stream to the Enemy, and others being toffed to and fro in the River were devoured by Crocodils. Ptolomy came over to the Kings, whom with the Officers he magnificently entertained, and then an election being to be made of a new Governour for them in the room of Perdiccas, though he could eafily have procured himfelf to be chosen, yet he got two others elected, viz. Pithon one of Alexander's most intimate friends and fin into his Aridaus, who having the care of the funeral committed to him, had at the defire of Ptolomy buried the Kings body at Memphis, against the will of Perdiccas. The Army now being displeased at the death of Craterus, declared Eumenes an Enemy, and chose Antigonus together with Antipater Generals for the subduing of him. venient, placing and difplacing Governours. He created Antigonus General against Eumenes, fending his own fon Cassander as Collonel with him, by whom he might be Arrigona Ge-certified, in case he attempted any thing for his own establishment; and then with the two Kings he marched for Macedonia. Eumenes having intelligence concerning these Councils, made all preparations possible for resistance. In the Spring Antigonus came against him into Cappadocia, where he sirst attempted by Libels thrown into his Camp, to draw his Soldiers from their obedience, offering a great reward for his head. Eumenes gave his Soldiers thanks for their fidelity, but told them, that these Libels were seigned by himself to try them, which was a notable device (and of fuch he was full) to make them wary of giving credit to fuch for the time to come. Yet some proved false to him, as one Perdiceae, who drew away a considerable party, but was pursued and taken, and being put to death, the Soldiers returned to o-bedience. But Apollonides his General of the Horse did most mischief; for being corrupted by Antigonus, when they came to joyn battel he passed over with his Expenses wor- Troops to him, whereby Eumenes had the worlt of it, and lost about 8000 men,

10. Apollonides the Traytor he caught and hanged: then, flying a private way, he returned to the Camp, and there buried his dead, to the wonder and amazement of the Enemy; after which he could have plundered the carriages of Antigonus but for burthening his Soldiers with the booty. Being driven to and fro in this flight, at length he betook himself to a Castle called Nora, situate in the Consines of Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and dismissed all his Army, except 500 Horse-men, and 200 Foot, as also such friends as were unwilling to undergo the hardship of a Siege. Antigonus before he would lay close fiege to the place, called him forth to a Treaty, requiring him to come to him a Superiour, to which he answered, that he accounted no man his superiour so long as he had a Sword by his side. This parley, though managed with much respect, came to nothing, and Antigonus leaving a party sufficient to carry on the Siege, marched against Aleetas and Attalus, two of Eumenes his consede-A. About this time Antipater died in Macedonia, and at his 01.115.412. death more fwayed by the Publick good than any felfish respect, left Polyspercon Prolon. 5. 435

(who after himself was the oldest of Alexander's friends now living) Protector of the eth and lea- Kings, and Captain, with full authority. Cassander his son stomached this very much, veth his place to Polyperkon, and confulting how to advance himself to be chief, secretly entered into confederacy with divers Captains. Amongst these was Ptolomy, whom he desired that he would fend him some ships out of Phænicia (for all that Country, together with Judea, he had now got into his power) into the Hellespont. But the death of Antipater strangely also made way for the inlargement of Eumenes.

11. For, Antigouus now being lef in Asia, thought oft no less than getting it all into his power, and for that end strove to ingratiate himself with the several Captains. Judging that the conjunction of Eumenes might be of great advantage to him, he fent Hieronimus his Country-man (who being an * Historian, wrote of the acts * Vide Villand of Alexander and his Successors) to desire him, that forgetting the fight in Cappadocia, cit. 1, 10, 11. he would enter into fociety with him, and receive a larger Province. He required that he should take an oath, which, slightly passing over the Kings, he had framed to his own advantage. Eumenes unwilling to swear fealty to him, with the assent of procured the Hieronymus and the befiegers, changed the form of the oath, and fwore to have the inlargement of fame friends and enemies, not only with him, but with Olympias, and the Kings.

Hereupon the fiege was raifed after a years continuance, which he had born with admirable chearfulness and prudence, and now being let loose drew many followers after him, fo that within a few dayes, besides the 500 which had continued with him in the Castel, he had 2000 at his devotion. Antigonus was very angry that he had changed the form of the oath, and by Letters checked the beliegers, for admitting of it, requiring them to beliege him again; but it was too late. Thus, they were as far from closing as before; and still were further set at distance by the affairs which now were on foot in Macedonia.

12. P. lysperchon having succeeded Antipater (as was before said) recalled Olympias A M. 3687. out of Epyrus, whither her enmity with Antipater had driven her, inviting her to 01.115.41.3 take the care of her young grand-fon upon her. But Cassander resolving to venture Ptol. 6. for Macedonia, entred into confederacy with Ptolomy and Antigonus, the later whereof gladly promifed him affiftance, out of love to the memory of his father, as he pretended, but indeed desirous that he should be diverted by so great a War, whilst he in the mean time might make fure of Asia. Polysperchon to secure Greece, in the name of the Kings published an Edict for the abolishment of all such Oligarchies as fince the paffing of Alexander into Asia; had been erected in any of the Cities, which by virtue hereof he restored to their former liberty, hereby to oblige, and keep them from yielding to Cassander. In the same name he also wrote to Eumenes, upon whom he confirmed his former Government, and bestowed more, beseeching him, that together with himself, he would take upon him the protection of the Kings house; if he pleased, in Macedonia, but rather in Asia against Antigonus, who now had visibly revolted from it: Moreover, he wrote to the Treasurers in Cilicia, to furnish Eumenes with money, and to the Argyraspida (or the old Soldiers with Silver Microsofth Shields) to obey him in all things. Olympias also by letters defired his help, owning him as the most faithful of those remaining, who could affist against the ruine and de-Kings interest. folation of her Family.

13. Eumenes not able to fray any longer in Cappadocia, because Menander was fent from Antigoms against him, hasted into Cilicia, where the Argyraspida being 3000 in number joyned with him. Fearing the envy of the Macedonians, for that he was but a Stranger of the Cherronesus of Thrace, he carried it with great civility towards all, and madehimself but equal to the other Captains. To contain them in order he Died. feigned that Alexander had appeared to him in a dream, fitting upon his Throne, and Piatario & Corn. Prolomy and Antigomus sent to take off the Argyrapide, and Tentamus one of their Captains was perfwaded by them, but was reduced to hisformer refolution by Antigenes his Collegue, and the common Soldiers were quieted by Eumenes, who came upon them while yet they were in fear of Antigonus, who threatned, that except they would deliver him up, he would come and destroy them with his Army, After this, Eumenes marched into Phenicia, intending there to provide shipping, that if need were, he might have entercourfe with Polysperchen. He also intended to re-scue Phanicia out of Ptolomie's hands; but finding himself unable to accomplish this defign, he began his march through Caleforia, and passed on till he came to Carra near Babylon, where he took up his Winter-quarters.

Who marcheth to Carra.

14. Antigonus having overthrown at Sea Polysperchon's Navy, and attempted something against the Governours near the Hellespont, now hasted to make a full conquest of Asia. He chose out of all his Army 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, wherewith, for expedition, he marched with speed into Cilicia to suppress Eumenes his forces ere he could get them together, which caused the other sooner to depart into Phanicia, whence he marched to Carre. While he here remained he fent to Selectus Governour of Babylon, and Pithon of Media, for aid against the enemies of the Kings; to which they A. M. 3682. answered, that they were ready to assist the Kings, but not him, who was condemned Oliss, as 4. by a Council of the Macedonians, and they folicited the Captains of the Argyrasside V. C. 417. to forfake him; but in vain. After this he resolved for Susa, thinking to get aid out of the upper Provinces, and money out of the Treasury, and thither he came with much difficulty, Selencus having so drowned his Camp, that he was forced to get off his men with boats. It happied that the Governours of the Provinces were at this time gathered together with many Forces against Pithon, who having slain Philotas, had placed his own brother Endramus in his stead. Fearing the like might be attempted against themselves, they armed, and having overthrown him in battel, drove him out of Parthia to Babylon, where he fled to Selencus for relief. European formerly sent them Letters from the Kings, now also solicited them for aid when thus met togeces joyn with ther, to which they agreed, and came down. These were Peucestes Governour of Perha, one of the Keepers of the late King's body, and now chosen by the rest for their Generalissimo; Polemon of Caramania, Sibyrtius of Arachosta, Stasander of Aria, and Drangiana; Andrabazsus, who was fent from Oxyartes Governour of the Parapomifade, and End amus (or Endamon) Governour of the Oxydraca and Malli, who brought with 4600 horse, which being joyned to Eumenes his Army, made up a considerable body. 15. They had fallen out about chusing a new General, had not Eumenes his former device of setting up Alexander's Pavilion and Throne prevented it, whither he perswaded them to repair, and rule in common; after which he took as much money out of the Treasury at Susa as his wants required. In Spring Antigonus being come into Mesopotamia marched to Babylon, where joyning in Confederacy with Seleucus and A. M. 3589. Pithon, he received some Forces from them, and passed the River Tigrin. hearing of his coming went down to Palitigris, where he fell upon fuch of his Soldiers as were got over the River, which he filled also with Carkeifes, and took 4000 Prisoners. Antigonus therefore bent his course another way to the City Radaca situate upon the River Euleus, whence he journeyed through the Countrey of the Coffcans with great difficulty, and hardship, into the habitable parts of Media, where he refreshed, and quieted his men now ready to mutiny, by reason of their tedious journey. Eumenes marched into Persia, where the whole army was Magnificently entertained by Pencestes the Satrapa, who now thought to establish himself in the Chief power, but by the great cunning of Eumenes, together with the other Captains, was retained in his former condition, and brought to a greater observance of him. Antigonus, following him into Persia, he returned to meet him, but feasting his Army, he drunk so excessively, that a great distemper thereby contracted, stopped him for some dayes, and then was he carried in a Litter out of the noise, till such time as the Front would not march without him in the head of them. He was therefore conftrained to lead them, and shortly after to frame the battel in his Litter, which Antigonus faw, and laughed at.

16. Four dayes were spent in light skirmishing, during which time Antigonus endeavoured to draw away Eumenes his men; but to no purpose; and afterwards resolved to go 3 dayes journey off into Gabiene, for that the Armies were both much straitned for necellaries. Eumenes hearing this, tent fome, who as Fugitives should acquaint him how as that night he intended to fall in upon his Camp, which he believing, ftayed, expecting him, and then did Eumenes make haste to get into Gabiene before him. Antigonus feeing himfelf deluded, marched after with great expedition, and leaving behind the reft of his Army, with a party got before him. He prefented then himfelf to his view upon the Mountains, which Eumenes feeing, and thinking he had all his Forces with him, made an halt, and so they mutually deceived each other. Here in the Countrey of the Parataceni they joyned battel, wherein Eumenes had the better, though the other got the advantage of ground; but then his Soldiers beginning to be refractory would needs depart to their baggage, and not stay to bury their dead. The victory Whereupon Antigonus doing this first, the victory came to be controverted.

7. Antigonus finding himself to have had the worst of it went his way to Gamarga in Media, where was plenty of Provisions, and then Eumenes finding his Army in no good case to pursue him, departed to Gabiene. Here he divided his Forces into their Winter quarters not according to his own defire, but the pleafure of the Souldiers ; pleafure it for the old ones which had followed Alexander in his Conquests were grown so high, supra, Plutarith as they would rather give Laws to their Captains than receive them. Antigonus hea- the Cornel, Novering this, thought to surprize them on a sudden, and for that they should know nothing of it, resolved to take a by-way, which yet was declared to Eumenes, who not being able to call his Soldiers together fo foon as was requifite, betook himfelf to his feldom failing policy. He caused fires to be made on the Mountains where the Enemy was to pass, which they beholding, thought he had there with him his whole Army, and so took the common way, after they were come into the midst of their journey. Antigonus stayed one day to recruit his Army, and Eumenes gathered in the mean time his Forces together, which admired his prudence so much, as they ordered him to be Chief, and thus brought him into danger of life, divers of the great ones conspiring against him, which made him say he was amongst a company of wild beasts; and caufed him to make his Will, and tear his Letters, left any of them that had wrote unto him should be troubled after his death. This as it was faithfully done to his friends, so was it also in good time, as it after fell out.

18. For shortly after, Antigonus and he came to a Pitch-battel, which decided the controversie, though not for the Conquerour. Fumenes lead into the field 36700, foot, 6500 horse, and 114 Elephants, Antigonus brought 22000 foot, 9000 horse, and 65 Elephants. The Argyraspides (or filver shields) got the victory, for they put all Antigonus his foot to flight, and killed 5000 of them, so that though Peucestes with drew himself out of the fight with his own horse, and 1500 more; yet Eumewer with the loss of 700 on his side got the day. But neither valour nor wisdom could befriend him, for the place where they fought being exceeding dufty, to as ones fight wastaken away at a little distance, Antigonus sends a party of horse to plunder the Enemies baggage, so that the Macedonians though Conquerors, after the battel fell into a deep melancholy for the loss of their Wives and Children taken away, and Tentamus first without the knowledge of any one sent to Antigonus, who Covenanted with him to restore him all, on condition Eumenes were delivered to him, and they would all

behind him was delivered up; his Army shamefully following him to the Tents of Antigonus, passing it self in triumph after him. Antigonus for shame would not see Enmenes his old fellow Soldier in that condition; but affigued him to Keepers, at first requiring he should be strictly looked to, but afterwards remitting that rigour till almost all perswaded him to make an end of him. This he was loath to do, and took feven dayes to consult in; but then fearing some Sedition might arise in the Army, he commanded his dayly allowance of meat should be withdrawn, saying, he would never lay hands upon him. Two or three dayes he languished in this condition, and then

Against him came Polysperchon, intending to beliege him, but his Provisions failing, he left his son with a party in Attica, and with the greatest part of the Army marched into Peloponnesus againft the Inhabitants of Megalepolis, who only amongft the Cities had refuled to take away their Oligarchy, and had joyned with Caffander. Here he had the worft of it, and that brought him so into contempt, as most of the Greek Cities revolted from him to Cassander, and the Athenians seeing they could not shake off his Garrison, agreed with him that he should retain the Fort Munychia, till the War was finished with the Kings, but that the City should be governed by one whom he appointed, which was Demetrius Phalereus the Philosopher, Theophrastus his Scholar, who Governed fome years with moderation, and was honoured with 360 Statues. Then Cassander Laurius in making an expedition into Macedonia, found there many friends. The year after, photonis Polysperchon by the help of Hacida, King of the Molossians, reduced Olympias with Alexander the son of Rhoxane her Grand-Child into Macedonia, whereupon Euridice. the Wife of Arideus the King fortified herself, and sent to Cassander for aid, but the Mucedonians fearing the Majesty of Olympias fell away from her, and she with her. husband being both committed to prison, he was first made away, and then Olympias. fent her a Sword, an Halter, and Poyson, to chuse which of them she pleased; so she praying the gods that the might have at length such gifts sent unto her, hanged her-felf with her Garter. But he hearing she was arrived in Macedonia, marched out of Peloponnesus against her; whereupon she made Aristonous her General, and commanded him to meet Cassander, she betaking herself, with Alexander her Grand-son, his Mother, and others, into Pydna, hoping she should have many affistants, but she was deceived: For, Cassander besieged her by Land and Sea. Afterward he caused those whose Kinsfolks, the had put to death to accuse her to the Macedonians, who naturally hated, and now incensed by them, condemned her. Then did he send some of her friends to her. willing her to fly, but she denied it, and resolved to plead her cause before the people; so that he fearing their affections might be moved towards her, sent some Soldiers to kill her. They were fo struck with her Majesty, that they returned without doing their errand; but then some, the friends of whom she had made away came in, and flew her, not at all amazed, or behaving her felf otherwise than as the Mother of Alex-

Perceiving Pencestes to be in great favour here, he removed him from the Government, to the great grief of the people, and then got the Treasure at Susa into his hands, out of which he made 25000 Talents. Thence he journyed to Babylon, where Selencus the Governour royally entertained him, but offering to punish a certain Officer of the Army without his knowledge, he called him to an account for the revenues of the place. Seleucus denied to account, faying, that place was given him by the Macedonians for his faithful service performed to Alexander; but the Contest grew sharper every day, so as he remembring, and fearing the case selenens flyeth of Pithon, with fifty horse in his Company fled into Egypt. Antigonus was glad he had gotten Babylon, and that without any violence offered to his antient friend; but being told by the Chaldeans, that if he let him go he should get all Asia into his power, and he himself should die in a battel against him, he sent some to pursue him, but

22. Seleucus being courteoully entertained by Ptolomy, fent his friends into Europe to stir up Cassander and Lysimachus against Antigonus, who suspecting some such matter, fent also to retain them in his friendship, but they entred into confederacy together with Ptolomy against him, and all three sent their Ambassadors to him, as he was now marching tawards the upper Syria, to demand that Cappadocia and Lycia might be reftored to Cassader Governour of Caria; Phrygia upon the Hellespont to Lylimachus, all Syria to Ptolomy, and Babylon to Seleucus, and to divide all the treafure he had got into his handstince the death of Eumenes, with them and the other gainst antigo- Macedonians who had lost their Governments. To this he answered sharply, and that he was already preparing for Ptolomy, so that the Ambassadors returning without any effect, they made great preparations both by Sea and Land. He understanding how full his hands would be, fent about to the chief States to retain them in friendship, and also to hire more Soldiers; he himself went into Phamicia, where he befieged Tire, used great endeavour for the making of ships, and took in Joppe and Gaza. Aristodemus also he sent into Lacoma, who there by the permission of the Lacedamonians raised 8000 men, and joyned Polysperchon and Alexander his son in confederacy with him, of whom the former was made general of Greece, and the later he defired to go over to Antigonus, who going accordingly, in an affembly of the Army accused Cassander, for that he had put Olympias to death, had committed Rhoxane and her son to custody, married by force Thessalonica the daughter of Philip and fifter of Alexander, and so evidently affected the Kingdom of Macedonia: moreover, that he had re-edified Thebes destroyed by Alexander, and restored the Olinthians; whereupon he was declared an Enemy, except he would amend what was amis, and obey Antigonus, and fet all the Gracians at liberty, and so Alexander rewarded with 500 Talents was fent back. But not long after he revolted to Caffander, being for that declared General of Peloponnesus, and shortly after he was traiterously slain by the Sicionians.

23. Seleucus in Cyprus prospered against the party of Antigomus, and Polyclitus his Lieutenant overthrew Theodotus his Admiral both at Sea and Land, after which Ptolo- Diodorus ne my and Antigonus met and conferred together; but to no purpose. Cassander short-prime tly after fearing Antigonus might pals over into Europe, to divert him, fent an Army over into Caria to help those Cities which were confederate with Selencus and Ptolomy, Caffander the Governour there joyning with him, which Antigonus fearing, left Demetrius his fon in Syria, with order to entrap Ptolomie's forces if they should march that way, and for that he was then but 22 years old, left four grave men his friends to counsel and direct him. Upon his coming to Caria, Cassander the Governour having too great a burthen upon him, made a Peace, on condition to keep his place, and gave his brother for an Hostage, whom yet getting again out of his hands, he presently revolted after which Antigonus got divers Cities into his Power, and restored the Milesians to their liberty. At this time the inhabitants of Cyrene revolting, Ptolomy reduced them again to obedience by the means of Agis his General, and in Cyprus supprefled some of the Kings which were of the contrary faction. Returning home he was follicited by Selencus to undertake an Expedition against Demetrius then in Coelesgria, so that with 18000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, he marched to Gaza, where Demetrius expected him. In the tight the Forces of Demetrius seemed rather to prevail, till his

Elephants being wounded and taken, his Horse out of scar ran away. He himself fled accompanied with many followers till he came near Goz s, but then so many forfook him and went in thither to fetch out their goods, that multitudes flocking to the gates, and they therefore being hindred from being flut, the enemies entred with them and took the Town. Ptolomy took Sidon also, and belieged Tire, whose Governour Andronicus upon summons refused to yield, and reviled him; yethe getting the place into his power through the fedition of the Souldiers, when he loo-ked for prefent death, not only forgave him, but entertained him courteoully as his ol. 117, 281, 15

But Seleucus thinking this a good opportunity for him to return to his former Principality, obtained of him 800 Foot, and 200 Horse, and with them marched for Babylon. In his way in Mejopotamia he procured, partly by fair means partly by foul, those Macedonians which quartered at Carrha to joyn with him, and when he came to Babylon, the Inhabitants there willingly received him, and he shortly after stormed the Castle which was held by Antigonus his garrison. Nicanor the Governour of Media hearing this, came against him with above 10000 Foot, and 7000 Horse, whom he went out to meet with but few more than 3000 Foot, and 400 Horse, and knowing himself too weak to engage in a set battel with him, he hid his men in the Fens till he was past with his Army, and then came upon him lying care-Silvens reco- lefly in the night without any strict guards; so as the Persians coming to fight. Enagrue their Captain was flain, with other Officers; at which being struck, and alfo weary of Antigonus his government, they revolted; and Nicanor with a few at his heels escaped, being glad he was not delivered up. Seleucus by this means getting a strong Army, easily made himself Master of Susana, Media, and the Countryes thereto adjoyning; fo as getting hereby Royal Majesty, and Glory suitable to his dignity, some have from this year fetched the rise of that Æra, which afterwards was called that of the Seleucide, and of the Greeks; for that his Kingdom proved the most considerable; about the year of the World 3694, the first of the Ensitius in 117 Olympiad, 309 years before the Æra of Christ, and twelve years after the death Chrosico, alii.

25. When Antigonus heard of it, he fent his fon Demetrius against him. Demetrius had now redeemed his credit by the overthrow of Cilles, lent to expel him out of Syria by Ptolomy, and upon it called thither his Father, so as they recovered all that Country, and Phanicia out of his hands, he not daring to stay and Demetrius his try a battel with Antigonus. Demetrius led with him an Army of 15000 Foot. and 4000 Horse, and had order to recover the Principality of Babylon, and then go down to the Sea. Then giving leave to his Soldiers to plunder all they could light on, he departed according to his Father's orders to the Sea, where he belieged Halicarnaffus, but was beaten off by Ptolomy, and so as it were took his leave of that Province for ever, taking what he could get along with him, and perhaps for this reason the Chaldeans with the Author of the second Book of the Machabees in this year (one after the other) fix the Era of Seleucus. Not long after, Ptolomy, Cassandar, and Lysimachus, made a Peace with Antigonus on these terms : that Calfander should be Captain General of Eu-An agreement with the control of the agreement was not kept long, each one feeking under any pretence to inlarge his Dominions, and indeed they might better do it, feeing that he for whom they pretended themselves Administrators, and was their Soveraign Lord, was taken away, For Cassander taking notice that young Alexander grew up, and that the People began to talk, that now he ought to be delivered out of custody, and to enjoy his Fathers Kingdom, and he fearing his own interest, commanded fecretly Glaucius his Keeper to kill him and his Mother, and concealing their bodies, to acquaint no person living with it. His name was Hercules, being now kept at Pergamus, whence he was called shortly after the death of the other, by Polysperchon, who now being in Pelopomelia, and envying Cassander the Principality of Mucchonia, tent about to his friends, intreating, that the youth being seventeen years old, might be brought, and chablished in his Fathers Throne. The Etolians especially, with others, imbraced the motion; so as he got together about twenty thouland Foot, and one thouland Horse, in no great space, and within a while after gathered up a numerous Army, with which he marched and came on his way to Stymphalia. 27. Alexander the Great had yet a fifter living called Cleopatra, formerly the Wid-Diodonusl. 20, dow of Alexander King of Epirus (who making an Expedition into Italy, perished, ad Olymputs. against the Lucanians, as Livie tells us) and after that married to Perdiccas, whom also now being at Sardis, Antigonus seems to have wooed. But she inclining rather to Ptolomy, stole out of Sardis to go to him, whereupon Antigonus took such order And clientita by the Governour of the Town, that the was not only stopped in her journey, but by means also of some women secretly made away; after which to colour the matter he put some of them to death, and buried her body with royal magnificence. Shortly after this, Demetrius was fent into Greece to fet the Cities at liberty, which he accomplished at this time for Athens; Demetrius Phalareus being driven out, and conducted to Thebes where he lived till Caffander's death, and then fled to Ptolomy. Afterward Demetrius being recalled to make War in Cyprus, thither he palled, where he overthrew Menelans, Ptolomy his brother and Governour there, and pursuing him to the City Salamine, slew three thousand of his men, and took one thousand, and then besieged him in that place. For, they endeavouring as near as they could to keep in with all these great ones; yet were drawn by their private interest, especially to favour Ptolomy, from whose Kingdom they got the greatest part of their livelyhood by way of Traffick. Demetrius according to his fathers command, went, and befieged their City, lying before it well-nigh a whole year, during which time he made all forts of opposition he could, till ordered by his Father to make peace with them, which they were prone to accept of, though Ptolomy and others fent them Provisions, and supplies of men. Antigonus was at this time celebrating publick Games at Antigonia, when hearing this news, he prefently broke them off, and with all speed marched against Lysimachus, Whom he reached, and belieged him in his Camp for some time, till taking the opportunity of a dark and rainy night he fled away: Then hearing that Selencus was drawing down his Forces from the upper Provinces, he fent for Demetrius to come over with all expedition. Seleucus had lately made peace with Sandrocottus (or Androcottus) who being a man of no quality, had follicited the Indians to revolt after the death of Alexander, and to kill his Officers, and thence took an occasion to subdue them under himself. Bactria being subdued, Selenens had waged War with him, but now for a Composure gave to him some Countries lying upon the River Indus, which Alexander had taken from the Arians, and received five hundred Elephants of him in exchange. Ptolomy with a compleat Army had come into Calejyria, where he reduced divers Cities; but as he was belieging Sidon came a false report that Antigonus had overthrown Seleucus and Lylimachus, and now was coming thitherward, wherefore he made a Truce with the Sidonians for five moneths, and returned, but not long after came up again to that fatal ingagement with Antigo-

And the contrary party had made up a Spriani. mongst them fixty four thousand Foot, one thousand five hundred Horse, four hundred Elephants, and one hundred twenty Chariots. Antigonus bragged that he would featter the meeting of these Kings together, as one might do the flocking of birds gathering Corn, with the throwing of a stone; but when they approached, he was more melancholick than usuai, and was seen to discourse with his son in private in his Tent, which he never used to do; he commended him also to the Army as his Successior. The battel was fought at Ipjus, a Town in Phrygia, in which Demetrius leading the best party of Horse, ingaged with Antiochus the fon (and afterwards Successor) of Seleucus, whom he routed, and put to flight, but being too hot in the pursuit undid all: for retiring back he could not again joyn himfelf with the foot, by reason that the Elephants were got between them. Seleucus feeing this, made as if he would have fall upon the Infantry, thus deftitute of the Horse, wherein his expectation failed him not, for they fearing it, part Antigonal revolted to him, and the rest were broken, and put to flight. The Conquerors parted his Dominions amongst them, as we are told; but it vides. feems to have been chiefly Selencus and Ptolomy, who did not well agree about their prey, and upon this account left a contention to their Successions. Seleucus fell presently upon building Cities, the first of which he called after himself Seleucia, and the later, to which he transferred the Inhabitants of Antigonia (to the number of three thousand five hundred) as we said before, he called Antiochia, either after his father or fon's name; for both are affirmed, and this afterwards proved the Metropolis of Syria. Pyrrhus as foon as he opened the Letter, eafily differred it to be counterfeit, for that it was not directed after the usual manner, as from the Father to the Son, but as from the one King to the other.

Others say that Lysimachus after Alexanders death, for that he was Julius sprainployed in a War with Dromichetis King of the Getes, delivered also up to De-Pistarch itid. metrius, that part which belonged to Antipater his Son-in-Law, and afterwards killed him also, when he complained to him that by his means he had lost his Kingdom. and imprisoned Eurydice his Wife, his own Daughter, for partaking with him in the complaint. But thus (one way or other) Antipater was rewarded for his Mothers death; and so in a short time fell the posterity of Cassander, by the just Judgment of God, as even Heathen Writers observe.

9. For some time Demetrius enjoyed Macedonia, during which he still aspired after his former height and power : for now having this Kingdom and Theffalie in his hands, as also Athens and Megara, and the greater part of Peloponnesus, he subdued the Bastians. Then hearing Lysimachus to be taken Prisoner by the King of the Getes (who shortly after yet set him at liberty) he resolved to return for Thrace; but the Baotians revolting caused him to retreat, though on his march thither. Coming back he found that his Son Antigonus had overthrown the revolters in fight, but Thebes still remained untaken, and whilst he was going about that, Prerhus of Epirus (being now alienated from him fince the death of Deidamia his Sifter which Demetrius had married) invaded Theffaly from his own Frontiers. and pierced as far as the Straights of Thermopyle. Demetrius hearing this, left his Son in the Siege, and hafted against him; but he stayed not his coming but retired, and then Demetrius fortifying Thessalie returned to Thebes, where the inhabitants to froutly defended themselves, that he lost many men, and himself was wounded in the neck; yet according to his skill and fortune in taking of Cities (whence he had the Sirname of Poliorcetes) he ftormed the place, and though he pretended at first severely to punish the Inhabitants, yet he satisfied himself with the death of ten or thirteen, and banishing a few, pardoned the rest.

10. Finding that his Macedonians were quiet when abroad, but feditious at home, he fell upon the Etclians, to divert them. Wasting their borders there he left Pantaucus with some Forces, and with the rest marched against Pyrrhus, who hearing it, came out to meet him, but they missed of each other, and went several ways: Demetrius into Epirus which he harrafed; Pyrrhus light upon Pantauchus, who challenging him to tight gave him a wound, but he received two for it himfelf, and thereupon falling he had been flain, but that his friends prefently refcued him, after which his Army was put to flight, and five thousand of them taken. After this, Demetrius fell fick at Pella, and then Pyrrhus again invaded his Territories a great way. none relifting him, nay, he had fuch an opportunity, as scarce could he have defired a better, for feizing upon the whole Kingdom, many revolting to him, and Demetrius his Captains making but flow endeavours to hinder his progress. But he having his mind fet more upon booty than any thing elfe, stayed not their coming, but fled away, lofing many of his men in the retreat. For all this Demetrius feeing him have a restless spirit, thought it not amis to reconcile him unto him; but especially at this time, for now he resolved to make for his Father's Kingdom with all the might he possibly could, and therefore left he should leave an Enemy at his back, concluded a Peace, and entred into a league with him.

11. Greater preparations he made than ever had been fince Alexander his decease. For he got together little less than one hundred thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse, a Navie also of five hundred sail; some ships whereof were of extraordinary bigness. Seleucus, Ptolomy, and Lysimachus, being startled hereat, combined together for refistance, and joyntly sent to Pyrrhus to move him to break the League which Demetrius had made with him, as they alledged, not to rest in peace, but to make War upon whom he pleafed. He believing as much, agreed with them, for that he hoped Demetrius might as easily lose Macedonia as he had got it, and then Ptolomy failing into Greece, follicited there the Cities from their obedience. Lysimachus from Thrace, and Pyrrhus from his borders made inroads into A.M. 2717.

Macedonia. Demetrius first began to march against Lysimachus, but afterwards ol. 123.41.1. hearing that Pyrrhus had gotten Berrhea into his hands, returned and went against V.C. 466. him thither, where when he was arrived, divers from the Town came into his Ptolom Let Camp, and so extolled the valour and kindness of Pyrrhus, that the Macedonians, 30. first in little Companies, and after all the Army revolted to him; so as Demetrius was very much deceived, who fearing they might do fo to Lysimachus, little suspected this towards the other being a stranger. Pyrrhus thus obtaining all the Army without a stroak, was faluted King of Macedonia by the Souldiers; but

Lylimachus coming shortly after, alledged the endeavour of suppressing the Enemy to have been common to them both, and demanded the parting of the Kingdom; to whom he affented, for that he did not trust the Macedonians, and so the Countreys and Cities, were divided betwixt them.

12. Demetrius thus outed of his Kingdom fled to Cassandria, and thence in- 1dis. to Greece, where after a little time he got some Forces together and being angry with Atlens, for that revolting from him, the Inhabitants had fent for Pyrrhus, he belieged it; but upon the entreaty of Crates the Philosopher (whom And thing up being a man of great Authority they had fent to him) he gathered together his thips and failed away into Afia with eleven thousand men. His design was to take if he could, Caria and Lydia from Lylimachus, and he took divers Towns, and scized upon Sardis, but Agathocles, Lylimachus his Son, coming down with an Army against him, he marched for Phrygia, with intention to pass into Armenia and Media; and so attempt to make himself Master of some of the upper Provinces of Alia, which at the worst would afford retreating places enough, and other helps to a beaten party. In his way he was superior to Agathocles who pursued him, but being brought into great diffres for want of Provisions, there fell withal such a Plague upon his Army, that he loft eight thousand men, and so was forced to retreat, and came to Tarfus. This place being now again under Seleucus, he was very unwilling to endamage, for fear of giving him offence, but being forced by want, he wrote to him, whereby he excused himself, and fadly lamented his condition. Seleucus, pitying him at first, commanded his Governours to use him and his Army with great respect; but Procles one of his most familiar friends, filled his head with fuch fulpitions, that he led down an Army towards Cilicia against him, whereat he wondering retired to the most convenient place of the mountain Taurus, whence he fent to him to give him leave to feize upon some Country of the Barbarians, that there he might put an end to his flight and wandrings, and fpend the refidue of his days.

13. Then Seleucus coming near him, he joyned and fought him, and overthrew one of his wings; but then all his Army revolted, and he with a very few fled into the Woods, whence endeavouring to pass to the Sca through the mountains, his discovering there the Enemies fires prevented that attempt, and at last one saying he must yield himself, he drew his Sword and would therewith have ended his life, but being hindred by his friends, he fent to Seleucus by their advice and yielded. Seleucus caused him to be royally received at first; but the great confluence thereupon to him, lessened that respect he else would have paid him; so as sending Pausanias with one thousand men, he caused him to be carryed straight (without as much as seeing him) into a Peninsula of Syria. Here he wanted nothing defirable, not only for necessity but pleasure; only his liberty, which yet to comfort him there was hope given of, after that Antiochus should come with his wife Stratonice, whom his Father Selencus upon his paffionately falling in love with her, had yielded to him. Antigonus his Son much interceded for him; fo did divers Princes and States; only Lysimachus offered two thousand Talents to have him killed, which Seleucus abhorred. At first he exercised himself much with And dieth af- hunting and fuch Exercises; but by little and little grew fluggish, and, as if he had Selencus was Lyamachus ha. easily perswaded to it now, having the whole strength of Asia and Syria united ving expelled into one Kingdom after the fall of Demetrius, which the other being aware of, Pyribus out of thought it best first to begin with him, and so passed over the Hellespont. Tolomy, that he might provide for the time to come, made Alliances with other Princes, as Antiochus of Alia, and Pyrrhus of Epyrus, who now being about to pass into Italy, made him Overseer of his son, and Kingdom: he also wrote to his Brother Ptolomy Philadelphus, pretending to acquiesce in the missing of that his Fathers Kingdom, as sufficiently satisfied with this that was taken from his fathers Enemy. Moreover, he counterfeited himself to be in love with his fifter Arsione, and married her, for that it was according to the custom of Eg.ppt, promising to adopt her Children, which he badly performed, for being received by her into Cassandria, he caused them to be first killed in the bosom of their mother, and then thrust her out of the City, from whence she went to Samothracia. At this time the Galls being too numerous for their own Countrey, under three Captains went to feek their fortunes fo many feveral wayes; fome towards Thrace, under the conduct of Cerethrius; others to Pannonia under Brennus and Acichorius, and the rest to Macedonia, being headed by Belgius or Bolgius. These Ptolomy opposed with a stragling company, being more heady than wise, for he refused 20000 men offered him by the King of the Dardanians, and peace by the Galls, if he would but buy it, which he scornfully refused, and answered, he would not yield it to them, except they would give up the Chiefest amongst them as Hostages, and deliver up their Arms. Joyning battel, his Army was overthrown, and he being fore wounded was cast by an Elephant on which he rode, and so ta-Is flainby the ken alive by the Enemy. They tore him in pieces, and cutting off his head, put it upon a Lance, and carried it about to the terror of his followers, of which a few elcaping, all the rest were either taken or slain. To this end came Ptolomy, after he had held Macedonia scarce one year and a half.

2. Meleager his brother succeeded, but only for two moneths: for then the Ma- Poppyrius in cedemians calt him out as unworthy of the Dignity, and in hisroom placed Antipa-finite for fon to Philip, the brother of Cassander, whom they simamed afterwards Etesta, Julia iii 24. because he continued but 45 dayes, during which term the Etessan winds blew. After this succeeded an Interregnum (if we look at the title of King;) for, Softhenes, who gathering together a company of young men, and thereby restraining the pride and covetouines of the Gault, though he might have been preferred before divers of Royal Raccs; yet refused the name, and made the Soldiers swear to him only as General. him by the way, and turning up for Thrace (where they brought under the Cities of the Propontis) he came into Macedonia, and here he made havock of all things. Belgius, as it feems, before his coming being repelled or gone, Softhenes went, and wenthown by met him with an Army: but carrying too few against so great a number, was easily overthrown; after which the Macedonians securing themselves in the Cities, Brenders ms wrought his pleasure in the Country and Villages throughout the Land. When he had fatisfied himself here, with an Army of one hundred and fity two thoufand foot, and twenty thousand four hundred horse, of Celtes (or Cimbres) and Illyrians together, he invaded Greece. Each horseman had two servants followed him on horse-back, who were if it happened to succeed their dead Masters; which custom they called Trimarkasia, or Trimarasia rather; for, Mare in the Teutonick signified the whole species, as also in our own Saxon tongue, and so furnished, they entred Thessaly, and came to the Straights of Thermopyle. Here they were opposed by the Greeks, so as they lost many men, till being lead over the Mountains (the same way that in the expedition of Xerxes, Hydarnes passed, and getting over, came upon who with his the backs of the Spartans) the Greeks then fled, and they went to Delphos to fpoyl the Temple, where with Thunder and Lightning, Cold, falling of Rocks, and the plunder he had gotin the East, with one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and

opposition of the Enemy, most of them came to their ends. Brennus himself being wounded, and not willing (or not daring) to out live this shameful expedition of which he had been the Author at home, first drinking much Wine killed himself, the rest flying were taken with a Pannick fear, and killed one another for Enemies; and what by this means, the rage of the Countreys through which they passed, and with hunger, and cold, scarcely any of them ever returned home.

He entertained nobly the Ambassadors, and to deter them from any warlike attempts shewed them his strength at Land and Sea; but they were so far from being afraid, as having an itching desire after prey, they stirred up their Companions to endeavour the attaining of that which they faw, no way in words diminishing the goodlines of any thing. By night therefore they set upon his Camp, but he being aware of some such thing had

About this time these Gaules, which parting at Dadania from Brennus, and going into Thrace, had at several places passed the Sea Idemibic. &c. into Afia, here uniting again under seventeen Captains (of which Lutatius and Livius lib. 38. Leoporius were Chief) they helped Nicomedes against Zypeas, who held part of Bithymia, and after he was overcome, wasting the Countrey far and near, divided the Kingdom withhim, and fixed themselves about the River Halys, in that place which fince has been known by the name of Gallogracia or Galatia, A. 4. But Pyrrhus having finished his fruitless expedition into Italy and Sicily after Plutarch in fix years, and being returned home, now wanting money fought an occasion to di- Julia at fapta. vert and maintain his Army. He made therefore an excursion into Macedonia (having strengthned himself with a supply of some Gaules) where he took divers Towns, and two thousand Soldiers revolted to him; then marching against Antigonus himself, joyned battel with him. The Gauls on Antigonus his part fought very valiantly; but those which governed his Elephants being compassed in, yielded themselves, and the beasts; after which the foot being affrighted, Pyrrhus making fign to them, and calling by name the Officers, drew them all over to his own party. Antigonus fled, but kept some of the Maritime Towns still in his possession. and Pyrrhus became Master of the upper part of Macedonia, and of Thessaly. For all this, Antigonus gave not out but returning to Theffalonica, there recruited himfelf with Mercenary Gauls, and then endeavouring to re-establish himself, was again defeated by Ptolomy, the fon of Pyrrhus; fo that again retiring to hide himself, Pyrrhus jeered him, and called him impudent, because for all this he put not on a Coat but wore still the Purple. He in way of return compared Pyrrbus to a Gamefter, which could throw the Dice well, but knew not how to improve his chance: for he knew how to conquer Kingdoms, and get Victories, but could not improve his Victory, nor retain what he had Conquered; as it had hapned as to this Kingdom before, and now also shortly followed.

5. Scarcely two years did he hold Macedonia; for, Cleonymus the Spartan being M. During his absence, Antigonus Gonatus recovered again the Cities of Macedonia, and taking it for granted, that after he had done his work in Laconia he would return again thither, thought it best to hasten into Pelopomesus, and prevent him. Being come to Argos, Pyrrhus provoked him to fight for the Kingdom, but Embassadors came to them both from the Town, defiring they would depart from them, and no. fuffer it (which was observant of both) to come into the power of either. Antigonus obeyed, and fent his fon to them for an Hostage. Pyrrhus pretended he would. but entred the City in the night, being let in by Aristeus; whereupon Antigonus was fent for. He fent in a strong party, and Areus King of Sparta was at hand with a thousand Cretians and other Lacedemonians. Pyrrhus marched upinto the Marketplace, and there faw a Brasen Bull and a Wolf standing in a fighting posture, set there in memorial of Danaus his election, and ejection of Galenon, one thousand two hundred years before, which startled him fore, for that it had been told him by an Oracle, that he should die when he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting together. Hereupon he would have retreated, but feering the straitness of the Gates, sent to his fon Helenus to break down part of the Wall, and come in; but he miltaking, brought his men and Elephants through the Gate, which stopped so up the way, that Pyrrbus in his coming back could not pass, and that occasioned his de-their union, and the flourishing condition of their body, envying and also fearing it, resolved to disunite if possible, and withdraw the Cities one from another. At this time Cleomenes reigned at Lacedamon, who refolving to better the constitution of his Countrey by reducing it to it's ancient form, and taking away the Epkori those impudent and rafeally Tyrants, fought for an opportunity of War as most fit to bring about his purpose. Ever since the Victories of Lysander, luxury and other Wherein cle vices had crept into Sparta, together with the use of riches. And the equality mens sing of of policitions in Land was taken away by one Epitades an Ephorus, who having a fon that displeased him, that he might disinherit him, procured a law to be passed, engaged, and that any one might dispose of his Lands, either in his life time or at his death, to whom he pleased. Hereby it was come to that pass, that there being seven hundred Light Plater Citizens of Sparta and more, of those not above one hundred possessed all the Lands cham in Agid and Estate, and the rest being void both of wealth and honour lay idle at home, un- de cliomer. willingly ingaging in War, and expecting an occasion of change. The Ephori tyrannized with unparallel'd impudence, domineering over the Kings, and ordering those at their pleasure, the servants of whom they had formerly been. Agis one of the Spartan Kings, of the family of Eurytion, the fon of Eudamidas, and the fixth from Agelilaus, burned with a zeal to better the state of affaires, and as a means unto it, endeavoured the reduction of Lycurgus his model for the equal division of Lands; but Leonidas his Collegue being of a luxurious temper oppofed him, and he was wickedly murdered by the hands of the Popular Villains the

11. This noble spirited man being taken away, and his brother Archidamus destroyed, Cleomenes the son of Leonidas was King alone, and being of a far different temper from his Father, upon hearing what Agis had gallantly endeavoured, refolved to pursue and accomplish what he had attempted, and to take away utterly the power of those Popular Tyrants, who usurped the whole authority. Neither did these two Kings defire to become affertors of Popular power by the restitution of the Lots of Lycurgus, but rather of Monarchy; for the restitution of those Lots would not promote the power of the Commons who were still to be kept under, as they were by the Laws of Lycurgus; but onely reduced them to that equality of wealth which might secure them from being insulted over by their fellow Commoners, as they had been of late, by fuch as had ingroffed the riches of the State. As this might be intended by the two Kings, so it appeareth from Plutarch, that Agis attempted to get himself reputation, and Cleomenes for his preservation, by gaining the good-will of the People, and making them fure of their fide when foever they should be reacloseness kildy for the great design of destroying the Ephor. Now though Agis miscarried in

Then restored he the Laws of Lycurgus, as to equal possessions and discipline, and for that there was none left of the family of Eurytion, made his own brother Leonidas King with him. But as wasfaid, perceiving this change would be better made in Warthan Peace, he caufed the War betwixt the State, and the Acheans, and bribed the Ephori to fend him forth in the Expedition. 12. To him therefore the Ætolians fent, and stirred him up against the Ackeans; and that they might strengthen themselves, and more easily suppress them, they made peace again with Macedonia, and without doubt had brought about their purpose, had they not had to do with Aratus, who undermined their Councils. They suffered Chomenes to take in divers Towns which belonged unto themselves, not onely not opposing but confirming him in the possession of them, which Aratus knowing well enough to be intended onely to strengthen him against his party, yet thought none were to be first Attaqued; but after that Cleomenes with great boldness had begun to build a Fort in the Territories of Megalopolis, then were the Lacedemonians declared Enemies. At first the Acheans undertook the Warre against them by themselves; partly for that they thought it more honourable and fafe to defend their own Estate, and partly for that they were loath to displease Ptolong (who had been formerly a good friend to them) by feeking for the patronage of any other; but the War going on (Cleomenes now having overthrown the Acheans in divers battels) Aratus thinking it a disgrace for him to be worsted by the young Lacedamonian, and being jealous still of the knavery of the Ætolians, concluded it washigh time to look about him; at leaft for a supply.

13. Considering with himself the power of Antigonus King of Maredonia, and withall his faithfulnes; and that he was prone to enter into Leagues and alliances. he refolved to make a Confederacy with him; but that fecretly, as well because he knew the Ætolians would feek to prevent him, as for that his people would be discouraged at the thought of expecting help from an Enemy. Knowing therefore the Megalopolitans to be fore prefied with the War (having little help from the Achaans) and how good affection they bore to the Macedonian Court ever fince the daves of Philip the fon of Amyntas, who deserved very well of them, he sent for two of friends thence (Nicophases and Cercidas) and dealt privately with them to perfinade their Citizens to crave aid of Antigonus. These two were therefore sent to the Acheans, and to Muccdonia if they should think fit. They giving way to it, they came to the King, and according to the instructions from Aratus, proposed to him to consider, whither this conjunction of Cleomenes and the Actolisms would tend; and whether when the Acheans were eaten up, he himself would not be in danger, feeing the covetousness of the Ætolians, and Cleomenes his ambition could not be contained in lesser limits than those of Greece. He answered, that if it should seem good to the Achaens, he would fend aid to those of Megalopolis. They being at this much encouraged, laboured to perswade them to give way to it, but Aratus then fearing, that if the coming down of Antigonus should breed any inconvenience, the blame would fall all upon him, diffwaded his People from receiving as yet any aid, and made them try first what they could do of themselves, exhorting each particular City to fight stoutly for their liberty. Now Ptolomy finding the Lacedemonians to be more for his purpose to withstand the Macedonian, stirred up Cleomenes against him. and furnished him with money. He also brought the Acheans by divers ingagements to fuch a low ebb, that they were now in great danger to lose all, and therefore they implored aid of Antigonus, and Aratus sent his son to confirm whatsoever had been offered on his part.

14. He then marched down, though a great difficulty there was at first for this to be hoped for by the Acheans, by reason that the Castel of Corinth which they had taken out of the hands of the Macedonians together with the Town, and which would be now mighty convenient for the carrying on of the War, they knew not how to restore unto him. But Cleomenes prospering exceedingly, and having reduced nine Cities into his power, the Corinthians sent to him, offering him theirs, and commanded all the Acheans to be gone; fo that at this Aratus taking occasion (who before durft not give them up into the hands of the Macedonians without their consent) restored the Castle into the power of Antigonus. Cleomenes (who after his taking the nine Cities, went and fate down before Sicyon) hearing the intention of the Acheans and the King, marched with great speed to the Isthmus, and then fortified the place between the Castle of Corinth and the Mountains Onii with a ditch and bulwark; and Antigonus with twenty thousand Foot, and one thousand four hundred Horse, coming through Æubæa (for that the Ætolians had forbidden him at his peril to pass through the Straights of Thermopyle) found no little opposition from Cleomener, till Argos revolting to Aratus (by the means of Aristotle his friend, who with help from Sicyon set upon the Castel, Megistomus who was sent to relieve it being flain) for that he feared if this Fort should be taken the Enemy might thereby stop up the passage, and at his ease invade Laconia, he drew down his forces from Corinth. Then Antigonus entering Peloponnesus took Corinth in his way, where placing a Garrison he followed Cleomenes to Argos, who having by a wile entred the Town, laboured again to reduce it, and took fome parts thereof, but seeing him come down from the Mountains against him, withdrew himself, and so by Mantinea returned to Lacedamon. Antigonus coming to Argos commended and encouraged the Citizens, and thence marching presently for Arcadia, reduced divers Forts, which he delivered into the hands of the Megalopolitans: after which coming to Ægium to the general meeting of the Acheans (where he held confultations with them) he was declared general of all the Aflociates, and took up Winter-quarters for his Army,

15. At the beginning of Spring he gathered his forces together and belieged Polybius ihid. Teges, where the scheaus met him. Having this Town yielded to him, he thence strutch is marched speedily into Laconia, where Cleomenes meeting him upon the borders there passed some light skirmishes betwixt them, and then he hearing that the Garrison Soldiers at Orchomenus were coming to help the Enemy, departed suddenly thither, and stoumed the place at the first onset. Thence moving to Mantinea, that Town presently was taken, the chief of the Inhabitants whereof (because though when Araus took the City, he restored them to their former priviledges, yet they again revolted, and pur all his Garrison to the sword,) for their ingratitude were flain; of the rest, part were fold, and part sent into Macedonia, their wives and children made flaves; and their Town was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who thither resolved to send out a Colony, and Aratus being made Prator, made a Decree for changing the name of it into Antigonia. After this, Antigonus took Herea and Telphuffa, and Winter then drawing on he went again to the General Assembly of the Acheans, sending out his Souldiers to their quarters, which Cleomeres taking notice of, and that Megalopolis was three days march from Egyum, and wanted a fufficient Garrison, he brake in thither secretly in the night. where though he found fuch opposition as both he and his were brought into great danger, yet became he Master of the place, and so cruelly raged against it (as Polybius a Citizen thereof telleth us) that no hope then seemed to be left of Peopling it again. This City being taken, he marched away to Argos (where Antigonus wintered) to harrase the Territories; a rash enterprise as the Vulgar judged, but prudent enough of it felf, confidering that the King's Army being at a great diftance, and he thereby unable to refift, the Argives would then murmur against him, and he thereby be brought into contempt. This hapned just as he imagined, but Antigorus though very much fpent of the Ptifick, lived to the next Summerto regain his credit.

16. In the beginning of Summer he led towards Laconia an Army of twenty fix thousand eight hundred men (his own and of the associates) which Cleomenes expecting fortified the paffage betwixt the two mountains Eva and Olympus, placing his Brother at the former, and fecuring the later himself, having in all about twenty thousand in his Army. Antigonus wondering at his skill and industry in his fortification, pitcht his Tents upon the River Gorgylus, bethinking himfelf what he should do; at last finding all passages made up, they both agreed to try the matter in battail. At the beginning of the fight those of Cleomenes his party with the light Armour placed amongst his Horse, seeing the Illyrian cohorts not to be backed by the Acheans, fell upon their Reer, and had done great mischief, but that Philopamener a Megalopolitan (then but young) giving notice of it to the Officers, and they not regarding him, fürred up his fellow Citizens, and fell upon the Enemies horse, which made the other return to their former place to help their Companions. After this the fortune of the day inclined to Antigonus his fide, for Euclidas undid himself by the bad choice of his ground, receiving the Illyrians not on the fide of the Hill, (whereby though he might have been repulfed, yet still he might have had the advantage of being higher than the Enemy) but just on the top, so that being thence removed, and forced downwards on the other fide, the Illyrians had the advantage of him. Cleomenes perceiving his brother overthrown, and the Horse on the plain to have the worst, for fear the Enemy should compass him in, was forced to remove the Carriages from behind his Army, and draw it out as well as he could to prevent that. Then the Files coming to be ingaged, Antigona pressing upon the Macedonians in great violence with his doubled Files, put them to flight, and many being flain, Cleomenes escaped with a few in his Company and got to

17. Cleomenes coming to Sparta, advised the people which flocked about him to Paphias at receive the Conquerour, and then by night getting to Gythium, thence went to A-popul lexandria in Egypt, whereas if had either deferred the battel a little longer, or flayed at home, he might cafily have recovered his former condition. For, Antigonus suddenly following him got Sparta, and very nobly, and with great humanity used the Citizens, restoring to them their antient liberties, but shortly after was constrained to leave that place, and Peloponnesus also, being called home by an invalion of the Illyrians into Macedonia, where they made havock of all things. From Sparta he came to Tegea, which he again restored into the form of a Commonwealth, and thence to Argos, at the time of the Celebration of the Nemean Games, where by the Decree of the General allembly of the Acheans in common, and each of the Cities in particular, he had all possible honour given him. After this he marched with great speed into Macedonia, where he overthrew the Illyrians in battel, but got his own death with the victory: for with exhorting his Soldiers, and shouting in the fight, he fo strained his Lungs that he spat bloud, and thereby his Consumption washeightned, whichin a short time made an end of him, after he had discharged the Office of a faithful Guardian, a good King, and of an expert and valiant Captainten years, A. Somethree years after his coming to the Government he was also ingaged in the Social War of Greece, of which the Ætolians and Acheans were the chief parties. For now the Ætolians (who used to live by Pyracy and Robbing) being weary of peace, though awed by Polyb. lib.4. 19. He durst not in publick Conventions perswade the Ætolians to the War, for that his private grudge was fufficiently known; but one Scopas being then Prator, him he perswaded to joyn with him in the invasion of the Messenians. They two therefore, without any publick Decree, took the advantage of that time, wherein a few dayes onely were remaining to Timoxems, the Pretor of the Acheans, to continue in his Office (during which time yet Aratus, who was to fucceed him, could not execute it) and calling together the Ætolians to the Promontory of Ægium, fayled over into Peloponnesus, and invading the Messemans (who being unable to resist, had fecured themselves within their City Walls) wasted all with fire and sword. Not onely the Messenians, but the Epirotes, Acheans, Acarnanians, and Macedonians also being declared Enemies by Scopas, they gave out Commissions to Pyrats to infest them by Sea. A Ship of the King of Macedonia was taken, and being brought into the Haven was fold, with all the men, and things belonging to it; the Sea-Coasts of Epirus were invaded; Thyreas a Town of Acarnania was set upon, and a band of men being fent privately through Peloponnesus, a Castle there was seized on in the Territories of the Megalopolitans, which yet Timoxenus reduced by the help of Taurion, whom Antigonus had left to overfee his affairs in those parts.

20. The Acheans meeting at Agium, Decreed that aid should be fent to the Mef Idm ibid. & fenians; but Timoxenus whose time was not yet out, being slow in his preparations, Atalon Aratus who was to succeed him got the publick signet five dayes before the time, made Levies, and fent to the Etolians to draw away their Forces out of the Meffenian Territories, and not to trouble Achaia upon pain of being profecuted as Enemies. Scopas and Dorimachus hearing the Acheans were gathered together, marched towards the Eleans their Allies (with whom the Etolians alwayes maintained friendship, that they might the better Prey upon Peloponnesus) so that Aratus hearing this, very indifferently, and not like himself (as Polybius sheweth) for that he thought they would retreat, dismissed all his Soldiers except three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, with which, and Taurion his party, he marched after them. Meatures is de. He constrained them to fight in a disadvantageous place for himself, so that his forces feated by the were overthrown by them, and many being flain, the rest secured themselves in the Towns thereabouts, and the Ætolians passing without let or hinderance through Peloponnesus, attempted to take Pellene, and wasting the Territories of the Sicyonians, paffed through the Isthmus, and so returned home. After this the Acheans afternbling together, Aratus was grievously accused for taking up the Office before his time, disbanding the Army when he knew Scopas and Dorimachas were in Peloponnefus, fighting the Enemy with fo few, when he might have eafily had aid from the Towns thereabout, and, which was worst of all, for ingaging not his best Soldiers in the plain, but onely skirmilling at the Roots of the Mountains, where the Enemy had the advantage of the ground, befides their being the greater number. But as foon as Aratus appearing put them in mind of his former fervices, answered to the things objected against him, and craved pardon in case he had failed of his duty in the fight, and defired they would examine the case not maliciously, but with humanity, the people changed so in their affections, that they were angry a long time with his accusers, and rested upon his Counsels alone for

21. These things having given the occasion to the Social War, it presently was decreed against the Ætolians. For, the Acheans meeting together, ordered that some should be sent to the Epirotes, Baotians, Phocians, Acarnanians, and unto Philip, to acquaint them that they had broken the League now twice by the invalion of Achaia, to defire help against them, and to receive the Messenians into the alliance; moreover it was refolved, that the Pretor should agree with the Lacedemonians and Messenians, what Forces should be raised by their States. The Ætolians also assembling, that they might make a breach betwixt the Acheans and their affociates, refolved to make peace with the Lacedamonians and Messenians, but as for the Acheans themselves, they absurdly decreed, that on no other condition would they have Peace with them, except they forfook the fociety of the Meffenians. The Epirotes, and Philip, after audience given to the Embaffadors, willingly received the Messenians into the alliance; but as for the Ætolians, not at all wondering at their carriage (for that it being but agreeable to their custom of Piracy and robbing, their custome something excused the badness of the action) they refolved still to keep peace with them. Philip march burnt down to the ground upon the report of the Macedonians coming into Peloing down the ponnesses. For, Aratus had sent to Philip again for aid, who came presently with an Social War is Army down to Corinth, where the Commissioners from the several associated Ciderred a. gainft the & ties met him, and unanimously decreed a War against the Ætolians, in the first year of the 140 Olympiad (as Polybius telleth us) and about that time that Hannibal took

22. While Philip was about Corinth, great stirs hapned at Lacedamon by reason of him. For fuch as were his Enemies there, caused some of his party, lest they should tell how they stood affected, to be flain, and afterwards the Ephori (who had brought the People to decree a continuance in the League with him) to be murdered as they were facrifizing, and then joyned their State to the Etolians, and after they had heard of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, made a new election of Kings (wherof one was Lycurgus, an obscure man, and not of the Race of Hercules) having lived in way of a Free State about three years, ever fince they were fet free by Antigonus, till this time, when their liberty fo called, had bred great strife and emulation. Philip coming to Agium to the general meeting, the Acheans renewed the leagues and confederacies formerly made with his Ancestors, and then with a great deal of credit he returned into Macedonia, there to make provisions for the War. where spending the Winter in levying Forces, and fortifying that countrey against forein attempts, he also so dealt with Scerdilaidas, as he drew him over from the Ætolians to his own party, by reason they had not made him partaker of the booty, as they had covenanted with him. During this time feveral aflociates were fent to for affiftance in the War, and amongst the rest the Messenians, who though they gave the occasion of it, yet answered, being overpoured by the Prators of the Ætolians, that feeing Phygalea was fituate in their borders and belonged unto them, they would not allist in the War, except it was first taken out of the hands of the Ætolians. Lycurgus the Lacedemonian King getting some Forces together, invaded the borders of the Argives, and took feveral Towns, they not standing at all upon their guard, expecting no acts of Hostility from their friends as they counted them, and then was War proclaimed by the Ætolians against the Acheans. They were much elevated being now in a flourishing condition, the other on the contrary were put to it, for that Philip in whom was their chiefelt hope, was onely yet providing for the War: the Epirotes would do nothing till they faw him begin; and the Messenians remained neuters; but shortly after, the marching of Philip from Macedonia revived their

23. For having got together an Army of fifteen thousand Foot, and five hun-

Coming into Epirus, he was persuaded there by the II - fapra. habitants to fet upon the City Ambracus and recover it, (which the Ætolians had gotten out of the hands of the Epirotes) to which he was lo unwife as to agree, and thereby lost the opportunity of finishing the Warr presently, by neglecting to invade the inland Countries of Ætolia, and by harkening to the Epirotes, who more regarded their private profit then the publick good. In the meantime, in Peloponnelus things went on in favour of the Ætolians: for though they had been repulled with some loss from Ægira, a City of the Acheans, yet Euripidas the General of the Eleans made inrodes upon divers of the affociates, got much booty, and took divers Towns with the Castle of the Dimeans; Lycurgus the Lacedemonian took Atheneus a Town belonging to the Megalopolitans; and Aratus fon to theother the Captain of the Acheans could hire no Soldiers (because behind already with much pay) and with fear and indifcretion managed the business. Scopas the Prator S:02as the stolian inva- of the Ætolians through Thessaly invaded Macedonia, where wasting all with fire and fword about Pieria, he thence went to Dium, which the Inhabitants not staying his coming, heburnt, and overthrew the Images of the Kings. Philip by this time had taken Ambracus in the space of forty dayes, and thereby satisfied the greedy desires of the Epirotes; then hearing what Scopas had done in Macedonia, he paffed speedily over the Bay of Ambracia, and through Acarnania invaded the

24. Pitching his tents before Phateas, after many sharp skirmishes he received them ibidthat town upon composition, and overthrew a party of five hundred Ætolians, who were coming to relieve it; after which, ashe was wasting the Country, the Ambasfadors of the Acheans came to him desiring help. He promised to take their business into consideration, and marched for Metropolis, the Inhabitants of which flying into the Castle, he burnt the Town, and thence moving towards Conope, some Horse endeavoured to hinder him from passing the River, but finding it to be in vain, retired into the Town, and after this, none daring any more to shew themselves, he passed unmolested through the Country, taking many Towns and Castles, the Walls of which he demolished, onely Oemade he resolved to fortifie. While he thus imployed himself, news came from Macedonia, that the Dardanians had refolved to make an invafion; whereupon judging it requifite to look home, he dismissed the Achaan Ambassadors with this answer, that as soon as he had provided for the security of his own Kingdom, he would use his best endeavour to relieve them. Returning that way he came, with great journeys he passed through Epirus, and when he had arrived at Pella, the Dardamans hearing of his return disbanded their Army, and then he presently marched back into Thessaly, intending to pass away the remaining of the Summer at Lariffa, Dorimachus who being created Prator of the Ætolians invaded Epirus, and harrafing the Country, robbed, and then destroyed the Dodonan Temple; but Philip now in Winter, when it was little expected by any, leaveth Lariffa, and paffing over his Army from Theffalie into Enbera, marcheth through Baotia, and the confines of Megaris, and about the Winter folstice, cometh to Corinth, whither calling Aratus the elder to him to consult of affaires, he writes to the Prator, and several Cities of the Acheans, assigning them when and where to meet him.

25. Having taken this order he departs from Corinth to Dioscurium, a City of Idem ibid. the Phliasians, and thence to Caphya, where he had appointed the Achaans to meet him, lighting in his way upon a party which Euripidas was leading towards the Territories of the Sicyonians to waste them, whereof two thousand two hundred he took; the other being flain and perishing amongst the high Rocks, one hundred onely cscaped with their Leader. This Victory got him abundance of honour (it being heard he was come, and had overcome also at the same time) which to maintain and increase, after he was come to Caphya, he joyned Aratus the younger to him with about ten thousand men, and marched to Plophis an ancient Town of Arcadia, fituate in the middle of Pelopomesus, and vpon the confines of the Eleans, who then had it in their hands, and whither Euripidus their Captain had now withdrawn himfelf after his defeat. To this place Philip had a great mind, as very convenient for carrying on the War. He got the Town prefently, and after that had His Exploits the Castle yielded to him, and staying there some time gave up the place into the hands of the Acheaus, as also Lastone shortly after, which upon his approaching was forfaken by a Garrison of the Eleans. After this he came into the Country of the Eleans, which giving his Soldiers liberty to fack and plunder, he paffed the River

Alphaus, and came into Tryphalia including nine Towns situate betwixt Flea and Meffini, which also the inhabitants of the former had got into their possession a few years before, with Aliphira that belonged to Arcadia. Passing his men over by a bridge he caused to be made, he presently took Aliphira, and within fix dayes all Tryphalia, though Phylidas was fent from the Ætolians to aid the Eleans with fix hundred men, to whom were joyned five hundred Mercenaries, and one thousand of the Inhabitans of Elea. Placing a Garrison in the Castle of the Lepreatans, he came to Herea, where dividing all the booty amongst his Soldiers, and thence marching to Megalopolis, in the midst of Winter, he afterward came to Argos, where he spent the remainder of that Season. During these motions Chilon the Lacedemonian killed the Ephori who had made Lycurgus King; but the fact being not approved, he was glad to betake himfelf to his heels.

26. Philip invaded again the Territories of the Ætolians, and thence took very much booty, and returning to Argos to winter, fent his Army into Macedonia. At Polybinslin S. this time Apelles (who was one of them whom Antigonus had left his Guardians) much maligned Aratus, and joyning with Leontius Captain of the Cetrati (called fo from the wearing of a short buckler) and Megaleas the King's chief Secretary, refolved to remove Taurion from the Government of Peloponnesus, and Alexander from his command of the Life-Guard; and had he not been hindered by Aratus, he had accomplifit his purpose. He had procured also one Eparatus to be chosen Prator in the room of Aratus the younger, and he managing his affairs very indiscreetly, the King could get neither money nor provisions, but was fain to flie to Aratus for relief; and now it being resolved to carry on the War by Sea, he consulting with his two creatures, determined to stop up provisions from coming to the Army, and went to Chalcis for that purpole. He fo managed his business, as he forced the King to pawn his plate, who now failed against the Cephalenians, whose ships the Ætolians constantly used in their invasions of Peloponnesus, and coming to Patra, there drew up his Ships on shore. He laid siege to the City of the Pateensians, and having undermined a piece of the Wall, fent Leontius to take the place, but he remembring the conspiracy of Apelles, Megaleas, and himself, to hinder the affairs of his Master, had corrupted the chiefest of the Officers, and suffered himself to be repulsed, so that Philip raised his Siege, and consulted what was to be done. By this time Lycurgus the Lacedemonian King had ivaded the Messenians, Dorimachus also the Ætolian had made an inroad into Thessay, so that from both parts came Ambassadors to crave aid. Leontius counselled Phillip to go to Messenia; but Aratus to invade Ætolia again, to whom he agreed, having had experience of his wisdom, and beginning now a little to mistrust the other.

27. Writing to the Pretor of the Acheans to relieve the Messenians, he invaded their Country, and taking Thermus, gave his Soldiers leave to plunder the Villages, in revenge for what the Actolians had done at Dius in Macedonia, and rifled and burnt the Temple, for which he is grievoully reprehended by Polybius. After this returning on shipboard, Leontius and Megaless in their cups to abused Aratus, as to throw (tories at him, for which the former ecaping, the later was imprifoned and fined twenty Talents at a Council of War. Philip then failed to Corinth, whence fending messengers to the associated Civies to meet him at Tegea, he marched thither in two dayes, and getting some Forces together he invaded the Lacedemonians, and wasted their territories far and wide, put to flight Lycurgus who came our of the City against him, and then returned again unto Corimb. While he prepared to attempt fome notable thing upon Phoeis; Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolomy, moved the Soldiers to fedition, which though he knew very well, yet diffembled he it at prefent. but Leantins sent for Apelles from Chaleis, who there had very naughtily behaved himfelt, and now returning was not entertained by the King after the usual manner, nor admitted to the Council. Megaleas hereat being affrighted fled, leaving Leontime behind him ingaged for the twenty Talents, whose Soldiers Philip sent with Tauhis completes rion into Thriphylliu asupon service, and then cast him into Prison for the payment of the money, and not long after (the Soldiers malapertly interceding for him, that he should not be tried till their return, otherwise they should take it as a great affront). he put him to death. Then came he to Patra, wherehe had appointed the Deputies of the Cities to meet him about a Peace with the Ætolians, which the Rhodians and Chians had by Ambasadors moved both parties to. Here letters of Megaleus were brought to him, wherein he furred up the Æidians to proceed in the War, because he would be in great straights for provisions; whereupon he judging Apelles to have been the chief cause of those evils; clapt him up at Corinth, and ordered Alexander to go to Thebes and purfue Megaleas. He hearing this killed himself, and Apelles died foon after.

28. The Ætolians hearing of these stirs in Philip's Court, and thinking thereby some great sedition would be raised, put off their meeting at Rhium about the peace, which he was not at all forry for, but exhorted the Allies rather to bend their minds towards thoughts of War. Then, coming to Demetrias, there was condemned Ptolomy, Apelles his Companion, by the Macedonians, and put to death; and for that Winter was now begun, having fent his Army before, he himfelf followed into Macedonia. The next year he got Bylazora the chiefelt Town of Peonia into his hands, and Thebes Phintick allo, which the Etolians holding, much moletted Theffaly: but receiving news that Scerdilaida being revolted, made great waste of all things about Malea, he returned into Peloponnels at the time of the celebration of the Nemean Games. Here he received letters that Hannibal had overthrown the Romans at the Lake of Thrasymene; and Demetrius Pharius, who had waged War with the people of Rome, for the Illyrians, advised him to make peace with the History and undertaking the affairs of Wyricum pass thence into Lady, and think of no less than arriving at the Monarchy of the World. After Living 1, 22. he had recovered the Cities, and fent his Army to the Winter quarters, he bethought him that there would be need of Ships for the carrying on of his project; not for fighting with the Roman, but conveying of his men; so that he caused one hundred swift Barkes to be built and yet in the Spring exercising his Soldiers a little in rowing, away he goes through Euripus near to Cephalenia, hearkening continually after the

30. The Ambassadors landing near to the Temple of Juno Lucinia, went through 14tm lib. 23. Applia towards Cappa where Hamibal then lay; but in their way fell into the Roman Guards, by which they were brought to M. Valerius Levims the Pretar, then lying about Numeris. Being thus entangled, Xenophanes, one of them bolder and wifer than the rest, told the Pretor they were come from Philip to make a League and Alliance with the People of Rome; at which he rejoycing, that after the revolting of their Affociates in Italy fo great a Prince should desire their friendship, entertained him and his fellows very lovingly, and fent them away with some to conduct them, The terms of to that coming into Campania they prefently got to Hannibal. 31. The Fathers entred into ferious debate about it, being much troubled to find, that though they were scarce able to undergo the Carthaginian War, they should be ingaged in another with the Macedonian King ; yet notwithstanding they were not dismayed, but considered how they might make work for Philip at home, thereby to divert him from Italy. Having therefore imprisoned the Ambassadors, and fold their followers, they gave order for fifty thips fitly furnished to hover about Italy, and if the Kings attempts should appear answerable to the Ambassage, Marcus Valerius the Prator was then to invade Macedonia. While these things were in hand, one of the flaves which being taken accompanied the Ambaffadors to Rome, escaped, and acquainted Philip how things had passed, who then not knowing what was done or concluded betwixt Hannibal and himself, sent Messengers, who dispatched the business with better success, but the Summer was too far spent for him to do any thing this year. These high thoughts and designs he now had in his head did so puff him up, that from an excellent Prince as he was at the first, he turned tyrannical, so that he began to wax harsh against the Cities of Greece, being set on by Demetrius Pharius, who advised him to get Peloponnesus into his power, and for that purpose to seize on the two Horns of that beast, (as he accounted them) the Castle of Corinth, and that of the Messenians, who being now at odds amongst them- Palybias to felves, he laboured to increase their differences; and for that Aratus was displeafed at it, and laboured to diffwade him, he cast him out of favour. The year after he had entered into a League with Hannibal, finding it yet not convenient to make for Italy, he took Oricus a Town of Illyricum, in order to the belieging of Apollonia, both which had joyned themselves in society with the Romans fifteen years before. But when Levinus the Pretor heard of it, leaving the Coast of Brundusum to the care of P. Valerius, he hasted to Oricus, and presently recovered it, and afterwards

But the same year M. Valerius Levinus withdrew the Ætolians from their fociety and alliance with him, by shewing them the civility of the Romans towards their friends, and especially by putting them in hopes to recover Acarnania again Levinus the into their power, having Scopes the Prator and Dorimacus to back him in this per-Resear Prator swasson. And in this new League were to be included the Eleans and Lacedamasen mm work enough monians, Attalus King of Asia the less, Pleuratus of Thrace, and Scerdilaidas of Illyricum, if they pleafed. Levinus took presently Zacynthus an Island near to Ætolia, having a City in it of the same name, Oeniada also and Nassus, Towns of Acarmana, all which he gave up to the Habiana, and then judging he had made work enough for Philip to keep him at home, that he should not think of the invalion of Italy, or of Hannibal, or the Carthaginians, he departed to a party to restrain the Ætolians, he thence marched towards Thrace against the Madi, which were wont to make inroads into Macedonia when the King was abfent in the Wars; from them he took Jampharma, and attempted other places. But Polybias the Ætolians now aiming at , and expecting great things, because of their conjun-lib. 1c. ction with their Romans, struck terror into almost all the other Greeks; wherefore the Acheans, Beotians, Eubwans, Epirotes, and Acarnanians implored his help, for all which he provided as well as he might, and fent a party to defend Preparethus the Island, at which he heard that Attalus coming into Europe, arrived, being cho-fen by the Atolians their Commander in Chief. Scopus the Atolian hearing he was gone into Thrace, invaded Acarnania, the Inhabitants whereof conveying away their Wives, children, and Aged into Epyrno, vowed never to return except as Conquerors resolving never to be again enflaved under the Ætolians. This the Enemy hearing, was fomething amazed at their refolution, and then knowing of Philip his coming, returned home, and he when he heard they had fo done, returned also unto Pella. The year after he succoured the Acheans fore molested by Machani- Idim lib. 27. das Tyrant of Sparta, and the Ætoliaus, and went against Lamia, a City of the Etolians, who coming out to meet him, he overthrew them in two feveral ingagements, after which they shutting up themselves in the Town,he drew down his Army to Phalara a Maritime City of Theffaly, whither Ambaffadors came from Ptolomy, the Rhodians, Chians, and Athenians, to compose the difference betwixt him and them. Though not so much out of love to the Etolians, as for fear that Philip and his Kingdom should grow too great, and become burdensome to the liberty of Greece. The Treaty was put off to the meeting of the States-General of the Acheans, and a Truce made in the mean time for thirty dayes.

34. It was also begun with this design, to keep Attalus, or the Romans, from co-

The Etolians ming into Greece; but the Etolians observing the Term of the Truce almost to be expired, and hearing that Attalus was come to Ægina, and the Roman Navy to Naupatins, hindred the conclusion; first complaining of some things done during the Truce, and then plainly refuling to agree, except the Acheans would reftore Pylas to the Messenians, and except the Romans, Athamanians, Scerdilaidas, and Pluratus were included in the peace. Philip holding it an unfeemly thing that those who had the worst of it in the War should give Laws to the other, broke up the meeting, and leavying 4000 men for a defence to the Acheans, went to Argos. In the mean while P. Sulpicius coming with the Roman Fleet from Naupathus, landed betwixt Corinth and Sicyon, and wasted the Countrey; but Philip lighting upon his men drove them to their ships, and then going to Dyme, cast out thence the Garrifon of the Ætolians, called thither by the Eleans. Their Territories he also wasted (Cycliadas the General of the Acheans having united his Forces with his) and then went against the City Elis it self. It hapned that Sulpicius was secretly got in thither with four thouland men, which struck a terrour into the besiegers as soon as they espied the Roman colours, and Philip would sain have drawn off his men; but a skirmish being begun he was forced to charge the Roman Cohort with his horse-men. His own horse being shot under him, a sharp constitt followed about his person now A.M. 3796. on foot, but he was refeued by his followers, and mounting another fled away. After his departure Sulpicius went and wint red at Ægina with Attalus; and the Acheans fought prosperoully against their Enemies.

35. The year after, P. Sulpicius Galba the Proconful, and Attalus departing from Agina, with their Navies joyned together (which made up fifty fayl) came into Livius Ill. 28. Æubæa, and there took Oreus through the treachery of Plator the Governour. Philip now being at Demetrias, great complaints came to him of the Afolians, who being very high, troubled grievously the Associates; the Acheans moreover being molested again by Machanidas Tyrant of Lacedemon, and desiring aid, he dismissed the Messengers with promise to provide for the safety of all as near as he could, and appointed fires to be made on the tops of the Mountains, with a Watch-Tower, to give him warning if the Enemy invaded the Sea-Coasts. The fires upon the coming of the Navy to Oress were by the cunning of Plator made too late; but upon the fign given he hasted with his Army (having beaten off the Etolians who opposed him at the Straights of Thermopyle) and came to Elatea a Town in Phocis. Attalus at this time, and the Proconful having attempted Chalcis to no purpose, came to Opus, which being taken, the Kings Soldiers were to have the plunder of it, as the Romans had before of Oreus. Here he staying too long to gather money, was almost surprised by Philip, and hasting to his Ships, had not got all his men aboard before he fell upon him; then departing to Oreus, he there received news that Pruflas King of Bithinia had invaded his Kingdom, fo that he prefently returned home, and Sulpicius to Ægina. Philip chiding the Opuntians for yielding so soon, went, and took Thronium inhabited by them of Thebes Pthiotick, who being outed thence by him 8 years before, as we faid, the Ætolians had given them this Town to dwell in. After this returning to Elatia (where the Ambassadors of Ptolomy and the Rhodians stayed his coming to move him again about the peace) and hearing that Machanidas had determined to fet upon the Eleans, he refolved to prevent him. Machanidus hearing of his coming, retreated presently to Sparta, and then went he to Egium to the general Council of the Acheans, to whom he restored Heraa and Triphylia; and Aliphera to the Megalapolitans. He made some depredations upon the Ætolians, then returned to Oreus, and fo to Demetrias, where he gave order for making of Ships; (things being quiet there after the departure of Attalus) and so into his own Kingdom against the Dardanians. 36. Not long after the Epirotes bearing also the same mind, sent to him, desiring he would think of Peace, which they despaired not of, so he and Sempronius would but meet together. He condescended to go down into Epirus, and then came to an interview with the Proconful at Phoenice, together with Aminander King of the Athamanians, and the Deputies of the Epirotes and Acarnanians, where it was agreed that the Parthini, the Cities Dimalum, Bargulum, and Eugenium, should fall to the share of the Romans, and the Atintana (because they had desired it from the Senate at Rome) to Philip: in the consederacy were included on the Kings part, Prusias King of Bithinia, the Acheans, Buotians, Thessalonians, Acarnamians, and Epirotes, and on the Roman, the Inhabitants of Ilium, King Attalus, Plearatus, the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians with Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, and successor of Machanidas, slain in battel by Philopomenes, who now had begun to defend his Country from the Lacedemonians and others. 37. But Philip's mind was so inured to action, that he could not but make himfelf work; for perceiving Philopomenes (now Prator the second time of the Achaens) Philopomenes to be in great respect for his Military skill and valour, he sent to murder him at Megalopolis, which being discovered he deservedly incurred the displeasure of all Greece.

them up into the City. The occasion of the War betwixt him and them was from the Acarnanians; for two young men of that Nation coming to Athens, chanced to go into the Temple of Ceres with the other company at the Feast, being not initiated, and for that reason were put to death, as having committed an unpardonable offence, though ignorantly they did it; now this the Athamanians took fo to heart, as they procured Philip to make War upon them. At the same time were come to Rome Ambassadors also from Attalus, and the Rhodians, complaining that the Cities of Asia were also molested by him; so that now having little to do after the ending of the second Punick War, the Senate unanimously made a Decree, by virtue whereof Marcus Levinus the Vice-prator was fent into Macedonia with thirty eight Ships brought out of Sicily by Cn. Octavius: afterwards came news further that he was about to take Athens, and then it being proposed to the People, the War (through the perswasion of Publius Sulpicius Galba the Consul, to whom it fell by lot) was decreed against him. He had not besieged that City himself, but, fending down Philodes one of his Captains thither, went and subdued the Chersonefus of Thrace. Philip was now come down to Demetrias, where hearing this news he passed over Euripus on a bridge, and through Baotia hasted to Athens, thinking Philip: funit to furprize the Town; but the Inhabitants having got notice of his coming, flood his Expedium pon their guard, and then he perceiving his craft failed him, betook himfelf to force 5 but this being to no purpose (the Romans coming in, and the Soldiers of Attalus from Egina) wasting all about the Town, and not sparing so much as the Sepulchers, he went to Eleusine thinking there to get the Temple and Castle into his power; but the guards being strong, and the Navy coming to help from the Piraus, he marched thence to Megara, and so to Corinth. Hearing now that the Acheans were met at Argos, to confult how to relist Nabis Tyrant of Sparta, he went down thither, and came upon them unawares, and promifed he would make War upon him, on condition they would but find him Soldiers to keep Oreus, Chalcie, and Corinth. The And is beaten Conful glad of this opportunity, fent a party with him, and then gave an Alarm with the whole Army to the Camp, which the Macedonians received willingly enough, and both Armies being greedy of fighting, they marched out of their Trenches to receive the battel; but then those on their backs setting up a shout, ftruck them with fuch terror, that some of them ran away, others by reason of the difficulty of the place for fight were compaffed in, and two thousand slain. The King fled amain till he came five miles off, and then rallying his men upon an hill, with a great company went into Thesfaly. The Conful following him into Thessaly, laboured to get the good will of the Epirotes, and called to him Aminander King of the Athamamans to conduct him on his way; then took he Phaleria (where were in Garrison two thousand Macedonians) which he plundered and burnt, at which also others being affrighted yielded themselves, and Philip not daring to oppose, but keeping within Tempe, sent relief upon occasion to such places as wanted. At Rhaga the Consul found such opposition as he raised his fiege, but thence departing took in divers Cities of Phocis, and befieged Elatea, during which things the Navy under the conduct of L. Aristanus or Aristinetus (ashe is called by Polybius) their Prator, laboured to perswade them by all means to imbrace the society of the Romans, at which the Dymeans and Megalopolitans out of distaste went out of the Council, as unwilling thus to betray Philip, and the rest unanimously entered into Alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians, and for that they could not do as much with the Romans withjoyn with the out consent of the People at Rome, put it off onely till they might fend their Ambaffadors thither, and Decreed at the present to dispatch away three to Lucius Quintius, and their Army also to Corinth before which he now lay. The Town was froutly defended by the Inhabitants, and Androsthenes the Governour for the King, till fuch time as Philocles came with 1500 fresh men to their relief, after which it feemed best both to Attalus and Quintius to raise their siege, and then Philocles had Argos betrayed to him. The Conful in this mean time got Elatea, and then taking up his Winter quarters, news came that the Opuntians were at odds amongst themselves, some calling the Ætolians, and some the Romans, desirous to give up their City to them. The stronger and richer part called the Conful, but the Castle was still held by the Macedonians, who could not be got out by any fair words or foul, and when it should have been stormed came an Herauld from Philip, defiring a time and place might be let for a meeting to treat again of Peace, which being granted, they met in the Bay near Nice at the day appointed, where Phi-

44. The Greeks fent their Ambassadors also, and all came to Rome, when the debate was about the Provinces of the new Confuls, whether one of them should have Macedonia, according to the custom, or both stay, and carry on the War against the Gaules then depending: for the Tribunes of the people opposed the cultom, alledging that the reason why Wars were so lengthned was because there was every year a new General according to the fuccession of the Consuls. This being referred to the Senate, it was thought fit to continue the Command to Quintius, and then had all the Ambassadors audience. The Greeks inveighed fore against Philip, and earnestly laboured that he should not be allowed to hold Chalcis, Corinth, and Demetrias, for otherwise Greece could have no thoughts of liberty. They alledged it to his own faying, that these three were the Fetters of Greece, and that not without reason; for if he held Corinth, Peloponnesses could have no breathing time: if Chalcis, the Locrians, Beotians, and Phocians durst not mutters and if Demetries, the Thessalians, and Magnetes should not beable as much as to taste of liberty: feeing therefore he pretended to be willing to quit all other places, this was but a shift for the present, seeing if he was master of these places he might recover what he had before; therefore they defired he might either relinquish them or that the War might be carried on, feeing the greatest part of it was finished already. The Kings Ambassadors beginning a long Oration, were interrupted at the first, and asked whether their Master would be willing to leave the three Cities: they answered they had no Commission to answer any thing to that point: and so being chidden by the Fathers they made an end, and the affairs of Greece were again left to the management of Quintius. 45. Philip shortly after came down again into Thessaly (it being no policy at all to expect the Enemy in his own Kingdom) which Quintius understanding marched thither, where wandring after each other, they Polybius txboth at length in a thick mist came near to some Hills, from the likeness of the copy. 2 lib. 17. heads of Dogs, called Cynoscephala. This feeming strange to the Etolians, they presently concluded he was bribed to it by Philip, not accounting better of others than according to their own covetous humour; But he being displeased with them, not onely for the matter of the plunder, but also for that they gave out sleighting words of the Roman valour (attributing the good fucces to themselves) hearing also that Antiochus King of Asia was coming towards Europe, and so searing Philip might joyn with him, and then a new Consul coming might take the glory of concluding the War away from himself, he resolved to make an end of the difference, and appointed a day and place to meet at, to which he summoned the Allies. Being met together he willed them to declare their minds concerning the peace, on what terms they would have it made. Aminander very modefly defired Provisions might be made for him, else he was like to undergo the malice of Philip, who would be able prefently to crush him. The Ætolians were point blank against the peace, saying, all would prove fruitless, except the Macedonian were outed his Kingdom, and that Quintius, except he did it, would neither anfwer the expectations of Greece, nor of those that sent him; to which he replied. that it was not the custom of the People at Rome utterly to undo at once those with whom they Warred, and that the liberty of Greece would better be provided for by the standing of the Macedonian Kingdom, so weakned as it was like to be, than by the destruction of it; seeing then it would be obnoxious to the invasion of the Thracians and Gauls. The day after arrived Philip himself, and the next, coming into a full Council there, very wifely allayed the heats of all parties against him, offering to ratific the former demands of the Romans, and for the rest to subfending again mit himself to the pleasure of the Senate. Therefore four months Truce was granted to him, according to his defire, and paying to Quintius four hundred Talents in ready money, and giving up Demetrius his Son, and others for Hostages, he had leave to fend to Rome about the conclusion; but with this caution, that if the bufiness should not succeed, he was to have the Hostages and Money returned back unto

47. Both Senate and People admitted of peace, though Marcellus the new Conful Identition laboured against it, out of desire to be sent into Macedonia, Philip was enjoyned, Legation left holidos the latitude of all Canada till the latitude of the l besides the setting of all Greece at liberty, before the celebration of the Isthmian Games, to restore all Captives and Renegadoes; to give up all his covered Gallies except five, and one with fixteen Oures on a fide; to pay one thousand Talents, half at present, and the other half in the space of ten years, at so many payments. Into Greece were sent ten men of the Chief, with whom Flamininus was joyned in commission, to compose affairs, and restore liberty to the several States thereof, which exceedingly affected all with joy, except the Atolians, who carped at the Decree, and affirmed that Greece had only changed its Lords; feeing the Romans had Corinth, Demetrias, and Chalcis. When the Commissioners came to fit, some controversie indeed arose about these Towns; for they having it in express charge to set all others at liberty, these were lest to their discretion because of Antiochus, who, as all men thought, had intentions to attempt something upon Europe: therefore Flamininus perswaded them to give up Corinth into the hands of the Acheans, and keep that Castle, Demetrias and Chalcis in their own power. Then going to the folemnity of the Isbmian Games he there pronounced liberty, in that great audience, unto all Greece, which so affected the hearers, as with admiration of the thing they were scarce

he grew fomething impatient, and especially amongst other things, this vexed him, that power of animadverting upon those Macedonians who had revolted in the War, was taken from him; for after that Antivolus was overcome, and the War with the Hitolians was now in hand, Acilius the Conful taking Heraclea, and Philip belieging Lamia, when he was in a fair way of taking it, he was commanded to depart from it, that so it might be surrendered to the other. Aciliar to pacifie His diffatisfa- him, gave him leave to make War upon Athamania, and to recover the Cities which dion after the the Atolians had taken from the Theffalians; so that he presently drove out Aminander from Athamania, recovered divers Cities, amongst which was Demetrias. and possessed himself of the Countrey of the Magnetes, and some Cities in Thrace alfo. This pacified him for the prefent, yet did he not let fall his indignation but in time of peace made all provision possible for another War, increasing his Revenues not onely by Customs, but by renewing the works of the Mines, and digging others, as also taking care for encreasing the number of his people now exhaulted. Whilest he thus imployed himself, there wanted not an occasion to inflame his mind anew; for the Thessalans and Athamanians sent to Rome to complain of him; Eumenes also about the Cities of Thrace. The Senate not being willing to judge the matter in his absence sent three Commissioners into Greece to hear and determine it, who fitting and hearing all parties as Arbitrators, were something provoked by some words he uttered, affirming, that as yet the Sun of all the dayer he had to live was not set: and all being heard, they Decreed he should withdraw his Guards from all the Greek Cities, and that the Kingdom of Macedonia should be terminated by its ancient limits. As for the Cities of Thrace, much being alledged pro and con, betwixt him and Eumenes; they kept the middle way, referving the decision of that to the Senate, and ordered in the mean time that his Garrison-Soldiers should be drawn out of them. The Senate resolved he should quit them; and all the Maritime Coasts of Thrace; so that now being sufficiently incensed, he wanted but convenient Forces to make him revolt-

49. Being commanded to quit Emus and Maronea, with all the Sea Coasts of Thrace, he procured the principal of the Maronites who were strongly bent against him, to be murdered in the night, and then the Romans complaining of it as an unworthy deed, he denied it, and when Onomastus and Cassander the instruments of the fact were required to be fent to Rome, the latter he gave way for to go, but then (fitsthought) procured him to be poyfoned in the way, left he should tell tales; and as yet his affairs not being ripe for a revolt, he sent Demerius his younger son to Rome, to purge himself, and deprecate the displeasure of the Senate. Underhand he sollicited the inhabitants upon the River Biter to break into Italy. Demetrize had got heretofore so much good-will at Rome, as coming to have audience in the Senate, though he was abalhed at that presence, and the heavy loads of imputations laid upon his Father by the Ambassadors of his Eneite is displeat thires, Yet were his Fathers faults passed over at this time for his sake, and so much fed at the far fignified to Philip by Q. Marcius, fent into Macedonia to fee whether he had done four of the Ramas to.

Then did he quit all the Cities of Thrace inhabited by the Greeks, and performed all other things which the Romans required that he might not give any fulpition, but get leifure to provide for the intended War. With Demetring his fon he was not well pleased, for that the Senate making no account of himself, had given him the credit of deserving only favour; but especially Perfew his elder fon conceived great indignation and malice against him, not only for the credit he had at Rome, but being jealous he might deprive him thereby of his Father's Kingdom. Indeed the Macedomans looking upon Demetrius as one to whom they were obliged for faving them harmless from the Romans, defigned the succession to Perseus growing more and more sensible of the favour his brother was in both with the Romans and Macedonians, bent his mind to bring him into the jealousie which are remainded in the result of the remainded in the representation of the remainded in way, whereby the young manis called for by his angry Father; and is forced with tears to make an apology, to which chedit is hardly enough given, sufficient and jealousies getting ground. He being also one of Perseus his Complices, he gave him in charge to infinuate into him, and thereby get out his most inward intentions, which he easily did, the poor young man being resolved to flie to the Romans for shelter, and desirous to use his help therein. This is prefently made known to Perseus, and by him with improvement to Philip, who having wearied himself and Soldiers to little purpose, and being troubled with this report, returneth home, casts Herodotus, Demetrius his chiefest friend into Prison, and causeth him also to be narrowly looked to Some moneths remained the King thus exceedinly troubled and anxious in himself till the Ambassadors returning from Rome, put an end within a short time to his resolutions.

51. These men being returned, seigned grievous acculations against Demetrius, Livit likes.

Credit being given hereunto, Herodotus is racked to death, confessing nothing, and Demetrius being again accused by his brother of intended flight, is deflined to die, though for fear of giving any offence to the Romans, and discovering his intentions against them, it's resolved to be done cunningly. Being sent to Æstraum a Town of Paonia, and thence called to Heraclea, he is there first poyloned by Didas, crying out against the cruelty of his Father, the parricide of his Brother, and wickedness of Didas. Being tormented with the working of the Poyson, two A. M. 2824. lufy Ruffans were let into the room, who stifled him with the Tapestry, and so the 6th 149 and innocent young man was murdered. The Roman Senate upon the report of the stirs in Dardania, sent three to see how matters went, but he refused to see them; it being alleged sometimes that he was absent, and otherwhiles that he was fick; but it clearly appeared to them that he was providing for the War, and so much the more, for that the Hitolians were now fo feditious, as though their commillions gave them power to take up the differences amongst them, yet could they not prevail by their authority. Indeed now he was better provided to make War than the Romans to refift, having thirty thousand Foot, with five thousand Horse, in a readiness, and provisions too for ten years. Thrace was at Peace with him, and though he was fo infamous for his cruelty, not onely in respect of his brother's death, but also the killing of Apelles, whom he used as an instrument in that business, and also for making away his Wife, and upon other accounts, yet either out of reverence to the Court of Macedonia, or by reason of their emulation against the Romans, were both the Greeks and Asiaticks generally more favourable to him than to Eumenes His bad carri the King of Pergamus, though of a clean contrary disposition. Not long after Antiochus and Antigonus Conatas being at difference, and preparing for the War on both fides, Niconucles joyned himself with Antigonus, a gainst whom therefore the other thought first to try his strength. Mithridates fortifying himself, procured 13 Gallies from Heyaclea, which adding to his own Fleet, he went against that of Antiochus, but facing one another for some time, they departed at length without a fight. 3. Antigonus Gonatas being resolved to venture for Macedonia (where his father

This Prince might be the more willing to imbrace it, by reason that the Gauls were now come into Asia, brought by Nicomedes of Bithynia to help him against Zybaus (or Zipatus) the younger, who held from him (whether his brother or no is uncertain) the Maritime part of that Countrey. After they had helped him to recover Bithynia, they harraled all the Countreys far and wide, and though they were but twenty thouland, and of them but half fighting men, yet ftruck they fuch a Terrour into all Nations on this fide Uarras, as most, though they had never scenthem, submitted unto them. But Antiochus, as we have it from Appian, repelled them from his Territories, and thence, for faving the Countrey harmless, had the name of Soter or Saviour, having before sent as aid into Greece five hundred men against their Countrey-men, under the conduct of Telefarchus the Syrian. After this having Passan is married his daughter Apame to Magas King of Cyrene, and brother to Ptolomy Phi-Photlein. ladelphus, he was perswaded by his Son-in-Law to break the League which his father Seleucus had made with Ptolomy, and invade Egypt; but as he was about to do this, ldem in Attiand was gathering forces for it, Ptolomy sent several parties of Soldiers into all the Countreys over which he reigned, whereof fome acting the parts of Robbers, and others of Enemies, diverted him from his purpose. The last ingagement he was in that we read of, was with Eumenes, the first King of Pergamus, near Sardis, from Strabo lib. 13. whom he received an overthrow.

Antichus Tree 5. Antichus his son succeeded him, sirnamed Theos most prophanely by the Mi-spin 165, the Parthan, because he rid them of Timarchus their Tyrant. From him the Parthan, wen first revolted, who being (as * Justin out of Trogus tells us) Exiles out of Scythia (in the language of which Countrey Parthus fignifieth fuch an one) were very obscure under the Government of the Medes and Persians, and being Conquered by Alexander, when none of his Captains after his death would accept of the Soveraignty over them, fell to the lot of Satagenor a stranger, but a friend to the Macedoniant. They followed first Eumenes in the Civil Wars; after his death Antigonus, and then submitted themselves to Seleneus and his Successors, till now they took occasion to revolt at the infligation of Arfaces. We mult know that Arfaces and Tri-Snahill, in dates were two Brothers, the sons of Arfaces and Grand-sons of Phriapins. The second or Tridates was attempted by Pheroles the Satrapa of Parthia to be carnally and filthily abused, and discovered the Villany to Arsaces his Brother. They taking to their affiftance five other Conspirators, set upon Pherocles, killed him, and then called on the Parthians to stand up for their liberty, and drove out the Macedonians. For this valiant Act performed the Parthians gave the title of King to Arfaces as to whose name all Writers agree, though not to that of the Persian Surrapa, whom some call by that of Agathocles. At the same time Theodotus the Governour of the one thousand Batterian Cities revolted also, which the people of ften From the East ofing for a pattern, in like manner fell off from Antiochus. He waged many Wars with Ptolony Philadelphus, till fuch time as both being weary they contracted an Alliance, Ptolomy giving his daughter Berenice to the other, who had two sons already, Selencus and Antiochus, by Laodice his former Wife. Herein that can trionical Prophecie of Daniel is taken to be fulfilled, which faith, that in the end of years they shall joyn themselves together; for the Kings daughter of the South shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement. But, asit followeth, she shall not rethin the power of the Arm, neither shall be stand nor his Arm, &c. For, Philadelphus dying shortly after, Antiochus took again his former Wife Laodice, who being sensible of the injury, and fearing her husbands inconstancy, poysoned him, after he had 6. Lacdice his wife kept his death close, till fuch time as she had secured the Identities

Kingdom to Selencus her eldest son, sirnamed for his victories (though of none but Julia like 27. one we read) Callinicus, and from his beard Pogon. The next thing the went aas and Po bout was to make away Berenice, who understanding that some were sent to kill her shut up herself in Daphne, a Town near Antioch, and when she was besieged, news flying about the Cities of Afa, they commiferated her condition, and out of respect of her Fathers and Grandfathers Dignity, sent mento her relief. But above A.M. 3750all, her brother Ptolomy Energ-tes being affrighted at her danger, haftened out of Ol. 133-22-23, his Kingdom with his whole power. Yet ere any relief could come she was taken Ptol. Fargut. Fleet, and to revenge her death, gave up themselves to Prolony, who invading Sytet even gethidedah fris flew Laadise, feized upon Caelejria,with Seleucia, got into his hands Syria, Cilicia, of his fifter and the upper Provinces beyond Euphrates, and almost all Afia, even as fir as Ba-Gria. Without doubt he had conquered all Selencus his Kingdom, had he not been forced by a Domeflick Sedition to return, after whose departure Seleuous having prepared a great Fleet for the reducing of those Cities which revolted from him, lost it in a great Tempest, at the which they were so far from rejoycing, that pitying him for this Shipwrack, they voluntarily returned to obedience.

7. Rejoycing that he fared to well by his shipwrack, he now made War upon tem. ibid. Ptolony, but being overthrown fled to Antioch in great fear, being as destitute as before, though he found not such relief. For, writing to his younger brother Antiochus, he craved his help, offering him all Alia within the Mountain Taurus for a reward, (who though he was but yet fourteen years old) being greedy of reigning imbraced this occasion, and then behaved not himself not as an helper or brother, but like a Robber, intending to get the whole Kingdom. He shewed incredible boldness in invading and snatching, whence he had the Sirname of Hierax or

Goshauck. Ptolomy hearing of his aiding his Brother, lest he should have two to deal with at once, made peace with Seleucus for ten years; and then Antiochus hiring the Gauls, with them made War upon his Brother in the other's stead, in which he had the better of it, and they supposing Selencus to be slain in the Battel (that cutting off all the Royal Race they might be Lords of Afia) turned their force against him that hired them; so that Antiochus was glad to purchase his freedom with Gold, and enter into fociety with his Mercenaries. The two Brothers being thus at odds, and every one gaping after Asia, Eumenes of Bithinia puts in amongst the rest, and overthrowing the Gauls, and after them Antiochus, got a great part of it into his poffession. Now also Anjaces hearing of the distress of Selences, perfected the revolt then the 41of the Parthians; for, invading that Country with a Band of Robbers, he flew the Governour Andragonu, and invaded the Principality, and not long after feizing on the Kingdom of the Hyrcanian, fo strengthened himself thereby, that after some years he overthrew Scleneur, and established his Kingdom. Hence a double Epoche is to be made of the Parthian Kingdom or Dominion. Of these the first is to be fetched from the Revolt of the Parthians from Antiochus Theory and the second from the famous Victory obtained over this Seleucus Callinicus; and so several disfenting Writers may be reconciled. But hence the Parthians accounting ever after the day of this Victory as the day of their Liberty, constantly observed it, and Ar-Saces being no less memorable to them than Cyrus to the Persians, Alexander to the Macedonians, or Romulus to the Romans; out of honour to him they called all their Kings by his name. This beginning of Arfaces fell out in the first of the 135 Olympiad, of the City 510, the second of Seleucus, and the third of Ptolomy Energetes. A.M. 2761. 8. power, and both the brothers had even lost their Principalities, yet could they not agree, but in stead of opposing the foreign and common Enemies, sought the destruction of each other, by renewing the War. In the next battle Antiochus was overthrown, and flying many dayes, and not knowing how to bestow himself, at length being wearied he went to Artamenes King of Cappadocia his Father in Law, by The two bro-whom at first being received very civilly, heafterwards understood there was a clotthere were and laid against him, and fled thence. Whereupon not knowing where to be secure. he betook himself to Ptolomy, judging he might rather trust to him then his brother, being (as well he might be) mindful of what he would have done to him, or had deferved of him. Ptolony commanded him to be narrowly looked to, but by the help of a certain Harlot with whom he had been too familiar, he deceived his Keepers and got away. Yet as he was flying he was flain by thieves. Selencus alfo almost at the same time, being outed of his Kingdom, and thrown by an horse, ended his life, after he had reigned about twenty years. A. of one Hermias, who now ruled all at Court, conspired together to withdraw all the upper Provinces from their allegiance. This Hermias a Carian by birth, had been left by Selencus to look to his Kingdom when he took his Expedition over Taurus, and then being fet in so high a place, began to envy the power of all others, grew proud and cruel, his malice above all others being against Epigenes, who had been Scleucus his General; for that he saw him to be a wise and prudent man, and the Army muchar his devotion. A Council being called to confult about the Rebellion, Epigenes advised that the King should go in person to suppress it; for thereby the Rebels would either be terrified and delift, or the Country at his presence would be moved to cross their designs, and deliver them up; but Hermias interrupting him, imputed this to a defire that the Kingdom should miscarry, mediately into that thereby he might seize upon his estate, and prevailed that two others should be great troubles that trierety he might the wing go against Ptolomy Philopater (who now thinking by the means fest against Molo, and the King go against Ptolomy Philopater (who now thinking himself secure in the youth of Antiochus, and Philip of Macedonia, had given himself secure in the youth of Antiochus, felf up to all luxury) hoping thereby to have an easie War of it, for that he was of a cowardly disposition, and hoped by exposing the young King to dangers and hazards, to escape the punishment due unto him, and maintain that powerhe already enjoyed. Antiochus being very young, was very earnest to get Calespria, and Hermios to prick him still forward, framed a letter from Achaus, wherein he tells he is defired by Ptolomy to take the Diadem and affume the title of King to himself, promising to send him ships, money, and all things necessary for that en-

11. Having married first Landice daughter of Mithridates King of Cappadocia, he prepared for his Expedition, when news came that Molon went on with his defign, and how the Captains sent against him, out of fear had secured themselves in Garmarch against risons. Hereupon he bent hismind to go himself, but Hermias being tenacious of though Molon his purpole, again diverted him, telling him, it was fitter for Subjects to fight against fuch, and Kings against their equals, and so sending one Xinetas an Achean against Molon, again turned his mind now obnoxious to him for want of years. Then marched they to Laudicea, and thence through the Defart to the Valley called Marfig., lying between the Mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, where about the A. M. 3783. Straights he took in divers Towns; but the principal Fort held out and put him to v.c. 532. a ftand, which made him the more definous to go now against Molon; For Xineta, saith Ma who was fent against him with full power, growing arrogant and careles, had rashly ventured over the River Tigris, and then Molon making as if he fled, came upon him in the night, and cut him off with most of his men, and those that escaped the Sword taking the River, scarce any got to the other side. After this, Molon pursuing his Victory took Seleucia, all the upper Provinces, the Principality of Babylon, those parts lying upon the Red Sea, all about Tigris as far as Europus, and Mesopotamia as far as Dura; onely the Castle at Susa stood out, the Town being taken; Antiochus at this report called a Council to confult what wasto be done, where Epigenes expostulating that his former advice was not followed, moved the same again; but was taken up as before by Hermias, with foul language, who defired the King HE INCECTIFIED TO BE A DESCRIPTION OF THE WAS A DESCRIPTION OF THE WAS

12. The Army before it stirred mutinied for pay, and then Hermias taking advantage at the Kings necessity, offered to lay down money, on condition Epigenes might be removed from his presence, which having obtained, he procured the man to be murdered. The Army marched and came to Antioch in Mygdonia at the Winter folftice, where staying forty dayes till the extremity of the cold was over, after forty dayes it came to Liba, Molon then lying at hand about Babylon. Here a Conneil of War being called to confult which way was to be taken, that they might not fail of Provisions; Hermins was for going along by Tigris, that it, and two other Rivers, Lycus and Kapros, they might have for a defence; but Zeuxis, though fearful to speak because of him, shewed the danger of that advice, because it would be a great compass, and after fix dayes travel through a Defart, they should come to a place called The Kings Ditch, which if the Enemy got before them, they should in no wife be able to pass, and be reduced into great straights for want of Victuals; but on the contrary, if they passed over Tigris, there was no doubt but the Inhabitants of the Countrey called Apolloniatis would return to obedience, obeying Molon at present out of necessity; further, in that plentiful Countrey they should have plentiful of Victuals, and (what was most considerable) Molon would be hindered from retreating into Media, and thereby being straightned, after that the place where he yet remained was emptied of provisions, would be forced to fight, or if he durftnot do that, then his Soldiers would revolt to the King. This counsel being taken, all things fell out accordingly; for Molon fearing his passage into Media might be stopped, little trusting those parts in which he then was, determined to get if he could, to the hilly Country of Apolloniatie; but it hapned that the Scouts of both parties met there, and skirmilling for some time, afterwards retreated to their feveral Bodies, and so gave occasion to a total ingagement the day 13, Molon confidering how dangerous it was to bring his Soldiers forth in open face against their King, thought it the best way to chuse out the most strong and valiant, and fet upon his Camp in the night. Going about to do this, ten young men went over to the King and told him the defign of the Rebels, fo that Molon was glad to return, and put his other Army left behind him into fuch an Alarm for that they were ignorant of the enterprise, that much ado he had to quiet them. The King being provided to fight, drew out his men by break of day, and placed them Molon and his in batalia ; Molon could but do it in great disorder and confusion, by reason of that consternation which fell upon his men in the night. In the fight which presently followed, the right Wing of his Army stood fast to him, and fought very earnestly, but the left as foon as it came in fight all revolted, which he understanding, now compaffed in with Enemies, and confidering the tormentshe was likely to undergo if taken alive, killed himfelf, and so did all his companions in the conspiracy, but his body being found was nailed, for an example, to a cross in the highest parts of Media. After this Victory Antiochus settled the affairs of these Countries, dealing more mercifully with his Subjects than was defired by Hermias, and then refolved to invade the Territories of the Barbarians lying upon his borders, to terrifie them from affifting his rebels for the time to come; which Hermias difliked for the danger of the War, his mind still running upon Calesyria, but news being brought that a young fon wasborn to the King, he wascontent he should expose himself to this danger, hoping that in casehe should miscarry he must be made Guardian and Protector of the infant, but he was ignorant that his just reward hung over his head. For one Artabazanes, his Country being invaded, being unfit for refistance because of old age, made Peace with Antiochus, submitting to whatsoever he demanded, and at the same time Apollophanes the Physician to the King, and his great favourite, perceiving Hermias not able to bear that high condition to which he was advanced, any longer, being follicious for his Masters safety, and much more for his own, so wrought the put to death. King (inclinable enough to it before) as being called to walk abroad one morning more early than usual, before his return he was made away.

14. Antiochus his mind was now turned towards Acheus, who, though at the first he had born himfelf very modeftly, being elevated with fuccefs, and thinking that the King in his expedition against Artabazanes might possibly miscarry, or if he did not, yet hoping that he being at so great a distance, he might have opportunity enough to break into Syria, and have help to feize upon the Kingdom, marched with his whole Army from Lydia, and coming to Laodicea in Phrygia, then set the Diadem upon his head, and first took the Title of King upon him. He continued his march till he drew near to Lycaoma; but there the Soldiers mutined, refusing to Diagon, and fight against their natural King, so that seeing this, he strove to perswade them that he had no intention to invade Syria, and diverted his course to Pissdia, which harafing, and increasing the Army with booty thereby, he returned home again. The King not being ignorant of any of this, first expostulated it with him, and sending him threatning messages, put off the rest for this time, and set himself with all his might to prepare for the War against Ptolomy. Consulting then what way to invade Syria, he was perswaded first of all to attempt Seleucia (held by the Ptolomies ever fince the Invasion of Euergetes, to revenge the death of his Sister Berenice) being the upon Ptolony Chief Seat almost of the whole Empire, from whence would arise much trouble being for cettifitie. thus in the Enemies hands, and very commodious by its lituation for carrying on the

rifon within who promifed that if he could but take part of the Suburbs they would procure the whole Town to be yielded. This being done, the Conspirators came to the Governour, and moved him to yield, as from the necessity of the thing, who being struck at this consternation, as it appeared, of the Soldiers, surrendred present. it all into his power; for he being an Ætolian born, had done the Kings of Egypt special service, but was so well requited for it as he was brought into danger of life, and therefore at what time Antiochus went against Molon, looking upon Ptolomy as a despicable Creature, and distrusting his Courtiers, he had seized upon Ptolomais and Tyre and follicited him to come down. Now therefore Antiochus putting off the business of Achaus till another time, marched down to Marsya, the same Valley and Straights as before, where hearing Theodotus was befieged in Ptolemais, he went, and relieved him, and then having that and Tyre delivered up unto him, and beating the Enemy out of the Straights, he had then determined to march towards Pelulium, but understanding that Piolomey's Army was come thither, and all opposition possible making for hindering his passage, he went on in taking in the Townsthereabouts, divers whereof presently submitted, and others stood it out. Ptolomy himfelf being given wholly up to fluggishness, though thus betrayed, took no order about his affairs; All the burthen of them lay upon Agathocles and Sosibius, then the greatest Officers of State, who being able men, sent up and down to raise Forces, and make all speedy preparations for the War, though to divert Antiochus they sent Ambaffadors to him to treat of peace (as defiring onely to go that way to work) and procured Embassies from the Rhodians, Byzantians, Atolians, and them of Cyzicus, to mediate betwixt them, during which they gained time, and deceived the Enemy, carrying all things fo close as his Ambassadors could understand nothing of their is by the pra- Provisions. The Commissioners coming to debate the particulars according to their instructions, Anticchus laboured to overcome them with his Arguments for the justness of his cause, as well as with his Weapons, pleading he had done Ptolomy no injury in making that invalion, for that he had but recovered his right, alledging much the Conquests of those parts by Antigonus Cocles, and the possession of them by Selencus, and that Ptolomy the first waged not War with Antigonus for his own particular, but to help Seleucus to the Soveraignty of that Province, but above all, he prefied the common agreement of all the Kings, made at that time when Antigonus was overthrown, wherein by Lysimachus and Cassander, all Syria was decreed to Seleucus. On the contrary, Ptolomy's Commissioners aggravated the height of the injury offered to him?, by the unworthiness of cloasing with the treasonable practices of Theodotus, and affirmed, that Ptolomy the Son of Lagus intended the Dominion of Syria to himself, and joyned with Seleucus on no other terms, than that indeed all Asia should be his, but Syria fall to his own share. Such like objections and replies as these were made often to no purpose, but that which put the greatest stop to the Treaty, was the comprehending of Acheus in the League, which The answer of Ptolomy stickled hard for, and the other as impatiently heard, crying out of the unworthiness of the thing, that he should protect, or make any mention of Rebels. Committee Winter being thus foun out with these discourses, and Spring drawing on, Antiochus Treaty ends intending to fet upon the Enemy both by Sea and Land, drew together his Forces, to the taking in of what remained unconquered of Syria; and Nicolaus on the other part, as the Egyptian General, with Perigenes the Admiral, made all possible provi-

He after this came near Sidon with his Army, but judging it to no purpose to set upon the Town very strong * Called by with men, and full of Provisions, he gave order to Diognetus his Admiral to go Josphus Balls with the Flect to Tyre, and marched to Philateria fituate upon the Sea of Tiberias, for in the Tiberia Mr. which he took, together with * Scythopolis. After this, Kareus, one of Ptolomies Chiefest of Officers revolted to him. Hippolochus the Theffalian brought over with him four hundred horse, and then the Arabians moved by his success joyned themselves to him. Shortly after he took in Galatis and Gadara beyond expectation, because of the strength thereof; but the Inhabitants terrified at his preparations yielded themfelves: then hearing that a great number of Enemies had met at Rabath-ben Amon, or Rabatana, a City in Arabia, and thence made incursions into the Territories of his friends, he marched thither, and striving by force in vain to be Master of the place, at length he effected it by stopping the course of Water, for want of which it was then furrendred. Then leaving a strong Garrison here, and sending Hippolo-chus and Kareus to Govern the Coasts of Samaria, he went to Ptolemais, and there took up his Winter quarters.

Pulsay in the 18. Prolomy to give him a ftop, prepared against the Spring a great Army, and Spring follow then marched from Alexandria with seventy thousand foot, five thousand horse, ing taken the and seventy three Elephants, and came to Pelusium. Antiochus hearing this, gatherid. red his Forces together, amounting to seventy two thousand foot, fix thousand horse, and one hundred and two Elephants. Ptolomy proceeding on his journey came to Gaza, and thence near to Ruphia (the first City of Syria, except Rhinocerus, as one cometh from Egypt) and Antiochus passing by that place shortly pitched his Tents at first within ten furlongs of the Enemy, and the next day, partly for the commodioufness of the ground, and partly to embolden his Soldiers, approached within five furlongs of them. Being so near, several skirmishes tell out amongst those which on both fides iffued forth for provisions, and Theodotus the Ætolian, after a most bold adventure taking but two in his company, for that he had been in Ptolomy's Court, and knew his manner of life, went out in the dusk of the evening, and not being known got into the Kings Tent where he used to give audience, and though he miffed of him being in a more obscure place, yet wounded he two which waited there, and killing out-right Andreas his principal Physitian, eleaped back in fafety to his own Camp; having onely failed of his purpole for want of informing himself when the King was wont to take his reft. For five dayes continued these two Princes in this posture, and then both resolved to try the matter in a sett

19. Ptolomy first drew out his men, and then presently Antiochus ranged his in battel aray against him. Each of the Armies had two wings, wherein the two Kings met each other, guarded with Elephants, betwixt which the fight was begun, after Antiochus had caused the charge to be sounded; their manner being sirst with their Trunks to thrust each other, and strive for the ground, and then after that for the one by force to remove the others Trunk, and to fall upon him like a Bull, and gore his sides. Few of Ptolomies beasts would sight at all, for that being African, they could neither endure the smell nor noise of those of India, so that the ranks being difordered by them, his left Wing was quite broke by the charge of the Enemy, and put to flight. Echecrates, who commanded in the right, ftayed first for the ingagement of the former, then feeing that his Elephants would not fight, gave order to Phinidas Commander of the Mercenary Greeks to invade his oppolites, and he himfelf also wheeling about to be out of the danger of the Bealts, fell upon the Flanks and Rear of the Enemies Horse; so that both together they made them all being Arabians and Medes to give ground, and put all the Wing to flight, thus being even with Antiochus. Then came the bodies themselves to ingage: Antiochus was busie in the pursuite of that Wing wherein he fought ; but Ptolomy coming to his Army much encouraged the Soldiers, and disheartned his adversaries who being charged by Andromachus and Sosibius, the Syrians for some time maintained their ground, but the rest scarce fighting one stroak shifted for themselves. Antiochus being yet unskilful and young, was still following the chace, (thinking because he had the better of it in his Wing, that therefore his whole Army overcame) till admonished by some one about him, he returned, and seeing things so contrary to his expectation, endeavoured to break in with his Guard, to the place where his Army stood, but finding all his men fled, retired also unto Raphia, being perswaded that he had done as became him, however, by reason of the Cowardly- A. Ptology loft one thousand five hundred Foot, and seven hundred Horse, fixteen Ele-Ptol. Philosoft phants were killed, and the rest taken for the most part.

20. Antiochus had intended after the rallying of his men to have fortified himfelf without Raphia; but most of them being got into the Town, he defired leave to bury his dead, and then returned into his own Kingdom. Ptolomy presently received all Calespria again into his power, the Inhabitants accommodating themselves to his present condition (as indeed bearing alwaies great reverence to his family) and striving who should first yield themselves. Antiochus coming to Antioch, prefently dispatched Antipater his brother's Son, and Theodotus Herviolius in an Ambaffage to him, fearing exceedingly he should be profecuted with War, distrusting his Subjects because of his adverse fortune, and suspecting Acheus might make use of this opportunity against him. But Ptolomy thought of nothing less than mo-

peace and of this opportunity against him. But Ptolony thought of nothing less than mo-easily obtain-lessing him, being overjoyed that he had above all expectation recovered Calcfiria, and defiring exceedingly to be quiet, out of his fluggish disposition, and other vices familiar to him; wherefore at first receiving the Ambassadors with threatning language, and complaints of the injuries received from their Master, he presently granted a Truce for a year, and then sent Sosibius to confirm the League, wanting onely courage and resolution to spoil Antiochus of his Kingdom.

21. Antiochus spent all the Winter in preparations, and in Spring marched over Iden except. the Mountain Taurus against Acheus, whom he besieged in the City Sardis. Above 113-7- a year he lay before it, having onely sometimes light skirmishes with the defendants, till Lagoras a Cretian, a man of great experience, observing that the strongest Cities are many times taken at such places as are by reason of their strength least looked to, and perceiving a piece of the wall, beyond which they used to throw carrion and filth into a pit, to be destitute of any watch, by the sitting of fouls upon it, which came to feed on the carkeiles, he took unto him Theodotus the Etolian, and Dionysius, with some Soldiers, and they made a shift to get over and open the gates; the King to divert the Enemy making as if he would give the onfet at another place, and so the Town was taken. Achem and Aribazus the Governour got into the Castle, and then were straitly besieged again, till such time as Sostius the chief Minister of State in Egypt, pitying the condition of the former, made means for his deliverance, which by the treachery of the instrument wrought his destruction. There was at that time in the Egyptian Court one Bolis For whose a Cretiun, second to no one Captain, as ne was reputed, to principle obliged him by this after Softine deals, having obliged him by this after Softine deals and the restorm more acceptable to the a Cretian, second to no one Captain, as he was reputed, for prudence, extraordina- 1dem except. He asking some time to consider of it, within two or three dayes took the business upon him, which to effect he had as he faid a good opportunity, for that Cambylus the Commander of the Cretians. Serving under Antiochus was not onely known to

Being supplied with money largely by Sossium, and loaded with promises, away he sailed for Rhodes to Nichomachus, and thence for Ephesus, to Melancoma. his acquaintance, and friends of Acheus, with whom dealing about his bufinefs, he sent one Arianus to Cambylus to let him know that he was sent from Alexandria to raise Forces, and that he must needs speak with him, desiring he would appoint time and place for their meeting, without the privity of any. Having obtained this, and bethinking withhimfelf what to do, he gave him a letter concerning which like Cretians they had a Cretian conference, as Polybius termeth it. For not respecting the fafety of the belieged, or their faith given to those that employed them, but agreeing to divide the ten Talents already given in advance by Sosibius, they resolved to acquaint Antiochus with the matter, and undertake upon promise of money in hand, and a good reward afterwards, to deliver Acheus into his power. This being with great earnestness promised, Bolis prevails with Nicomachus and Melanchoma, wholly ignorant of his treacherous intent, to write letters in cipher to Achaus, which he fent hy Arianus, for whom passage was procured into the Castle by means of Cambylis. Acheus being earnestly advised by his two friends to trust Bolis and Cambylus, and withall considering the difficulty from him to escape; hoping if he got out to pass presently into Syria whilst Antiochus was yet at Sardis, and then to get all the parts about Antioch into his power, yielded to put himself into the hands of Bolis, who was fent presently by Melancomas with great entreaties and promises if he could accomplish the business. Bolis ment to Cambylus at night, and flaying with him the next day to confult of the business how it should be managed, after he had been with Antiochus, and was much incouraged by him, he went up for Acheus into the Castle.

23. Receiving Bolis with great respect, and after all his sisting of him perceiving

nothing difagreeable to feriousness, he much rejoyced; but bethinking himself how weighty a thing it was, and what a hazard he was like to run, he trembled again at the thought of it, and at first resolved to send some before to Melancomas; but at length out he went of the Castle, and according to former agreement, Bolis Buthe is be- coming behind him by a whiftle gave a fign to those in Ambuth, and held him by raided by the the clothes till he was taken. his History had been kept entire, we might have known. After this he quieted the upper Asia, and coming into Battria for a good while endeavoured to drive out Expedition the East, therice Euthydemus the King thereof, whom he defeated, and behaved himself most froutly, whence he got great credit for his valour. At length Euthydemus complaining Polytius 122. that he was injurious in opposing him thus who had not revolted from him, but cut emplish the off the posterity of those that had, beseeching him also not to envy him the name of King, especially considering that by this diffention neither of their affaires could be secure, for that a number of the Scythian Nomades hovered at the borders, and were like to overrun the Gountry, Antiochus, who being tired with the tediousness of the War, had fought occasion to make a Peace, not unwillingly now heard the overtures of it, especially after that Euthydemus sent his son Demetrius to him, with whom he was so taken for his person and parts, as thinking him worthy of a Kingdom, he first promised him one of his daughters, and then yielded that his Father should take the title of King. Then the conditions of the league being written down, and sworn to, and taking with him all the Elephants that Enthydennus had, he marched over Caucasus, and renewed the confederacy with Sophagasenus the Indian King; then taking with him more Elephants (of which he had now one hundred and fifty) and leaving Androsthenes of Cyzicus to bring the treasure promised him, he came to Arachosta, and so through Drangiana into Carmania, where he was forced to Winter, having received this fruit by this Expedition, that belides the Countries recovered, and the maritime Cities and Dynasties on this side Towns added to his Dominions, he struck such an awe into his Subjects, as kept them more in order, and he wasthought to be efteemed as well by the People of Europe as those of Asia, worthy to govern. 25. Though he heard this with much disdain, yet thought he it wisdom to give them good words for the present, and please them in this particular, but they, after all danger was over from Philip (who this Summer was beaten at Cynoscephale) not tying themselves with him to the former condition, sent aid to the Cities their associates, and preserved several in their liberty. He took at length Caracesium, and after it several others, and amongst the rest Ephesius, where wintering, he endeavoured to reduce also the Cities of Asia, under the obedience they payed to his Ancestors, and thinking it not difficult to be done by any of them, except two, viz. Smyrna in Holis, and Lampfacus upon the Hellespont, he sent Forces to besiege them

27. Now the Romans, with all others, doubted not but his Army was for Europe, after his affairs had fucceeded in Affa, and they had the more cause to be jealous of him, for that Hamibal their old and sworn Enemy had now been with him; therefore in the fetting of the Greek Cities at liberty (after the overthrow of Philip King of Macedonia) the Senate had left it to the Commissioners appointed for that work, to deal as they should think fit with Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth, the keys of the Country, and whether out of a defire of the glory of fetting all the Greeks at liberty, or to awe and affright him, they decreed, that all such Cities, as well in Asia as Europe, should be freed. The ten Commissioners sitting now in Greece about these affairs, they of Smyrna and Lampsacus (whom he had befieged) sent to them for relief, and Antiochus himself thinking fit not to anticipate Apriam is Sp. his opportunities, fent thither also his Ambassadors, to whom the Commissioners Polyhinterut. lay'd open the pleasure of the Senate, and in case he contain not himself and Forces Legal, 9. in Ala, threaten him with War: and withall promife that some of their number & Lib. 17. should come to him. Yet he in the beginning of Spring comes over into Europe, got a great part of the Chersonesus into his power, and then marching to Lysimachia, there found the Commissioners, who pressing him to the things formerly mentioned, he demanded by what right the Romans questioned with him about Asia, seeing he medled with nothing done in Italy; and added, that the Greek Cities should obtain their liberty, not by their commands, but his bounty. Now it was moved that those of Smyrna and Lampsacus might be heard; which being obtained, and the Delegates using their liberty of speech, he out of indignation, that he should be forced to plead with them before those Judges, interrupted them, saying the Hamibal denied that the Romans could be overcome any where but in Italy, and defired but one hundred Gallies, fixteen thou- Livius lib. 34. fand Foot, and one thousand Horse, with which he would first go to Carthage, Appianuty int hoping to draw his Countrymen to revolt, and though that should not succeed, yet would he seize upon some part of Italy. The King closing with his propositions at this time, he went not himself, but sent a certain Tyrian to Carthage, who under pretence of trading should break the ice; but he being suspected by Hannibal's adversaries, was glad to shift for himself, and notice thereof was presently given to the Romans. In the mean time Antiochus sent three Ambassadors to Rome, who under colour of procuring a right understanding, should feel how the Senate stood affected. They expoltulating the matter, that their Master should be forced to quit the Cities of Asia, and forfake his ancient right in Thrace, were referred to the Commissioners in Greece for answer; to whom repairing, Flaminium and his Collegue, urged that the King should either leave Europe, or the Romans have power to protect their friends in Asia, and make as many more there as they could. The Ambaffadors answer, they neither can, nor will conclude any thing to the prejudice of their Master's crown, and so the Peace was not nearer than before.

29. Antiochus his resolution being set therefore for the War, that he might pre- Livius lib. 35vent any thing that would divert or call him back, he refolved to make alliances Appian ibid. with his neighbours. To Ptolomy he married his Daughter Cleopatra (giving with Antischusin- her in portion all Cælefyria, which before he had taken from him;) to Ariarathes tending a War King of Cappadocia another named Antiochis; and a third he offered to Eumenes feeketh Conof Pergamus, but he being acquainted with his design to make War upon the Romans, and by this affinity to oblige him to his party, conceiving it also his interest A. Mag. Selga, being defirous first to bring all Asia to his beck, and at the same time came 32. Ambaffadors from Rome to discover his designs and preparations, and either to take Ptol. Epiphan. off the edge of Hannibals harred, or at least by their entercourse with him to render him suspected to the King. Visiting Eumenes sirst, as they had it in charge, they were egged on by him to the War. Sulpitius one of them falling sick, was forced to fray at Pergamus, but Villius hearing how Antiochus was employed, went to Ephesus where Hannibal then lay, and according to his instructions often met and discoursed with him. Thence he travelled to Apanea, where the King met him ; but news coming that Antiochus his Son (whom he had lately fent into Syria) was dead, it broke off the Treaty; so that Villius loath to be unseasonable returned to Pergamus, and the King breaking off the War, to Ephesis, where holding secret confultation with one Minio, he gave way that the Ambassadors should be called thither. When they had there arrived, they were referred to Minio, and both fides arguing for themselves as formerly, came to the same conclusion, and the Romans having scarcely obtained that they came for, returned home.

30. The Ambasiadors being departed, Antiochus then fell into another ferious Livius to Apdebate about the War, to which Hannibal being now suspected was not called, till plan at prints acquainting him how, when a Child, his Father had made him fwear at the Altar never to be a friend to the people of Rome, all jealousies were removed. Moreover Marcus Babius was commanded to draw down the Legions towards Tarentum and Brundusium, that thence, if need should be, they might pass over into Macedonia. But upon Antiochus his crossing the Hellesport, Eumenes King of Pergamus sent his Brother Attalus to acquaint the Senate therewith, and that the Arbitans were preparing to joyn with him; whereupon Bebius was then ordered, with all his Forces, to pass over into Epirus, and hover about Apollonia. The next year came over M. Acilius Glabrio the Conful, with ten thouland Eoot, two thouland Horse, and fifteen Elephants; who taking in divers places held by Antiochus his Garrisons, marched towards the Bay of Malea, took Thaumacha, and wasted the Territories of Hypata. Antiochus something herewith awakned, fent to the Ætolians to have all their Forces in readiness, and then came down with less then ten thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; but fewer of the Ætolians came together than usual, and his own Army, expected out of Asia, loitered, fo that wanting it, and forfaken of his Confederates, he fortified himfelf in the Straights of Thermopyle, and sent the Atolians (whereof there were but four thousand) to keep Heraclea and Hypata. Upon the approach of the Consul, bethinking himself of the Mountains, which he knew had been formerly passed by fome of Xerxes his Army, and fearing the Romans should come over upon his back he procured some Ætolians to secure the passages. But Glabrio hearing of it, sent M. Porcius Cato (then a Colonel in the Army) and L. Valerius Fluccus to beat them off, which being done by the former, he got over, and approaching the Enemies Camp, they at the first fight supposed them to be friends; but then again Overtunows understanding their error, cast away their Arms and fled. But being closely purfued five hundred of them only escaped, though but fifty of the Romans were at the Straights of Thermopyle.

32. Antiochus flying to Chaleis, passed thence with his new marryed wise unto Ephosus, after whose departure the Gates of Chaleis were presently opened to the Conful, who having taken in Phocis and Bxotia in his passage thither, all Eubxa pre-Authorized his fently returned to obedience. Then fell he upon the Ætolians, whom (though not long before they had fent to the King for aid, yet) now he forced to yield, and after he had used their Ambassadors something roughly, and threatned to chasand an extra the purpose; through the intercession of T. Flamininus, gave them liberty to send their Ambasiadors to Rome. Antiochus now lay at Eplejur altogether secure of the Romans; but Hannibal told him, he rather wondred they were nor there already, than doubted at all of their coming, and procured the Forces to be sent for out of the upper Provinces; and with those thips which were ready the King sayled into the Chersonesus of Thrace, fortifying it, and placed stronger

Garrisons in Sessus and Abydus, where the Romans were to pass over the Hellespone into Asia. At this time Livius Salinator being sent from Rome to succeed Attilius in the Government of the Fleet, came with it to Delus, which Antiochus hearing, hasted from Thrace to fight him before the Rhodes and Eumenes should joyn with He is defeated him; but they coming in in good time, his Fleet was worsted, and chased as

33. After this defeat he fet himfelf with all his might to repair his Navy, and Usimillo 37. left his Son Seleucus in Holis to look to the Maritime Coafts. Living the Roman Admiral coming into the Hellespont, took Sestius, and had done the same by Abjust, had not Polyxenidas a Fugitive of Rhodes, destroyed by Treachery all the Fleet belonging to that Illand; whereupon he raifed his fiege and departed. Seleucus fell upon the Territories of Pergamus, and then befieged the City it felf (Attalus being unable to graple with him in the field) with whom also at length Antiochus himself joyned, till hearing that the Roman and Rhodian Fleets were Anticeous finites: joyiecd, this nearing that the normal and account rices were coming to relieve the place; and, worse than this, that Lucius Scipio the Consist (together with his Brother the African) was already in his march as far as Maccedonia, and preparing now to pass the Hellesport against him, he sent to American the Registration of the calling Eumenes from Pergamus, and the Officers of the Rhodians to confult, these were content to Treat, but Eumenes being averse to it, and urging that nothing could be concluded of before the coming of the Conful, an aniwer to that effect was returned to the King, who leaving his Son fill before Pergamus, har rased the Territories of the Roman Confederates, and taking divers places, returned to Sardis. Seleucus was presently beaten off, and forced to raise his siege, by one thousand Foot, and one hundred Horse, sent to relieve the place by Hamibal wor. the Acheans, and Hannibal returning with ships from Syria, was met by the Rhodians, who put him to flight, and caused him to be blocked up in Pam-

Failing therefore in this Ptol. Epiphan. and an Ambanage tent from come for the lame purpose. Faning merciore in this enterprize, he went to Ephefas to his Navy, where (concluding that no other way could he hinder the Conful's paffing the Hellefornt than by being ftrongeft at Sea) he refolved to try another battel, and so set upon the Maritime Town near to Ephefas, that the Romans coming in to succour their friends, Polysenidas his Admiral might have an opportunity to work fome notable feat. But he engaging with ninety Gallies against Eumener and the Rhodians, who made up a Fleet together of about eighty three, being overmatched both in the valour of his men, And Polyami- and the nimbleness of his Vessels, he lost forty two of his Navy (thirteen of which, together with the men, were taken) having broken but two of the Romans, and by meer chance carryed a Rhodian away with him to Ephefus. The King now terrified at the meffage of this third overthrow, madly drew out his Garrison from Infinated at the interface of the control of the paffage of the Conful left it should be cut off; and raifing his fiege from before Colophonia, departed to Sardis, whence he sent into Cappadocia, to Ariarathes his Son-in-law, for aid, and all over else where he could be hink himself, he raifed Forces, neglecting in the mean time Atthebus his his true opportunities. for the Roman Army, and thence marched through the Chersonesus of Thrace to the Hellespont, where all things being in readiness through the care of Eumenes, they passed over without any disturbance into Asia.

Re fendeth to 35. Antiochus being so besotted as to lye still, and suffer the Conful quietly to come the Confail over, was now exceedingly discouraged, and sent out of hand to him, and his Brother, to treat of peace; with order also to deal in private with the African about it, whose authority he knew would sway his Brother to either side indifferently. The Ambassador being arrived at the Roman Camp, deferred the delivering of his message till the African's coming, who was yet behind; but after his arrival, and audience given, had these conditions set him: To pay all the expences of the War, of which Antiochus had leen the cause, and not only quit the Cities in Holis and Ionia but all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus. Being no whit satisfied with the proposals, he made no further overtures to the Conful; but, according to his instructions, offered to his Brother (in case he would procure a peace on the terms proposed by his Master) the restitution of his Son who had been taken Prisoner. as much Money as he would ask, and more than that, to be partaker of what the Kingdom it self would amount to. The African answered, that the discharging of his Son would exceedingly oblige him, and as for the rest, had he kept Lysimachia in his hands, fortified the passage into the Chersonesus of Thrace; or at least had he opposed them at the Hellespont, and then offered these conditions, much might have been done for him. As things now stood, he advised to consider into what estate he had brought himself, by all means to decline the War, and refuse no conditions offered to him. But he thought no harsher terms could be imposed upon Rejecting the one already Conquered, and therefore casting offall thoughts of peace, made what Provision he could possible for a battel.

The Conful being desirous to do something before Winter (which now drew He prepareth on refolved, if possible, to fight him, though, his Brother the African falling fick, had departed to Elea, to whom Antiochus now to comfort him, restored his Son without any ransom; which hapning as a Cordial to him in that condition, he advised him in way of requital (being able to do no more at present) that he should not ingage in fight with his Brother, before his return to the Camp. Being much moved with his authority, he declined an ingagement to his utmost endeavour, but the Conful still degging him from place to place, and being ready to storm his Camp, for fear of utterly difcouraging his men, he was forced to draw them out:

(a) Some fay he had feventy thousand Foot, and about twelve thousand Horse, (a) Livin at (though others (b) mention but seventy thousand in all) with fifty four Elephants. have The Conful brought into the field but thirty thousand, whereof two, being Mace () Mining donium, were left to keep the baggage; and fixteen African beafts placed in the rear for a referve, left (being worfted by the Indians) they should break their ranks. The battel was fought near Magnesia a Town situate at the foot of the Hill Sipplus. It hapned then that fuch a mist fell as blinded so the Kings Army, that both the wings thereof could not be seen to one standing still in the same place; and their weapons were also spoiled with the wet. His Chariots armed with fithes which he had placed in the front, proved his ruin for the Horses being gored with arrows (according to the direction of Eumenes) brake down all behind them, and so disordered the ranks, that the Avxiliaries fled; which occasion the Romans taking, pressed hard upwards, and discomsited the whole lest wing. In the right he had better fortune; for he put both Horse and Foot to flight, and drove them to their Camp; but M. Æmilius Lepidus who was left there for the security of it, met them, and forced them to face about and to charge the pursuing Enemy, so that he and Attalus (the Brother of Eumenes, who came in in good time with two hundred Horse) renewed the battel with fuch carneftness, that now the King (who ere while gave the wherein he charge) betook himself to his heels. The Roman Cavalrie, in the pursue, did is overthrown, great execution, and the rather, because of the multitude of Chariots, and Camels, which blocked up the way; infomuch as fifty four thousand were flain, and one thousand four hundred taken. Antiochus, with a few about him, fled to Sardis, and thence to Apamea, making Zeno Governour of the former, and Timon of Lydia; but they were defpifed by the Soldiers and Townsmen that held the Castle, who gave up the places to the Conful; which was followed as an example by divers Cities of Affa. The Conful being once arrived at Sardis (with his Brother now upon his recovery) the King presently sent and defired safe conduct for some Commissioners to treat of Peace. This being granted, Zeuxis who had formerly governed Lydia, and Antipater the Kings Brothers Son, shortly after arrived, desiring their Master might know upon what terms to purchase the friendship of the People of Rome. Publius Scipio the African, in the name of the rest, answered, that the Romans used not to insult over their conquered Enemies, and therefore nothing should be required of him Living of more than formerly; save only to pay sifteen thousand Talents of Eubea to definy the sim at princharges of the War, by certain portions; four hundred to Eumenes (together with such vely time. This man being Captain of the Temple, and in contention with Onias the High Priest, when he could not have the better of him, told Apollonius Governor of Cælesjria and Phænicia, that in the treasury there were great sums of money, which the Priests having no need of, it might well enough be taken out into the Kings Coffers. Apollonius acquainting the King with this, he fent Heliodorus his

Treasurer to seize upon the money, to whom Onics declared that it belonged to widows and orphans, that the fum of it amounted but to fourhundred talents of Silver, and two hundred of Gold, and that such was the holiness of the place, that it must not be violated. Heliodorus not being perswaded by this, entered the Temple, and was smitten by an Angel dead for the present, but being restored by the prayers of Onias, returned to the King, declaring the holiness of the place, and power of God. Simon after this calumniated Onias, as if he, who had well deferved of his Nation, had been the cause of this evil, and being backed by Apollonius, in his fury proceeded to flaughters, so that Onias was forced to go to Selencus, and, as some have it, got him banished, though it seems not incredible that the King was dead ere he came to him, being flain by the treachery of Heliodorus after he had reigned

But when he dyed Antiochus was in his way home come as far as Athens. Eumenes therefore and Attalus, that they might bind him to them, being now a little offended at, and jealous of the Romans, drove out Heliodorus, Apian in Sp. who affected the Kingdom, and placed him in possession of it. Being possessed of the Kingdom, he would slip privately out, with two other in his company, and wander abour the City, keep company and drink with the meanest persons, coming on a sudden upon them with his cup and musick. Laying off his robe he put on a gown, and according to the custome of the Roman Candidates (who stood for Offices) took the people by the hand, desiring their voices for the Hedileship or Tribuneship of the people. In Syria he was not acknowledged at first by those who savoured Ptolomy; Hittonyon In but afterwards obtained it by a counterfeit elemency, and then having entered into Dam. cap. 11. In the beginning of his applies reign Justin the brother of Onias the third, the High-priest of the Jews, purchased the Priesthood of him for three hundred fixty Talents of Silver, and another rent of eighty Talents; and not facisfying himfelf with wronging his brother, promited one hundred and fifty more for a Licence to fet up in Jerusalem a place of exer- 2 Mattable. cife for the training up of youth after the fashion of the Heathen, whereby an inlet was made, as unto idolatry, and prophaneness, so unto that bloodshed and cruelty which enfued from the wickedness of this Prince, his instruments and successors. For three years only kept he this Office, being then ferved in his own kind. For, fending Menclaus the brother of that Simon whom we before mentioned, to the King, to carry the money promised, and follicit his affairs, he circumvented him after the same manner he had done his brother, promising for the Priesthood, over and above what he payed, three hundred Talents; so that he had his defire, and Jason was forced to flie into the Country of the Ammonites. Antioclus being seized of Cælesyria, Ptolomy Philopater, who pretended it belonged to him being passed over to his father as his mothers portion, fought to recover it out of his hands, whereupon he marched down to Egypt, which, having overthrown his Enemies in Matiachus seiz- battel betwixt Pelusum and the mountain Casius, he easily got into his power, preethon of gipt tending friendship to the young King for all this, and a provident care for his affairs. Menelans taking occasion at his absence, took divers Golden Vessels out of the Temple at Jerusalem, some of which he gave away, and othershe sold to Tyre, and other places, for which being accused of Sacrilege by Onias the lawful-Highprieft, he procured him to be murdered. Going on in such mischiefs he was accufed to the King; but bribing Piolomy the fon of Dorymenes, got off, and procured the death of his accusers. At this time Antiochus went down the second time with a great power into Egypt, which he rocovered again (the King thereof flying be- 2 Mattab 5. fore him) and getting the fortified Towns into his hands, there staied, till the sons of the Jews procured his return to their destruction.

42. A falle rumour being spread abroad of his death, Jason having got one thousand men at his heels, set upon Jerusalem, and getting the City into his hands, forced Menelans into the Castle, and then made slaughters, as if he had not been amongst his Countrymen and kindred, but foreigners and Enemies, yet obtained he not the Pricfthood, but was forced to betake himfelf back into the Country of the Ammonites, where being accused to Aretas King of the Arabians, he fied from place to place like a Vagabond, hated of all men as a forfaker of the Laws, and Country men as the publick Enemy of his Country, and died at length at Lacedemon. Antiochus hearing in Higpst that they at Hierufalem rejoyced at the report of his death, and fifteefting becaute of their Giris of Jafon, that Judea was about to rebed, in a great earliest and rage departed thence, and came and took the City by force, and giving no quatter for three days space, put eighty thousand to the Sword, and afterwards fold as ma-

Yet not contenting himself with this, he prophanely entered the Temple Menelaus that Traitor to his Country being his guide, and rifling it of the holy Veffels, killed fwine upon the Altar, and with the broath of the flesh of them sprinkled the place; then taking away with him one thousand eight hundred Talents, he Joseph. Philip a Phrysian, and Andronicus in Samaria; and besides them Menelaus more grievous to, and despightful against, his fellow Citizens, than the other. Two years also after this, he sent Apollonius a cruel man with an Army of twenty two thoufand, commanding him to kill all that were arrived at ripeness of age, and sell the women and children for flaves. He coming to jerufalem, kept himfelf still until the Sabbath, and then taking the opportunity of the folemnity of the day, fee upon those imployed therein, then running through the City slew a great multitude, plundering and fetting it on fire, pulled down the houses and walls round about, and led away many women and children into captivity, whilst Antiochus his Master was busie again in his attempts upon Ægypt.

43. For Ptolomy being stirred up by Hillains the Eumech to attempt again the Except. Diodorecovery of Calefyria, to prevent that, he went down into Ægypt, where putting riva Val. him again to flight, he might have destroyed all his men, but riding to and fro himfelf to forbid it, he thereby procured fuch love, as he prefently got into his hands He gruth all Peleufum, and not long after all Egypt, except Alexandria. Prelomy after this fent with the his Ambaffactors to him, with those of the Acheans, Albenians, and others, to excuse the matter, and lay all the blame upon the Eunuch; but getting no good thereby, after he had spent some time carelesly without any further provision for his affaires, he departed to his younger brother to Alexandria, whom the Citizens there 71811 111.24. had made King after his overthrow. The Alexandrians at first received him, and Polybius Ligat. made him partaker with his brother, but afterwards for some distaste banished him Livius 1. 14, again, at which Antiochus took an opportunity, as thinking it best to accomplish & 45. his defigns, by pretending to protect and reduce him into his Kingdom; wherefore he engaged at Peleusum with Ptolomy the younger in a naval fight, and getting the better, on a fudain laid a bridge over the Nile and belieged Alexandria. Presently after this, leaving at Memphis Ptolomy the elder, for whose sake he pretended to wage this War, and giving up the rest of Egypt to him, he only lest a strong Garrison at Pelusium, and so departed into Syria, concluding with himself, that keeping this in his power, the key of the Country, he might fafely fuffer the two brothers to try out the quarrel; for the Conqueror being wearied beforehand, would eafily be brought under by him.

44. The Ambassadors of Ptolomy obtained their desire, the Romans being jealous 14m ibid. of the increasing power of Antiochus. For, C. Popillius Lanas, with two others, 899. were fent with order first to go to Antiochus, after that to Ptolomy, and to denounce unto them, that except they gave over the War, him that was the hinderer of the Peace they would not account as their friend or allie. Whilst they were on their way, Ptolomy the elder bethinking himself what little cause he had to trust Antiochus, fent to his brother, and through the mediation of Cleopatra was reconciled to him, and reigned with him, the Alexandrians being willing to receive him, because their City was much straightened for provisions by reason of the Warr. Antiocline hearing this, contrary to his former pretences, was grievously fretted, and then more eagerly than ever preparing for the War against them both sent a Fleet against Cyprus, where Ptolomie's Forces were worsted, and in the beginning of Spring marched down for Ægypt. In Calefyria the Ambassadors of Philometer met him, and gave him thanks in their Masters name, for that by his means he had obtained the Kingdom, defiring he would continue his friend, and protect what he had helped him to, and rather fay what he would have done, than by force to attempt it as an Enemy; but he replied, he would neither withdraw his Fleet nor Army, except he had all Cyprus, Pelulum, and all the ground lying upon that Mouth of the Nile given up unto him, and he fet a day whereon at furthest he would have an answer to these conditions. Popillins and his companions hearing of his delign (Perseus of Macedoma being now overthrown) made haste to get to him before he reached Alexandria, and staying some time at Rhodes, they came to him, when he was but four milesoff from the City, upon the fight of whom he reached out his hand to Popilius; but tivins ibid. he being a fevere man, reached him the Tables, wherein was written the Decree of Polyb. Into Judea he sent an old man of Athens, with order to defile the Temple, and name it the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, as that at Gerizam the Temple of Jupiter Hospitalis; he commanded the sacrifices to be left off, the Sabbath he prohibited, he commanded them to defile the Sanctuary, built up Altars, Groves, and Chappels to Idols, to Sacrifice Swine, and other unclean beafts, not to Circumcise their sons, but to forget the Law: Moreover, an order was sent to the Neighbouring Cities, that they should force the Jews to partake of their facrifices, and kill those which would not come over to their Rites, so that many by sear obeyed, the Temple was polluted by the dalliances of the Gentiles, the abomination of defolation, viz. the abominable Idol of Jupitur Olympius was fet up therein, the Scriptures burnt, and a Decree published, that with whomsoever they should be found, or whosoever should approve them, should be put to death. Many yet were they that stood out, contemned the Kings Edict, and defiled not themselves, so that being inraged he caused divers to be brought before him to force them by Torments, but they stood our couragiously, and enduring the pains sealed the truth with their blood; amongst whom are very notable the Mother and her seven Sons, from the eldest of them called Maccabeans. The rage of this perfecution coming 1 Maccab a to Modin, a Town fituate near to Diospolis found some opposition; for there Mattathias a Priest eminent in degree, especially for his five Sons, not onely refused to facrifice, but killed a Jew at the Altar that was so doing, and after that the Kings Officer who was fent to compel the people. Mattathias, and they that were with him hearing this, resolved for the time to come to repulse the Enemy on the Sabbath, and then the Asideans, a fort of religiousmen joyning with him, with fuch as dayly fled out of the Country, he made up a little Army, and therewith profecuted the wicked ones, and drove them to fly to the Nations about, pulled down the Altars, and Circumcifed fuch Children as they found in the Coasts of Israel; then after he had been Captain of this wandring Company the space of a year, he died, leaving his son Simon for a Counsellor, and Judas sirnamed Maccabaus for a Captain to them. Judas being affilted by his brethren, and his Fathers followers, fell upon the Enemy, burnt divers of their Towns, and feized upon the Commodious places, coming usually upon them in the night, so as he forced many of them to quit the Land; Apollonius the Governour of Samaria coming against him, he overthrew, and slew him, and getting his Sword, ever after used it in the Wars, and after him he overthrew also Seron, who governed Cale-Syria. These things being executed, provoked one Leptinus so far as he slew Cn. Octavius the chief Commillioner (and who first brought the Consulship into his family, out of which Augustus Cafar iffued) whom Lysias, though he was sufspected to incense the People against the Romans, honourably buried, and dispatched quickly Ambassadors to Rome in the Kings name to disclaim any consciousness to 52. Against those therefore, Judas Maccabeus marched, took divers places, and put twenty thousand to the Sword, after which turning upon the Ammonites, he overthrew them in divers ingagements, and taking Jazer with the Territories thereto belonging returned again into Judea. Timotheus the General of the Ammonites herear integrated, and gathering inany men out of Afis, menteth a came as if he would devour fudeas but fudes with his having humbled themselves, war with the and called upon the name of God, gave him battel, in which twenty thousand five hundred Foot, and six hundred of his Horse being slain, he seed to Guzzara, a strong Garrison kept by his brother, but that being taken he was pulled out of a Cave where he had hid himself, and slain, together with the other. After this the Nations about Galaad and Galile afflicting fore the Jews, Maccabeus divided his Army into three parts, one of which (viz. threethousandmen) he delivered to his bro- 1 Mattab 5. ther Simon to relieve them of Galile, the second to Joseph the Son of Zechariah, to defend Judea, giving it in charge not to fight with any Enemy till his return, with the other he marched himself to the succour of them in Galaad. Simon fought men into Judga with great gladness, and Judge had the like success, taking many Towns, and putting many thousands to the Sword; but those that were left at home defiring also upon the report hereof to atchieve some military glory, marched to Jamia, whence Gorgias issuing out, put them to flight, and following the chase as far as the borders of Judea, killed about two thousand of them.

53. Lysias the King's Protector and chief Minister of State, was displeased at the report of Juda's fucces, and taking eighty thousand Foot with all the Horse along 2 Maccas it. with him, resolved to make Jerusalem an habitation for the Greeks, the Temple to pay tribute, and the Priefthood thereof to fet to fale every year. He came and befieged Bethfura nigh to Jerufalem; but Maccabaus then meeting with him killed eleven thousand of his Foot, with one thousand fix hundred Horse-men, and for-

Confidering this defeat, and that God fought for the Jews, he fent to them to treat of Peace, and according to his promife brought the King to yield to fuch reasonable conditions as were offered by Maccabeus; but it was quickly broken by Timotheus, and other Captains, that governed the places adjoyning to fudea, at which time they of Joppe also drawing two hundred Jews craftily on shipboard, drowned them in the Sea. Judas hearing this, went and burned all the Vessels in the Haven at Joppe, and understanding that the inhabitants of Jamnia had also intended fuch a thing against his Country-men, he did as much for them; then And the SO: marching against Timotheus, the Arabian Nomades set upon him, being sive thousand this Nomades. a promise of giving up their Cattel, and being at his beck for the time to come, they obtained Peace. After this he stormed the City Caspis (wherein was such a flaughter made of the Inhabitants, that a Lake thereto adjoyning feemed to be full of blood) and then proceeding seven hundred and fifty Furlongs came to the Jens called Tubieni inhabiting the Land of Tob (concerning which mention is made in the Book of Judges) whence Timotheus was departed, but had left a strong chap in Garrison, which being taken by Dositheus and Sosipater two of Judas his Officers, they put to the sword above ten thousand men.

54. Timotheus gathered together from the Nations round about him and the Arabians a hundred and twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand five hundred Horse, where I Maccale s. with, putting up the women and children into a strong Fort called Carnion, he 2 Maccal- 122 came and pitched his Tents against Raphon beyond the brook; but his great multitude was fo furprized with fear upon the approaching of Judas, that every man shifted for himself, and what by their running upon one anothers Swords, and the pursute which Maccabeus followed on with much earnestness, thirty thousand of Asallo Time them were flain, and he himself fell into the hands of Dositheus and Sosipater, from whom he obtained his liberty, upon promife of dismissing such of their Countrymen as he had taken. Judas then proceeding took Carnion, wherein twenty five thousand were put to the Sword, after which he gathered all the Jews out of Gas land to bring them into Judea, and for that the City Ephron, through which they must needs pass, denyed them entrance, they took it by force, and destroying the Inhabitants, went through and came up to ferufalem to the Feast of Penteogle. After the Victory the Jews coming to ftrip and bury fuch of their own party as had faln that day, found under their coats certain things dedicated to the idols of Jamnia, so that it appearing that this being forbidden them by the Law was the cause of their death, they betook themselves by Prayer to God, intreating that it might not be charged upon them The Edomites all. After this Judies Subdued the Edomites, and the Philistines, their idols he burnt, and philippines and overthrew their altars, and then returning into Judea, for that he found the Kings Garrison Souldiers which yet kept the Castle to straighten and infest the Israelites about the Sanctuary, with all the People, he belieged them close, but some of them with certain Jewish fugitives getting out, went straight to Antiochus, and 1 Maccab. 6. perswaded him with all expedition to come and give a check to the growing power of the Tews.

Then returned he to the fiege, which Judas fore molefted, cutting off taken, hebe many of his men, and relieving the befieged with provisions, who being not provided within themselves, because this was the Sabbatical year, yielded up the Town upon composition. Antiochus having herein placed a Garrison marched up to 7erusalem, and there made all provision possible for gaining it, all manner of engines being raifed for the casting of fire and stones; which the besieged resisted as well as they might by others of their own, but as for provisions, were in no better condition than they of Bethfura had been, which gave opportunity enough to the Kings but before he could perfect his work, came newsthat Philip, whom his Father had ordained to be his guardian, being returned out of Egypt, was coming with the Forces which Epiphanes had left in Persia and Media to recover his right usurped by Lysias. Confulting with Polybius the Achean and Historian, whether he should not once more move the Senate in the bufiness, he advited him not to dash himself twice Polyhiss Leagainst the same Rock, but attempt something of himself worthy of a Kingdom, en 114 hinting thereby what he would have him to do. But he being ruled by one Apollo 1 Micros 14 nius his intimate friend, but a young unexperienced man, requested the Fathers again, that at least he might not be constrained to stay there as an Hostage, seeing they had secured the Kingdom of his Cousin Antiochus. They yet remained in the fame opinion, and resolved as formerly, so that then he consulted how to escape, first with Diodorus a cunning man, who was come from Syria, and had belonged to him, and then with Polybius, who procured Menethyllus the Ægiptian Ambasfador to hire a Carthaginian ship just then failing for Tyre; so that Diodorus being sent before to feel the Peoples mind, and seek for advantages, he taking a few friends along with him supped at a friends house, whither, for fear he should stay too long, Polybius fent him a secret hint, not to let slip this opportunity; whereupon making as though he was fick, he arose from the table, and came that night.

After the return of Menocharis and his report, thinking it his main interest to obliege these men, he cast off all other things, and labouring to please them, sent first to them into Pamphylia, then to Rhodes, of fering to do any thing whereby to purchase his being acknowledged King by the Romans, and Tiberius one of the Commissioners stood him in great stead for the obtaining of this his defire. He shortly after sent Menocharic, and others in Ambas-

59. Alcimus, who had procured from Empator to be made high-Prieft, and now Maccab 7. was not received nor owned by the people, because that in the days of Epiphanes t Mac. 14he had defiled himself, came to Demetrius with other Apostates, and such like as himself, and accused his Country-men, especially the Hasmoneans (i.e. Judas and his brethren) that they had cut off, and banished his friends; whereupon he sent method for one Bachides a truly friend with great Forces into Judea, confirming the Prieft-bylinagaint hood to Aleimun, whom he sent back with him. All their design, being arrived there, was to get Judas into their hands; divers Scribes going out to them to follicit for peace, being confident because the Priest was of the seed of Auron, he most wickedly, and contrary to his Oath given, flew fixty of them in one day; then Bachides going from Hierusalem, sent about, and caused divers that had fled from him, and many of the people whom being flain he cast into a great pit, and so committing the Country to Alcimus (to the desence of which he left him some Forces) he returned unto his King. After his departure, Alcimus striving to confirm himfelf in the Priefthood, made great havock of the people to reftrain which Judas went throughout the Country, and compelled his party to thut themselves up within their holds, and growing stronger, he restrained their invasions, so that Alcimus being afraid of him goes once more unto the King, carrying along with him a Crown of Gold, a Palm, and of the boughs which were used solemnly in the Temple; and feeing he could not have any more access to the Holy Altar, taking a fit opportunity when he was asked of the affairs of his Country, accused the A sideans, and especially Judas, as seditious, of depriving him of the Priesthood (the honour as he faid of his Ancestors) and plainly affirmed that as long as Maccabana lived, the Kings affairs could not be secure. This being seconded by some ill-willers to the Jews, Demetrius was inflamed, and fending for Nicanor one of his chiefwho accusing est Princes, and a litter Enemy to the If deliter, made him Captain over Judea, and Judea, fent him forth with a Command to flay Judea, to scatter them that were with him, Juds: fent him forth with a Command to flay Juds: to scatt signal him. and make Alcimus High-Priest of the great Temples

When he was come thither, and understood the courage and resolution of Judas, his brethren and companions, for the defence of their Country, he feared to try the chance of War, and fent to make peace with the people, who having agreed unto the Covenants, the two Captains came together to confult about the League. Nicanor was so taken with Judas that he continued with him, loved him in his heart, and perswaded him to marry, and beget Children; and so remained constant

Niteres at first in his affection to him, till Alcimus perceiving it, and understanding the Covenants much loveth which were made betwixt them, took a third journey to the King, told him that Metashem. Nicanor had taken strange matters in hand, and appointed Judas, a Traitor to the Realm, to be his Succeffor. Demetrius being hereat displeased, by Letters checked him for these things, and commanded him in all hast to send Maccabetts bound in Chains unto Antioch, which grievously troubled him, that he, who had done no hurt, should be thus used, but conceiving it necessary for him to comply with the pleasure of the King, he waited for a convenient opportunity to accomplish it. Beplained of by having himself thenceforth more roughly to him, the other suspected something by the great change of his demeanour, and therefore gathering a few of his men, withdrew himself from him, but he followed him with a strong power to Hierufalem, and drawing him out totalk with him, had prepared some to seize on him; yet he having notice hereof got away, and would fee him no more. Seeing his defign to be discovered, he went and fought with him near Capharsalama, in which he lost about five thousand of his men, and the rest sled into the City of David. After this he came up to Mount Sion, and some of the Priests with the Elders of the people went forth of the Sanctuary to falute him peaceably, and flew him the burnt-offering that was offered for the King; but he jearing hereat, demanded Judas to be delivered unto him, and they affirming with an Oath that they knew not where he was, he stretching out his hand against the Temple, swore that except Judas and his Forces were delivered up, he would when he should return in peace, fet the fanctuary on fire, demolish the Altar, and build there a stately Temple to Bacchus. The Priests hearing this, went in, and standing before the Altar, with tears begged of God that he would frustrate the mans intentions, and be avenged

After Nicanor's death, Judea was quiet for some 1 Maccab. 8. time, and then Judas hearing of the power of the Romans, and their compassion 69. of the diffressed, and how much Demetrius stood in awe of them, sent Eupolemus the fon of John, and Jason the son of Eleazer on an Ambassage to the Senate, that entring into fociety with them, the people might be freed from the yoak of Deme-Reclides and trius and the Greeks. But Demetrius hearing of the milchance of Nicanor and his scheme forces, fent Bachides and Alcimus again into Judea with the greater part of his guint Judea. Forces, who coming to Jerusalem to feek for Judea, marched therice with twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse against him, who had but three thousand men in all. With these few he setting upon Bachides, all of them forsook him but eight hundred, with which yet he to charged him, as fighting from morning till night, he put to flight the right wing in which he flood, but they of the left perceiving this, followed him behind as he gave the charge, and compaffing him in, flew him, all his men then shifting for themselves. This happed A.M. 3844. of the Greeks or Seleucide the 152 in the second of Demetrius Soier, and after he led the People, from his Fathers death, fix years chace flew thirty thousand, so that not one of the Army was left remaining. Coming to the plunder of the field they cut off Nicanor's head and hands, and carryed sembled themselves together, and chose Jonathan (Sirnamed Apphus) their Captain in the room of Judas his brother, which Bachides hearing fought to kill him, but he understanding thereof, fled into the Desert Thecoa, having sent his brother John (Sirnamed Gaddis) with a party to the Nabathaan Arabs, to defire they might leave their baggage amongst them. He going down with it, was met in the way by the children of Jambri from Medaba, who killing him and those with him, seized upon the prey; but no great joy had they of their booty; for Jonathan and his brother Simon hearing that they were about to make a great marriage, and bring the bride from Medaba with great pomp, being the Daughter of one of the noblest Princes of Canaan, they went, and hiding themselves under the covert of the Mountain, when the Bridegroom and his friends came forth with Timbrels and instruments of A. Bachides would not adventure to follow, but returning to Jerusalem, built up the strong Forts throughout the Land, and placed therein strong Garrisons, that thence making excursions, he might endamage the Jews. He fortified the Cities Bethfura and Gazara, with the Castle at Jerusalem, where he placed Souldiers with provisions, and taking the fons of the chief of the Country for Hoftages, he secured them in the 63. The Ambaffadors fent by Maccabeus to the Romans were well received, and 1 Miccab 8. entered into a League and fociety with the Romans, which being written in Tables that they might the more commodiously get bread, and he made such wicked perfons Governors, as bringing to him the friendsof Judas, he mocked them, and revenged himself upon them. But such of them as remained, and could do it, as-of brass, contained an ingagement mutually to succour and relieve each other. The Senate also wrote to Demetrias, charging him no more to hurt or indamage the Sorbidden by Jews, being their confederates, under pain of being prosecuted with War both at Land and Sea. Not long after Alcimus the High-prieft commanded the wall in the Temple, which severed the Court of the People from that of the Gentiles, to be pulled down, which had been built by Zorobabel, and the Prophets, whose monu- 1 Maccab 9 ments he began to pull down and destroy; but at the same time he was so smitten that he could not open his mouth, being taken with a Pallie, so as he could not speak nor give order concerning his house, and died with great torment. When Bachides faw that he was dead, he returned unto the King. Two years then did the Land continue quiet, but at the end thereof, certain wicked persons sent for Bachides to return, telling him he might easily apprehend Jonathan and all his company in one night, at which message he arose with great hast, and sent Letters privily to his adherents to take them, but they having notice of it, took fifty of thefe men, which had been the greatest sticklers, and slew them. Then Jonathan departing into the Wilderness, built up the walls of Bethhusin, and fortified it, which Bachides having notice of went down thither, and closely belieged it; but such was his entertainment from the befreged (who getting out killed his men, and burnt his engines,) that having lain before the place a long time to no purpole, and feeing his journey to be frustrate, he eased his stomack against those that had been the cause of his Expedition, and putting to death many of them, resolved to retreat into his own Country. Jonathan having notice of this, fent to him to treat of Peace, and exchange the prisoners, which he gladly accepted of, and made an oath never more to disturb him. Returning then home he never brake it; fo that the War being removed, Jonathan dwelt at Machmas (or Michmash) in the Tribe of Benjamin, began to govern the People, and destroy the ungodly out of Ijrael.

O-Origination or opplement afterwards refolving to venture for it, came to Demetrius, complaining he was injuriously deprived of the Kingdom by his younger brother, and craved his general capts affiltance for the recovery of it. He being offended at Ariarathes for the refuling dots by the the marriage of his fifter the widdow of Perfene, bargained with Original Complements for the resulting desirable and the marriage of the fifter the widdow of Perfene, bargained with Original Complements for the refulling desirable complements for the refulling desirable complements. one thousand Talents, and expelled Ariarathes from Cappadocia, though he was helped by Eumenes King of Pergamus. Orophernes having thus invaded the Kingdom, behaved himfelf not like one who intended to fecure it to himfelf in the love of his People, but raiging againft them with pillages and flaughters, and corrupting himfelf with the luxuire of Ionia (where he had been brought up) pulled upon him the harred of all his Subjects, which he perceiving, made only as an occa-fion further to profecute his wicked and unfeatonable defigns. Arimathe went straight to Rome to crave aid; and the Ambassador both of Demetrine and theother, followed to excuse what was done, and recriminate him, which those of Orophernes performed to dexteroully, that no body being prefent that could confute their lies, they seemed to gain credit, and Ariarathes because he had been the confederate of the Romans, was ordered to reign together with his brother. This was Artaphrauthe all he got at Rome; but shortly after Attalns the brother and Successor of Eumenes expelled Orophernes and Demetrius quite out of Cappadocia, and restored him to the entire possession of his Kingdom.

65. Not long after, Demetrius calting in his head how to inlarge his Dominious, Exemp.Psp. offered Archius, the Governour of Cyprus for Philometer, five hundred his to Pale Talents to betray the Island into his hands; which the man consented to, but being difcovered and fentenced, prevented the execution by hanging himself. Being thus frustrated in this design, he thencesorth giving himself up to idlenes, having built a Castle fortisted with four Towers not far from antioch, wherein he passeth away the time without any any attendance of State affaires, out of the fight of his Subjects. Hereby he contracted fuch hatred, that the Antiochians revolted from him, and made choice of Oraphernes, then living in exile at his Court, who so badly requited him for his former kindness, as to conspire with them to rob him of his Kingdom and life. He getting knowledg of this, thated his life, left he should free Ariarathes from the sear of a competitor, and taused him to be kept securely at Selencia; but the Antiochians not at all terrified from their attempt; went on in their Rebellion, to which Attalus of Afia, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Prolong lending their helinborned by ping hand, they suborned a young man of the basest condition (by one (a) called (a) Julia like testa runs parameter a young man constitution (by one (a) canca (a) joine in ces for the fon Prompalus, by others (b) Balas, and (c) Balles giving him the name of Alexander, of Epiphanes, and reporting him to be fon of Antiochus Bojphunes, to recover as it were his Fa. 16. thers Kingdom by force. This youth, together with Landice Antiochus his daugh (c) Juphu ter, did (d) Heraclides (whom Demetrim cast out, as we said, of the Office of Treafurer at Babylon) carry to Rome, where he brought him into the Senate, and caused Light 140. him to defire that he might be helped in the recovery of the Kingdom, at least that he might not be hindered in his endeavour that way; then he seconding him inveighed against Demetrius, and heaped up the praises and merits of Antiochus to far, as though to all fober minded men his impudence was distasteful as well as his person, yet he so bewitched the generality of the Fathers, that a Decree was made, whereby power was given to them to return, and aid ordered them for the recovery of the Kingdom (being the children of their late friend and allie) as they had required.

66. Heraclides having obtained this act of the Scinate, prefently hired Souldiers, 1 March 10 and getting many eminent men to joyn with him, went to Ephelia, where he made all possible preparation for the War. Demetrius then according to his right obteined his Father's Kingdom, and Applinin Sysfor that he had subdued this counterfeitor of his Family had (the next after Selencus Haid, the founder of the Race) the sirname of Nicanor or Nicator. About this time Jo-Europ. After this, feeing his Realm to be quiet on every fide, Demetrius disbanded all his old Soldiers, retaining onely some Cretians and other Iflanders, which so inraged them, being wont by the former Kings to be kept in pay, as an incouragement to them for the future service, that they thenceforth became his Enemies, and shewed it upon occasion which he also himself presented them being wholly ruled by one Lasthenes, who had helped him in the recovery of the Kingdom. By this man's advice, thinking himfelf fecure enough of his estate, he cruelly raged against such as had been against him, and plunged himself into bad courses; which (together with the alienation of the minds of the Soldiers) one Diodotus an Apamean, and one of Alexander Balas his Captains, confidering, went to Elmalchueles the Arabian, with whom Antiochus the young fon of that Alexander by trius by Dio- Cleopatra was brought up, and acquainting him how things stood, at length obtained to have the boy delivered to him, to be restored to his Fathers Kingdom. out of Arabia into Syria, and there crowned him, giving him the firname of These. Hereupon all the disbanded Soldiers came over to him, fo that Tryphon made open War against Demetrius, and overthrowing him in battel forced him to flie to Selencia. Then sent Antiochus to Jonathan mellengers with presents, and great prominanties, to draw him to his party, which he casily did, because Demetrius had fallified or a his word, and proved very ingrateful towards him, who now therefore gathering his mentogether, reduced the Country beyond Jordan as far as Damascus, and overthrew a party which there met him, killing to the number of three thousand men, after which he fent an Ambaflage to the Romans, to renew the alliance made with 1 Maccab. 12. them by Judas. He resolved to seize upon the Kingdom himself; but

Thither came Jonathan down with forty thousand men to meet him, who entertained him with exceeding great respect, and advised him to dismiss all his Army, and with a few go along with him to Ptolemais, which he promifed to put into his hands. He confenting to this, fent all his men back but one thousand, which taking along with him, upon their entrance into the Town they were all cut off, he himfelf being kept prisoner. Then Tryphon invaded Judea with a great Army, which to oppose, Simon the brother of Jonathan was chosen General in his stead by the People; so that he seeing the Jews prepared for refistance, feigned as if Jonathan was onely detained for one. hundred Talents of Silver which he was in arrear, which if they were fent, together with his two tons for Hostages, he promised he should be released. the borders of Judea, or else to pay five hundred Talents for the Cities, and the harm he had done, and for the Tributes of the places other five hundred, upon pain of being profecuted with War. To these things Simon answered, that he held no Towns belonging to any other, but had recovered his own by right of War; but as for Joppe and Gazara which had done great harm to his people, he offered to pay him one hundred Talents, at which the King was to displeased, that following at that conditions fent time Tryphon to Orthofias, he left Cendebaus to overfee the Sea-Coasts, with order to build up Cedron, whence he might make war upon the Jews. He coming to Jammia made inroads upon Judga, and built up that Town according to order. which John the Son of Simon then lying at Gazara understanding, gave notice John the for thereof to his Father, who now being decrepit, committed the War to him and his Brother Judas. He taking with him twenty thousand Foot, and a party of Horse, marched straight down against Cendebeus, and then placing his Horse in the midst of the Foot, that it might protect, and be protected against the Cavalry of the Enemy, which was exceeding strong, he overthrew him, and putting the whole Army to the rout, some betook themselves into the Fort newly built, and others flying away, he purfued them as far as the Towers of Azotus, which having fet on fire, and flain

two thousand men, he retreated safe into Judea.

74. This fuccess of John sufficiently moved Antiochus to punish Simon, but it was done to his hand by one who of all others might least have done it. There was one Ptolomy the Scn of Abubus, Son-in-law to Simon, and by him fet over the Province of Jericho. He entertaining his Father-in-law as he went his Circuit about the Countrey, to take care for the Government thereof, flew him treacheroufly after a feast, together with his two sons Mattathias and Judas, when he had governed the people eight years. His defign was, being rich, to obtain the Principality of that Countrey where he lived, and therefore he presently certified Antiochus of his feat, defiring an Army of him, wherewith he might subdue the Cities of Judea. He also sent certain Cut-throats to murder John, Simons son; wrote to the Collonels of the Army to draw them over to him, and fent others to feize upon Hierusalem and the Temple; But John having timely notice of his Treachery, prevented his death by that of the Messengers, and was made High-Priest in the room of his father: and here the Author of the first books of Maccabees concludes his

The befieged, being exceedingly helped by the strength of the Walls, stood out manfully, so that he raised an hundred Turrets, from which he endeavoured to scale the Walls, and compassed in the Town with a double Trench, that none might escape, but they still defending themselves, fometimes fallied out, and did him harm. Hyrcanus feeing a great and ufeless multitude in the City, which confumed the Victuals, put the more infirm out of the Walls, whence being hindred from going any further by the fiege, they wandred about the Walls almost familhed, till at the feast of Tabernacles, out of pity, they were again admitted.

75. At this feast of Tabernacles, Hyrcanus sent out to Antiochus to desire a Truce for feven dayes, because of the celebration thereof. He not only granted this, but fent in also Bulls with gilded horns, Golden, and Slver Cups, with all forts of Spices, and beafts for Sacrifice, and made a feaft to the Army, by which the other taking notice of his great humanity (whence he was firnamed Pius, as also, uncertain for what other reason, Sidetes) withall, considering that the Sabbatical year being now at an end, and the people being hindred from fowing, a famine was likely to infue, he sent out to him, desiring that the Jews might be suffered to live according to their own Laws. Many about the King advised him utterly to destroy the City, to blot out the very name of the Jews from under Heaven, at least to dissolve their Laws, and change their course of life, so diverse from, and disagreeable to other Nations; but he being moved by a principle of magnanimity and bounty, rejected this counsel, and approving of the piety of the Jews, commanded them to deliver up their Arms', pull down their Walls, pay Tribute for Joppe and other Towns without Judaa, and receive a Garrison, upon which conditions he offered them peace. They yielded to all but the last, because they would not converse with the Gentiles, yet in Lieu of it choic to give Holtages (amongst others Hyreams his own brother) and pay five hundred Talents, whereof three hundred at present; whereupon the fiege was removed, and they were freed from any further incumbrance. Antiochus with a great (but extraordinarily effeminate) Army marched into Media, where many Eastern Princes met him, with all their hearts giving up themselves and Countreys to him, and cursing the pride of the Parthians, whereby he got such strength, as overthrowing the Enemy in three several battels, he reduced him within the bounds of his own Countrey. But what he thus fuddenly got, he almost as quickly lost again; for upon the approach of Winter, quartering his Souldiers abroad in the Countrey, the people were so oppressed, what by the exaction of provisions, and their insolence, that they again revolted to the Parthian, and upon agreement, at one and the same time, fer upon them as they were feverally disposed of in their quarters. Antiochus hearing this, with that party which lay with him came into relieve the next to him. and there met with Phraates himself, against whom he fought most couragiously, till being forfaken of his men he was flain, or elfe killed himfelf. 77. Demetrius then recovered all the Kingdom of Syria, though not long likely Julia ibid. to hold it, by reason of that malice he contracted both from Soldiers and People. Josephus Anti-Hyrcanus the High-Priell and chief Magiltrate of the Jens taking this occasion, qui illa 13 leads down an Army to the Cities of Syria, supposing indeed as it was, that he cap. 17. should find them unnanned, took Medeba in the fixth moneth, then Samega and Demetring Idem lib. 394 being absent in Ægypt, the Antiochians first, then other Cities revolted, not enduring his pride as they pretended, which he had increased by his durance in Parthia; so that he was forced to return; but they sent to Ptolomy Physicon, desiring him to fend them some one of the posterity of Seleucus to reign over them. He sent them a young man an Egyptian, the son of one Protarchus a Merchant. A fable was invented of his being adopted by Antiochus Balas, whereupon his name being Zahinas, (or Zahineus) he was firnamed Alexander, and the Syrians being willing to Doubtinhes mat, (Or Labrings) is the control of the first properties, readily received him. He despised him, now grown insolent, as being able to stand on his own legs, which the other taking in great disdain, that a creature whom he had raised out of the dust should so requite him, laboured faster to pull him down than ever he had done for his advancement. He reconciled himself to his fifter Cleopatra, and for that Antiochus whom she had by Demetrius was yet alive (on whom having bestowed the title of King she ruled all her self) he sent him great aid, and his daughter Tryphena for a Wife, which the People feeing, began to revolt apace from Antiochus Gry- Alexander. At length they ingaged in a battel, in which Alexander was overthrown. who then fled to Antioch, where wanting money to pay his Soldiers, he took out of the Temple of Jupiter an Image of Victory of massie Gold, jesting it out, that Jupiter had lent him Victory. But a little after attempting to remove fecretly and take away Jupiters Image it felf of an infinite weight, he was discovered, and forced to run away by the multitude, after which being opprelled with a grievous Tempelt, and forfaken by his followers, he was taken by thieves, and by them brought to Antiochus Grypus was killed (though some give other accounts of his death) after he had reigned four years.

Being thus rid of his unnatural mother, he reigned fecurely eight years, but then Antiochus his half brother, the son of Antiochus Sidetes (begot on his mother, and from Cyzicus the place where we was brought up under Craterus the Eunuch, called Cizycenus) began to be his emulator for the Kingdom, whom he then going about to poylon, provoked him to a more speedy attempt of what he had but beby Antiochus fore defigued. At this time it hapned that Cleopatra the fifter and Wife of Ptolomy Lathurus, being divorced from him by the means of that notable woman her mother, came into Syria, and married with this Cyzicenus, and for that she would not feem utterly to come without a dowry, brought over to him the Army of Coprus, whereby thinking himself sufficiently strengthened against his brother, he joyned battel with him, but was forced to retire unto Antioch. Cleopatra continuing here was befieged by Grypus and taken; and then Tryphena his Wife and her Sifter required her to be delivered into her hands, that the might put her to death as her enemy and emulator, and though he refused it utterly, as being against the custom of Warriours to rage against the weaker Sex, especially when allied in blood so near as she was; and protected by the Religion of the Temple to which she sled; yet the being more hereat enflamed, as judging his answer to proceed from love rather than pity, fent some Soldiers in, who murdered her imbracing the Image of the Goddels. thereby against his brother, whence succeeded those civil Wars betwixt them concerning which we have only the title left unto us in the Epitome of the fixty eight Book of Livie, who related the story. Grypus died first, being slain by the treachery of one Handleon; after he had lived forty five years, and reigned twenty fix, whereof fifteen were in conjunction with his Brother. He left five fons, Josephine for whereof Seleucus his eldest and successor made War upon his Uncle Cyzicenus for pra cap. 21. the Kingdom, and overthrew him in battel, after which the Horse of Cysicenni rin away with him into his Camp, wherein, when he was about to be taken, he killed himfelf, after he had reigned eighteen years. Seleucus after this, obtained Antioch, Parphy. apad and the Kingdom, but against him arose Antiochus sirriamed Eusebes, or Pius; the son Eusebest. monest their of Cizycenus, who having avoided his snares by the help of a certain Courtizan that extremely loved him, went to Aradus, where taking a Diadem, he gathered forces, and in one battel clearly overthrew him. Selencus then fied into Cilicia, where being received by the Mopinestians (as they are called) when he began to exact money of them, they fet fire to the house wherein he lay, and he was burned quick with those about him.

81. Two twin brothers of Sciencus, Antiochus and Philip, carried down forces to tiam ibid. Mobile Stia, which having taken, in revenge for their brothers death, they levelled it Josephus ibid. with the ground; but Antiechus Pius coming presently ugon them overthrew them in fight. Antiochus taking the River Orontes in his flight was drowned. Philip Appian in Syescaping carried the title of King, and gathering again confiderable forces, strugged viscis. hard with Antiochus for the whole Realm, till fuch time as Ptolomy Lathurus calling from Cnidus his fourth brother Demetries, made him King at Damascus, so that they joyning their forces together, they both opposed Antiochus, who though he manfully relifted, was put to the worft, and glad at last to flie into Parthia; whence yet returning after two years he re-obtained Syria. Philip being thus deprived of that Kingdom, fell into contest with his other two brothers, Demetrius Eucerus and Antiochus sirnamed Dionysus for the Kingdom of Dumascus, and being driven into Berea, was there belieged by Demetrius. Mithridates Sinax, who coming with a great power overthrew Demotrins, railed his fiege, and taking him prisoner sent him into Parthia, where he washonourably treated till his death, and Philip marching to Antioch again, as it's faid, obtained the Kingdom of Syria, or (as is most probable) part of it. Antichus Dionysus the younger brother getting Danascus into his hands, made War against the Acabians, and was flain in a battel with their King Arctas, who then was chosen King by the inhabitants of Damascus, and thereby obtained the Kingdom of Culesgris. The Histories which only give us hints of these things are so confounded, as no certain thing concerning the ends of Antiockus Pius or Pkilip can be afferted; yet this we find, that the Syrians taking occasion at these differentions and Wars of the Selencide amongst themselves, began to think of forein aides, and cast their minds upon forein Kings. At length they all agreed to make choice of Tigranes King of Ar- Tuglin lib. 40. menia, who being called in, held Syria for the space of eighteen years, and by his dealing with them, made them know they had had no reason to rebel against their

For fourteen years Tigranes governed the Country by one Magadates, till fuch time as fiding with his Father-in-Law Mithridates the Great Applian in Syriof Pontus, against the Romans, and overthrown by them, he was forced to re- wish call him with his Army. Antiochus the son of Antiochus Pius, sirnamed Asaticus, taking this opportunity, infinuated himfelf into the Principality, the Syrians being not unwilling, out of respect to the dignity of his family; and Lacullus the Roman General (whose work it was to drive Tigranes out of his new acquired posarisa recover- feffions) envying him not the inheritance of his Ancestors. The Ægyptian Kingdom.

From the death of Ptolomy the son of Lagus, to the death of Cleopatra, and the reducing of Ægypt into the form of a Roman Province:

His eldeft fon by Eurydice seeing this, thought it was no staying for him in Egypt, but fled to Selencus, by whom being honourably entertained, with some hopes of being setled in Ægypt after his fathers death, he so badly requited him, as he treacherously slew him, as we before shewed. Philadelphas, after his fathers death made away two of his brothers, the one as conspiring against his life, and the other as suspected to raise a Rebellion in Cyprus. In power and riches he surpasfed his Father. Being learned himfelf above the common rate of Princes, he fought to promote knowledge, by rewarding the most eminent and industrious (of which flourished many in his time) and founding that his famous Library at Alexandria, confifting of two hundred thousand Volumes. Demetrius Phalereus that noble Philosopher, and sometime Prince of Athens, being he that was imployed in the Col. in Jackie lection, perswaded him to send to Eleazar the High-Priess of the (a) Jews to de- Tolophem confire their Law, and that he might be the easilyer induced to send it, by the Council has a phisan of Aristess (who wrote the story) he purchased the liberty of all such Jenses were Institute flaves in Agypt, to the number of about one hundred thousand which cost him later more then four hundred and fixty Talents He also sent extraordinary rich gifts to the literature. Being nobly entertained, and feasted by him for several dayes, they were set to their work in the Island Pharos right over against Alexandria, which in seventy two dayes with admirabale agreement they are faid to have finished, after which the King having exceedingly admired the wisdom of the Law-giver, and commanded the book carefully to be kept, dis-milled them with great rewards to themselves, and presents to him that sent them. 2. Here mentioning this Library of Ptolomy, and Alexandria where it was built, we cannot but now take further notice of this City, which by this time was grown to some perfection, though not near to that eminency at which it afterward

Annuianus Mar-11, 22, p.234cellinus it is who tells us, that being the chief of all Cities of that Countrey; it Edit. was ennobled by many things, particularly by the Magnificence of the greatest Founder, and the eminent skill of Dinocrates the Architect, who for want of Chalke when he went about to delineate the Tract of the Walls, made use of Meale; and this in the opinion of men predicted the plenty of all things necesfary for humane fustenance. He adds, that here the Air was wholsome, quiet and milde: and that as experience for many ages together did demonstrates; fearcely any day passed wherein the inhabitants did not see the Sun clear and Splendid. That the Sea-Coasts on which it stood, might not as formerly, by fallacious and treacherous Accelles, as he phraseth it, afflict Navigators with many miscarriages. Cleopatra invented in the Haven an high Tower, called Pharos from the place it felf; whence lights by night should be exposed for direction to Saylors; whereas in former times such as held their Voyages from the Parthenian or Lybian Seas, having no tokens nor Markes from any Mountains, by reason of the Champian Countrey, wear too often choaked up, and miscarried in the

This it feems Cleopatra repaired, when by age and washing of the Sea it was decayed, and upon this occasion if Ammianus was rightly informed. The Island Pharos where Homer Fabled, Phoens with his Flocks of Sea Calves to lodge was obnoxious and tributary to the Rhodians. Their Officers demanding exceffive Tolls, this crafty Woman invited them to a folemn Feast, and entertained them so long till inseven dayes she caused a Mole to be made of 60 many Furlongs; and then passing upon it in her Chariot assumed the Rhedians were mistaken in asking of Tolls to be paid for Islands; for there were no fuch things to be found in those Quarters. Others write that to be made betwixt Pharos and Alexandria, and so joyned the Island to the Continent by the skill and industry of Dexiphanes a Mechanical Mathema-

But Ammianus proceeding in the description of this City, mentions the lof-The Straptum: ty Temples therein to be feen, amongst which was eminent that called Serapeum. or of Serapis, which though it might be lessen'd with the slenderness of Expression ons, yet was so illustrated by its Atria, adorned with most large Pillars and amultitude of other works; that after the Capitol, wherein venerable Rome for ever

The Libraries prided her felf, the whole world faw nothing more stately. In it were inestimable Libraries: and the faith of antient Monuments unanimously speaks that seven hundred thousand Volumes having been carefully got together by the Industry of the Ptolomies, were burnt when the City was plundered under Cafar the Di-Cator. As for the Libraries, Epiphanius writes of two which were publick at Alexandria, the first was this of Philadelphus in that part of the City called Bruchiuss, and the second made long after in the Serapeum; and called the sister of the former. This of Philadelphus contained an hundred thousand Books, as Eusebius, writes in his Chronicon; and afterwards by the following Kings, it was inlarged, who in this matter of Collecting Books, contended with those of Perganus; so that the number of Volumes role to that of seven hundred thouland, as several Authors relate. Livie and Orofius wrote that four hundred thousand Books were burne in the Alexandrian War; neither is it probable that all miscarried. But befides these fome speak of another Library, and that a publick one in the Castle

5. Certain it is from Strabo's account he gives us of this City that by reason Lib. 17. of its fituation, it flowed with the abundance of all things, and though near to it # 792. trealthfulness, adjoyned a Lake, yet, which was chiefest, it enjoyed an Aer very healthful. It was washed with two Seas, the Ægyptian from the North, and that from the South called the Lake of Marcia or Marcotis. The Lake was filled by the River Nile both from the upper Countries by Ditches and from other parts, through which many more things were imported than by Sea, whereby it came to pass that the Haven of the Lake was more rich and frequented. And any one might eafily perceive that this way more Merchandize was exported from Alexandria, than was imported from Italy, if he had been both at Alexandria and Puteoli, and had taken notice of the ships of burthen which had egress and regress from and into both ports. Belides the wealth which flowed into it from both Havens, The clemency of the Air he thinks worthy to be mentioned, which thence happened because the place was on both fides watered, and the Nile conveniently had its Increases. For other Cities (in another place he excepts Ravenna) placed upon Lakes, in Summer heats have a thick heavey and Choaking Air, and by reason of vapors excited by the Sun, abundance of mud and filth lyes upon the edges, whence noxious fteems arise which infect the Air and produce the pestilence. But at Alexandria, when Summer begins, the Nile being increased fills the Lake, and leaves no mud or filth from which any malignant vapor may exhale. Befides the Etelian winds blow for from the North, and so great a Sea, that the Inhabitants with much ease pass the Summer.

6. In the days of our Geographer the Figure of the City represented that of a Chlamys or Souldiers Coat, the fides of which extending in length were compaffed with water being about thirty furlongs in Diameter; The fides ftretching forth in breadth were straitned with Lithmi or Necks of Eand of seven or eight furlongs being washed with the Sea and the Lake. It was also so divided into streets and passages, that both Horses and Chariots might be driven through them, but two were confiderable for their largeness, and cut through each other at equal Angles. It had Temples and publick places most beautiful, and Royal Palaces which took up a fourth or a third part of its Circumference. For every one of the Kings had a mind to be adding to things Confecrated to their Gods, so some thing of his own to the Palaces built by his Predecessors. All of them were near together and joyned to the Haven. Part of the Palaces was the Museum which had a walk, an Exedra, and a large House wherein was the Resectory of those who being Fellows of the Museum applyed themselves to the study of good Letters. This Colledge was maintained at the publick charge, and had a Priest for its Governor formerly nominated by the Kings, and in the time of Strabo by the Emperor.

J. Another part of the Palaces was called Soma (or Body) being a place walled in, wherein were the Sepulchres of the Kings and of Alexander. For, Strabo place of Sepul. Writes that Ptolomy the fon of Lague took the body of Alexander from Perdiccas, as he carryed it from Babylon, and turned off unto those parts moved by Avarice and the defign of getting Egypt into his own power. He was killed by the Souldiers being furprised by Ptolomy in an Illand, where they fell upon and murdered him with their Sarifle. The body of Alexander, Ptolomy brought to Alexandria and there buried it; and there, faith he it ftill lies though not in the fame cheft or coffin. For now it is Glass whereas he had laid it in Gold; But the Golden the was taken away by Ptolomy Sirnamed Coccus and Subdititius coming this ther from Syria; though he was prefently overthrown and received no benefit by his booty.

8. In the great Haven near the entrance at the right hand, was the Island and the Tower Pharos; at the left lay Rocks and Lochios the Promontory wherein there was also a Royal Palace. As one went further to the left were more houses of the Kings joyning to that in Lochias having many and various Appartments and Croves. To them joyned an Haven or Creek private and thut up which belonged also to the Kings. Also an Itland lay before the artificial Haven, having moreover its Palace and its Creek, and called Antirhodus, because it did, as it were emulate Rhodes. Above it was a Theatre, and a place called Possideum, because in it was a Temple of Neptune; there Amony made a further Mole into the great Haven and built a palace he called Timonium; and he did it at the last, when being for faken by his Friends, after the defeat of Actium he had retired to Alexandria, and bid-

Chap. VI. ding farewel to all his Acquaintance, purposed to lead there a solitary life, after the example of Timon 9. Next to them was the Cafareum Emporium or Exchange and the Apostases or Abfeeffes and then the Navalia, or stations for ships; as far as the Heptastadium. Beyond the Heptastadium lay the Haven of Funostus, and above it was digged another Port called Cibotus or the Arke wherein were other Navalia. Within it was a Fofs or Ditch reaching as far as the Lake of Maotis, and without lay a little part of the City. Then was to be feen Necropolis, or the City of dead bodies, and a Sub-Neroyelis. urbe wherein were many Gardens, Monuments, and places for Embalming the dead. Within the Ditch stood the Serapium and some other old Temples almost ruinated, by reason of the building of the Temples at Nicopolis; for there was the Amphitheater and the Stadium, and the five years Games were there Gelebrated: And fuch things as were of old inflituted became of no repute. In a word, faith he, the City is full of confecrated and facred things, hath a beautiful Gymasium (to which belongs Porticus longer than a furlong) a Forum or place of Judicature, and Groves. There is also the Panium an high work raised with the hand, broad above, and small beneath, like a Top, to which they mount by Stairs and thence they have a fair prospect of the whole City.

10. From Necropolis ran one street by the Gymasium as far as the Gate of Canopus ; then the Cirque or Hippodrome, and others as far as the Ditch of it. Paffing through the Hippodrome, one came to Nicopolis inhabited as far as the Sea, so as it ought not be effected to be less than the City, being thirty Furlongs diffant from Alexandria. This place Augustus Casar beautified, because here he overthrew those that fided with Antony, and taking the City in his first attempt, Constrained him to kill himself, and got Cleopatra alive into his Power, who shortly after being in Cuftody fecretly made away her felf by the biting of an Afp, or as others deliver, by a poyfoned ointment.

11. Ammianus tells you (that we may finish this short Account of this famous City) that Alexandria being increased, not by degrees as others, but growing up at its first beginnings through spacious compasses, and being long and sharply " harrafed with internal feditions, at last after many years, in the Reign of the Em-« peror Aurelian, Civil Contests proceeding to deadly blows, lost its walls and with « them the greatest of its Regions called Bruchion the long abiding place of Ex-« cellent men. Here lived Aristarchus the Excellent Grammarian; Herodian the most Minute inquirer into Arts; Saccas Ammonius the Master of Plotinus, and " many other writers of noble Learning; amongst whom Chalcenterus Didymus " was eminent, memorable for his Attempt of manifold knowledg, who, for the silli Gracidi five Books wherein unskilfully he reprehends Tully, immitating the Silligraphia contar Malali and Malevolent Authors, is accused in the judgment of Learned ears, as a whelp degranate or fneaking curr, barking and making a rotten noise about a roaring Lyon. "

12. And although he adds, many of the Ancients, befides these I have mentioned, there did flourish; yet at this present time various forts of Learning ares not filent in that City. For, the Mafters of Studies there in a measure take their " breath, and whatfoever lyes hid, there is discovered by the frame of Geometry, neither hath Musick amongst them quite decayed, nor harmony been put to fi-" lence; the confideration of the motion of the World and Stars grows warme in fome men though they be rare; and not a few are learned in Numbers : besides " Are profested, this they are skilled in that Science which telleth Fortunes. Over and above, the Studies of Medicine, are daily so increased, that though the practice it " felf do discover the skill sufficiently, yet it abundantly sufficeth for the Commendation of the Physicians Art if he say he learnt it at Alexandria. In Bruchion it was that Philadelphus made his Library, and credible it is that Learned men flocked to it, to whom he affigned Sallaries and maintenance from the publick. For this our Philadelphus first instituted a Colledge of Learned men called Museum or the Temple of the Muses, to whom he also instituted Games solemni and called Musea; The Museum was part of the Palace, which as we have seen took

He had a brother by his mothers side named Magas, whose father Lanting in she was one Philip a Macedonian, but of base Original. Him she had procured to Dimitrii. to be made Governor of Cyrene, the Inhabitants of which he now railed, and caused Pausan. ibid. them to revolt from him, and marched with an Army towards Ægypt; and Ptolomy fecuring all the paffages, went out to encounter him. But news coming in the way that the Marmarida, a people of the Lybian Nomades had rebelled, Magas retreated in all hast back to Cyrene, and Ptolomy then intending to follow him, was hindred by taineth cyrent the Galls in his Army, whom having hired amongst others, he found to have plotted to seize upon Ægypt; but he brought them all to the number of four thousand through the Nile to a defert Island, where with famine, and other ways, they were made away. Magas after this having marryed Apame the daughter of Antiochus Soter, perswaded him to break the League betwixt him and his brother, and invade Ægypt, which he prepared to do; but Ptolomy sent several parties abroad into Syria, and found him fo much work at home, that he could have no time to look abroad, and Magas before his death having a defire to be friends with his brother, betrothed his Juflin. 116. 25. daughter to his fon. Betwixt this Ptolomy, and the next Antiochus firnamed Theos were continual Wars, till both being weary thereof entered into an Alliance, Ptolomy giving him in marriage his daughter Berenice, which proved but an occasion of greater trouble, and the destruction of the Bride, though he lived not to see it. For he, notwithstanding all his learning, gave himself up to luxury, and fondly dreaming he should live always, and that by him alone was found out immortality, suddenly died, after he had Reigned thirty eight years alone, and one (with some odd Albanass lib.

Seleneus provided a Fleet for the recovery of the places revolted, but before Juliant plant he could come to tile it, lost it all by a Tempest, which yet proved the greatest gain; for the Cities out of commiseration of his estate, and as if he had already sufficiently fmarted for his paricide, returned again to their obedience. Being exceedingly encouraged, and animated herewith (as richer by his loss) he then made War upon Ptolomy; but as if he had been born for a laughing stock to fortune, and not recovered the Kingdom for himfelf, he was overthrown again in battel, and as deftitute of followers, as after the shipwrack, fled to Antioch, when applying a remedy worse than the disease, he sent to his brother Antiochus (from his ravenous disposition sirnamed Hierax) for aid; and to Ptolomy fearing himself not to be able to graple

In his time a Phanix is reported the third, time after the days of Selostris, and the next after them of Amafis, to have flown (being a bird facred to the Sun) accompanied with a great number of other birds, admiring her new face, to the City Heliopolis, as Tailes tells us, who reports that the same thing hapned afterwards in Annal. 11h. 6. the Reign of Tiberius; Paulus Fabius, and L. His lazines, and neglect, encouraged Antiochus the Great to make War up-Polybins lib. 5. on him for Caleforia, in which, though he got the better, yet can it not be ascribed to any thing of his, he thinking of nothing less than preparation for resistance, and whereas he had opportunity enough after the battel to have outed his Enemy of Syria, yet being overloyed that he had recovered Callespria only, he sent Sosibila to confirm the peace. In his return out of Syria he went to Jerulalem, and would need see the inward holy places of the Temple, but was simitten so with a blind horror, that he fell, and could scarcely be recovered to himself, but departing home raged a gainst the Jews at Alexandria. Then with great earnestnies returning to his a little intermitted jollities he doted so upon Agathoclea his Concubine, that he killed his fifter and wife Eurydice, and forgetting all credit and Majesty, spent the nights in filthiness, and the days in feasting. These things are first privately acted within the Court Walls, but prefently shamed not at the publick views the impudence of the Strumpet containing it felf in no bounds, being increased by the favour of her brother Agathocles, one of as filthy a life as her felf, and the Conjunction of her mother Enanthe, who frent high, and prefumed much on the foore of her Childrens great grace with the King. Henceforth these women not contenting themselves with the King, possessed on the foore of her childrens great grace with the Kingdom also, and snamed not to appear in publick in great equipage to be reverenced. As for Agathocles, he reigned, and not Ptolony, by the direction and advice of his two Assistances. Mother and Sister, disposing of Offices and Commands in the Army at his pleafure.

17. Yet, had Ptolomy the strange fortune to overcome all difficulties he met with. Polybius ibid. Cleomenes the Spartan entertained, as we faid, lovingly by his father, with pro-cliemen. mile to endeavour his restitution, now finding things to make for it at home, by the death of Antigonus, and the Conjunction of the Etolians with them of Sparta against the Acheans, earnestly desired to be dispatched away; but he minding nothing but his pleasures, and buried in sottishness, regarded him not at all. Sosibius indeed confidered of the thing, and called his friends to advite about it; but up-on mature deliberation concluded it not wildom to difinish him provided of men and arms, left finding all clear abroad, his Enemies being now dead, or quiet, he, who knew fufficiently the state and condition of Ægypt under such a Prince, might at-Cleanants King tempt fomething rather beneficial for himfelf, than fafe for it. should leave a Letter directed to the other, wherein he should accuse Cleomenes of an intention to make flirs in Egypt, except he were fent away according to the promise of Euergetes. This being laid to his charge by Sosibius, and soundly aggravated to the King, he was secured in free custody, having a large house, but kept with a Guard, affigned to him; whereupon growing desperate, one day when Ptolomy was gone out of Town, he made his Keepers drunk, and with his followers brake out into the streets, and called the people to liberty. But none stirring, being all aftonished at the greatness of the Enterprize, they made for the Castle, which finding to be ftrongly defended, he and all with him, after a Laconian fa-fhion, as Polybius termeth it, killed themselves. Such was the end of this samous man, who being indued with a fingular dexterity and promptness of wit, had a genious fuitable to great and weighty matters, and was fitted by gifts of nature as well as experiences, for the Offices either of a great Commander, or a Prince.

After this, such as had an hand in the murder of Euridice the Queen were knocked in the head by her women. The infamy of the Nation being thus in some measure expiated by the slaughter of these miscreants, Aristomenes an Acarnaman was made Protector of the King, his Realms and Dominions, who though for his own interest he beforetime temporized with Agathocles, yet now managed the affairs of his Prince with much honesty and wifdom. And indeed such there was need he should be at this time, when the King, being obnoxious by reason of his years to injury and wrong, was struck at by two the greatest Princes then living, viz. Antiochus King of Syria, and Philip King of Macedonia, who pretending fair things to his Father, and nothing towards him but kindness, now sought to devour him, and make a prey of his Kingdom; Philip by laying hold upon Egypt and Caria; and Antiochus on Calefyria and Phanicia. What Cities he had got in Afia, the Romans divers times by Ambassadors demanded to be put into their hands, which being refused by him, this, with his ambition, and other things, ministred occasion of a War betwixt them (as is shewed before) and that turned to the commodity of Ptolomy. For Antiochus being unwilling to have any Enemies at his back, fought to enter into affinity with feveral Kings, and amongst the rest gave to him in marriage his daughter Cleopatra, and with her in Dowry all Colesgria and Judga; having this also in his eye, by means of her to get some sooting in Ægypt, though he was miltaken. For Ptolony his Officers understanding his curning well enough, behaved themselves more warily; and Cleopatra together with the man married his interest.

Yet though he had many Souldiers at his command, had he no heart to ftir, and though having a fufficient opportunity in the minority of the King, he still delayed to execute his deligns, till he was prevented. His' answers were no whit fatisfactory; fo that being condemned not only by all the Council, but fuch foreign ministers as were present, and being secured that night, he was together with his complices the next day taken away by poylon, being a man so extraordinarily covetous above all others, that having broke down the walls (as Polybius terms it) of the Kingdom, he had exhaulted it with rapines. With him fell Dicearchus one of his companions, who being tortured to death, the reby (as

For plotting now against Selencus Philopator, who had succeeded Antiochus his Father in the Kingdom of Syria, and preparing an Army against him, when one of his Capitains Hinnays, it asked him where he would get money sufficient for such an enterprize, he answered, that his friends were riches to him, which being told abroad amongst the People, his Officers fearing he would fleece them to supply himself, took him away by poyson, after he had lived twenty seven years, and Reigned twenty sour thereof. Moreover calling to their remembrance, that Antiochus his Father had lately obtained it again by right of conquest, he flatly denyed that ever he passed it over as a portion with his daughter, to the late King of Egypt, and so having discoursed on this subject to the satisfaction of all his hearers, he then

He accordingly went to Crete, where hiring nine thoufand Souldiers, he passed over to Libyna, where he expected to hear from Alexandria; but the Romans there treating with his brother about a reconciliation, and the yielding of Cyprus up to him, fomething he affented to, and put off others, on purpose drawing out the time in length. Forty days with extraordinary entertainment he detained them at Alexandria, during which time news came to Euergetes that the Cyrenians had revolted from him, who understanding well the mind of his brother from his present carriage, and seeing nothing suitable to royalty in Energetes, he acting all things after a Tyrannical manner, could not bring themselves to submit any longer to his Government. Hearing this, he failed to Catabathmus, thence to make for Cyrene, in which place he found the Straights kept against him, but fending some about to come upon the Defendants on their backs, set upon them also himfelf, and cleared the paffage, but coming to Cyrene, and ingaging with the Natives, was worsted by them. Whether he recruited himfelf again, and recovered his Soveraignty here or no, we have nothing from History to speak expresly; but not long after he was in a capacity to attempt Cyprus (being encouraged by the Senates renouncing their friendship with his brother upon his account) where he was also overthrown by his brother, and then besieged, and taken in the City Lapithus. Yet did Philometor spare him, what for his innate elemency and brotherly affection, and for fear of the Romans; and not only fo, but made a Covenant with him when Conquered, wherein he restored him Cyrene, and for Cyprus certain Cities with a quantity of Corn yearly, and promifed him his daughter in marriage, worse than this being not accounted incest in that Country.

Two Ambasiadors were present from Philometor to answer to whatfoever he should accuse him of, but all mens ears were so filled with the accufation, that no place would be found for their defence; fo that they were instantly commanded to be gone, and five Commissioners were appointed (furnished all with Gallies) to go, and bring him into possession of Cyprus; the Allies also, both in Greece and Asia, being written to, and leave given to as many as would to assist him in the recovery of it. Coming to Alexandria, he first caused the favourers of the Child to be flain, and then the boy himfelf in the arms of his mother on their wedding day, and amidst the solemnities; according to which beginning he proceeded, being nothing milder towards those that had sent for him. For, giving liberty to the outlandish Souldiers to kill, and rifle, he filled all places with slaughters; many being Records, Die ments, others under some pretence or other banished, and their goods confiscate. Having a fon born of this his fifter, he named him Memphitie, after the place of his

Cleopatra being thus dither another, vorced by her Mother, rather than forfaken of her husband, married to Antiochus Cyzicenus in Syria (as we before faid) and carryed away with her the Army in Cyprus for a portion. The Queen Mother, that she might be the more awful to Lathurus her fon, in the second year of their reign made Alexander King of Cyprus, and fent him thither, and then at the end of other fix, took away from him, his wife Selene, though she had brought him two sons; and again to compleat her malice, stirred up the People against him. For taking such of her Eunuchs as were most faithful to her, she brought them wounded into the publick, accusing him of having endeavoured to make her away, and of fouring those that were true to their trust in her defence: at which the Alexandrians being much moved, came so upon him, that he narrowly escaped with his life, and then sent they for Alexander from Coprus, and made him King.

She in the mean time took Ptolemais, whither Janueus came to her, with whom a little after the renewed the League at Seythopolis, and then he prospering much in Calefyria, Lathurus was forced to return to Cyprus, and his Mother feeing that, departed also into Egypt. Porphyrie reporteth him to have flain her nineteen dayes after he had married her. Certainly though his reign be accounted no longer, and that of Auletes to begin here, yet cannot be rejected that which is produced to the contrary. For, Suetonius reporteth, that Julius Casar in his younger dayes having ingratiated himself to Julio air, with the People, attempted by their Tribunes that Ægypt might be affigued him as a Province, having gotten an opportunity of extraordinary command, for that the Alexandrians had expelled their King, on whom the Senate had bestowed the title of friend and Allie. This can in no wife be meant of Auletes, for when he was expelled and came to Rome, Cafar was then above fuch a condition, having spent some years in the Wars of Gall. And that King of Ægypt mentioned by Cicero to have dyed at Tyre, and reported to have left the People of Rome his heir in In Oran. 1 a.s. his Confulfhip, can be meant of none but of this Alexander the Second, who be-24 deraria. ing expelled rebelliously by his Subjects, lived and died there in exile; so that we must necessarily affign him (counting from the death of Lathurus to the Consulthip of Cicero) about fifteen years; during which time of his life, he is to be supposed to have reigned longer than onely so many dayes, contrary to the vulgar

33. Alexander being expelled by the Alexandrians, they immediately fet up in Aulter succee- his room, the son of Lathurus, sirnamed Dionysus and Auletes, because he was too much addicted to the rites of Bacchus, and dancing to the found of Cymbals and Pipes. He was base born, as appeareth by the Prologue to the thirty ninth book of Trogus, and so was also his brother the King of Cyprus, if that be true which Pau-Janias speaketh of his Fathers having no legitimate illue, except one daughter. After some years, they that set him up pulled him down; for his brother of Cyprus being most unjustly spoiled of his Kingdom by the Romans, through the malice of Clodins Tribune of the People; they prefled him fore, either to demand Cyprus of the Roman, or renounce their friendflip. Being unwilling to do this, and by reason Julius, 39: of his great exactions which he made for paying of his debts (contracted by his purchase of the Roman alliance) he incurred their hatred, and whereas he could Plant him. neither quiet the tumults by fair means nor foul, was glad to withdraw himfelf out of the way, and went to Rome. At Rhodes he met with Cato, who was fent by Clodius out of the way, under colour of doing him honour, to reduce Cyprus into the form of a Roman Province, who advised him to ruturn, and be reconciled to his Subjects, rather than leaving his former happy condition to expose himself to danger, and the avarice of the Roman Officers, which Ægypt it self could not be able to fatisfie. But hearing at length how thingswent at Rome, they sent one hundred of their Countrey-men thither, to make their defence, and recriminate their lawful King, which he understanding, procured most of the Messengers to be made away in their journey, and the rest coming to the City, he either took away, or deterred, or else perswaded them to hold their peace. The Senate hearing of this was grievously moved, and the rather, because that divers publick Ministers of others their Confederates had been made away with the rest; asalso for that it appeared, that there was much corruption amongst themfelves. Pompey harboured the King all this time in his own house, being yet desirous to restore him himself as Cicero lignifieth to Lentulus then the Pro-Conful of Cilicia, who still waited also for the employment. At length Sibylla's books being consulted, were reported to forwarn the people of Rome never to reduce him by force, and therefore to that purpose another Decree was made in the Senate. A great debate then enfued how the thing should be done, some proposing one way, and some another, till at length Auletes perceiving it was neither likely to be effected by Pompey nor Lentulus, defining of his return, and getting him into $A\mu$, expected at $Ephe \mu$ in the Temple of Diana, a betterment ter advantage for the recovery of his right out of the hands of the imperious

The people hereby was quieted for a time, until Pothinus, fearing he might be called to account for what had already paffed, kindled a new flame to divert it. He first objected, as well he might, what an unworthy thing it was that the King should be called to answer, and then added, there was reason to suspect, that whatsoever Casar might pretend, yet at length he would put all into the hands of Cleopatra. He sent to Achillas General of all the Forces then lying at Pelusum, alluring him by great promises in the Kings name to draw down the army privily to Alexandria; and he, being not backward to close with him, marched down with twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Casar had not strength enough to go out and meet him, and therefore contained himself in the City, yet commanded his men to be in readiness, and kept the King with him; whose name he knew to be of great force amongst his people, and that thereby this undertaking might appear rather to be the enterprize of a few diffolute, and factious persons, than any thing backed by

By this time a legion shipped by Domitius Calcinus, with provisions and arms from Syria, landed on the African shoar, a little above Alexandria; which Cafar understanding, went with his Fleet unmanned to fetch them in, and the enemy having notice of it, drew out also against him. He receiving the men aboard, had no mind to ingage, because cafar defeat- it grew towards night; but a Rhodian Gally, not keeping up with the rest of the th the Alex- Fleet, was fet upon, whereby he was conftrained to go in to the refcue, and fo carried himself, that day-light onely was wanting to his compleating of the Victory, by utterly destroying the whole Navy of the Alexandrians.

Both fides being ready to ingage, yet a narrow paffage lying betwirt them, each expected till the other should enter first, as their having a better advantage, until the Rhodians desired of Cesar leave to enter the Streight. This once granted and done, they were presently set upon and then relieved, till a total engagement enfued, in which the Ægyptians were worsted (not a ship of Casars receiving any hurt) and in their flight took into Phaios, where they were received by their friends, and kept off the Romans for some time, but at length were forced to quit the Island with great loss. This being joyned to the main by two Bridges, one of them in like manner was forfaken by the Towns-men; but the Romans attempting to gain the other, through the railness of some in their company, were beaten off, and forced tumultuoully to betake themselves to their Ships. a great power of men, and pierced as far as Pelusium, which also was taken, with great pains and industry by assault. Thence marching down for Alexandria he took in the Countrey in his way, the Jews inhabiting those parts (though at first they made refistance, yet) being brought over by Antipater upon the producing of the Letters of Hyrcanus the High-Priess. When Ptolomy heard this, and that he had nigh already reached Delta, a place not far diftant from Alexandria; knowing he must needs pass the River, he sent out a party to oppose him there. which he received prudently after the Roman fashion, being intrenched in his Camp, and eafily fultained it's violence; till feeing them very disorderly, and with great boldness to affaile his fortifications, he issued out, and killing a great number, had utterly defeated the rest, but that by their knowledge of the Countrey, and by the Veilels which had transported them, they secured themselves. Whereupon rallying again they once more charged him, and a fight enfued in that place called The Camp of the Jews, in which engagement the wing commanded by Mithriboteropeoled dates himself, was forely oppressed, and had been totally overthrown; but that Anonymous the three control that the control of the cont tipater (who led the other) came in good time to the refeue, put to flight the Egyptians, and took their Camp; which Mithridates confessed by letters to Casar, acknowledging Antipater to have been the Anthor, both of his aftery, and the Victory. But now by this time was Ptolony himself coming against Mithridates, and

Cafar also to fetch him off.

42. Both went by Sea, but Cafar first got to him, and took him in with his victorious Army. Ptolomy and Ciefar encamped then seven miles asunder, the former in a high and most fortified place by nature, having a narrow River with exceeding high and precipitous banks betwixt him and the Enemy, which though the Alexandrians defended, yet Cafar's men got over (the Horse by passing the Foard. and the foot by laying over a bridge made of long trees) fo that Cafar fat down, not far from the Kings Camp. The next day he stormed a Castle in a Village near adjoyning, the defendants whereof flying amain to the Camp, his men had well nigh entred with them; but coming to hand-strokes, were beaten back, being severally · laid at, both from the fortifications and the Ships. But Cafar espying a very high place, which by reason of it's natural strength was little looked to by the Alexancefar florm- drians, fet certain Companies to get up there into the Camp; which being perforeth the Aspirian Camp. med, and a great cry raised on purpose round about, the Romans brake in, in sespirian Camp. When he was got up she laid him on a bed, tore her flesh, wiped off his blood with her face, calling him Lord, Husband, and General, after which he presently expired. Casar now desired to get her into his power by ftrong hand, having an extraordinary ambition to grace his Triumph with her, and not willing to promife any thing, and be counted a deceiver by falfifying his word. The Judaan Kingdom or Principality of the Asmonaans.

From the departure of Antiochus Sidetes from Jerusalem to the Reign of Herod an alien, being by birth an Idumæan, Conteining the space of ninety eight years.

Fter Antiochus had raifed his siege and departed from Jerusalem, as was faid before, he undertook an Expedition against the Parthians, wherein he was flain. John the Son of Simon who then was chief both Priest and Magistrate of the Jews accompanied him some way with a band of Auxiliaries, and got the firname of Hyrcanus from the overthrow of the Hyrcanians, A.M. 38.70. as it's thought, and returned with great credit into his own Countrey. After Antio-Jobs firmamed chus his death, he led down an Army into Syria, thinking, as indeed it fell out, that the Cities were left without defence, whereof he took feveral, Medaba, Samaga, Sicima, and Gerizim, where the Cutheans had built a Temple refembling that at A.M. 3877.

After this he fent to Rome, desiring that Setterid, 186. the confederacy made with the Senate might be renewed; that Joppa, Gazara, 20 with other Cities and places taken from the Jens by Antiochius, contrary to their Job Hyrcani g. Decree, might be restored, that it might not be lawful for the King of Syria to pass through their Countrey with his Armies, that whatfoever Antiochus had attempted against them in War contrary to their will might be made frustrate, and that the Senate would please to send their Ambassadors to procure those things, and to cause fatisfaction to be given for the hayock made of the Countrey. The Fathers renewed the confederacy with them, according to their defire, promifed to take order they should be no more wronged, and dismissed the Ambassadors with money to bear their charges, and letters commendatory to those through whose Countreys they should pass. The many changes which then presently happened in the Syrian Kingdom to diverted the feveral Princes from medling with the Jews, that they were glad of their friendship, and this proved a sufficient opportunity for Hyrcanus to establish his affaires. For they destroying one another, with War, he securely injoyed Befrech 5s the Revenues of the Countrey, and got together a great Mass of money 5 to that de-failing them, he went and befreged Samaria, the Inhabitants of which he was difolea-

was renewed. The belieged reduced to their former necessities, sent once more to Cyzicenus, who then obtaining about fix thousand men of Ptolomy Lathurus (then expelled his Kingdom by his mother) made an inroad into Hyrcanus his Dominions, and made havock of all things, thereby hoping to conftrain him to raise the fiege. But having loft many of his men being intercepted by the Enemy, he himself went to Tripelis, and gave over the War to Callimander and Epicrates, two of his Captains. Callimander being more venturous than wife was presently flain, and his fellow was corrupted to betray Scythopolis and other Towns to Hyrcanus; who then after a years lying before Samaria took it, razed it, and brought the watercourses through the Place, by the filth of which all appearance of a Town was taken away. After this, inviting the Pharifees on a time (whose Scholar he had been) to a feast, he laboured to approve his fincerity to them, and defired, if any of them knew any fault in him, to tell him plainly of it. All approved of his manners but one Eleazar a seditious and bad man, who told him, that if he would be accounted good, he must devest himself of the Priesthood, and be content with the Principality, for that he had heard fay, that his mother was a captive in the time of Antiochur Epiphanes. This being utterly false, Hyrcanus was grievously offended, and so were the Pharifees; but Jonathan a Saducee of the contrary fact, and one in great grace.

Gudges be with him, took thence occasion to tell him, that this affront came from all the Pharwix him and rifees together, and that he should perceive it by the punishment they would inside the Pharlin. upon him, if their opinion was demanded. They being mercifully inclined thought it sufficient he should be imprisoned and beaten for no greater an offence at which Hyrcanus was fore displeased, as then thinking they had raised that scandal of him. Wherefore being more incensed by Jonathan, he revolted to the Saducees, abrogated the constitutions of the Pharifees, and punished their followers, whence it came to pass, that neither he nor his sons were much beloved by the People. A sedition also arose hereupon, but he quieted all, and having governed thirty one years died, being honoured with three especial dignities, of the chief Government, High-Priesthood, and also Prophecy, as Josephus tells us, who relateth, that he foretold his two eldeft sons should neither of them long enjoy his Principality. A. M. 3899. the last of the one handred and fixty Olympiad, about one hundred and four years before the birth of Christ.

3. Mention being here made of Pharifees, it is requisite to speak something of this Sect and others amongst the Jews, according to the nature of this work, * 1th. 18.6.2. Josephus first maketh mention of them in the ninth Chapter of his thirteenth of the Section 11. Book of Antiquities, afterwards more diligently and largely * handling their matters. 2.c. 7.

There is no question but these sects sprang up after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. It's probable that the difference amongst them arose after the building of the second Temple, about their worship and offerings. Some thought they were onely to live by the prescript of the Law, neither above nor below it. Others believed they were not onely to act according to the bare letter of the Scriprures, but also according to such senses and consequences as might be made out from it, and accordingly they offered over and above what the Law required in from it, and according to the ferrice of the Temple, even what they conceived was due according to their riches or other respects. Those that frood up the letter of the Law were confut Japan called Karraim: Those that besides the precepts of the Law did works of super-phan scaling. erogation, and voluntary service without any compulsion, were named Hasidim, Tribetto Falls. that is Santhi or Holy, and (after they grew into a body) Halideans. As long as rum Mifcellar. this voluntary and supererogatory service was free and spontaneous, there was no 4 1. 63. fuch schism; but when this doctrine of the Hasideans came to be digested into precepts, and the precepts of fupererogation into Writings and Canons, many doubts, disputes, and controversies daily arose, whence two dogmatical Sects had their original. One which onely allowed of the Law it felf, and another that imbraced also the glosses and interpretations of it. From the latter, being that of the trib Halideans, spring up some who called themselves Peruschim or Separate, as those, Judeans, who by reason of their holiness were not only distinct and separated from the Judean carvulgar, but also from other Hasideans, for that they taught that those constitue A.M. 3891. tions formerly accounted free, were to be observed out of necessity. These Po Simplified A.M. 3856 ruschine in Syriack Pheruschim, came by Greek Writers to be called Pharisei: Now as out of the Hulideans arole the Pharifees, so from amongst the Karraim the Saducees, to named from Sadoc. Antigonus the Master of this Sadoc, and Scholar to Simeon the Just, amongst other heads of doctrin had taught, that they ought not to be like Servants, who served their Masters on condition to receive their Wager, meaning that we ought to serve God out of love, and not for our own gain or advantage. But Sadoc, or Saduc, and Baithus interpreted this godfy faying into a wicked fence, teaching, that there was no reward after this life; and therefore denied the future state, and framed their Heresie. The third sect was that of the Estat or Effeni, who as it's probable fprang from the Pharifees, though when it becan it be uncertain. Philo Judeus thinketh they were so called from their holines Erodios, as though 'Osidios, though more probably from Hafi the Syriack, whence the Greek "Ost may be derived. The Hebrew fignifieth fuch as live apart from noife, which agreeth much with those Effent, who like the Pythagoreans kept filence, and lived in deferts or Villages by themselves, far from others. They had skill in Phyfick, and thence some would derive their name from the Hebrew Asa, which figurfieth to heal. This Sect was later then that of the Pharifees, and some think it arose at this time when Hyrcanus turned Saduce, and perfecuted the Sect of the Pharifees; for then might many of the Pharifees to shun persecution depart into the Wilderness and desert places, and afterwards be called Essei or Essen, who were held more strict than the Pharifies themselves.

4. But, (to return to our matter) John sirnamed Hyrcanus left five sons, where-of Aristobulus the eldest (sirnamed Philellen for his love to, and familiarity with the Greeks) fucceeded him, and first changed his Principality into a Kingdom, setting a Diadem on his head, four hundred and eighty one years after the return of the Jews from the Captivity of Babylon. His lecond brother he loved exceedingly, fo as he made him his partner in the Kingdom; but thut up the rest in prison, and with them his Mother, to whom his Father had left the Principality, and proceeded fo far in unnatural cruelty, as to starve her to death. Not long after, he caused to A.M. 3900 be made away alio his beloved brother, though against his will he did it. For he (Anti- 01. 168.ana., gonus by name) returning victorious from the Wars, at the Feast of the Tabernacles, P. He having rejected tales heretofore, did not easily give credit to them now, but to provide for his own fecurity, and yet shun suspition, he commanded some of his Guard to stand in an obscure place where he was to come, and if he came armed, then to kill him, but if not, then not to molest 1 in, and he sent also to him to come without any guard at all. But the Quien and the rest of the conspirators, perswaded the messenger to deliver his errand the clean contrary way, fo that Antigenus thinking nothing; but coming to fee his brother, wasthere murdered. After this was done, Aristobulus presently repented of the deed, though knowing nothing concerning the methage, which to increased his disease, that he vomited blood for anguish of mind. The blood being carried out by one of his attendants, chanced to be spilt in that place where Antigonus was flain, which being judged by them that faw it, to be done of purpose, they cryed out against the thing, and made such a noise, that the King hearing it, forced the matter out of them; after which his Agony increased so highly (crying out, that his blood was required for that of his Mothers and Brothers which he had spilt; and chiding as it were his body for retaining the Soul required of him by their Ghosts) that in great torment of conscience he presently breathed out his last, when he had scarcely reigned a whole year. He profited much his Countrey by his Government, and making War upon Iturea, laid a great part of it to his own Dominions. and frighted the Inhabitants by threatning banishment to them, into an imbracement of Circumcifion, and the other Jewish Rites.

At this time the two Brothers Antiochus Grypus (called by Josephus Philometor) and Antiochus Cyzicenos in Syria, attending nothing but the destruction of each other, the Defendants had little hope of any fuccour from either of them, onely Zoilus, who gaped after the City himself, gave them a little relief. There remaining no help to be hoped for but either from Hzypt, or Cyprus (whither Lathurus had been expelled by his Mother Cleopatra) they sent to him, desiring he would rescue them out of the hands of Alexander, giving him hopes, that he should not onely have them, but the Inhabitants of Gaza also on his side, and that Zoilus, the Sidonians and others would come and help him. He being puffed up with these promises made what haste he could, but Demanetus one of their Citizens perswaded them for reasons formerly recited to refuse his help, notwithstanding which he came on, and pitching his Tents near the City, feeing he had no Message from them, began to be discouraged. But Effeging Pto- Zoilus and the Gazeans came shortly to him, and defired his help against Alexander, limais, the who wasted their Territories, whereupon the siege was raised before Ptolemais, and Alexander departed home, wherein he attempted to overturn by policy the defign of Ptolomy. Alexander suffered him quietly to pass foolishly supposing that the victory would be more eafie if the Enemy had the River on his back, and so could not run away. For some time the Victory was doubtful, or feemed to incline to Alexanders party, till his Soldiers being beaten back by a reserve of fresh men, and having none to fuccour them, were put to flight, and the Enemy gave the chace as long as he could hold a fword for weariness, so that thirty thousand (some have affirmed

Ptolomy ranging up and down the Countrey, fell at length into some Villages, which seeing full of Women and Children, he commanded his Soldiers to kill them promifcuoully, and cutting off their limbs to cast them into hot Caldrons, that a report going that his Army are mans flesh, the enemy might thereby be discouraged. But Cleopatra hearing that her son thus prospered in his undertakings, thought her self concerned therein, especially he being to near her, and therefore the came against him with Forces both by Land and Sea, over which she placed Checcias and Ananias, both Jews. Her son thinking he had her at advantage, being now out of Egypt, hasted thither, but she had left it fo provided, as he could not do any thing according to his purpole, and was beaten back to Gaza by a party she sent after him. She having taken Ptolemais, Alexander thither came to her, where he was received as a person distressed by her adversary, and one who onely had refuge in her felf. Some advised her to seize his Countrey into her hands, and not to fuffer so many good Jews to be at the command and pleafure of one man: but Anamias counting it wickedness for him to disposessa man received into friendship, and his own Kinsman besides, and withall thinkwho entereth king that thereby he should lose himself with the Jews in all places, he perswaded into League her to the contrary, and so she entered into a League with him at Scythopolis, a City

In the mean time Apollodotus their General brake out into his Camp by night with twelve thoufand men, and as long as night lasted had the better of it, but as soon as it was day the Jews Uniting themselves, and encouraged after they saw Ptolomy was not come as they expected, charged the Towns-men fo fiercely that they sew a thousand men. For all this they would not yield, expeding the coming of Aretas the Arabian King; but the City was taken ere they could see his face, by the treachery of Lysimachus the Brother of Apollodotus, whom he envying for being in so great grace with the People, murdered, and then getting a party close about him delivered up the place. Being inraged hereat he slew about fix thousand of them; made up the place about the Altar with boards to defend him for the time to come from the violence of the multitude, and furnished himself with Guards hired out of Pisidia and Cilicia. Then overthrew he the Arabians, and imposed Tribute upon the Moabites and Galadites, and levelled Amathus with the ground, Theodorus not once daring to ingage. But making another expedition against the Arabians, he was drawn into an Ambush by Obeda their King, and being thrust amongst the Craggy and precipitous Rocks by a multitude of Ca-He is defeated mels, he hardly escaped by flight to Jernsalem, his whole Army being cut them, so that joyning with him they made up an Army of three thousand Horse; cap. 22. and forty thousand Foot, their King having twenty fix thousand and two hundred men in his Army. Both at the first laboured to draw their Enemies to revolt, Demetrius those Greeks that were in pay with Alexander, and he the Jews which had called him in, but this succeeding on no part, they both resolved to end the controversie with dint of sword. Demetrius had the better of it (all Alexanders Auxiliaries being flain, though they behaved themselves most gallantly) but he was no whit better, but much worse for his victory. For the Jews taking pity of their King after this his defeat, about fix thousand went over to him, which so discouraged Demetrius, that hethereupon retreated into his own Country.

9. They thenceforth waged War with him by themselves, but still had the worst of it, and many of them were flain. About eight thousand men got away by night and passed all the time he lived, in Exile, and so ever after the Kingdom continued free from feditions. Afterwards Alexander gathering together his Forces, went and took divers Towns with all the Valley of Antiochus his conquests (as it was called) and the Castle Gamala, and returned to Jerusalem at the end of three years, now joyfully and honourably received by his people for his valour; and indeed at this time the Nation, what by his own, and the diligence of his predecessors, arrived at that height for dominion and glory abroad, that they enjoyed many Cities in Syria, Idumea, Phanicia, and other Countries; whereof a Ca- 13. cap. 13. talogue of most Josephus hath left unto us, and amongst which Pollu a Town of Moab was destroyed, because the Inhabitants refused to receive the Jewish Rites. them the loss of a just King, and so stirred up the multitude to mourning and lamentation, that hereby she procured him (even as he forelold her) a more honourable burial than elfe he could have had, and as fumptuous a funeral as any of his Predecessors obtained. Alexander left two sons by this his wife, Hyreamus and Aristobulus; but to her left the management of the Kingdom. The elder of their followeth and fons was not at all made for government, but dull and heavy. She being in great grace with the People, because she ever had pretended to dislike the proceedings of her husband, made Hyrcanns the High-Priest, not fo much out of respect to his birthright as his laziness, keeping the title of Queen and Governess, though indeed all things were ordered at the will and pleasure of the Pharifees, whom the People were commanded to obey, and against whom all such constitutions as were made by Hyrcanus were taken away. Yet she took care for something her self, for she kept in pay a great number of foreigners, and so increased her power, that she became formidable abroad, and fuch a terror to the neighbouring petty Governors, that the constrained them to give Hostages.

11. Yet no great matters were done abroad, but ftirs fufficient hapned within the Kingdom; for the Pharisees knowing no moderation in the profecution of their ambitious and envious desires, caused her to put to death those that had counfelled her husband to deal cruelly with the eight hundred before mentioned, and they made away divers of them; till such time as those of most power and esteem being backed by Aristobulus (who complained of the too great power of his Mother) came to Court, and there laid before her how unworthy it was, that they should suffer so much for their faithfulness to Alexander, and how joyful news it would be to Aretas the Arabian and others, to hear that the Kingdom was deprived flirs betwirt of fuch men, who had done good fervice against him. They befought her, that if their adversaries were not satisfied with what blood they had spilt already, to give them leave to depart, and provide for their own fafety, or if that could not be granted, to distribute them into several places of strength, that there they might live quietly and meanly, with which condition they would be contented, feeing Fortune so frowned upon the favourers of Alexander. They setting these things off with all advantage possible to gain compassion, and calling on the ghost of Alexander, Aristobulus also foundly reprehended his Mother, but withal added, that they were justly punished for permitting the chief power to be in a woman, as if no pofterity had been left by his Father. A report dutable went at the same time, that Tigranes the Armenian had invaded Syria with fifty thousand men, and would speedily come into Judea, which so terrified both Queen and People, that they sent Ambassadors to him then lying before Ptolemais; for Celene or Cleopatra then reigned in Syria, and had advised her Subjects to exclude him. He kindly received the Ambaffadors, because come so far to tender him respect, and gave them incouraging words. And after he had taken Ptolemais, news being brought him, that Lucullus in his pursute of Mithridates the Great, King of Pontus, was entred Armenia, and wasted the Country, he being Son in Law to that King, and therefore taking his part, departed home with all Expediti-

After this, Alexandra falling grievously sick, Aristobulus judged that now or never was there a fit opportunity for him to do fomething, and left the Pharifees should get all into their hands, departed by night with one man in his company, and got the Castles within a short time into his power, which she had committed to their adversaries, even to the number of twenty two within little more than fifteen dayes. Thither was sent also an Ambassage of the Jews themselves, who declared they were unwilling to live under Kings, it being the custom of their Country to yield obedience to the Priest of their God; and that though these two were of that race of Priests, yet being desirous to change the Government into another form, they thereby intended to enflave them. Hyrcanus accused his brother of ambition and violence, in that he had gone about to deprive him of his birth-right, and the other excused himself by the necessity of the thing, lest the Principality should have been transferred into another family by his heavy dulness, which rendered him incapable of employment. To Hyrcanus bare witness one thousand Tens which Antipater had brought for that purpole, but to Aritholius a Company of effeminate Gallants, ridiculous to all for their fantaltick bravery. He followed him, and in the way heard how Mithridates of Pontus was killed by his Son Pharnaces. His first nights quarters he took up at Jericho, where the Trees grew, that being cut distilled with the precious Balfamum; and the next day marching towards Jerusalem, Aristobulus repenting of what he had done, came and met him, offered him money, and referred himself to his pleasure, so that omitting War he would order things in a peaceable manner. He pardoning him, fent Gabinius to Jerusalem to fetch the money; but he being flut out by Aristobulus his Souldiers, returned empty handed, which Pompey taking in great disdain, committed Aristobulus to custody, and went himself to the City. There were two factions disagreeing with each other, whereof that of Ari- cap. 8. ftobulus brake down the bridge, which went out of the City to the Temple, and therein fortified themselves, whereupon the other let in the Romans into the City and Palace. Then did Pompey befiege the Temple, filled up with the great toil of his Souldiers the Ditch before it, and with Engines brought from Tyre battered the Walls, taking occasion at the superstition of the Jews, who thought it finful to do any thing on the Sabbath-dayes, but defend themselves. He undertook the War against him, by this time having ten thousand Foot, and one thousand and five hundred Horse at his Command, but notwithstanding he overthrew him not far from Jerusalem, killing and taking fix thousand of them, and then befleged him in the Castle Alexandrium whither he had sled. Leaving here sufficient ftrength for carrying on the fiege, he went and visited the Countrey, causing divers Cities to be re-edified, and then returning, and more powerfully inforcing the fiege, Alexander yielded himself, and the Castles, which by his Mothers advice to addition and Gabinius were demolithed, lett they mount notate Priefthood, but cantonized the behinful allo went to Jerufalem, and eltablished Hyrcanss in the Priefthood, but cantonized the behinful allo went to Jerufalem, and eltablished Hyrcanss in the Priefthood, but cantonized the Gabinius were demolished, lest they should nourish another War. One division was to be Governed by an Assembly at Jerusalem, another by one at Gadara, a third at Amathus, a fourth at Jericho, and a fifth by one fitting at Saphora a Town of Samaria. The Jews very gladly embraced this Government. But Aristobulus not long after escaped from Rome, and coming into Judea ministred occasion of further trouble.

Then prepared Gabinius an expedition against the Parthians, but passing over Euphrates, washired by Ptolomy Auletes to reduce him into his Kingdom, as we faid in the foregoing Chapter. In this voyage he made use of Hyrcanus, and especially Antipater, who furnished him with supplies, both of men and provisions, and prevailed with the Jews, inhabiting about Pelusium, to give him passage. But during his absence Alexander the Son of Aristobulus made work enough for him after his return; for having gotten toge-Alexander his ther a great multitude of Jews, he resolved to cut off all the Romans that inhabi-

Gabinius victoriously thence marched to Jerusalem, where setling things according to the pleasure of Antipater, he went against the Nabateans whom he overthrew in one battel, and dismissed Mithridates and Orfanes, two noble Parthians who had fled unto him, pretending an escape. Then returning to Rome, he left his Province to Crassus his Successor.

But going against the Parthians, he received the reward of his Sacriledge and Perjury, being slain. Cassius flying into Syria defended it from the incursions of the Enemy, and being come to Tire visited also Judea, where at the first onset he took Taricheas, and therein thirty thousand Captives, which he led away and slew Pitholaus the favourer of Aristobulus at the defire of Antipater, who now grew very confiderable, having entered into Confederacy and Alliance with feveral Princes, and especially with the Arabian, out of whose Countrey he had Marryed a Wife of noble extraction, by name Crpris, by whom he had four Sons, Phalaelius, Herod, Joseph, and Pheroras, and a Daughter named Salome, which Sons he also sent into Arabia, there to be kept whilst he was ingaged in the War with Ariftobulus. When Pompey was driven beyond cap. 13. 6 is the Ionian Sea, and Cafar had got Rome into his power, he fet Aristobulus at liber- billo ni prim ty, and with two Legions fent him back into Syria, hoping that all that Countrey, cap. 7. and round about Judea, might be brought under by him; but he was prevented in his journey, being poyloned by those of Pompey's party, and lay in his own Countrey for some time unburied, being Embalmed, till by Antony he was sent to be buried in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors. This expedition proved fatal, not only to himself, but his Son Alexander also, who was beheaded by Scipio at Antioch, by order from Pompey, being first arraigned before the judgment seat for his offen-Alternate, be ces committed against the Romans. His Brother Antigonus with his Sisters were sent

But especially the forward and bold disposition of Herod affrighted them, whom they looked upon as a young and growing Tyrant, and therefore they grievously enveighed against Antipater to Hyrcanus, as one who carryed away all the profit of the Kingdom, an empty name being only left to himfelf, and laboured to bring him into suspicion, hinting that ere long the vizard would be taken off, and he would dearly pay for the negligence of his own affairs. This they enforced by that bold act of Herod's killing Ezechias, and the rest, in contempt of the Laws, which suffer no man, how wicked foever, to be put to death, till he first be cast by the sentence of his Judges. mode to fr. Sextus Casar hearing of it, with threats wrote to Hyrcanus to: quit him, which he was inclinable enough unto, loving him as his He appeareth, own Son; and when he appeared to answer, no body durst accuse him, except one but with a Sameas bolder than the rest, who invasished action him to the control him.

Sameas bolder than the rest, who inveighed against him for the manner of his appearance, not fuitable at all to humility or guilt. The meeting being encouraged by his words, had certainly condemned him, had not Hyrcanus foreseen it, and sent him out of the way on purpose, having put off the determination to the next day. Herod retired therefore to Damascus, and afterwards visiting Sextus Cesar, and fetling his affairs, plainly gave out, that he would no more appear though he were cited, at which they at Jerusalem fretted, and sought to perswade Hyrcanus that all this rended to his ruin, and indeed he was convinced of it, yet could he do nothing. for that innate dulness which evermore accompanied him, though shortly after hearing that Herod had purchased of that Casar the Government of Calesgria, he feared he would imploy his power against him. And indeed so it happed; for disdaining now that he had been commanded to come and plead his cause, he marched towards Jerusalem with an Army, and if his Father and Brother had not met him, and shewed him the uncertainty of the event of War, and that he was rather beholding to Hyrcanus for discharging him, than had reason to be angry with him, for being as it were forced by others to summon him up, he had made mischief Andhad done enough: But being prevailed with by them, he thought it was sufficient for him to michief but have made a shew of his power, and so retreated. 23.A civil War following and the chief Captains on both fides running up and down Josepha to provide themselves for it, Cassius one of the conspirators came into Syria, where Antiquinities, raifing the fiege at Apamia, he drew both Murcus and Baffus to his own party, and of the belle i. i. then conquering the Country, levied men, and exacted grievous contributions: 69. But especially he afflicted Judes, laying a taxe of above seven hundred Talents of Silver upon it.

Antipaer committed the raising of the money to histwo Sons and others, whereof Herod first of all raised that which was imposed upon Galile, and brought it, thinking it good policy to purchase the favour of the Romans at the cost of others. Divers Cities with their Inhabitants were fold to make up the sum. amongst which the principal were, Gophna, Emaus, Lydia, and Thamna; and Cassius having done this, was further so inraged, that he had slain Malichus also one of the Collectors, had not Hyrcams by the means of Antipater, stopped his mouth with one hundred Talents of his own money. But Antipater was badly rewarded by Malichus, for after the departure of Cassius he lay in wait for his life, thinking, that he being removed out of the way, the greater fecurity would happen to the affairs of Hyrcanus. Antipater getting knowledge of his intention, passed over Jordan, to provide himfelf to revenge this treachery, but he being a most crafty diffembler, so denyed the matter with Oaths to his two Sons, that they reconciled him to their Father, who by his intercession then faved him, when Murcus the Prefident of Syria upon the report of his attempting new matters, had refolved his death. Herod visiting Samaria, and feeing it much out of order, laboured what he might to cherish it, and sate in Judgement, deciding the controversies of the People, and then presently came up to Jerusalem to the Feast with a Company of Souldiers at his heels. Malichus being exceedingly afraid of his coming, perswaded Hyrcanus not to permit him to enter, and he accordingly forbad him to approach so holy a solemnity with a prophane rout of strangers; but he notwithstanding this, got in by night, and so affrighted Malichus that he betook him to his old trade of dissembling, weeping to him birterly for the death of Antipater as his kind friend, yet in the mean time providing himself of a guard, so that for a time it was thought fit by Herods friends, not to evince his deceit, but for the shunning of suspition to treat him fairly; yet did he fignifie by Letters his Fathers death to Cassius, who willed him again to revenge it, and gave order to the Tribunes then lying at Tyre to affift him in his just en- datique prices deavours. Cassus not long after having taken Landicea, they went and carryed him crowns and money, and then Hand thought to be even with him; but he sufferching fomething at Tyre, out of desperation cast higher matters than ever in his head. For his Son being kept hostage in that City, he resolved to go in, and nead. For his son being kept notage in that city, he reloved to go in, and early him out by fleath into Judea, and then, when Caffius should be ingaged in the War against Antony, to follicit that Country to revolt, and get to himself the Principality, and cast out Hyrcanus. But the cunning of Herod prevented him, who being aware of his project, invited him and Hyrcanus to supper, and then sent to the Tribunes to come out to meet him, who remembring the commands of Cassins, encountering him on the shoar, slew him there. Hyrcanus was so astonished with fear at the fact, that he was not himfelf, and scarcely recovering his sense, asked Herod who had flain Malichus; to whom one of the Tribunes answered, the His Son Herod command of Cassius, at which he replyed, that Cassius had preserved both him and revengeth his his Country, by cutring off him that had plotted the destruction of both. Whether he spake this seriously, or approved the thing out of fear, is uncertain; but thus Herod revenged his Fathers death upou Malichus.

means of Falix, who being left there Commander, the Souldiers attempted violence upon Phasaelus, intending by his death to revenge that of Malichus upon his & de billo lib. Brother Herod. It hapned that at that time Herod living at Damascus with Fabius 1. 6. 10. the Roman Captain, was fick, and unable to come and help his Brother, but he by himself was too hard for Falix, and forced him into a Tower, whence he let him go with his life, and then expostulated much with Hyrcanus, objecting ingratitude to him for taking Fælix his part, and fuffering the Brother of Malichus to seize upon divers Castles; for now he held many, and Massada amongst the rest, the strongest of all. But Herod after his recovery regained them all from him, suffering him to depart quietly out of Massada upon his desire. Returning to Terusalem he was received very honourably, not only by the People, but Hyrcanus also, who had of late received him into his family, contracting him to Marianne the Daughter of Alexander, the Son of Aristobulus, and his own niece by his Daughter; by which Wife he was made a Father of three Sons and two Daughters, having on a former Wife (and his own Country-woman) named Doris, begotten Antipater his eldest Son. Antony being come into Bithyma, Ambassadors were sent to him thither from cap. 22: Stirs in Judea all Countries, and amongst the rest came some from the chief of the Jews, to complain of Phasalus and Herod, who usurped, as they said, all the power, an empty title being only left to Hyrcanus. Herod went to defend himself, and so prevailed with his Money, that his accusers were never heard. Antony having reached Ephelius, an Ambassie was dispatched to him in the name of Hyrcanius, and the whole Nation, defining that all Captives which Cassus had carryed away out of Judea, might be set at liberty by his Letters published throughout the Province, c2, 23, which he readily granted out, and as he was travelling into Syria, Cleopatra met him in Gilicia, to whose allurements wholly giving up himself, at the same time came one hundred of the most considerable of the Jews to complain again of the two Brothers, whom Messala defended, and Hyrcanus himself stood by to assist. Their cause being heard at Daphne, Antony demanded of Hyrcanus whether part was fitter to Govern, who answering in commendation of Herod, he, who formerly loved the young men for their Fathers sake with whom he had contracted familiarity when he served in Ægypt under Gabinius, constituted them both Tetrarchs, and committed to them the Government of the Jews. To this purpose he wrote Letters, and cast fifteen of their adversaries into prison, and had put them to death, had not Herods intercession prevailed for them; and yet were they not discouraged fo as to defift. For instead of one hundred, a thousand returned in Ambassage, and stayed for him at Tyre, but his savour being surther purchased by the two Brothers, he commanded the Magistrate of that place to animadvert upon them, and assist the order in obtaining the principality. Herod going to them as they stood before the City on the shoar, advised them to withdraw the slelves, and Hyvcanus Which end in also laid before them in how great danger they were if they should go on in the promotion their purpose: But they contemning their advice were presently fall'n upon out of the Town by their own Country-men and the Inhabitants, and part of them being flain, and fome taken, the rest returned. And the people clamouring exceedingly against Herod, Antony was so far incensed, as he caused those whom he had before committed to custody to be flain.

Daily skirmishes thence insued, Antigonus his party staying for the feast of Pente-cost, expecting then a great multitude of people to come up from all parts, and accordingly at the day many thousands being assembled, what with Arms, and what without, they overran all, except the Palace which still Herod and his Brother Phasaelus kept with a few Souldiers, with whom also issuing out into the Suburbs, having there fought most manfully, he put many thousands to flight. Shortly after, Antigonus procured Pacorus the Parthian with a few horse-men to enter Jerusalem, under pretence of composing the difference, but indeed to establish him in the power, who being kindly met by Phasaelus, and entertained, he perswaded him to goin Ambassage to Barzapharnes, thereby intending to entrap him. He suspecting nothing, went contrary to the mind of his Brother, who advised him rather to destroy the perfidious Barbarians, and with him went also Hyrcanns (an unheard-of imployment for the Prince himself) under conduct of Pacorus.

As foon as they came into Galile, they were met by the Governors of the Brossus and Towns there, and Barzapharnes entertained them very civily, and gave them gifts, fa ambufage but prefertly fought how he might entrap them. Phyllus was lodged with his Train to Bargaban near the Sea, where hearing that Antigoms had made such a bargain with the Parmare perfiner near the Sea, where hearing that Antigonus had made such a bargain with the Par-dioully apply thians, as is above related, began to suspect them, and then he had also intelligence, that they would be laid in wait for by night, and be privately fecured; and certainly they had been taken ere now, but that there was great expectation, that the Partitions which Paconin had left at Jerujalem, flould take Herod, and thereupon the thing was deferred, left coming to his ears, he flould have notice of their Treachery, and thereby cleape it. Shortly after, his fears were confirmed when he a. M. 30%. faw a Guard coming to fecure him, whereupon there were not wanting fome that V. Phaselus had sent to make known his condition to him, but the Mellengers were intercepted, which he having knowledge of had a conference with the Chief of the Parthians then at Jerufalem, who by all means Bured before at Juniful and the content of the Palace. dea, his Brother Joseph met him, and perswaded him to dismiss the most of his followers, because the Castle could not harbour them, which he did to the number of nine thousand and above, giving them money to bear their charges, and taking the ablest Souldiers, whom he had culled out from amongst the rest, with his relations, to the number of eight hundred, he marched on to Massada, and there placed them, where no fort of Provisions was wanting; but he himself held on for Petra in Arabia, hoping of that King, who was fuch a friend of his Fathers, to obtain help for the recovery of his Brothers liberty. But the Parthians after his departure from Jerusalem plundred the City and Palace, and wasted the Country, in which they destroyed Marifa a wealthy Town, and so reducing Antigonus into Judea, delivered up Hyrcanus and Phalelus into his hands, who was grievoully troubled that the women had escaped, which he intended together with the money to have given to the Parthians.

Then fearing that Hyrcanus by the favour of the people might again be reftored to the Kingdom, he either cut or bit off his ears, making him thereby uncapable of the Pricfthood, which by the Law was not given, but to one of an Malignan has entire body. But Phaselus knowing he was defined to death, for that he could vig rectived not otherwise kill himself for his bonds defined to death, for that he could not otherwise kill himself for his bonds, dashed out his brains against a stone. It was reported, that being grievously wounded in his head, Antigonus caused poyson to be put into it instead of salve; and that he hearing before his death that his brother Herod had escaped, underwent it cheerfully, as leaving behind him a revenger of it. And he certainly knowing nothing thereof, laboured exceedingly to prevent it, going to Malchus the Arabian, whom he knew to be obliged to his family, hoping of him to get money, either upon free gift or trust, and resolving to give three hundred Talents for his brothers Ransom, whose Son also a Child of seven years old he carrved with him to leave as a pledge. But the Arabian being perswaded by his great ones to retain the money owing, with the goods which Antipater had deposited with him, fent some to meet him, and command him to depart from his borders, and after he was gone repented of what he had done, and fent after him, but too late. For he was now almost got into Ægypt, hearing of his Brothers death in the way, where Cleopatra kindly entertained him, intending to use him in her Wars; but nothing could hinder him from hasting to Rome, though in the Winter season, and though great ftirs were reported to be in Italy, whither also he came, though with great danger, for the difficulty of Navigation.

31. He came thither when not long before there had been an agreement made betwixt Antony and Cafar the Triumvirs (the former having marryed Octavia sister to the later) and another betwixt them two and young Pompey, who then held Sicily, which was a time convenient enough for his affairs. He made his application to Antony, of whose favour he had formerly tasted, recounting to him the whole story of the Parthians overrunning Judea, of his brothers death, and the mifery of his family now belieged in a Castle and how through these Tempests both at Sea and Land, he had ventured to come to him as his only harbour and refuge; and withal he was not sparing in offering money to him, in case he could procure him to be declared King of Judea. Pity wrought something with Ant cap. 250 tony (being backed with the memory of that friendship which had passed betwixt Antipater and himself) the money more, and to these being superadded an hatred of Antigonus, whom he accounted a turbulent man, and one that bore a mindfull of hatred towards the Romans, he much inclined to favour him. Cafar alfo, partly for that Antipater had done good service for his adoptive Father in Antipater and because he was willing to gratifie Antony, was ready to do him all good Offices, being also inclined to favour him out of a particular fancy he had to the man for his courage. The Senate therefore being called, first Messala, and then Atratonius commended him to them, relating his Fathers, and then his own merits towards the Commonwealth; and withall they accused Antigonus, and inveighed against him as an Enemy, for that he had not only born himself as such heretofore, but now of late in the calling in of the Parthians. Herewith the Senate being offended, Antony then declared to them that it would much conduce to the carrying on of the Parthian War, which was now depending, if Herod should be King; so that without any more to do, he was fo declared by unanimous confent, and then

32. During his absence, Antigonus laid close siege to the Castle of Missada, Josephus de where he left his relations, abounding with all forts of provisions; only water was bille it i.e. 12: wanting; so that Joseph had thoughts of flying with two hundred men into Arabia, the King whereof he had now heard to have repented of the rejecting of his brother. But this was prevented by a shower which fell by night, as if sent on purpose from Heaven for their relief, whereupon they were so heartned, as to fally out upon the befiegers, whereof they cut off many. In the mean while Vent ns the Roman General being fent into Syria to expel the Parthians thence, after their retreat, came into Judea, pretending to help Joseph, but indeed with intention to fleece Antigonus of a round sum of money, and this he did, pitching his tents nigh to Jerusalem, which being done, he drew off the greater part of his forces, and left Silo with a party behind him, left the fraud should be understood, whom Antigonus was also to pacific till such time as the Parthians could come to help him. But in the mean time Herod landed at Ptolemais, and having got together no mean company, hasted through Galile against him. To Silo and Ventidius Antony had 1dem Antle. mean company, naucu tinough Came against the Kingdom. Ventidius was then buffe had a 25th fent express order by Gellius, to place him in the Kingdom. Ventidius was then buffe had a 3566. in composing differences amongst the Cities, which the incursion of the Parthians had made: Silo was in Judea, but corrupted by Antigonus. Yet Herods forces increasing, he marched towards Massada to relieve his friends, which he accomplished, having first taken Joppe in his way, notwithstanding the lying in wait against him by Antigonus, after which having taken in also the Castle Resta, he went up to ferusalem, accompanied by Silo's Souldiers, and many Citizens affrighted at his power. Laying siege to the City, both he and Antigonus laboured to draw over the contrary parties to themselves, and though Herod could not at all move the Townsmen, yet it appeared that Silo was corrupted; for he caused some of his Souldiers to begin a mutiny, requiring to be led into a place more plentyfull of provisions, which Antigonus had all cut off; but Herod took fuch care for the bringing in of new, that his plot was frustrated, and taking out a party of 'ten Companies (half Jews and half Romans) went and took Jericho, forfaken of its Inhabitants, which he left to be rifled by the Romans. Then returning, he fent down the rest of their Army into their Winter quarters, which he appointed in Idumea, Galile, and Samaria. Antigonus also obtained of Siloto have part of his men received into Lydda, thereby endeavouring to curry favour with Antony; so that the Romans lay idle all this feafon in places abounding with all necessaries.

33. Herod was not idle, but fending his Brother Joseph into Idumea with one thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, went down into Galile to reduce some places there held by Antigonus; and within a short while brought all the Country into obedience, except those menthat lurked in caves, and then dividing to his Souldiers one hundred and fifty drachmes a man, placed them also in their Winter quarters. Silo a little after came to him, being cast off by Antigonus, who had ordered the Inhabitants to take all necessaries with them, and fliginto the mountains, that so the Romans might be starved. Ventidius being now ingaged in Syria against the Parthians, fent to Silo to come to him when he had with Herod finished the War. But Herod having no confidence in him, difmiffed him beforehand, and went himfelf against the Thieves, who dwelling in caves with their families in craggy and inacceffible rocks, he was fain to invent certain cages, which being let down to the fitles of the rocks full of Armed men, either flew them or tumbled them down headlong out of their holes, or else burnt them within, and by this means he subdued them all. Then placing Ptolomy over that Country, he marched into Samaria, but was prefently forced to return, for Ptolomy being fet upon by those who formerly had disturbed Galile, was flain, and then they betook themselves into the fens and inaccessible places, and thence making excursions, robbed all the Coasts thereabouts; but Herod returning punished them, pulled down their places of strength, and fined the Cities one hundred Talents. In the mean while Ventidius having slain Pacorns, and put the Parthians to flight, by Antonius his command sent Macharas to help Herod, with two Legions, and one thousand Horse; but he being corrupted also by Antigonus, would need sgo to him as a fpie against Herods will; Yet when he went could not be received, but was laid at with darts, fo that repenting he had not followed Herods advice, he went and secured himself in Emans, killing all the Jews that came in his way, without any difference of friend or Enemy, out of madness for what had hapned unto him. Herod being hereat enraged, refolved to go and complain to Antony, but he entreated him to stay, or if he went, however to leave Joseph with him to carry on the War against Antigonus, which later he granted, yet charging his Brother not to venture all, nor contend with Macharas. Then hasted he to Samosata upon the River Euphrates, before which Antony then lay, leading Auxiliaries with him both Horse and Foot. At Antioch he met with many, that having a design to go thither, durst not for the Barbarians, who lying in the wayes, made great slaughters of travellers, but he taking the conduct of them upon him, ftoutly defended them against the violence of the Robbers, and with great credit for his valour safely arrived at the Camp of Antony.

Shortly after his arrival Antiochus yielded up the place, and then Antony committing the Province to Softus, and commending to him the affairs of Herod, went away back into Egypt. In the mean while Jojeph neglecting his Bro- zden de bills at thers Counsel, was slain in Judea, and great innovations followed in that place and prime cap. 13. in Galile; which Herod understanding, being sent before by Sofius with two Legions, lying at Daphne the Suburb of Antioch, marched into Galile, where he worsted the Enemy, and took the Castle they fled into, whence hasting to Jericho, he there feasted the chief Inhabitants in a room, which upon his departure to his chamber presently fell down, and thereupon he was accounted to be especially owned by God, who had so wonderfully preserved him. Not long after he got five Towns into his hands, wherein he put to the fword two thousand of the Garrison Souldiers, and then went against Pappus, whom Antigonus had sent into Samaria in a vain oftentation, as able to wage War in both places. Pappus gave him battel very boldly, but he overthrew him, and in revenge of his Brothers death did great execution, whereby Antigonus his interest was clearly broken, and he thought of quitting the City, had the weather suffered the King to improve the Victory, and make an end of the War. At night Herod being weary, went to wash in a chamber, where one boy only was with him, and therein chanced to be diversarmed men of the Enemy, who though they might have eafily dispatched him then naked, yet were they so affrighted, as they gladly got out and faved themselves by flight. The extremity of the weather being over, he went up to Jerusalem and laid siege to it in the third year after he had been declared King at Rome, intending to use the same manner of oppositi- 1dem datiq at on as Pompey had made formerly against the Temple. But during the siege he turned off prime cap, 28. to Samaria, and there marryed Marianne Daughter to Alexander and niece of Aristobulus, formerly contracted to him. Antigonus came and fell on his knees before Sofius, who received him with reviling speeches, calling him Antigona. Herod had much adoe to keep the Souldiers from entering the fecret places of the Temple, and to restrain them from slaughters, demanding of Solius if the Romans intended to make him King of a defert, and adding, that he should think the price of all that blood which was spilt to be very little, though the Dominion of all the World should come into the bargain, and at length was fain to redeem the City from further trouble by his own money, wherewith he dismissed the Romans sufficiently inriched. The affairs of Sicilie Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

From the death of Timoleon to the Sicilian or first Punick War, containing the space of seventy three years. 1. He constitutions of Timoleon being Popular, and tending to the loose liberty of the Vulgar, which was destitute of lawfully successive Princes, Sicilie continued not in peace many years, being of all other places, through want of lawful Monarchs, most subject to the ambition and tyranny of those, who, though private Citizens, through flattery and deceit enflaved their neighbours. Amongst the rest Agathocles is most eminent; none that ever in any time went before him, coming up to him, or, reaching him by far in cunning and cruel-The Original ty. Be- ann. 4. fore he was born, and when his Mother was yet great with him, the Delphick Oracle foretold, that he should be the author of great calamities to the Carthaginians, and also to all Sicilie, and for that cause he was exposed by his Father, but preserved by his Mother, and referved to fuch a time unknown to him, as he repenting of what he had done, gladly understood from her of his fafety. Being then again received by his Father, he was brought up in the trade of a Potter, and was but young when Timoleon overthrew the Carthaginians at the River Cremiffus, and made all free of Syracuse that would come thither. He was then with his Father admitted into that City, and not long after his Father dyed, but one Damas a chief Citizen being extraordinarily affected towards him for his comlinets, gave him whereon fufficiently to live, and afterwards being created the Captain of the Agrigentines, beflowed on him the place of a Colonel in the Army, for that he was wont formerly in mufters to wear those arms which none else could bear for their bigness. But the Chief command was committed to Heraclides and Sofistratus, the later of which out of envy defrauded him of the rewards of his valour, which he now abundantly shewed, whereat he was so inraged, as to accuse him and his Companions to the people, of affecting the Tyranny, but they giving no credit to his words, Sofistratus after his return feized on the Principality. the Carthaginians, and a great number of the chiefest Citizens were ingaged. Having once broke into the City Gela, and there being overmatched by Solistratus and the Towns-men, so that he and his party were all of them in danger to be cut off, he sent his Trumpetters round about to the Walls, commanding them to found an Allarm, whereby it came to pass (as he intended) that the Enemy thinking the besiegers had broken in from all quarters, retired from him to repulle them, and to he fafely retreated this Sconce. This business of Sosistratus being over, and Acestorides the Corintbian Suffected to Created General of the Syracustans, Agathockes was suspected because of his politick affect the Ty- head, to affect the Tyranny; ver Acettorides would not take him of militable head, to affect the Tyranny; yet Acestorides would not take him of publickly, for Afterwards the Exiles of Solistratus his faction being received, and a peace made with the Carthaginians, he lived as an out-law within the Country, but gathering together confiderable forces, proved to formidable to his own Citizens, and their new Allies, that they fought to him themselves to return, and having brought him into the Temple of Ceres, there took an Oath of him not to be against the popular Government. Making a fliew then of Patronizing Democracie, he so inveigled the people by his fair speeches and cunning pretences, that he was constituted General, and keeper of the Peace, till such time as the differences then on foot, through the restitution of the Exiles, should be composed; and then having obtained his wished for opportunity, the Army being at his beck, and under pretence of opposing some, who at Erbita had lately revolted, fufficient occasion being taken to increase his strength, he marched out as against the Rebels, and united unto him three thousand men, some whereof had formerly served him against the Carthaginians, and were most addicted to himfelf, and adverse both to the people in general, and the fix hundred who now had the power in their hands, after the Aristocracie was taken away. With these, and certain Syraculians, who being poor themselves envyed the wealth of others, he strengthned himself, and acculing the fix hundred to the Souldiers as having plotted against him, procured them casily to be taken for Enemies, and causing an Allarm to be founded, commanded the Army to march to the City, and there to kill the Malignants, and take the spoyl of them and all their party.

The Army marching prefently to the City, every part thereof was filled with flaughters, there being no difference made betwirt friend and Enemy, but according to the riches or poverty of the persons, and many running out into the streets to know what the matter was, were flain as they asked the question : all the Gates were shut that none might escape, so that four thousand by this means in one day perished. Many leaped down the Walls, of which some perished in the fall, but others to the number of six thousand escaped, of which most Massice to be field to Agrigentum, where they were courteously received, but sufficiently tormented in this respect, that their Wives and Daughters at home were abused by the Souldiers in revenge for their escape. Agathocles being glutted with a two dayes flaughter, gathered together the multitude of his Captives, of which he only difmiffed Dinecrates for his former friendship, but the rest he presently put to death or banished, and then calling the people together, grievoully inveighed against the fix hundred, and at the Aristocratical Government, and then mentioning what he had done to purchase the liberty of his Country, very formally laid down his Office, knowing certainly he should be sollicited to take it up again. For, his Souldiers now made rich by other mens goods, would not endure that he, or his authority, should forfake them, but cryed out he must take care of them, so that with much adoe, as it feemed, he took upon him the Office of Chief Captain, but without a Collegue, being unwilling, as he faid, to be called to an account for others breaking the Laws, when as he acted according to them; to which the people confenting, he was Cre- A. on the Carthaginians, as they pursued their friends, drove them back, and with great flaughter gave the chace unto their Camps. Agathocles judging this a fit feafon for aning agement, arose with his whole Army, and fell upon them in their Trenches, into which he brake, and there maintained for some time a hot dispute, tills

the Enemy repulsed him by help especially of Slingers, natives of the Island

Baleares, who being exercifed after the fathion of that Countrey in flinging of itones, forced back the Syracufans, by throwing at them thole of a pound weight. Yet he broke inin other places, and had almost done his work, when fresh supplies to the Enemy arrived out of Africk, which falling on him in his rear, turned the fate of the day clear against him, and put his men to flight, of which great execution was done by five thousand Africans that gave the chace, many al-

fo destroyed themselves by drinking over hastily, out of extremity of the heat which then raged through the influence of the Dog Star. So that he loft no fewer than seven thousand men, six hundred onely of the Carthaginians being

Ambaffadors, expostulated with him his breaking the League, and constrained him to give the Castle up again into the hands of the Meffenians. The year after, the Exiles 4d. ann. 3. that lived at Agrigentum exhorting their entertainers not to fuffer him thus to go on in his Conquests, and make a prey of their Towns, for that it was better now to set upon him before he had confirmed his Tyranny, than when he should be grown too The Agricus strong for them, and to be forced to War with him against their Wills. This appeartinage ing to be but reason, the people decreed the Waz, and having entred into a strict Althat production in the people decreed the war, and many by the Lorest lance with them of Gela and Messena, sent some of the Exiles to Lacedaman, thence relove to and calling to mind the worth of Timoleon. At that time was there in that City one Acrotatus Son to Cleomenes the King, labouring under the envy of most of the youth, because the Lacedamonians having been overthrown by Antipater, who then Governed Macedonia (after the death of Alexander the Great) when such as returned from the defeat were acquitted by the people, he alone had opposed the decree. Being inraged hereat, they beat him, and laid in wait for his life, whereupon now defirous of fome foreign command, he easily accepted of this imployment, and without consent of the Ephori, with a few ships sailed to Agrigentum, yet did he nothing worthy, either of his family or Country, but proving more bloody and cruel than the tyrants themfelves, incurred the displeasure of the people. Giving himself up to all luxury, and therewith spending the publick revenue, he murd'red Sosistratus the Chief of the Exiles having invited him to supper, for nothing but out of emulation, whereupon he was deprived of his command, and had been froned, but that he withdrew himfelf into his own Country. After his departure a composure was made by the interposition of Amilear the Carthaginian, upon these terms, that of the Greek Cities Heraclea, Solinus, and Himera should continue under the power of the Carthaginians but the reft, over which the Syracufanians had the Dominion, should be left to their

5. The Island being hereby cleared of the Enemies Forces, he securely laid divers Towns to his Dominions, and with the accellion of many places to his former strength fufficiently confirmed himfelf, having over and above his Syracustans, and Confederates, ten thousand Foot, and three thousand five hundred Horse of Mercenaries in constant pay, and making provision of all forts of Ammunition, for that he foresaw, that the Caribaginians disapproving of the peace made by Amilear, would within a floor while renew the War: The year after feeing himself sufficiently furnished, he re- Ad an . . . folved then not to expect them, but begin himself; yet desiring first to clear his way, by He breakethir removing whatever might hinder him from the neighbouring Cities, he first attempted Messene whither the Exiles of Syracuse had fled; and he first prevailed with them to expel these, and then to admit him into the Town, where he killed six hundred of the chiefest of them, and most adverse to his power. Thence he went to Agrigentum, think- 01, 117, 1861 ing to make also a prey of it; but fixty thips of the Carthaginians with Forces having v. c. 442. lately come thither, he forbore to attempt any thing, and drew his Forces into the Ter-Salvati. ritories of the Carthaginians, where he took in divers Castles. In the mean while Dino- Ptol. Lagi 12. crates the principal man amongst the Exiles sent to Carthage, desiring aid before Agathocles should reduce all Sicily into his power, and having gathered his Companions together, and raised a pretty Force, sent Nymphodorus to the Town of the Centerippini held then by Agathocles, but being promifed to have it betrayed into his hands, under condition they should be left to their own liberty, he got by the night into the Town, but the Garrison having timely knowledge of it, cut him off, and all his followers which had entred, and Agathocles punished the Conspirators. But Dinocrates being called by the Inhabitants of Galaria, with three thousand Foot, and two thoufand Horse marched thither, where Agathoeles his faction being cast out, he pitched his Tents without the Town; but he fent two of his Captains against him with five thousand men, who at length put him, and his whole Army to flight, and recovering the place, animadverted upon the Revolters, Agathocles being elevated with this fuccess, hearing the Carthaginians were seized on an Hill, marched thither, intending to fight them with all the power he could make, but they declining an engagement, in a Triumphant manner he returned unto Syracuse.

6. The year following, the Carthaginians shipped a great Army for Sicily under Conduct of Amilear, a man of high Nobility; but such a Tempest feized on the Fleet, that two hundred and fixty Vellels loaded with men and Pro-The carthagi- visions miscarryed, which made them cover their Wall with black, as it was the cunians receive from upon some great and publick disafter. But Amilear being an industrious man, by flipwrack, gathering together the Relicks of the shipwrack, listed more men after his arrival.

7. Agathocles getting together his straglers betook himself to Gela, having given out, that he determined for Syracuse with all speed, so that three hundered Affricans entering Gela, and fearing nothing, were all cut off by him. Then thut he himfelf up there, that the Carthaginians laying fiege to the place, the Syracufians might have time enough to victual their City, and indeed Amilear thought first of all to befiege it, but afterwards understanding what force was in it, changed his purpose, and took in several Towns and Castles, and behaved himself so obligingly, as many within a short time revolted to him. Agathocles then withdrew to Syracuse, which he furnished with all forts of Provisions for the enduring of a Siege, intending to leave a party for defence thereof, and remove the War into Africk, by passing all his Army over thither. For, considering that the Carthaginians had al- 4d ass. 3i most got all Sicilie, and his consederates generally revolted to them (who were most potent now both at Sea and Land) he judged it (though the most venturous, yet) the fastst way to invade the Enemy in his own Territories, which being a suddain and most unusual thing, he should daunt him therewith, and drive cilic. Communicating therefore this purpose to no man living, he left Syracuse to Grandle to Give a long to the Government of his brother Antander, and severing all the relations of the City still lines on the control of the city still lines on the city s part of them along with him as holtages) he raifed money by feizing the estates of Orphans into his hands (which he promifed to restore when they should come to age) by borrowing money of Merchants, and robbing of Temples; but especially by calling the multitude together, and acquainting them, how he was most ready to endure any hardship, but it pitied him for the People: therefore he advised all that feared themselves and estates to depart, which when the richest and most out of favour had done, he procured them to be cut off, and confiscated all their goods. Then manumiting all flaves that were fit for the Wars, he shipt his men in fixty Vessels, and getting out into the Main whilst the Carthagimans knew not his delign, escaped them by the darkness of the night, and though they chased him all the way, yet arrived he in Africk with his Army in fafety.

8. Once arrived he burnt his Ships, as well to take away from his Soldiers all hope of cscape (thereby to heighten their valour) as also having no great Army, left for the defence of the Navy, left it should be divided. Then fell he upon two Cities immediately, which he took (the Soldiers being encouraged at the fight of fo pleasant and rich a Countrey) but suffered none of his Army to lye there, but destroyed the places, lest his men should relie upon them as a refuge. The Carthabe berneth his ginians were wonderfully daunted at the first report of his landing, concluding he durst not venture over, except he had first, by destroying their Army, made all fure in Sicilie, but understanding the whole affairs by some messengers sent from the Fleet, they gathered courage, blamed their Sea-officers, who having the Sea in their power, had fuffered the Enemy to land, and made choice of two Captains, Hanno and Bomilear, thinking that their enmity towards each other which had been intailed upon them, would prove the commodity of the Commonwealth; though indeed therein they were militaken. These two Generals thought not fit to stay for their affociates, but muster as many of their own Citizens as would make a shift, and so raising forty thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, with two thousand Chariots, they encounter the Enemy. Agathocles his men, many of them, wanting Arms, he made them counterfeit ones, to be so esteemed a far off, and perceiving them to be discouraged at the number of the Carthaginian Horse, he procured many Owles to be let go in the Camp, which birds being taken to bring alwaies good luck with them, the Soldiers were therewith so cheared, that they refolutely fet upon the Enemy, and brake prefently the body of Horse. The Chariots they drove for the most part back amongst the Foot, which they charged also with fuch resolution, that the Wing where Hanno commanded was discomfitted, and he himself slain. Bomilear his Colleague understanding this, having formerly wished for some good opportunity to invade the Tyranny (which the most eminent men of Carthage were many times forced to do, for the avoiding of those cenfures and punishments constantly inflicted upon them for the least miscarriage of fortune, by the heady rabble) thinking now an occasion to be presented to him, as it were from Heaven, resolved to take hold of it. And for that he thought it most convenient for him, that the Enemy should not be overthrown, but an awe continued upon his Citizens, he retreated by little and little, fuffering the Sicilians to prevail, and at length drew off his men to an Hill, whence they all fled as fast as they could to Carthage, having lost of their number one thousand men, and killed of the Greeks but two hundred.

9. The Carthaginians now shut up in their City, and besieged by Agathocles (though they had carried with them above twenty thousand pair of Manicles in their Chariots to bind the Greeks, over whom they promifed themselves an easie Victory) were very much discouraged, and laying the blame of the misfortune upon the neglect of their superstition, sent great gifts to Hercules the god of the Tyrians, from whom they were iffued, and forthat they had redeemed their own Children of late (by others gotten elsewhere) from being sacrifized to Saturn, they presently offered up to him two hundred boyes of the chiefest amongst them for Nobility, being put into the hand of the Statue, and thence falling down into the hollow of it full of fire. They sent also to Amilear into Sicilie for aid, who receiving the news, caufed it to be given out that all the Sicilian Army was cut off, and earneftly thereupon urged the belieged to a furrender of Syracuse, shewing them (to inforce the matter) the Iron-work of the Ships wherein the Army had passed over, which indeed the Carthaginians had taken up into their Vellels after the burning of the Fleet. But the chief men amongst the besieged stayed the rest from yielding, though Antander the hrother of Agathocles was so faint-hearted, as to be for delivering up the City, and cast eight thousand of the contrary faction, and the friends of the exiles, out of the Town: But within a few dayes arrived a Gally from Agathocles, to give them knowledge of his fuccess, which being pursued by the Carthaginians, and the People flocking to the Haven to gaze, the walls were fo forfa-Amiltar rai. ken that Amiltar taking his opportunity, got fome of his men over, but an Alarm taking his feet being given, they were either flain, or forced headlong down the fortifications. 10. Agathocles in this mean while took divers places in Africk, and fortifying his Camp before Tunis (wherein he also left a strong Garrison) marched further and belieged Adrymis, and drew into fociety with him Elymas the King of the Africans. The Carthaginians having notice of this, turned all their forces upon Tunis, which they belieged, having first become Masters of his Camp; but he hereupon leaving a great part of his Army still before the Town, went with the rest to an high Hill, whence he might eafily be seen both by the Carthaginians that lay before Tunis, and also by the Inhabitants of Adrymis, and there making abundance of fires, deceived them by this stratagem at both places. For the beliegers thought he was coming with a great Army to relieve Tunis, and therefore railed their fiege out of hand, and departed to Carthage, the belieged of Adrymis out of a strong apprehension that new supplies were coming to the Enemy, yielded the Town. Then took he Thapfus by storm, and divers other places, and having now got into his hands about two hundred Towns, went higher up into Libya. The Carthaginians took another occasion at his absence to beliege Tunis, but he thereupon returned as before, but overcame them by a stratagem of a clean contrary Nature with the former; for he commanded that no fires now should be made, and marching very fast fell upon them at unawares, and cutting off two thousand, took very many Prisoners, and forced the other to betake them to their heels, whereby he exceedingly advanced his affairs, giving the Carthaginians such a blow (who now by reason of their supplies arrived out of Sicilie, were thought superiour to him) that improving the Victory he went against Elymas, who had revolted fromhim, and killed him with a great number of his Subjects.

11. The year following, Amilcar in Sicilie once more belieged Syracuse, and 4d ann. 4. presently made great haste for storming of it after his arrival because the Soothsayers had foretold him, that that day he should dine in the City. A great number joyning themselves to him out of hope of plunder, they so stopped up the way with Cariages, that they hindered one another, and such a tumust arose, that the Syracustans having notice of it, fallied out upon them, and putting them to flight made great flaughter of them, and taking Amilear alive, delivered him to the friends of those that had been slain, who most cruelly tortured him to death, having been formerly it's probable, condemned by his ingrateful Citizens themselves, though as then, he having the Army in his power, they durst not let it be known, but Julia 1:22: casting all their votes (written as the manner was) into a Vessel, they ordered it to be covered, and the thing not to be looked into, until his return, and the gi-

The Exiles and Greeks chose them Dinocrates for their Captain, and the Carthaginians, him that had held the next place to Amilcar. The affairs of Sicilie being thus in confusion, the Inhabitants of Agrigentum thinking a fit opportunity for gaining the Principality of the whole Island to be put into their hands, made Zenodocus their Captain, who went and took in divers Towns, many revolting to him (all which with the former he restored to their liberty) and restrained the excursions of the Syracusians, who were in great distress for want of provisions which had been cut off by the Carthaginians, the constant Masters at Sea. By this time Amileu's head was fent over to Agathoeles, who receiving it with joy, raifed the contrary affection in the Enemy, to whose Camp he brought it, together with the message, that their forces were utterly cut off, where-

Archagathus his Sontaking it heignously, returned it to him in his own language with threats, which further so inraged him, that he threw in his Teeth (which was generally reported) his incoftuous having to do with his step-mother. The young man hereat was so transported, as he ran him through and slew him outright which was followed by a mutiny of the whole Army, demanding justice against him; and this flew to that height, that the Soldierschofe themselves Captains, seized on Tunis, and befieged Agathacles and his Son, and many of the Officers upon promife of larger pay, revolted to the Carthaginians, who had not been wanting to add fuel to this flame. Agathocles seeing the danger he was in, put aside his Purple, and made a pitiful Oration to the Soldiers, wherein he told them he was willing to lay down his life if so they pleased, rather than end his dayes by some ignominious death, and drew out his Sword as intending to kill himself; but the Army

The Numidians, whilest he was employed in the battel, having been intent upon the event of the fight, fell in, and plundered his Carriages, and getting away the greatest part of the goods, by reason of the darkness of the night, he was glad to divide the plunder of the field equally amongst his Soldiers, in way As it heelts ob- of recompence for the damage fultained by them. Pomilcar feekerh to invade the Tyranny and miscarricth.

14. Whilft Agathocles was in hand with this treacherous defign, Bomilear having long intended, but still out of fear deferred, the invasion of the Tyranny, communicated his intention to five hundred Citizens, and one thousand Mercenaries, and broke out into open Rebellion against his Countrey. Having seized on the new Citic, he thence invaded the old, which caused great consternation at first, whilest every one scared they had been betrayed into the Enemies hands; but understanding the matter, they presently made head against him, who going on in his way made flaughters of all he met; but what with opposing him in the Streets, and throwing down stenes fron the Houses, they drove him back again into the new Citie through the narrow wayes, and there befieged him. At length upon promile of pardon for what had passed, an agreement was made, and his followers by reason of the danger the Citiestood in, were all dismissed without any punishment; but he, not with standing the faith given to him, was most ignominiously, and with great Tortures put to death.

15. The year after, Agathocles hearing that the Captains of Alexander had taken Idem ad ann. Againocles ta. the Titles of Kings upon them : for that he thought himself neither inseriour to them keth the title in power, Territories, nor for valiant Acts, called himself King in like manner: yet took he not the Diadem, being accustomed constantly to wear a Crown of Myrtles heretofore, either for the Ceremony of some Priesthood, or as * others * Allen Val. have conceived, by reason of baldness, which rendered bim exceedingly uncomely Hist. 116. 116. about the head. Though he prospered thus in Africk, yet was he follicitous for Sicilie, where the Agrigentines had made some progress in freeing the Cities; but now of late had received so great a blow from his Captains, that broke in pieces their defign. Just after the fight was over he arrived, and making a progressabout the Island, recovered most of the Towns, onely he was repulled with great loss from Centorippa, and upon the same terms gain ned Apollonia. Henceforth his affairs began univerfally to decline. In Sicily, Dimocrates got so great an Army of Exiles together, that he durst not fight him, Returning in though continually dared, and dogged at the heels. In Africk his Son Archagathus prospered very much at the first through the good fortune of Eumachus; who fubdued many places. But the Senate at Carthage dividing their Army into three parties, whereof one was to march for the Maritime parts, another for the Island, and the last for the upper Countreys, they thereby attained their ends, viz. to leffen their number in the Citie (which made all Provisions fearce, by fending out thirty thouland men) to contain their Allies in fidelity, by giving them hopes of relief, and (which was the chiefest) to force the Enemy also to divide his Army, and so draw him down from Carthage it

16. For Archagathus dividing his Army to oppose the Carthaginians in the several quarters, loft almost the two parts thereof, which he sent out under Conduct of two feveral Captaines, to the number of about nineteen thouland men; fo that the Carthaginians reduced almost all places back to obedience, all the confederates revolted except a few, and Archagathus being distressed for want of all things, and the remainder of his Army in great terrour, he fent to his Father into Sicily to acquaint him in what posture matters stood, and to desire speedy relief. He feeing his affairs to go down the wind in the Itland was follicitous how to leave it, and three hundred Vessels of the Carthaginians blocked up the mouth of the Haven, so that he could not stir out. But eighteen Vessels coming in from Hetruria, he perswaded the Masters thereof being friends to put out, and then when the Carthaginians (as he expected) gave them the chase, he fell in upon their Rear, and beyond all hope got a Victory, boarding five of their Fleet, which he took together with the Defenders. Hereat encouraged, he sent Leptines against Agrigentum, knowing Xenodocus their General thento be out of favour with a great part of the Town, and he seeing himself unable to grapple with him stirred not out, but provoked by the Citizens, so that being worsted, for fear of condemnation he fled to Gela. Agathocles now feafted the people for joy, making himself common with all, and giving them Wine to excess, so that their wits being out, when that once was in, they might speak their minds, and he thereby know their inclinations; for he feared that after his departure they might call in Dinocra-Being to re. tes and the Exiles, and restore again the popular Government. Having by this means mm more got out who they were that diltasted his power, he seasted them again by them-fire, he ma-selves, with other five hundred who bore the most noble minds, and compassing crein Syracuse. them in with his Mercenaries, slew them every man.

17. Then sayled he over into Africk, where he found his Army in a low and desolate condition for want of necessaries. Therefore resolved he to fight, though far inferionr to the Carthaginians, who fought rather to draw out the time in length, knowing the condition of the Enemy; but he leading down his men to their Trenches, forced them to come out and give battel, in which he fighting valiantly, yet was worsted with the loss of three thousand men. After this a sudden calamity feized upon both the Armies by reason of mistakes. For the Carthaginians offering the most beautiful of their Captives, as a facrifice to their gods, it happened that the fire thence was driven to their Tents, which being covered with Reed and Straw easily catched it, and as easily were consumed, whence it came to pass that all things were in great confusion. But the worst of it was, that the Africans which had fought with Agathocles coming now over to them, the Scouts feeing them,

A thronge ac gave an Alarm, as if all the Greeks taking their advantage of the fire were coming maketh great against them, so that flying in great consusion, they killed and trode down one another, mistaking one another for Enemies, and having thus dispatched five thoufand of their Company, all ran away to Carthage, where they were received with great trembling by their friends, left that with them the Enemy should enter. The Africans which were coming over, being affrighted at the burning of the Camp, retreated, which being also seen by the Greeks, they gave notice to Agathocles that the Carthaginians were coming against him, so that he drew out his men in great fear and terrour, who meeting the Africans, and they taking one another for Enemies, they killed, and flew all they could during the night feafon, till fuch time Agathoclisdef as four thousand being flain, the rest retreated to the Camp. 18. But Archagathus having notice of his intention (which he took in marvailous evil part) communicated it to several of the Officers, who raising a mutiny presently in the Army, Agathocles was seized on, and made sure in Fetters. A little after it hapned that an Allarm was made in the Camp, as if the Enemy approached, which made all Arm themselves and run out, and amongst the rest the Keetiny, wherein pers of Agathocles, whom then the multitude feeing in fuch a condition, cried out Agathacia is presently that he should be loosed; which being done, he forthwith took Boat ters, but being with a few attendants, leaving both his Sons behind him. The Army understanloofed esca- ding this killed them both, and then agreed with the Carthaginians for three hunpeth away, and both his dred Talents to restore the Towns yet in their hands, and that such as would should fons are killed receive pay in their fervice. And fuch as did so had the Terms performed; but by his Army, those that out of hope of succour from Agathocles held out the places, being all forissown terms. ced to yield, their Captains were Crucified, and the common Soldiers being bound in Fetters, were forced with their hard labour to repair that Countrey which formerly they had helped to depopulate.

19. Thus the Carthaginians obtained peace after four years; Divine vengeance hurrying Agathocles to punishment, after that perfidious murder of Ophalles, his two sons being slain on the same day, and by the hands of his Soldiers. After his arrival in Sicily he went presently to Ægesta, a Town consederate with him, whence wanting money he exacted much Treasure, but they grumbling, and complaining thereof, all the poorer fort he brought forth, and flew at the River Scamander, and then tortured the rest with all forts of Torments to make them confess what they had. Some he broke upon the Wheel, others he shot of from Engines as Stones. Some had their Ancles cut off, and endured other fuch cruel torments. He invented a kind of punishment also, something resembling Phalaris his Bull being a bed of Iron, wherein one being put, was burnt or fried to death by fire put underneath. Rich Women had their Ancles broken with Iron Tongs, others their Breasts cut off. Some out of terror burnt themselves in their houses, and others hanged themselves, so that the whole flower of the People being absolutely destroyed, he fold the Children to the Brutii in Italy, and utterly to destroy the name of the City, called it Diceopolis, and Peopled it with Fugitives. Hearing then that his Sons were flain in Africk, to be revenged on the Soldiers, he fent commands to Antander his Brother, to kill all their friends and kinsfolks at Syracuse, which he readily performing, no fex nor age was spared, but so horrid a Massacre committed, that as well old and decrepit men as young infants were included in the flaughter. Such as were thus murdered lying on the Sea shoar, none durst bury them though never for nearly related, fo that the Sea washing them away was coloured with the blood, carrying along with it a note of this cruelty to other parts at a good distance. Agathacles continued his progress up and down the Island, strentbgning piodorus no Towns, and raising money; but Pasiphilus his Captain despising him now for the supra. ad ann. lowness of his fortune, fled over to Dinocrates, and withdrew the Army also from 3 him. This cast him into such despair, that contrary to his former boldness, he sent to Dinocrates, offering to quit the Tyranny, and restore the Government to the People, so he might have but two Castles to maintain himself on, and earnestly prefied him to admit of the conditions. But he gaping after the chief power himChap. VIII. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians. The remainder of the Army being gathered up he received and Dinocrates himself, to whose command he committed part of his Souldiers, and contrary to his own disposition, trusted him to the last. He betraying his companions, flew Paliphius at Gela, and going about in subduing the Towns and Castles (in which work he spent two years) delivered them all up to Agathocles.

21, Not long after, Cassander the King of Macedonia besieging Corcyra, Agathocles went and railed the fiege, burning all his ships in the Havens. Returning to Diodorus in his Army, and understanding that certain Ligurians and Tyrrhenians had joyned A. M. 3704. with those that slew his Son Archagathus, he got them into his power to the number of two thousand, and put them all to the sword. The Bratii (a People which issuing from the Lucanians, were grown mighty high, and at the very first fought against those from whome they had their original, and forced them to a Peace, on Justin lib. 23: equal terms) being offended with him, he failed over into Italy against them, and determined to beliege a Town belonging to them, but they fetting upon him at unawares, forced him with the loss of four thousand men to return to Syracuse. Yet was he not discouraged from making another Expedition against Crotone, which purposing to besiege, he pretended he was about to send his Daughter to the King Ragen against of Epirus with a Royal Fleet, and beguiling them herewith, laid close siege both the Unitaris by Sea and Land to the Town, when they full little thought it. Having undermined a great house, they being terrified thereat, opened their Gates and let him in, after which he plundered the Town, and committed great flaughters. Then entred he into fociety with the Japyges and Pacetii notable Pyrates; whome furnishing with Vessels, he was to have part of the booty; and leaving a Garrison in Crotone, he returned to Syracuse.

22. Once more having prepared an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and two Diodorus ibid: thousand Horse, he passed over into Italy, where being arrived, and committing the Navy to the care of Stilpo, he commanded him to make excursions into the Territories of the Brutii, but he coasting along and wasting the maritime parts, lost almost all his ships by a Tempest. He himself took by storm the City of the Hipponiata, at the report whereof the Brutii were so affrighted, that they sent to him to treat, and delivered up fix hundred Hostages. Yet after his departure they brake their oath, and expelling his Garrison, returned again to their own freedom. Agathocles being returned home, fent his Son of his own name to De-Entereth into metrius Poliorcetes now King of Macedonia, to enter into fociety with him, who Demetrius Po. taking the mellage in good part, rewarded the Ambaliador with royal gifts, and fent one back with him, who under colour of ratifying the League, might espie out the condition of Sicilie. But now it happing, that Agathocles commending Agathocles his Son to the Syracusians as his Successor; and sending him to succeed Archagathus (his nephew by Archagathus his Son, and a man of great courage) in the command of the Army then quartering about Hims; Archaeathus feeing how things were likely to go, plotted the ruin of them both, and fending to Menon, defired him to make the old man away with poyfon, while he in the mean while inviting the young one to a feast, made him drunk, and then killed him. Menon mindful of the message, when the King after meat called for a tooth-pick to cleanse his teeth, dipped one in poylon and gave him it, which he using, began by little and little to wax ill, and then his teeth putrifying in a horrid manner, this was succeeded by tormenting pains. Seeing himself near his end, he called the people toge-Ec is prever- ther, and inveighing bitterly against Archagathus, stirred them up to revenge him ted by poston on him, and reftored the Democracy to the people. 24. The Syraculians having again got the power into their own hands, put to fale Agathocles his goods, pulled down and tare in pieces all his pictures. Menon in the mean while who had poyfoned him being in the Camp with Archagathus, and elevated with the thought of what he had done, made away also Archagathus by treachery, and with good words drawing the Army to himself, resolved to make War upon the Syracustans, and seize on the Principality. The Syracustans therefore having made Hicetas their Prator, sent him out against him, but the Carthaginians joyning with Manon, they were constrained to deliver them four hundred Hostages to let fall the War with them, and receive the Exiles. Afterwards the mercenary Souldiers being denyed the right of Suffrage in the election of Magistrates, a great sedition arose thereupon, and both they and the People took arms, but the better fort interposed themselves, and prevailed with both parties to agree, the Souldiers consenting to depart the Island with their goods. These Mercenaries marching away, came to Messene, a Sea-town standing over against Italy, where being kindly entertained by the Inhabitants, they so well requited them, that in Item that in the night they maffacred them all, and Marrying their Wives, seized upon the Polysinallik I. The Mercena- Town, which they called in their own Campanian Language Mamertina; Mars in ries massacre that speech being named Mamers. Over against this Town stood Rhegium upon the Miljalant, and the promontory of Halp, which being in danger now in the War betwixt the Re-soldier those mans and the Tarentines, the Inhabitants desired of the Romans to have a party Disdom Exfent them for their defence, which being also Campanians, in imitation of what east. 1.22. their Countrymen had done at Messene, and by their help, they also killed or expelled the Inhabitants, and seized upon their Town and Territories. Decisis their chief Commander they banished for the unequal division of the prey, who going thence to Mossene, fell ill afterwards of his eyes, and sent to Rhegium for an expert Physician in this kind, who coming to him, in revenge of what he had done to his Country, applyed Cantharides to his eyes instead of salve, and utterly blinded him. And when the Romans were once difintangled from the War, having grievously refented the Treachery of their Souldiers, they befieged them in the Town, which taking, they brought three hundred of them to Rome, and in the market-place first whipped and then beheaded them, after the custom of their Ancestors, to vindicate their credit with their confederates.

25. In Sicilie were now many petty Tyrants: Hicetas at Syracuse, Phintias at Agrigentum, and several others at other places. These two fell out and Warred with each other, infomuch that by reason of their mutual excursions and depredations their grounds lay untilled. Hicetas having still the upper hand of the other, was so elevated, that he ventured to fight with the Carthaginians at the River Teria, but as it proved to the great loss of his men. Ever fince the death of Agathocles, had the Syracuftur laboured with all their might to reduce that whole Illand into $\frac{Plumb ln}{pyyth}$ their power, and now at this time rather doubling their diligence than at all flack-ing their endcavours, fent over into Italy to Pyrrhus King of Epirus (who now was busie in War against the Romans, being called thither by the Tarentines) defiring aid of him for the expelling of the Africans, and to take upon him the protection of Sicilie. Hicetas having held the Dominion of Syracuse nine years, was then Diodorus ibidejected by Thynio, who together with Sostratus were so vexed with the Carthaginian War, that they again called Pyrrbus into Sicilia. The Mamertines entered into League with the Carthaginians, and resolved if possible to hinder his landing the Romans were also by reason of their enmity with him easily drawn into the confederacy, so that the Straights of Sicilie were narrowly watched. He delaying his A.M. 3782. coming till the next year, the Carthaginians fent back thirty of their Ships upon 0- 91. 125. an. 4. ther occasions, and belieged Syracuse. But then he (having been in Italy now two Astroc. Philathousand men, having also one hundred Ships at anchor in the Haven, yet upon his approach raifed their fiege, not daring to try the hazard of a battel.

26. Pyrrhus coming to the City, reconciled the Inhabitants to their Governours, for which getting great favour, and receiving meffages from diverse Cities, which gave up themselves into his hands, he not onely thought now of gaining Sicily (which he intended to give to his Son, begotten on Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, as Italy to another) but of laying Africk it felf also to his Dominions. Making a journey through the Illand, he received the Cities to protection, and within a fhort space subdued all the places held by the Carthaginians, ex- Diodorus at cept, Lilybaum, a Town built upon the Sea by their Ancestors, after that Dionysius sand. had taken Motra. After he had been some time before it, though a great supply had arrived, yet fent they also to him, offering him money to raise his siege and he was inclined to accept of the offer; but his friends in Council perswaded him by all means to refuse it, and utterly expel the Africans out of Sicily. Then did he with all his might attempt the taking of the place by force, but it being strongly defended, he every time came off with loss, and finally after he had continued the fiege for two moneths, role up and departed. After this he had thoughts Platarely at of becoming Master at Sea, and transporting his Army into Africk; but beha-tribiving himself too Majesterially in the preparation for this attempt he lost himfelf exceedingly, and then suspecting the sidelity of Themo and Softrains, the one he compelled by sear to revolt from him, and the latter he slew as guilty of the fame intention. This fo provoked the Cities, that some revolted back cruety loseth to the Carthaginians, and others to the Mamertines, so that perceiving a great defection, and a conspiracy also hatched against him, being now sollicited also by the Samnites and Tarentines for more aid, he departed again into Italy, being opposed so in his passage by the Carthaginians on the Sea, and that he lost most of his Ships, and so much after he had landed by the Mamertines (who had before wafted over one thousand men) that with much ado he got safe to Ta-

27. After the departure of Pyrrhus, the Soldiers which quartered in the Towns Political life, i. near to Syracuse, beyond all example, created two Magistrates out of their own body, Artemidorus and Hiero, to the great indignation of the People, which took Juffin at prike it in disdain that their priviledge should be thus usurped by the Army. Yet afterwards did they confirm the honour unto Hiero for his great moderation and high abilities, who being the Son of Hierocles, had strange presages whilest yet a Child concerning his future Dignity. He perceiving how in the absence of the Prator, the Syracusians were apt to beseditious, and attempt new matters, entred into affinity with Leptines (by marrying his daughter) whom he knew to be the most confiderable man, and of great Authority amongst the vulgar, that he might supply his place as it were in his absence, and contain the people in obedience. After this marriage was over, taking notice of the loofe Carriage of the old Mercenary Soldiers, and how they were ever inclining to mutinies, he drew them out against A. M. 3730. the Mamertines, who being Barbarians (as the Greeks alwayes termed all belides of 128. an. 2. themselves) had seized upon Messen, and dividing them from the rest, which he with the kept with himself, exposed them against the Enemies, and suffered them every man Piol. especially after that Hiero had got into his power two places near unto them, they were exceedingly straitned.

28. Yet fent they out against him eight thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse under the Conduct of one Cios, who calling the Soothfayers to divine what the iffue should be, they answered, that he was to spend the next night in the Enemies Camp, at which being much elevated, he fet his men in order, and passed over the A. M. 3734. River. Hiero sent two thousand choice Messenians, and sive hundred others, to get about the Hill Thorax, and come upon their backs, he in the mean time charging their front. Here was maintained a sharp dispute, till the seven hundred fresh men coming upon the backs of the Mamertines, did great execution upon them, so that being now compassed about, they betook themselves to flight. Cios the General fighting most valiantly, received so many and great wounds that he swooned with too great expence of bloud, and being taken alive, was brought into the Camp of the Syracusians, where all means possible were used for his recovery. But it hapning that divers Horses being brought out of the Field, he espied that on which his Son rode amongst them; whereat taking an apprehension of the young mans death, in great trouble of mind he untied his wounds, and thereby caused his own end, as unwilling to outlive his fon.

29. The Mamertines upon the news of this defeat were minded to give up them-Hannibal the selves, and their Citie, into the hands of Hiero. But it hapning that Hannibal the Carthaginian General, being at that time in the Illand Lipara, heard of the overceitfully tam-throw, and came over prefently to congratulate Hiero, as he pretended, but indeed to circumvent him with his General craft in which he was well skilled; and Hiero was so wrought upon as to give credit to him, and lye still. Then went he to the Mamertines, and finding them ready to furrender, turned them clearly from it, and drew them to his own interest, by bringing them relief into the Citie. Hi- Palphini thid, ero returning to Syracufe, was for a reward of his great fervice faluted King by the consent of all men, which title he held to his last, the space of fifty four years. Hannibal cunningly placed his Garrison in the Castle, and thereby awed the whole Town, so that the Mamertines then suspected him as much as Hiero, and they himdring thus each other from gaining the place, at length made an accord to carry on the War against it in common. This combination causing the other to be hink They fend to the patronage of them, their own Countrey-men, as being Originally Campathe Romans for mans.

30. The Meffage found no good entertainment with the Senate, for that the Fathers accounted it an abfurd thing for them, who had punished the perfidiousness of those that had seized upon Rhegium so sharply, now to take upon them to protect those that were guilty, and patterns of the same Crime; and they could by no means be brought to confent unto it. But the people (who alone could do it) A. The next year was Appines Claudius accordingly sent over with an Army, with which he put to the worst, both Hiero and Hamibal, and thereupon constrained the other to joyn himself to him against the Carthaginians. This is called the Sicilian, or the first Punick War, which for that it falls into the History of the Romans more especially, under whom thenceforth Sicilia was ever subject, it must necessarily be referred thither, as to its proper place. It began A.M. 3741. the first of the 129 Olympiad, in the 19th of the Reign of Antiochus Soter, the second King of Syria, and the twenty first of Ptolomy Philadelphus, the second also of Egypt, after the division of the Empire of Alexander the Great; twenty two years after the death of Agathocles, in the 490th year after the building of Rome, Appias Claudius Caudex, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, being Confuls.

The affairs of the Romans Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

SECT. I.

From the War of Privernum to the first Punick War, wherein the Romans first set foot out of Italy,

Containing the space of fixty fix years.

War decreed against the Palapolitans.

I. IN the year after the taking of Privernum was War decreed against the Palapolitans. Palapolis stood not far off from the place where Neapolis Livius lib. 8. (now Napoli or Naples) is feated, and, as some think, there where at this day, is seen il borgo de Chiara. The same people inhabited two Cities, being descended from Cume, which was also a Colony of Chalcis in Eubera, now ralled Negropoms. For the Cumani having a good Fleet first passed to the Islands A. M. 3678.

Menaria and Pithecusa, and afterward ventured upon the Continent. The Pile-V.C.173. politans trusting to their own strength, and counting of the treachery of the Alexand, io. Sammites, and the plague Which now had seized upon Rome, committed many Hostile actions against the Romans that inhabited the Countreys about Cume and Falernus. When L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publius Philo were both Confuls the second time, the Faciales were sent to demand restitution, who bringing from those Greeks (more valiant in tongue, faith Livy than in deeds) a fiery and resolute answer, it was resolved that War should be made upon them.

2. Whilest this War depended, the year following was Alexandria in Egypt built, as Livy writeth, whereas the foundation of this City was laid, while Alexander was in Africk, the year before the death of Darins, and the fifth before this, wherein C. Patiliss and L. Papirius Mugilanus were Confuls. This same year he maketh Alexander the King of Epirus to have been flain, who being Uncle by the Mothers fide to Alexander the Great, is thought to have undertaken an expedition into Italy, out of emulation towards his Nephew, that as the one was now Conquering the Bast, so the other might endeavour to subdue the West, having no less matter to work upon in Italy, Africk, and Sicily, than the other found in Asia and Persia. He was deceived by the Oracle of Jupiter of Dodona, which bidding him beware of Pandofia and Acheron, he knowing there was a City of the former name in Epirus, and a River of the later, thought himself so much the safer, as he could get farthest off from these. Being therefore sent for by the Tarentines, he came into Italy, and made War with the Brutii and Lucani, from whom he took many Towns, and three hundred Familier, which he fent as Hostages into Epirus. He entred into a League with the Metapontini and Romans: But the Brutii and Lucani recruiting themselves by the supplies of their neighbours, reinforced the War, and set upon him near Pandosia (a Town situate a little above Consentia, the Metropolis of the Brutin) near to which ran a River called Acheron. Taking this River with his Horse, he was therein slain by a Lucanian, and his dead body being carried down the stream into the Enemies quarters was mangled into pieces. A certain Woman whose Husband and Children were taken prisoners by the Epirotes, got the pieces together, and in exchange for her relations fent his bones to Metapontus, whence they were conveyed into Epirus unto Cleopatra his Wife, and Olympius his Sifter, whereof the one was Sifter, and the other Mother to Alexander

3. The Palapolitans though affifted by the Sammites and Tarentines, were overmatched so, as glad they were to yield up their City, and the Samnites lost three

Being a young man of a beautiful body, Publius attempted filthily to proceed in the state of the proceed in the abuse him, and when he would in no wifefuffer this, most grievously beat and tore his body with rods. In this plight Papyrine got away, and running to the People, by declaring his condition, so affected them, that they procured the Fathers to Decree, that the Confuls should propose to them in the Comitia these two Laws: the fust, That no man should be detained in bonds, except for some misdemeanor, till the time of his punishment: the second, that the money and goods, not the body of the debtor should be responsible. Whereupon all Prisoners for debt were forthwith setat liberty. The year following the Vestini were overthrown by Junius Brutus Scava, the Conful, who also took from them two Towns. His Colleague L. Furius Camillus being fick in Samnium (or the Countrey of the Samnites) pronounced Dictator L. Papyrius Curfor, the most famous Captain by far of those times, who named Q. Fabius Rutilianus for his Master of Horse-men. Papyrius being in Camp against A. The Dictator hearing of this, in a great rage returned to the Camp, and had put him to death, but that he was rescued by the Army, from which flying to the City, Papyrius followed him, and preffing fore to the Senate the necessity of discipline and authority, would not at all give way to the entreaties of the Fathers. This forced M. Fabius the Father of the party to appeal to the People and their Tribunes, by which he ing Fabin Ru- hardly was drawn to pardon him, though his authority was faved together with the

Is bindred tilinus his Matter of the life of Fabius, through the intreaties of those who might justly have Commanded it, was confessed by himself.

4. This severity of the Dictator so alienated the hearts of the Souldiers from him, that it had well nigh cost him the loss of a battel, which constrained him to be more Popular; then afterwards he overthrew the Samnites, and harrazed their Country. The Samultes This made them defire Peace, but returning quickly again to their former enmity, in the second year after, they received another great defeat from A. Cornelius Aruina the Distator. Herewith they were so struck, that they sent all the Prisoners they had home to Rome, with fuch plunder as they had taken, and the dead body with the goods of him who had been the Author of the Revolt, and who fearing to be given uphad killed himfelf. The Senate onely received the men, with fuch goods as any Citizen could challenge for his own, and denied them Peace. At this Livin lik 9. Defire Peace C. Pontine a leading man amongfithem took occasion grievously to enveigh against which is deni- the injustice of the Romans, and causing them to take arms, led them presently near to a place called Caudium, whence having apparelled ten Soldiers in the habit of Shepherds, he sent them to Calatia (where he heard the Confuls lay at present) with a charge, that when they should be asked where the Army of the Samnites was, they should answer in Apulia, belieging Luceria, which it had already well nigh taken. A rumour being already foread abroad of fuch a thing, now obtained greater credit, and the Romans accounted themselves by all means bound to succour Luceria, and the rather, for fear lest all Apulia should revolt. Two wayes there were which led to Luceria: one by the Sea fide open and secure, another through the Straights of Candinum called Furca Candina (at this day Candino, and Forche Caudine, ten miles distant from Benevento) a place incompassed about with high Mountains, and into which one could not enter, nor depart out of it but through very difficult and straight passages. The Confuls leading their Army through this, as the nearest way, were quickly stopped up, so as they could neither proceed nor retire, because on all sides Pontius had blocked up the paslage.

5. The Sammites having the Roman Armies at this advantage, fent to Herennius A. M. 3684. the Father of Pontius their General, and a very wife man, for his advice what was of 114,455. to be done. He fent word they should dismisthe Romans without any injury at V. 6. 433 ail, which answer not pleasing, they sent back for another, and then he coun-

being ascribed to dotage, he came to the Camp, and offered his reasons. He said, he gave the first advice as such, which if followed, would by a great courtesie have for ever obliged a most powerful People, and the fecond, as tending so far to the weakning of their power, as they could not for a long time either recruit themfelves or renew the War, having loft two fo confiderable Armies; as for any third expedient he found none. Being asked concerning a middle way of difmiffing the Romans in fafety, but under the obligation of fome conditions, he answered, that this course would not procure them friends, nor diminish their enemies; for such was the Roman Nation, that being difgraced or defeated, it could not reft, but would still retain the memory of what present necessity urged it to submit to ; neither, faith he, will they fuffer you to rest till punished abundantly. But this wife counsel would not be heard; so that the Romans had these conditions set them: Make it dif-The Army was to march away onely with their clothes, having first in token of flavepass under-the jagum and ry passed under the jugum: the Romans should quit wholly the Country of the Samnites. and thence remove their Colonies: and both Roman and Samnite live under the Came terms of confederacy and alliance. The Armies were constrained to submit, and in great shame and consternation marched away disarmed. This disafter happed in the four hundred thirty third year of the City, and the third after the death of Alexander the Great, when T. Veturius Calvinus the first, and Sp. Posthumius the second time were Confuls.

6. The City was most grievously afflicted with shame and anger at so disgraceful and unusual a thing. Posthumius perswaded the Senate to deliver himself and his Collegue into the hands of the Samnites, as being onely obliged to the conditions, and not the State, which was unacquainted therewith. This being accordingly done, Pontius refused to receive them, exclaiming against the perfidiousness of the Romans. The Army then marching down again sufficiently revenged themselves, under the conduct of Papirius. Several Towns which had revolted were recovered, and scarce could the Sammites obtain a Truce for two years. They Separate often brake this Truce ere the time was out, and thereby drew the War again upon them, which enduring for eleven years, they lost many thousands of men, with many Towns, which humbled them fo, that upon their submission the usual confederacy was granted to them. Then were the Æqui chastized, who had helped them, and thereby were other Nations affrighted into subjection. In the second year after, began another War with the Hetruscans, wherein were fought divers bloody battels; but still the Romanshad the better, who stormed divers Towns, and wasted the Country. Two yearsafter, the Sammites rebelled again, and joyned with the Hetruscans, but with the same success as formerly, being grievously slaughtered, especially under the conduct of Q. Fabius Maximus, and Decius Mus; the later of whom, feeing his wing give ground, in a great and bloody battel fought with the Samnites and Galls (for those now had joyned with them) solemnly devoted him-Drive Mass as felf and the Enemy to the Dir Manes, and rushing into the midst was killed, as his fore him . - F. ther had been forty four years before. Still continued the mileries of the Samvoteth himself wites, and two years after their last Army (for this time it must be understood) was cur in pieces by L. Papirius fon to the former, who also took many Towns, and tor his fervice obtained a most splendid Triumph. It is observed, that over the Samnites the Romans triumphed thirty times: viz. Confuls twenty fix times, L. Papirius the Dictator twice, Publius Philo once, who first of all others triumphed with Proconsular power, and once Q. Fabius another Proconsul. The Family of the Fabii obtained, of these thirty, sour triumphs, and that of the Papirii five, as may be seen in the Capitoline Tables. This war having begun in the 410 account of the year of the City, ended in the 481, and therefore continued 71 years, not fifty

War windle onely, as I lorus, according to his custome, fallely computeth; neither 81 as Appian, nor 49 onely, as Entropius; nor yet onely seventy, which number Livie affigneth with tolerble difference. All Writers agree, that the Romans had no Enemy in Italy, who longer, or more pertinaciously, mannaged the grand quarrel with them, than the Sammites.

7. During thesefuccesses abroad, the People having got of late so many priviledges, were reasonably quiet; yet their Tribunes having one occasion left to create trouble to the Fathers, stomached much that all the Priests and Mugars should be created out of the Nobility, and laboured to make the Commons partakers of thise hood and Au Offices. The Senate made no great refiftance, as being now accommed to yield, gurfing communicated to and that in things of far greater moment, as the Compatible, Conformer, Destator fund. the Commons, and Triumphs. So, whereas as yet there were but four chief Bitests and as many

Augurs, to them were added four, and to those five out of the body of the Commons. And this same year did M. Valerius the Conful preser a Law of Appeale more diligently enacted. Now was it the third time preferred fince the banishment of the Kings, alwaies by the same Family. The cause of renewing it, saith Livie, I suppose was no other, than that the power of a few prevailed above the liberty of the Commons. Which cannot be, if we consider, how for a long time the will of the multitude had got ground, and before this overturned the prerogative of the Patricians. The Lex Porcia, faith he, feemeth alone to be enacted for the backs of the Citizens, because it inflicted an heavy punishment upon him that should beat with rods or kill a Roman Citizen. The Lex Valeria having prohibited any to be killed or beaten who had appealed, if any did contrary, added no more than it was naughtily done, which (such was then the modesty of men) was I believe, a fufficient obligation for the Law. Now scarcely can any one threaten a Slave in that manner. Fabius Gurges after this, being Conful, fought unprosperously with Livil Epiton. the Samnites, whereupon the Senate confulted about removing him from the Ar- lib. 11. my. Fabius Maximus his Father deprecating this ignominy, prevented it, by promissing he would go to the War as Legatus or Lieutenant to his Son. After this were Colonies fent to Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The Triumviri for Capital matters were now also first made. The contest came to that height, that the Plebeians departed into the Janiculum, for the reconciliation and reducement of whom, Q. Hortensius was made Dictator. He appealed them with good words, and perswaded them to return, by promising that for the time to come their Plebiscita should have the force of A.M. 3719. Laws, and bind the whole politick body. They imbraced the Philosophy of Pythagoras, especially one Archytas, who governed the Citie a long time. In aftertimes luxury was produced by prosperity to such excess, that if credit may be given to Strabo, the Tarentines had more publick Festivals yearly, than the year hath dayes; by reason whereof, the State of the Commonwealth under fuch a Government was rendred much worfe. One of their bad cuftoms was (as he judgeth it) to use the Conduct of Foreiners in their Wars; for against the Messapi and Lucani they employed Alexander the Molossian, and before that Archidamus the Son of Agesslaus, as afterward Cleonymus and Agathos cles; and afterwards Pyrrbus against the Romans. They contended with the Messapii about Heraclea, and imployed also against them the two Kings of the Daunii and Pencetii. it should appear that the iffue of this battel was doubtful, and Civero writeth that Decius was flain. Florus relateth, that first in Apulia, and then at Asculum the Romans had better fuccess, Curius and Fabricius being Consils; for now the ter-Severalinesee ror of the Elephants was worn off, and C. Minutius by cutting off the Probects mean of the from one, shewed that the Beasts could die. Darts were thrown so thick upon them, and fire upon the Towers on their backs, that the Army was forely diffreffed, in which condition it remained till night relieved it, and the King being the last that fled, having received a wound in his shoulder, was carryed out by his Guard in his Armour. But as Florus is to be read with great caution in every place, so especially in this; for Curius and Fabricius were never Consuls together, as the Tables show. This therefore is to be referred to the ensuing year wherein C. Fabricius Luscims, and Q. Hemylius Papus (both of them the second time) were Confuls. Plutarch writeth that two dayes together Pyrrhus and the Confuls fought at Asculum; whereof, on the former, his Elephants could do him no fervice, but on the later, chusing a more even ground, by the means of the Ele-phanus especially, he drove the Romans back into their Camp, having slain of them fix thousand, and lost three thousand and five hundred and five of his own men, as Hieronymus relateth out of the Kings Records. But he addeth, that Dionysius neither wrote any thing of two battels fought at Afculum, neither, for certain, of Pyrhus his Victory: one fight he mentioned fought till Sun-fet, at the conclusion whereof Pyrrhus was wounded in the Arm, which wound, with the Sammites rifling his baggage, put an end to it; either party having lost above fifteen thoufand men. That this battel (or those battels) fell out in the year aforesaid is clear from that which moved Pyrrhus this way to attempt the ending of the controverfie. For the Confuls, Fabricius and Æmilius, receiving a Letter from the Kings * De bac biffs * Physician, wherein he offered to poyson him, upon condition to be well requited, ria aliter area they wrote back to Pyrrbus to acquaint him with the Treason, and in theirs in- dios relata confule Livii cluded the Phylicians Letter. with mountains, over which no Army could pass. 14. Pyrrhus after this action at Asculum, is reported to have answered one who congratulated with him about his fuccess, in this manner : If we overcome the Romans another time ne are utterly lost. For he had by this time lost a great part of the Souldiers he had brought over, and almost all his friends and Captains: he had no more to fend for : he perceived his Italian Allies to loiter, and the Romans to have a constant supply, whereby they presently recruited their Army, and filled up their Legions, and he faw clearly that their courage was nothing daunted by the loss of one battel, but rather their strength and resolution to be the more increased. Being pressed with these difficulties, he had prefently a recourse to vain hopes, occasioned by such affairs as cast him necessarily into an anxious deliberation. For at the same time, the Agrigentines, Syracusans, and Leontines, out of Sicily, gave up themselves to him, desiring his help in casting out the Carthaginians, and clearing the Island of Tyrants: and out of Greece came intelligence, that Ptolomeus Carannus was slain in battel by the Galls, and therefore it was most convenient for him to come into Macedsmia, now without a King. Valerius Levinus the Conful hasting to give him battel ere the affistance of the Confederates came, he drew out his Army to him; but before they should joyn, sent to him, offering himself an Umpire betwixt the Romans, and their adversaries, to which Valerius answered, that they neither cared for him as an Umpire, nor feared him as an Enemy, and taking his Spies, he caused them to be led throughout the Camp, and then bade them return, and tell him what they had seen. Pyrrhus pitched his Tents betwixt Estree. Pandosa and Heraclea, a Town situate betwixt Tarentum and Metapontus, built by the Tarentines. The Romans beyond the River Siris not Liris, a River of Campania, as Florus and Orofins Write, who also draw Heraclea out of that part of Magna Gracia, lying upon Siris and Metapontus, into Campania. In the fight Pyrrhus had his Horse killed under him, by one Obsidius a Ferentane, who was flain in the place by his followers. This made him change Armour with one near to him, who being made at for him and struck down, his Armour was taken from off him, and being carried about by the Romans in token of his death, struck such a terrour into his Souldiers that it had cost him the Victory, but that he seasonably with some labour made himself known. Whilest the Victory seemed yet to be doubtful, or rather to incline toward the Romans, the Elephants being brought into the battel decided the controversie. Till the passing of Alexander into the East, this Beast had been talked of, but never seen by the Europeans nor them of Asia, except the Indians and their neighbours, as also the Southern Africans. After this having received the Auxiliaries of the Sammtes, Lucani and Brutii, he marched towards Rome as far as Praneste, a Town eighteen miles distant from the City, wasting all with fire and Sword in his passage. Hearing that the Romans were bufie in recruiting their Army, he confidered it was most creditable for him to make peace with them, being he had no hopes to fubdue them, and for that purpose sent Cineas to feel their minds, a man so powerful in the art of Rhetorick, that the King acknowledged him to have stormed more Cities by his Tongue, than he had Sendeth about ever done by force of Arms. Cineas presented the principal Citizens and their Wives with gifts from Pyrthus; but they refused them: When he had something dist hindedist hindewrought upon the Senate to make a peace, and admit Pyrthus into the Citie, Appius Claudius now blind came in, and by an Oration, recorded by Plutarch, procured the contrary. The Ambassadour at his return being asked what he thought of Rome, answered, that the Senate seemed to him as a Council of so many Kings. After Cineas his return the Romans fent to Pyrrhus about redeeming of Prisoners, amongst others C. Fabricius, a man of great note for virtue and poverty. The King being informed by Cineas concerning his disposition, offered him Gold, which when he refused with great resolution, to try his gravity, the next day as they were talking together, he commanded the greatest Elephant he had to be set behind the hanging, and then on a sudden the Tapestry being removed, the beast Fabricius go. held his Proboscis over Fabricius his head, and roared exceedingly. But he not eth to him a at all terrified, though he had never before feen this kind of Creature, fmiled, bout redeeming of Prifo and told the King, that neither his Gold the day before, nor his Elephant now did at all move him. Perceiving at length that he was involved in the deep hatred of all, and nothing throughout the Island but revolts, new councils and a strong conspiracy against him, he received Letters from the Sammites and Tarentines, who being flut up in their Towns, which they hardly maintained, defired his affiftance. He was glad of fo specious a pretence, that he might not feem to be driven by desperation out of Sicily, which indeed as a perishing Vessel in so great a Tempest he was not able to govern, and so returned into Italy, after he had been absent near as long as formerly he had there

This so animated the Mamertines, that one of them, great in bulk, and glittering with armour, came out far before the rest, and in a threatning manner bade Pyrrhus come forth if he were alive. Pyrrhus inraged with his guard, bloody as he was, and with a terrible countenance rushed through the midft, and coming up to the Barbarian, struck him with such fury upon the head, that the strongh the Swords mettal and the strength of the arm, pierced to the lower part of the body, so that in a moment it was chined down in the middle, and the two parts fell down on either fide. The Barbarians aftonished herear, left off their attempts, and so without further interruption he marched with twenty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse to Tarentum, where increafing his Forces by new levies, he proceeded into Samnium against the Romans, who

there lay incamped. 16. Few of the Sammites joyned now with him, because being so often overthrown by the Romans, their courage was wholly broken, and for that they were displeased with him for his going into Sicily. He divided his Forces into two parts, whereof one he fent against L. Cornelius Lentulus into Lucania to hinder him from joyning with his Colleague M. Curius Dentatus the other Conful, against whom he marched, then lying in a fortified place near Beneventum. Hasting to fet upon him ere the other could come to his relief, with the most valiant of his men, and fiercest of his Elephants picked out, he marched by night towards his Camp, but passing through Woods his lights failed him, and going out of his way he loft his time so much, that at break of day the Romans discovered him upon the Hills. Curius then in halt, as he could, drew out his Forces, and falling upon the vantguard of Pyrrhus put it to flight, killing many men, and taking some Elephants. Animated by this success, he descended into the Plain, whence calling forth those who kept the guard, they from high places so plied

Florus and Orofins, contrary to what Plutarch reporteth of Benext time (concerning which place Learned new to much doubt) make the battel to have been fought in Lucania in the Anguain Plains. Flories writeth, that

Chap.IX. the cause of the Victory was a young Elephants being wounded in the head, which turning back and roaring for the pain, the Dam hearing him, ran as to his relief, and so both of them disordered the battel; she overturning as Enemies all the met. Orofus faith, that the beafts were thus difordered by bundles of hemp befreeared with pitch, which having hooks in them and fet on fire, the Romans cast upon their backs, and the Towers set thereon. Frontinus maketh the battel fought about Fatuentum, in the Arufinian Plains. Entropius is silent concerning the place; but writeth, that Curius Dentatus beat Pyrrbus back to Tarentum, flew twenty three thousand of his men, and led, the first of all others, Elephants (four in number) in triumph to Rome; which beafts the Romans called Luca boves, because they were first brought out of Lucania, where Pyrrhus was overthrown: This maketh much against that place which Plutarch assigneth for the battel, the original of whose error seemeth a mistaking of Beneventum for Fatuentum, or Statuentum, a City of Lucania.

16. This Victory, faith Plutarch, made way for the establishment of the Roman Empire: for the Romans got fuch courage and reputation by this fuccess, that being counted invincible, they presently obtained all Italy, and not long after, Sicily also. As for Pyrrhus, he having spent six years, and fall'n from his hopes both in Italy and Sicily, returned into Epirus, yet with a mind nothing daunted. He was thought the Ablest Captain of all the Kings of that time, both for military skill, and personal valour; but what he had already obtained, he lost still by striving to grasp more. SECT. II.

From the First Punick War, to that with Antiochus the Great, in which the Romans first invaded Asia, the space of thirty seven years.

1. He Umbri and Sallentini being newly subdued, and the number of Questors being increased to eight, the Romans took occasion to transfer their Armies over the Sea into Sicily, and begun that, which from the Island (that gave both occasion to, and was the seat of, it) is by Greek Writers called the Si-The Original cilian War. There had the Mamertines most perfidiously seized on Messay, as is of the stilling already related, and thereupon were become Enemies to Hieron King of Syracuse, who belieged them justly as thieves and murderers, and had taken the City, but that Annibal the Carthaginian cunningly diverted him, with an intention to get it into his own hands, as it came to pass; for pretending fair things to the Mamertines, as before to Hiero, and fending them in provisions, he possessed himself of the Ca-ftle. They being thus cheated by him, and now straightned by both, who had joyned together against them, betook themselves to the Romans for relief. The Senate begun to be very fensible of the power of the Carthaginians, who had now almost the whole Island in their hands, and was jealous of their approach so near to Italy; to that a just quarrel with them seemed very acceptable. But so bad was the cause of the Mamertines, as they could not in conscience undertake the patronage of it, and gave them a denial. From the Senate the thing was brought to A. M. 3740. the People, which besides it's antient use to debate matters concerning War, had 0.128.424 by the Hortensan Law obtained power by it's Plebiscita to bind the whole State, Solestid, p. The Prators showed what great profit would redound to the Commonwealth in Assistic San. general, and particularly to private Citizens (who having suffered much by the late Profess. Philad. Italian Wars, were defirous by a new one to recruit their fortunes) and therefore 21. by a Plebiscitum they decreed aid to be sent to the Mamertines, in the four hundred and eighty ninth year of the City, Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges the third time, and L. milius Vitulus being Confuls. 2. In the year following, and the Confulthip of Appius Claudius Caudex, and

M. Fulzius Flaccus, Appius was fent over with an Army to Messana; to execute the commands of the People. He first defeated Hiero, then the Carthaginians, and for railed the flege. The succeeding Confuls Manins Ottacilins and M. Valerins Maximus, were ordered both, and with all the Legions, to passinto Sicily, wherewith Hire King of Elicro was affiighted into obedience, perceiving that the Roman were molt likely systals being to remain Victors, and made his Peace upon these terms, To restore all their prisoned works and the control of the control world ma-keehlis pear, vers without ranjom, and pay one hundred Talents of Silver. The Roman imbra-with the tase ced his friendship the more readily, for that the Carthaginians being masters at Sea, they could not well fend over provisions, which they hoped might be supplyed by him in good measure. They also by this alliance thought themselves eased of the burthen of War, and therefore the next year they fent over but two Legions. Valerius the Conful from Meffana had the firname of Meffala, who also having taken

Catana, carryed thence a new Sun-Dial to Rome, Papirius Curfor having thirty years A Dialbrought before fet up the first that ever was in that City. This though not perfect, the Peoont of Stilly ple used ninety nine years, till M. Philippus their Confor set up a persect one by it, and about the same time Scipio Nasica being Censor, first divided the equal division of the day into hours, by water dropping out of one veffel into another. This Pliny relateth out of Varro, who also reported, that out of Sicily the first Barbers And Barben, were brought to Rome by P. Ticinius Mena, about the four hundred and fifty fourth year of the City, before which time the Romans never cut their hair. The first that was shaven every day was Scipio Africanus, whom Augustus imitated therein, Beck. none more using the Razor than he.

3. The next year was Agrigentum taken after à long siege; Hannibal who came to raise it being overthrown by L. Postbumius and Q. Mamilius the Consuls. The news whereof filled Rome with excellive joy, and the Citizens now elevated in mind, would not acquiesce in former Councils. It seemed not sufficient to them, that they had faved the Mamertines, nor inriched themselves with great booty: but conceiving good hope that they might be able to cast the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and much thereby promote their affairs, they thitherto directed their thoughts and confultations. On Land indeed they feemed fufficiently to prosper, for L.Vaand Communities of Levius and T. O'Hacilius the fucceeding Confuls, managed the War very well, but A. M. 3713; the Carthagimians without controverlie being Masters at Sea, thereby procured the Ol. 129 de 3.9. Maritime Towns to revolt to them, so that the War was poised betwixt the two Antischetorists interests, now inclining to one side, and then presently to the other. Moreover Ptol. Philadzi Italy was often molefled by the Carthaginian Fleet; but Africk out of all danger. Wherefore they concluded, there was necessity of betaking themselves also to Sea matters. Having never as much as thought of the Sea before, they now fet upon building of one hundred Quinqueremes and twenty Triremes, a thing most difficult, The Roman because the Carpenters were utterly to rece uow to make the But before they had made lies, their use being utterly unknown to the Halians. But before they had made because the Carpenters were utterly to seek how to make the former fort of Galtryal, when they first transported their Forces to Messana, they ventured to fight wth the Carthaginians, who had received the Dominion of the Sea, without any competition from their Ancestors; which boldness and confidence Polybius esteemeth no less than miraculous. First of all Cn. Cornelius the Conful and Admiral, going with feven V sliels to reduce a Town of the Lipareans, was taken in the Haven by one sent from Hannibal. But Duilius his Collegne presently after gave the

Hanibal Cru- Auxiliaries and Legions contended who should have the first place in battel; and to Carthage, where recruiting his Neval Forces he went into Sardinia, and being A.M. 2745 blocked up in a port by the Romans, lost many ships, and for that was crucified by Pal, Max, 1.71 the Souldiers, who overlived the defeat. The punishment which he feared for the 6.3. exter former overthrow he craftily evaded; for, before the thing was heard at Carthage, eximp. 7. he sent one of his friends thither, who coming to the Court, told the Senate that the Roman Admiral was come with a great Fleet, and therefore he was come to ask their advice whether he should fight him. All the Senate answered, there was no doubt but he ought, to which the messenger replyed, he hath fought and is over-

Carthaginians a great overthrow, the Souldiers having provided iron hooks, by the help of which they could board them and fight as on Land. The Romans hereby extraordinarily animated, relieved the Egeftans, and took Macella a certain Town by storm. But Amilear Captain of the Carthaginian Land-Forces then lying at Pa-normus, understanding that in the Roman Camp there was a mutiny, for that the

that the former had separated themselves, he suddenly fell upon them in their removal, and killed almost four thousand men. Hannibal after this loss at Sea departed thrown. By this means he hindered them from condemning that fact, which before they had judged that it ought to be done. 4. Now had the Romans passed both into Sardinia and Corsica; Divine Providence as Cafanbon noteth upon Polybius, so ordering it, that present success should diffiose their minds for fuch future undertakings, as made way for their decreed Empire. (a) Hunno, the year following, being in Sardinia was flain, and his Army (a) oraças cut off by L. Cornelius Scipio the Conful. The next, many Towns were lost and 6.4 for taken in Sicilio on both sides. But (b) Calpurnius Flemma a Roman Tribune (or States, 1.4.4)

Leader of a Legion) gave a great demonstration of his valour. For A. Attilius Examp. 19. Calatinus the Conful, having rashly brought the Army into such straights, out of 10. which there was no possibility to extricate himself, he with three hundred men took silius 1.3.47 an hill near adjoyning, and drew thereby the Carthaginians to himself, till the Ar-alii. my could pass through without opposition. All the three hundred were flain, aft of calvar- yet he forely wounded and covered with dead bodies furvived, being by Roman Writers compared, for this act, to Leonidas the Spartan. This story is twice told by Julius Frontinus, who acquainteth us with the uncertainty of the mans name, fome calling him Lagerius, others Q. Cædiims, but molt Calpurnius Flamma. The following year, C. Aitilius Regulus the Conful fubdued the Islands Lipara and Metita, whereof the late is ennobled by the ship-wrack of St. Paul, lying betwixt Sistly and Africk. Polybius writeth, that first Regulus was worsted at Sea, and then he defeated the Carthaginians. Now the Romans resolved to change the seat of the

Sect. 2. War into Africk, and the next year fent a Fleet under command of the Confuls The Confuls M. Attilus Regulus (who was substituted in the place of Coditius) and L. Manlius, containing three hundred and thirty long and covered thips. The Carthaginians fenfible enough how concerned they were to keep the War from their own doors, opposed them with three hundred and fifty Vessels, and a threefold battel was fought, carthaginians on the same day, in which the Romans remained Victors, having taken fixty four ships with the defendants, and funk thirty, and of their own lost twenty four, but not with the men; for the Carthaginians fearing their Corvi or Iron hooks, were afraid to come near them. Repairing then the ships they had taken, they passed over into Africk, and had furrendered to them Clupea a City seated upon the Promontory Hermaa. This done, they fent to the Senate for further orders, employing themselves, till the return of the messengers, in wasting the Country, which they did without interruption. At length they received the refolution of the Senate, which was, that one of them should continue in Africk with a convenient Army, and the other return to Rome with the remaining Forces. 5. (a) M. Attillius Regulus remained in Africk with forty thips, fifteen thou- (a) Polybiat

The History hereof was curiously and elegantly related by Livie, as (c) Valerius (c) Libit cult telleth us. After this, (d) the Consul gave the Carthaginians a descat, fighting in Exemp. alt. such a place where their Horse and Elephants could do them no service, and then populate in the population of the property of the property of the consultation of the property of the consultation of the property of the property of the consultation of the property of the took Tunetum or Tunis. But not long after he was overthrown himself, taken carthaginians, prisoner, and almost his whole Army lost; this Victory being got for the Cartha-

and not long ginians by Kantippus, the Lacedemonian, whom afterwards fending honourably home A. This 7. plan writeth. Of thirty thousand but a few escaped into the City Aspis (called Ptol. Philad. also Clupea) where they were belieged, till their Enemies perceiving they profited M. Anillio Renothing, rose up and made provision for resisting the succours which the Senate sent guile 2. the following year, under command of M. Emilius Paulus and Ser. Fabrius No. 1. They taking the Sea with three hundred and fifty ships were opposed by the Carthaginians, whom they deseated, and took one hundred and fourteen of their Vessels with the men in them, as Polybius writeth, or took thirty and fank one hundred and four, as Eutropius and Orofius, the later whereof addeth, that of the Carthaeimans were flain thirty five thousand, and that the Romans loft nine Gallies and one thousand and one hundred men. The Consuls then went to Clupea, but, taking in the relicks of the Army, presently set sail again for Sicily. The Pilots told them they must take heed of the outward part of that Island, which was full of shelves and very dangerous, especially at that time betwixt the rifing of Orion and the Dog. But they gave no heed to the Seamen, out of a defire, by shewing of their fresh Victory and Plunder, to procure certain Towns upon the Coasts to yield. They had safely passed the middle of the Sea, and drew near to the Coasts of Camarina, when such a tempest and so great calamities fell upon them, as cannot be expressed, faith Polybius, for the greatness thereof. For, of four hundred and fixty four thips, eighty scarcely were faved, and the rest were Identified. Esin the tree. molifhed. 6. The Romans nothing at all discouraged by the greatest loss that ever a tempest procured, gave order for the making of two hundred and twenty Gallies, which was profecuted with fuch alacrity, that in three months time they were both made and lanched. Astrubal the Carthaginian with all the old Army, new levies, and one hundred and forty Elephants, came into Sicily, and of old and new Vesfels made up a Fleet of two hundred fail. The Confuls A. Attilius and Cn. Cornelius being commanded to pass into Sicily, therein, this year, took several Towns, and returned. Their fuccessors C. Servilius Capio and C. Sempronius Blaso, in the beginning of the next Spring with all the Fleet passed into Sicily, and thence into Africk, where coasting about they landed in many places, but did nothing memoveyed them fafe to Messana. Karthalo the Carthaginian taking advantage of this disafter, besieged, conquered, and burnt Agrigentum, the Walls whereof he also de-

Hiero kindly received, and furnishing them with Cloaths and other necessaries, con- A. M. 2750.

Here they fell upon some quicks in the low water and were in great danger, being utterly ignorant of the Coasts, but the Tide returning, when they had lightned the ships, cleared then off the shelves, and they Another Mip returned in a kind of flight to Panormus in Sicily. Then passing hence towards Rome through the straights very unadvisedly, such a Tempest sell upon them, as above one hundred and fifty ships were lost. Though the Senate and People were marvailously pricked forward to all attempts by defire of glory, yet so many and great were their losses at Sea, that they were constrained to omit naval preparations, and place all their hope in the land Forces. They fent L. Cacilius Metellus and Cn. Furius Pacilus the Confuls into Sicily with the Legions, and fixty ships only, for the conveying of necessaries to the Army. And not only did they plainly yield the Dominion of the Sea to the Carthaginians, but feared them also on Land, because of their Elephants, which had oftentimes done them great dammage. As drubal the Punick General understanding their fears, and how one of the Consuls was returned back into Italy with half of the Army, in great confidence wasted the grounds about Panormus, and the more carelesly, because Metellus kept himself within the Walls. But the Conful taking an opportunity, fo placed his men in respect of the Elephants, that when the Carthaginians came against the Town, he overthrew them, flew twenty thousand, and took twenty fix Elephants, according to Eutropius. But Orofius writeth, that twenty fix were flain, and one hundred and four taken : and Livie related, as appeareth by the Epitome of his nineteenth Book, that one hundred and twenty Elephants were led in triumph, with thirteen Captains of the Enemy. Diodorus Siculses maketh the occasion of the overthrow cartheginians, to have been given by the Celtae, in Afdrubals Army, who meeting with Wine brought thither by Merchants, fo ingurgitated themselves therein, that being not themselves, they broke the ranks and turned all into disorder, which opportunity

Metellus instantly improved. 7. This defeat caused the Carthaginians to desire Peace, and offered to send to veth them to the Senate about it. Amongst the Messengers was Attilius Regulus whom they had overthrown, and taken priforer, five years before, and now bound with an Oath to return to Carthage, in case neither Peace nor exchange of prisoners could be procured. He when he came to Rome, according to what he thought of the interest

The year following, side confet writeth, by hunger and warm difficulties and worm difficulties. because the Land-Forces were very fearful of the Carthaginian Elephants, and very eth it, and for unchearfully went about their work, the Romans provided another Fleet, and befieged Lilybaum, a Town standing upon the Southern Promontory of Sicily, overagainst Africk, but without success, within a while the Navy was brought to nothing, and Amilear Barcas being fent from Carthage troubled Italy with his inroads and depredations. For seven years then did they abstain from the Sea; but being forely disturbed by Amilear, they resolved once more to try their fortune that way, and a Flect was provided, and furnished out of their private purses, the Treafury being now exhausted. With this they gave such a blow to the Carthaginians near the Islands Ægates, under conduct of C. Lutatius Catulus the Consul, as made them give commission to Amilear to conclude a Peace, if he found it requisite, Though he was, as to his own disposition, much averse to it, yet seeing it necessary Polybius I. 3. for his Countries welfare, he made an agreement with Lutatius upon these terms,

That the Carthaginians should wholly quit Sicily; make no War upon the Syracusians or their allies; release without ransom all Prisoners, and pay within the space of twenty years two thousand two hundred Talents of Silver. This pleased not the People, and therefore ten men were sent into Sicily, with full authority to conclude the Peace, who shortned the time of payment, added one thousand Talents to the former sum, and further cautionated that the Carthaginians should not only quit Sicily, but all the Islands also between it and Italy. Thus ended the first Punick War, after it had continued twenty four years, and pieders las. Lilybeum had been besieged ten; in the five hundred and thirteenth year of the A. M. 3764. 2. The Carthaginians submitted to the terms of this Peace, that they might re-

For, Amilear Barcas, after the ratification, drew down the Forces to Lilybeum, and giving them up into the hands of Gesco, to be transported, laid down his Office. Gesco wisely considering what danger there was Lee Polytime of fuch a multitude of Mercenaries it's falling into fedition (especially because they

A lamentable wanted their pay, which the publick Treasury already exhausted could not afford mutiny of the them) conveyed them into Africk by small companies together. But his Superiors, either through inadvertency, or for want of money, difmified them not as they arrived; but stayed them till all should come together, with intention to prevail for an abarement of their wages. The City growing full, many outrages were committed by the Souldiers, which caufed the Townsmen to procure their Captains to lead them out to Sicca a Town not far off, and when they left their baggage behind them, as intending shortly to return to Carthage, they fearing their unwillingness to depart, or their speedy return, because of their Wiyes and Children, in the carriages, forced them to take all away. When they were come to Sicca, they fell into greater licentiousness through want of employment, and demanded larger pay than formerly they had pretended to, expecting also great rewards promised them by their Captains in dangerous adventures. As foon as they were all come thither, Hanno the Carthaginian Pretor was sent to them, who was so far from curing, that he heightned the diftemper. 9. He not only brought none of those things with him which they expected, but complaining of the emptiness of the Treasury, talked of abating something to make up the breachin of their constant wages. This put the multitude into a rage, into which having once fallen, it was hard to be appealed, as upon other accounts, so through the diversity of their speech, things being either misrepresented by unskilful interpreters. or mifunderstood by them who were willing enough to be mistaken. Breathing nothing but fury and violence, they took Arms, and in despight of Hamo and the other Officers marched toward Carthage, and encamped at Tunis, fifteen miles from the City, to the number of twenty thousand. The Carthaginians affrighted at the multitude resolved to satisfie them; but then the Mercenaries perceiving how they were feared, every day invented what to add to their demands, requiring belides their pay the price of their Horses lost in the War; and, after this was granted, Provision for several years, which they said was behind. Their late Mafters not daring to deny them any thing, prevailed that some one who had com-manded them in Sicily should be chosen as Moderator, and the whole matter lest

10. The Souldiers made choice of Gefco, as one who had best deserved of them. And he laboured to pacifie them all he might, and was about to pay them their Arrenrs. But there being in the Army one Spendius, a Campanian of Italy by birth, but by condition a Roman flave, who having ran away from his Mafter, wanted neither strength nor courage; and one Mathos an African; the former fearing to be tortured to death if his Master caught him, as the Roman manner was, and the later though free, fearing to be called to an account for his too great forwardness in the late stirs, sought how to drive all things into extremity, that they might procure a War, inveighing grievously against Gesco and the Carthaginians, ashaving a delign as foon as the rest were dispersed and gone home, to spend their rage against the Africans. The multitude herewith were strangely incensed, so that who ever attempted to speak, before they could be heard what they would say, were all stoned to death except these two. Gesco yet would not cease to do his duty, but went from one Nation to another, labouring to pacific them; but when the Africans demanded allowance for their Provisions, he bade them ask it of Mathos their Captain. This fo transported them, that they plundered the goods of the Carthaginians, with all the money he had brought for the dischargement of the Army, and binding him and his followers in a contumelious manner cast them into

11. By the advice of Mathos they rebelled against the Carthaginians, and so began the War called Libycum and Africum, as also Zundo. Their numbers being increased to seventy thousand. Matho and Spendius now created Generals, divided by a, or Apri their Forces, and belieged Utica and Hippacra. Hanno was fent from Carthage to the relief of the Uticans, and at the first onset drove away the besiegers; but entering the Town, and loitering there, they let upon his Camp without, and killing many, took all his Engines, and other things prepared for the War. His Superiors troubled hereat, created Captain Amilear Bareas, and fent him into the field with feventy Elephants, and ten thousand men. There he was encompassed by the A- Sect. 2. fricans on his Front, the Numidians on his Rear, and Spendius on his Flank, where Anilicar Barcas Naravassus a Numidian with two thousand of his followers revolted to him. Encouraged by this addition he engaged with his Enemies, causing his men so to face about as the Front became the Rear, whereby feeming to be in confusion, the Mercenaries thought they ran, and breaking their Ranks to purfue them he took this opportunity, and fetting on them out of order obtained the Victory, having flain ten thousand, and taken four thousand Prisoners.

12.He gave Arms to all fuch Prisoners as would serve under him, and having exhorted the rest to fight no more against the Carthaginians, dismissed them freely. Spendius and Matho, together with Autaritus Captain of the Galls, hearing this, doubted how far his clemency, especially the offer of indemnity, might prevail with the Africans and others, and confulted how to obviate this his delign by fetting the multitude at irreconcilable enmity with the Carthaginians. To this purpose they feigned Letters to be fent out of Sardinia from their friends, giving them to understand, that certain amongst them held intelligence with the Enemy, and advifing them to keep close Gesco, and the other with him. Spendim taking hereat occasion, earnestly advised them not to trust to the pretended elemency of Amilwho arefur car, and by no means to permit Gesco to escape; for thereby they should incur the contempt of their Enemies, and by strengthening them through the affistance of so great a Captain, not a little damnifie their own affairs. Whillt he yet spake another pretended mellenger brought Letters as from Tunis of the same Contents with the former; and then Autaritus openly protested, that whosoever had any regard to the kinkness of the Carthaginians could not be faithful, and therefore such were to be heard as perswaded the most bitter things against Carthage, all others being Traitors and Enemies. Then did he perswade them to Torture Gesco to death, with fuch as were now with him, and all that hereafter should be taken. There were many which spoke against this cruelty, especially as Gesco was concerned in it; but for some time they were not understood, speaking in their own Languages, and when what they aimed at was fully known, some one cryed out strike them, which so provoked the multitude, that they forthwith stoned them. After this, bringing forth Gefco, and the other Carthaginians to the number of seven hundred. they cruelly tormented them to death; and made a decree, that whomsoever of them for the time to come they should take, he should be used in the same manner, and if any of their Allies were taken, his hands being cut off, he should be fent back to Carthage. This they very carefully afterwards observed, having also refused to deliver the dead bodies to the Messengers that came for them and threatned, if any more came, to deal with them as they had used Gesco.

13. Amilear feeing into what straights he was cast by this boldness of the Mercenaries, fent for Hanno, judging that an end might sooner be put to the War if the Forces of the State were all United. Such of the Enemies as he took in the ten me car-thughnian for heat of the fight he killed, as he might by the Law of War, or taking them alive, cast them to wild beasts. When he thought that he had brought matters into a fair way of recovery, they presently relapsed into a far worse condition than ever. For, the ships that brought Provisions miscarryed by force of Tempest; Sardinia at the same time revolted from them, which was wont to supply them with large Provisions; and Hippacrita and Utica which hitherto had remained faithful. now revolted without any manifest cause. Mathos and Spendius herewith elevated, refolved to lay fiege to Carthage it felf, and shortly after performed it. The Carthaginians in this their diffress betook themselves to their neighbours, whereof vaned by their the Romans, and Hiero King of Syracuse in Sicily, being sensible of the sawciness feeces be of their Enemies, were ready to do them all good Offices. Herewith better ena-feece carbage, of their Enemies, were ready to do them all good Offices. Herewith better ena-bled, they held out, and Amilear lying abroad, so cut off all Provisions from the Mercenaries, that being no other than belieged themselves, they were forced at length to rife up and depart, resolving to observe Amilear's motions, and ly in wait for him on the fides of the Mountains; for they would not venture to take the plain, being afraid of his Elephants, and the Horse of Naravascus; and otherwise they were much inferior to the Carthaginians, who far surpassed them in Military skill, though but equal to them in valour. 14. But Amilear fingling them out by parties, killed many of them, and when they ingaged with their whole Force cut them off by statagems : sometimes by day, otherwhiles by night he would fall upon them on a fudden with great Terror; and fuch of them as he took he cast to the beasts. At length he compassed

Sect. 2. them about in fuch a place, as, though they were afraid to fight they could not cscape, and being shut up within a Ditch and Rampire, they were forced to devour one onother. Though they now could expect no mercy, yet they fent to defire a Parley, and having obtained leave, Autarolus, Zarxas, Spendius, and other Captains were ordered to manage it. It was agreed that the Carthaginians should pick out ten men whom they pleafed, and the other be dismissed in their Coats. The Covenants being finished, Amilear declared that he made choice of those who were present, and so got the most eminent Leaders into his power. The Africans understanding that their Officers were seized, took Arms in great haste, but Amilear with his Elephants and his Army compassing them in on every side, put them to the Sword. For the improvement of this fuccess, he and Annibal went and befleged Mathos in Tunis, before the Walls whereof he nailed Spendius to a Cross with the rest of the Captives. Annibal pitching his Camp on that side of the Town towards Carthage, carelelly demeaned himself, which Mathos considering, made a Sally, and killing many, took much plunder, and amongst other Prisoners Annibal himself, whom bringing to Spendius his Cross, after he had taken down his Collegue's body, he nailed him to it, and killed thirty more of the most Noble of place, and difficulty of paffage, he could give no relief. Marching therefore from Tunis, he fate down by the mouth of the River Macaris, and his Superiours at Carthage making new Levies joyned Hanno in Commission with him. These two. after feveral pallages, at length agreed to fight one fet battel with the Enemy, who consenting, a bloody contest ensued, wherein at length the Carthaginians had the better. A great part of the Africans were flain, and the rest fled to a neighbouring City, where not long after they yielded themselves, and Mathos was taken alive. The Subjects of Carthage now all returned to obedience, except they of Hippacrita and Utica, who being past hope of mercy from their inraged Lords, four moneths, feemed refolved to frand out; but Hanno and Amilear bringing their Forces, conftrained them to submit to such conditions as the Carthaginians would lay upon them. Mathos, and those that were with him being carried to the City, were handled with all forts of contumely and torment, and so this Libyan War ended, having lasted three years, and almost four moneths, being, faith Polybius, the most cruel and wicked that ever we heard of. But it gave the Carthaginians occasion to repent of two great errors, viz. Trusting so great a multitude of Mercenaries together when they were idle; and the cruel, and tyrannical usage of their

16. The Romans, (that we may return to them the History of whom is our proper subject) though they observed the League during these troubles, at and length, as was faid, gave the Carthaginians also reason to like well of their friendship, yet thought they had some cause to be angry with them. For such of their Subjects as fayled from Italy into Africk, they feized on, left they should carry Provisions to their Enemies, and had at Carthage almost five hundred of such kind of men in Prison. Yet when Ambassadors were sent to complain hereof, they kindly dismissed all those in custody, which so affected the Romans, that they also sent them all their Prisoners, gave them all they asked, and permitted their Merchants to carry them necessaries, forbidding them to Traffick with their Enemies: they also refused to hearken to such of the Carthaginian Mercenaries as having betrayed their trust, invited them into Sardinia. But though Polybius telleth us that this they did; yet it appeareth from him also that this modesty continued but for a time. For, allured, as it feemeth, by this invitation, they fayled thither, which much offended the Carthaginians, who thought that the place by far more right belonged to them; fo that they prepared to fend Forces into the Island. The Romans took occasion hereat to decree War against them, complaining that these Forces were not defigned fo much against the Sardinians as themselves, which forced the other, who The Romans, found themselves in no good case to manage the War with them, to give way to from the car- the time, and quit not onely Sardinia, but pay further to the Romans one thousand · and two hundred Talents. This, though fubmitted to at prefent, bred fuch grudges and malice, as at length brake out into another War, a more dangerous and bloody than with more Tribute.

17. In the (a) year after the ending of the first Punick War, the five hundred (2) ciers at Rows, made and fourteenth of the City, C. Clandius Cento, and M. But whereas he is faid by Gellins first to have made or taught playes at Rome, it is to be understood of these two sorts of Poetry now mentioned, (c) Vulerius Maximus telling us, that he drew the minds of the spectators to those shews from the use of Satires, which by little and little succeeded that most antient and plain Roman fort of the Histriones brought out of Etruria, (as we shewed before) for the The Ludi See- Istopping of the Petitlence, through the command of the Oracle. These Ludi See- Lage Livium nici were first managed with rude gestures, and incomposed Songs, called Versus 1.7. or cases. Fescennini from Fescennium a City of Etruria. From these jocular speeches, which di Satira Roat random were wont to be uttered at the Roman Solemnities, came the Satire, as later in time fo more elaborate, and as for metre a perfect Poeme containing ridiculous things digested into Verse, which they were wont to utter amongst themselves, after the antient custom. It differed as much from that of the Greeks, as from the rest differeth Dramatick Poetry, whereof the Romans at this time knew not so much as the name. A Satire being afterwards variously handled by the Romans, at length was reduced to two forts, which Fabius onely acknowledgeth. The former was found out by Lucilius, and the later ennobled by Varro. Horace mentioneth two kinds of most antient Poetry; one whereof they used in the praise of their gods, as when they appealed Tellus with a Sow-pig, and Sylvanus with milk: the other, when in jest and sport they jeered one another, being the same with the Fescennine Verses, whence came the Satires, to which Livius Andronicus added the playes of Comedies and Tragedies, as was observed. 18. Four yearsafter, were celebrated at Rome the third time the Secular Games, A. M. 3769; concerning which it is convenient to speak in this place, that beginners may know 01. 136. an. 1. the differences of Roman exercises. These were called Luidi Magni, as others were, Saturid, 77.

Terentini Ludi (which some not considering have run into consusson) and that more properly than these Sacular ones were, and therefore the rise of them all is to be related. There was one Valefus a man of prime note, amongst the Sabines, who living near Eretus, and not far from Tiber, in a great Plague, had two Sous and a daughter which fell dangerously sick. Amongst his prayers for them, he heard a vide valerism voice that they should recover, if carrying them to Terentus, he would fetch them Maxim. 1. 2.51 some warm water of Tiber from the Altar of Pluto and Proserpina. He thought the City Tarentum was meant, and doubted how he should come by any Tiberine water in that remote part of Italy; but resolving to be obedient, he failed down the River towards Osfia, and late at night arrived at the Campus Martius, where he understood there was a place called Terentus. Landing here, he gave his Children some warm water, wherewith refreshed they fully recovered, and told their Father, how in a dream they had feen a certain god, who commanded, that at the The Original Altar of Pluto and Proferpina black coloured Sacrifices, (furve hostie) should be ofof the Teren fered, as also that Lettisternes (Beds made for the cause of Sacrifice, as whereon to lye down after the Roman fashion at a solemn feast) and night-games should be made. Valefins feeing no Altar in the place, thought of making one, when as his flaves were digging for that purpose, they found one in the earth dedicated to Pluto and Proferpina. Here then he Sacrificed, and three nights together, because of the number of his Children, made Lettisterns and Games, being afterwards from this thing named Manius Valefius Terentinus. Zozimus writeth, that the Romans Trina Terentina one hundred years before being to fight with the Albam, were admonified to build albant trise-this altar in the Earth, and that having facrifized they covered it. This confusion cast Censorinus into such a per-die Natali. plexity about the Secular Games, that he thus expresseth the incertainty of the Roman intervalls of times and ages. 'Some think the Roman ages to be distinguifhed by the Sæcular Games ; which, if it be so, the manner of the Roman age is uncertain. For, concerning the intervalls of times, wherein these Games ought to be ce-' lebrated, we are not only ignorant how great they were formerly, but what they ought to be for the time to come. For, Antias and other Historians, with Varro and Livy, have written, that they ought to be made every hundreth year. But on the contra-"ry both the Commentaries of the Quindecimviri (or fifteen men) and the edicts of 'Augustus testifie, that they ought to be reiterated every hundred and tenth, as * Ho- * corns made. Augustus testifie, that they ought to be renerateaevery immuses and tensors allo letter sade.

Jacobus Cap. elefius about the year 188. These were Terentine Games but not Secular. Now, the Sæcular are of two forts. The greater, which perhaps thou mayst not call amiss * Quindecimvirales, were celebrated at the distance of one hundred and ten years. Of * Vide Tui. this kinde the first were made by the command of the Quindecimviri, in the 298 libit. Horat.in carm. ' year of the City, 110 years, as it seemeth, after the first Terentine Games made by Vale-' fius. So, the Valesian shall fall in the 188 of the City. The first of the Quindecimviri were made in the 298 year of the City, the Second in the 408, the Third in the 518, and the Fourth in the 628. The leffer Sæculum, or Age, confisted but of 100 years, ' instituted as it seemeth, by L. Valerius, after the banishment of the Decemviri, that 'year being according to some the 300 of the City. So the First Centenarie Games agree with the 305 Varronian year of the City, the Second with the 405, the Third with the 505, the Fourth with the 605. 21. Though the Second of the Centenaries should have been celebrated in the 405 year, yet whether it happened through the Gallick War or otherwise (they were not till that following, wherein M. Popilius Lanas the fourth time, and L.Cornelius Scipio were Consuls, as Zozimus writeth. These Censorinus hath omitted and four more, if credit be given to the infeription of a certain stone mentioned by George Herwart, from which it should appear, that before this year were celebrated three Sacular Games, viz.in the 100, 200, and 300 years, according to the account of Pictor, and the 105, 205, and 305, according to that of Varro. Two Solemnities also at the distance of 110 years, as in the 188 and 298, after the account of Varro, to which may be added those made by Poplicola extraordinarily in the 245 year. So that the Games celebrated this year (viz. in the 4c6) may rightly be called the feventh Games. The Quindecimvirals (or those of 100 years) continued till Conflantine's time, who forbad them to be celebrated in the 1067 year of the City. His Son Constantius also prohibited the Centenaries, which in his time fell into the 1100 year of the City. Fifty feven years after, the Heathen got leave of Honorius to celebrate the Terentine Games again in his fixth Confulthip (for which Claudian thanks him) two hundred years after they had been kept by Severus. But to return, these Third Secular Games which gave occasion to this discourse, and were celebrated in the five hundred and eighteenth year of the City, and the fifth after the first Punick War, P. Cornelius Lentulus and C. Licinius Varus being Consuls, were those of the Quindecimviri, or of the interval of 110 years; (a) Livins Lt.

by a War with the Illyrians. For, Tenta Queen of that Nation, the Widow of A. Polybins 1. 24 gron (who for joy that he had prospered in his enterprises against the Ætolians. drank so hard, that he fell into a Pleurisie, and thereof died) elevated by her prosperity in Peace, gave out Commissions to her Subjects to rob all at Sea whomsoever they met with. The Illyrians then having taken Phanice a strong City of Epirus ftruck a great terror into all the Maritime parts of Greece, and fetting upon the Italian Merchants, some they robbed, others they killed, and not a few they carried away prisoners. The Romans having hitherto neglected all complaints against them, when now many came together, fent unto Illyricum Cains and Lucius Coruncani, to inform themselves concerning these matters. Teuta answered, she would take care that no publick injury should be offered to the Romans, but it was not the custom to hinder any from making what private commodity they could out of the Sea. But faith Lucius, the Romans have a good cuftom publickly to profecute private injuries, and to relieve the injured : therefore we will shortly endeayour, God willing, to constrain thee to amend these customs. The Queen took this liberty of speech so hainously, that her Womanish impotency and anger prevailed against the Law of Nations, to have some sent after the Ambassadors who killed Lucius. For this, War was decreed against her, and both the Consuls of the 525 year of the City, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and L. Posthumius Albinus Conful the second time, were fent into Illyricum; Fulvius with the Navy, and his Collegue with the

It was granted to her on these terms: To pay a yearly tribute; sin. to quit all Illyricum, except a very few places: and not to fail beyond the River Quiffus with more than two Barks, and those unarmed. For nine years the Illyrians continued in obedience, till the 535 year of the City, wherein rebelling, they were again reduced by Emilius Paulus and M. Livius the Confuls. For, Demetrius Pharius then their King, forgetting the great favours received from the People of Rome, wasted the Towns of Illyricum subject to the Romans, and passed the bounds fet by the League. Æmilius within seven dayes took Dimalium, and followed him to Pharus, a Town of the Illand Phario, which he also took. Demetrius being fled to Philip King of Macedonia, he feized on the rest of Illgricum, which he ordered to pay a stipend to Pineus the son of Agron. But thus was begun, and sinished the War with Tenta, which Florus (according to his custom, breaking the order and feries of time) fallly placeth after the Gallicum Cifalpinum, or that with the Galls inhabiting within the Alpes.

25. For, the same year wherein the peace was made with Tenta, the promulga- A.M. 37776 ting of the Agrarian Law by C. Flaminius, Tribune of the people, brought this V. c. 526. The Seditious great, and dangerous War upon the Common-wealth. There being a good quanattempts of tity of ground Conquered within the Countrey of these Galls, he preferred a Law try or ground conquered within the control of the dividing of it to the People, man by man. 2. Fabius Maximus being for the dividing of it to the People, man by man. 2. Fabius Maximus being now Conful the second time stiffly opposed it, Sp. Carlotine his Collegue not stirring as (a) Cicero telleth us; the Senate also laboured to cross it, but when in the (a) De Santis Rostra Fluminius read the Law, his Father laying hands on him he obeyed, and went down, though he neither valued the Conful nor Senate, nor yet was affrighted with the levying of an Army. Whether the Law for division

Sect. 2. fully passed or not (by reason of the interruption by old Flaminius) yet this thing gave occasion to a new and great War, as Polybins writeth, who mistaketh the time by four years, for as much as these stirs about the Agrarian fell not out in the five hundred twenty fecond, but the five hundred and twenty fixth of the City, wherewithall the second Consulship of Fabius Maximus, and that of Sp. Carnilius Maximus is joyned. Indeed the first of Fabius fell in with the five hundred and twenty first year of the City, two years before Tenta killed the Ambassador, and two more at least before the finishing of the Illyrian War, whence may be conjectured that as the militake of Polybius might arise from want of diffinction, betwirt the first and second Confulships of Fabius; so the error of Florus (or him, who ever wrote that System) in placing the Gallick War before the Illyrian, might proceed from an (inconsiderate) trust to the Authority of that excellent Author.

26. The report concerning this Law awakened the Galls, especially the Bois who were nearest neighbours. Concluding now that the Romans fought not so much for glory and Dominion, as out of a covetous delign of enriching themselves, they fent to the Insubres for aid, exhorting them to remember what their Ancestors once did at Rome, and to tread in their steps. These joyning together sent over the Alps for other Galls, living near Rhodanus, and called Gessate, from their Wages, faith Polybius, or as others write, from Gessa a kind of weapon they used. Their Kings, Congolitanus and Aneroestus being allured by great promises, with a vast force passed over the Alpes, and joyning with the Insubres and Boii, to the number of fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse brake into Etruria. When first the Romans heard of their passing the Alps, they commanded Amilius the Conful to go to Ariminum, to give them trouble in case they came that way. They ordered one of the Prators into Etruria, for, C. Attilius the other of the Confuls was already fent into Sardinia. The whole City was fad and grievously afflicted, fearing the Galls as fatal to it. All the Registers of the Military age were inquired into, to fee what forces they, and what their Affociates, were able to fet forth. The Italians prepared to fight, not as for the Roman Empire, but their own fafety; fo that an Army wasin readines, consisting of seven hundred thousand Foot, and seventy thousand Horse, according to Polybius. But Fabius Pittor wrote, as Entropius relateth, that eight hundred thousand men were prepared for this War, wherein he himfelf was employed.

reparations on the Roses tained of the Latines eighty thouland Foot, and five thouland Horfe; of the Samble for this flevent thouland Rose and five thouland Horfe; of the Samble for this reference thouland Roses and flevent thouland Horfe. 27. The Tables of the Military age, as they were brought to the Senate, connites seventy thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse; of the lapyges and Messapians fifty thousand Foot, and fixteen thousand Horse; of the Lucanians thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; of the Marsi, Marucini, Ferentani and Vestini twenty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse. And of the Roman people gave their names, together with those of Campania, two hundred and fifty thousand Foot, and two hundred and thirty thousand Horse. The total sum five hundred and fifty eight thousand. There went out with the Consuls four Legions, whereof each contained five thousand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse, together with thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse of the Associates: in all fifty thousand eight hundred Foot, and three thousand two hundred Horse. There were in readiness for necessary occasions, of the Etruscans and Sabines fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, which the Pretor led into Etruria to oppose the Enemy on the Borders. Of the Veneti and Cenomani were assembled twenty thousand and as many of the Unitri and Sas sinates inhabiting the Appennine Mountains, who were placed on the Borders of Gall, by invading the Territories of the Boii to draw them back, and divide them from the rest. These were the Forces placed on the Borders. At Rome were in a readiness, for the uncertain chances of War, as a supply, thirty thousand Foot, and one thousand five hundred Horse of Citizens, besides of the Associates thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. In Sicily, and about Tarentum were placed two Legions, whereof each contained four thousand two hundred Foot, and two thousand Horse. The fum of all these amounts to two hundred ten thousand and three hundred men. So, faith Polybins, the fum of the Forces which guarded the City were one hundred and fifty thousand Foot, and about fix thousand Horse, but the whole number of the multitude fit for War was seven hundred thousand Foot, seventy thousand Horse, which yet Hannibal durst oppose, and invade Italy with scarce twenty thousand. But this will appear further in what shall be hereafter fàid.

Afterwards inroads being made into the Territories of the Galles, they were several times overthrown, and so harrased, that they sent Ambassadors to Rome to beg peace on any terms. Spring moved from his Winter quarters with ninety thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse, and passing over the River Iberus, sudued all the Towns as far as the Pyrenean hills. Then leaving Hanno with a fufficient force to keep the Country, ving conquer and sending as many of the Spanish Soldiers home, he marched with the rest, in as far as the number fifty thousand Foot, and nigh nine thousand Horse, over the Pyreneans Pyrenan hills, and so through Gall unto the Alpes. Having marched one hundred miles in ten dayes from the River Rhodanus, he came to the foot of these Mountains, which when he ascended, he encountred with great difficulties being opposed by the Allobroges (inhabiting the Country now called Savoy) who possessed themselves of the places through which he must necessarily pass. On the ninth day he arrived at the top, whence his Soldiers had a prospect of Italy. Proceeding after a little rest, he lost as many men here in the depth of the Snow, as formerly by the incursions of Enemies, and at length came to a place which would affoard no passage for Horse, or Elephants. The place of it felf was precipitous, but lately by a falling of earth it was become so, to the depth of one thousand foot. He laboured then to bring his men through other wayes never before trodden, but at length the Snow making: them impalfable, he was forced to betake himfelf to the levelling of the Rocki They made a great fire, wherewith the Rock being heated, they putrified it with Vinegar, then did they cleave it, and so diminished the descent by moderate turnings, that not onely the beafts of burthen, but the Elephants also might fafely pass Patteth over Four dayes were spent about the Rock: and by this time almost all the beafts were wasted; for on the top was little grass, and that covered with Snow. Coming lower, certain Valleys afforded pasture, where the Cattel were refreshed, and rest was given to the weary Souldiers. Thence descended Annibal into the Plain, in the fifth moneth after he had parted from new Carthage (built by Asdrubal, and now called Cartagena) in Spain, having passed over the Alpes in sourteen dayes. In the pass fage he lost a great part of his Army, bringing into the Countrey of the Insubres, but ten thousand and two hundred African Foot, eight thousand of the Spanish, and fix thousand Horse,

34. Scipio the Conful having Spain for his Province, was by Sea going thither, when he understood that Hannibal was near the River Rhodanus. There he intended to have given him a stop; but missing of him, he returned on shipboard and hasted to Italy, there to meet him, before his men had yet refreshed themselves. They met aud joyned battel, wherein the Conful had the worst, being wounded, and preserved alive by the valour of his young son afterwards named Africanus. The Roman Senate, when first they received intelligence that Hannibal had passed the Alper, sent for the other Conful Sempronius out of Sicily to the aid of his Collegue: According to order he brought over his Army, and united it with Scipio's at the River Trebia. Having had the better in some skirmishes with certain parties of Annibal, he defired to make trial of a battel, that his Collegue being fick, he might have all the glory of the Victory, and though Scipio alledged, that by delaying to fight the Galls might be farther drawn in, and their own Soldiers better exercised. yet left the battel should be deferred till the coming of the next Confuls, he refolved to fight alone. Annibal feared nothing more, than that they should refuse to fight, because as yet the Galls continued his, and he knew the best of the Roman Captains to be unable to act, and his own Army fresh and chearful. In the battel, which shortly followed, the Romans were overthrown, being drawn out by a party that Hannibal sent to provoke them, ere they had armed their bodies against the extremity of the mid-winter feafon, either by meat or other provision; fo And Simproni- that ingaging with cold and hunger, and befet with their Enemies (whereof as in the former battel, the Numidians, to their great terror fell upon their rear) they were defeated though with great flaughter of the Enemy, through whose ranks ten thousand broke and escaped to Placentia, the rest being either slain, taken, or drowned in the River. The Carthaginians having pursued them to the River and almost all the Beasts and Elephants. 35. At this time things went better with the Romans in Spain and Sicily. In the former Cneus Scipio (being fent thither by his Brother the Conful upon his return into Italy) overthrew Hanno the Carthaginian, and took in a good part of the Country, wherein was also new Carthage. For the following year C. Flaminia: (who being Tribune had preferred the Agrarian Law) was the second time made Conful, together with Cn. Servilius Geminus. He had a good gift in speaking, but no skill in War, being yet heady and impatient of advice. Hannibal having all this while made the Country of the Galls the feat of the War, refolved to change it, and after some consultation about his way into Etruria, resolved upon that of the Fens, as short and unexpected to the Enemy, though more troublesome to pass. Being forced to march three or four whole dayes through water, this forely distressed all his men, except the Galls, many of the beasts were left in the mudand the Hoofs of the Horfes came off. He himfelf riding on an Elephant that was onely left, escaped with his life, but was forely pained in his eyes, one whereof he lost utterly. Being arrived at dry ground, he hoped by some means or other to entrap the Conful, understanding what his disposition was: He passed by the Camp and went further into the Country, which inraged Flaminius, who thought himself flighted by the Enemy. When amongst the Romans some told him that he must not rashly pursue, but use great caution, especially by reason of the Horse; but above all things flay for his Colleague, and not hazard a battel without the conjunction of both Armies, he was so far from following their advice, that he could

Cn. Servilius the other Conful who kept Ariminum (a Countrey of Italy now called Rimini, lying upon the River Rubicon) hearing of Annibal's coming into Etruria, purposed to joyn with his Colleague, but finding that difficult, chose out four thoufand men whom he sent to his aid, under conduct of C. Centenius (by some called Centronius) whom he commanded, if possible, to reach him before the fight. Hannibal hearing of this supply, after the battel, sent out Maharbal with a party, which cutting off one half, forced the the other to an hill, where they also yielded themselves.

37. The Romans struck with consternation at these losses, upon mature deliberation refolved there was need of a General with absolute authority. But the Conful (who alone had power, and that in the Roman Dominions, to name a Dictator) being absent, and incompassed with the Carthaginian Forces, so that no mesfage could conveniently be fent to him, and the People having no power to create a Dictator, they created as a Prodictator, or Vice-Dictator, Q. 38. Fabius, when his fix moneths were out, laid down his Office, and was badly requited, the Tribunes and others calumniating him with the Nobility, as wilfully lengthening the War, which procured Terentine Varro a rash, hot, and inconsiderable man, for the next year to be created Conful. He, though joyned with a prudent person L. Emilius Paulus, so far prevailed, as to joyn battel with Annibal at the place of Canna an ignoble Village of Apulia, which the year before had been deftroyed, and onely the Castle remained, on which Annibal had lately seized. The Romans brought into the Field eighty thousand Foot, and about fix thousand Horse; the Carthaginians not much above forty thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse. Florus writeth, that for the destruction of the unhappy Army, both General, Earth, Heaven, the day, and the whole nature of things conspired. For Annibal not content with the fending of those who counterfeiting a revolt, fell upon the backs of the Romans, observing the nature of the place, so chose out his ground, that befides his Army they must needs fight with wind, dust, and Sun. But from others it appeareth, that the Romans fighting with their faces toward the South, and the Carthaginians toward the North, the Sun-beams offended neither. However the abilities of the Panick General were seen so far in this, as in other battels, that he overmatched them in skill, who exceeded him in numbers, making fuch flaughter of them, that at length wearied, he commanded his Soldiers to forbear, as Florus telleth us. Of the Romans we flain fifty thousand men say Plutarch and Appian; feventy thousand aith Polybius, and Livy hath forty thousand Foot, and two thoufand fix hundred Horse. Varro the Consul fled to Vennusia with seventy Horse, whither also escaped four thousand Foot and Horse, which leading to Cannussum, where were already ten thousand men, he made up a shew of a Consular Army, which by the help of Walls, though not of Arms, seemed able to defend it felf. 39. Had Hannibal taken his opportunity and marched to Rome, in all probability he might have made an end of the War, and of the Roman Empire both together; but this great Souldier knew (as Maharbal Captain of his Horse truly told th his Army him) how to get, but not how to use and improve a Victory. For, he loytered all this Summer, and having Capua a wealthy and luxurious City given up into his hands by the Towns-men, there he took up his Winter quarters, and Capua became Livins lib. 241 a Canne to his Soldiers. For, hereby he utterly spoyled an excellent Army, which now was so enervated by the pleasures and effeminateness of the place, as ever after it became impatient of labour, and its ancient Military Discipline, so that before this it was harder for the Romans not to be overcome by Hannibal, than afterwards to overcome him. His fortune presently began to change. He was worsted at Nola by Marcellus the Prator, and repulsed at Casilinum, a very small Caftle for a good space. At this time, though there was a Distator in the Camp (M. Junius Pera, whose Master of the Horse-men was Tib. Sempronius) yet the Senate Two Diffators being exhausted by the War, M. Fabius Buleo was named Diffator by Terentius the Conful, for filling it up, without a Master of Horse-men. He coming into the Roftra, faid, he did not approve that there should be two Dictators at one time (which never before had been known) nor that he was created without a Master of Horsemen; neither that the power of Cenforthip should twice be permitted to one mans nor that power for fix moneths should be given to any Dictator, except for the War. What extream necessity had procured, he said he would moderate. For he would not remove any Senator which C. Flaminius, and L. Æmilius the late Cenforshad chosen, onely transcribe, and cause them to be read over, lest the credit, and esteemed of Senators should be in the power of one man; and so he would supply the places of the dead, that this man before that, and not one order should feem preferred above another. The old Senate then being called over, he chose into vacant places, first such as since the last Censorship had born Curule Offices, as each one had been first created; then such as had been Ædiles, Tribunes of the Commons, or Quastors, and lastly, such had any spoyls hung up at home, which they themselves had taken from the Enemy, or had received a Civick Crown. So one hundred and seventy seven being thus chosen with universal approbation, he prefently laid down his Office. 40. The Romans, though the defeat at Canna threatned them with no less than

The Romans ruin, quickly recovered their courage. When Varro (being fent for to name a Dictaquickly reco tor) was near the City, all Ranks went forth to meet him, and though he was the cause of the overthrow, gave him thanks that he had not despaired concerning the Commonwealth. Philip King of Macedonia having expected the fortune of both parties, after the battel of Canna joyned in affiancy with Hannibal; and this being discovered through the intercepting of his Ambassadors, for to prevent his coming denibal and into Italy, the Romans took order for the invasion of his own Territories. At this his party go-th down the time Hamibal was beaten at Cuma, and constrained to raise his siege; and from Wind in I aly, Nola the second time by the same hand; Hanno having the same fortune at Grumentum. In Spain the Scipioes fo managed the War that they got ground, being continually Superiors. Afdrubal was ordered by the Senate at Carthage to pass into Italy, but upon his departure they defeated him in battel, and by this fuccess not onely overthrew the defign of joyning with Hannibal, but drew most

A year Livius 110.24, or two after the death of Hieron King of Syracuse (who having been a fast friend to the Romans died at ninety years of age or more) altered much the face of affairs. For Hieronymus his Grandson succeeding him, was for his wicked disposition quickly made away, and then the City breaking into divers factions; that which was most contrary to the Roman interest prevailed, by the means of two inconsiderable men made Prators. 42. Marcellus hereupon departed from the siege, jeering his own Engineers and calling Archimedes by the name of Briareus. He destroyed Magara, one of the most ancient Cities of the Island, and falling upon the Army of Hippocrates, as it was incamping it felf, killed above eight thousand men. After this he made incursions, and drew several Towns from the Carthaginians. He took Damippus the Spartan as he fayled from Syracuse, about the redemption of whom coming often near the Walls of that City, he observed a Tower negligently kept, and convenient for receiving of men, because the Wall there might be easily mounted. Taking the opportunity of Diana's feast, wherein the Syracusians gave up themselves to Wine and sports, he seized on this Tower and through it bestowing his men about the Walls, easily became Master of the City, after three years spent in the siege. zeth the City, He wept when he beheld the goodliness of it, which notwithstanding his Commands for moderation (in which he was eminent) he knew would fuffer much. But more than the rest, the death of Archimedes troubled him, whom he most laboured to preserve. Some wrote that this famous Artist busied in his Geometrical speculations minded not what was doing in the City; but a Soldier coming to him, and bidding him follow him to Marcellus, he would not go till he had finished his probleme, and demonstrated it, whereupon the Soldier killed him. 44. His coming being heard of at Rome, they were there variously inclined as to relistance. Some thought that all the Armies in Italy were to be fent for; but Fabius Maximus would by no means hear of leaving Capua: Therefore a middle way was taken, to fend for one of the Captains from the fiege to the defence of the City. Q. Fulvius then the Proconful chusing out fifteen thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse out of the three Armies, marched for Rome, which he entred at the Gate Capena (when Hannibal now lay encamped eight miles off) the Senate, left his power should be diminished, having decreed, that if he came into the City he sliould have equal authority with the Confuls. Annibal removing to the River Aniene three miles from the City, with two thousand Horse thence went to take a view of it. Flaceus stomaching he should take this liberty and do it with ease, sent out a party of Horse, which falling on made him retreat. The day after, and that following, Hannibal on one fide, and Flaceur with the Confuls on the other, drew out their forces for a battel, when on both dayes fell fuch ftorms of hail and rain, as the Armies could not joyn, but when they had retreated into their Camps a wonderful ferenity appeared. This struck the Carthaginians with a religious awe, and from fighting caused Hannibal to say, that sometimes a Will, and otherwhiles fortune were wanting to

The heads of the Rebellion (fifty three in number) were put to death (twenty eight having before poyloned themselves) at the command of Fulvius, contrary to the Will of his Collegue Appins Claudius, who would have had the the matter determined by the Senate at Rome. The common fort was fold, and the City, because fituate in fo good a foyl, referved for a receptacle of all forts of Plow-men, Labourers, and Artificers, without any shew of government of its own, after it had stood about two hundred and fixty years. 45. This year was sent into Spain Claudius Nero, who having got Astrabal the Living lib. 201 Carthaginian into a straight so as he might have cut off him and his Army, Asdrubal promised he would draw all his Soldiers out of the Countrey, but drew out the time in length by the interpolition of his Punick faith, till by little and little he withdrew all his men out of the danger. The Senate and People hearing this, took it ill that Nero would thus fuffer himself to be abused, yet know they not whom to fend to fucceed him, and when the Comitia were held for the creation of a Proconful, none appeared to stand for the Office. A great sadness hereupon seized on the multitude, When Publins Scipio son to Publins Scipio slain in Spain (whom as we faid he defended in battel) a young man but of twenty four years of age, ftood up in a place where he might be seen, and professed himself Candidate, having the year before been made Edilis, though under age, by the great savour and confidence of the People. Sect. 2. This year M. Valerius Levinus, who had done good service against Philip of Macedonia, was the second time, in his absence, created Consul, together with Marcellus the fourth time. Levinus went into Sicily, where taking the City Agrigentum, he thereby brought the whole Island under the Roman Jurisdiction. 47. The year following, Afdrubal was ordered to go out of Spain into Italy, to Afterbal or the affiftance of his Brother Annibal. This caused great carefulness in Rome, by reason they knew not well whom to oppose against him. At length M. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator (who lately had returned to the City, after that being publickly difgraced he had absented himself for several years) were created Consuls, having been at great odds, and now reconciled through the interpolition of the Senate. Livius was ordered to meet Asarubal, and Nero appointed to attend the motions of Annibal. But the later having some success against his Enemy, picked out of the flower of his Army fix thousand Foot, and one thousand Horse, and with great fecrecy, and as much speed, marched toward his Collegue, that he might reach him ere he joyned with Afdrubal. Being joyned, they incompassed him, who was by a deceitful guide led into a dangerous place, and cut him with his whole Army in pieces: then marched Nero back to his own Army, and ere Hannibal knew of his departure, cast his Brothers head into his Camp, whereby to his grief he knew of the Is cutoff with defeat. Of the Senate, because fighting so long a time in an Enemies Country, they had so little supplied him with money and other things necessary for War. Of himfelf, for that having so often overthrown and put to flight, the Roman Legions, he had still delayed and given them time to breath. It's reported also, that ere he took Ship, he built an Archnear the the Temple of Juno Lacinia, wherein, in Punick and Greek letters, he wrote the fum of his great atchievements. Taking the A.M. 38031 Sea, he landed in a few dayes at Leptic, whence he marched to Adrumentum, and V.C. 5511 thence to Zama. Confidering now the weak estate of his Country, he defired a meeting with Scipie to treat of Peace, which being granted, the two greatest Captains in the World came to an interview betwixt their Armies, but receiving mutually no fatisfaction, they returned to decide the controversie by the Sword. Hannibal in the battel behaved himself most gallantly, and like so expert a Warriour amongst his Soldiers, confisting of so many Nations and languages. But providence ordained the Victory to Scipie, who slew twenty thousand, and took as many Prifoners, yet not without great loss of his own men, whereof two thousand fell. After whom he also this, Annibal perswaded his Country-men to ask Peace, and Ambassadors were dif-

Claudius Nero the Conful, and now by C. Cornelius Lentulus, who both had procured Africk for their Province, and to be joyned in equal authority with him. The power of concluding the Peace was by the People decreed to Scipio, with ten others, which was at length agreed to on these termes. That the Carthaginians being Peace is desi-free, should enjoy all their Territories in Africk; but the Romans hold Spain with all the Islands of the Mediterranean anytime in question between the two States. That all Rebels and Fugitives should be given up to the Romans. That the Carthaginians should deliver up all their beaked Ships , except ten Triremes, with all their tamed Elephants, and tame no more. It was made unlawful for them to make War in Astick or elsewhere, and tame no more. It was made unlamful for them to make War in Alrick or elfembere, without Licence from the People of Rome. They were to reflore all to Malanilla, and enter into confederacy with him. To give money and Corn to the Roman duxiliaries, till A. M. 3864. the Ambassadors should be returned. To pay ten thousand Talents of Silver in the 01.144.20. space of fifty years, and give one hundred Holfages for performance of these data decays things. Thus ended the second Punick War, in the eighteenth year, and Sci-Pulipipa, pio obtained the honourable firmame of Africanus, being the first General [15] Livy observether the production of the second Punick War. 52. The Romans had little or no rest after this War; for immediately begun, or Quintius * Flamininus (not Flaminnius as Plutarch now hath him; for the Flaminini Patritians must not be confounded with the Flaminii who were Plebeians) using great expedition, beat Philip out of the Straights, wherein fecurely he had encamped, and by Sea his Brother Lucius (with Attalus took several Towns of his Confederates, and besieged Corinth, though in vain. The time coming for the election of new Confuls, and it being usual for them to take the Provinces from their Predecessors, the Tribunes rightly objected, that this course hindred the progress of the Wars, and procured Quintius his Government to be conthing done by timed to him, who being about taking the Castle of Opus, Messengers came from the Tribune Dhilin about a Trooter Castle of Opus, Messengers came from Philip about a Treaty. Several times they met (which before they had also done of the People at the Straights) and the Ambassadors of Attalus, the Rhodians and Achaans were present; but the effect was nothing, and Philip gave up Argos into the hands of Nabis Tyrant of Lacedemon, who used the Inhabitants with great cruelty and incredible exaction. Sempronius Tuditanus was totally defeated. The same year wherein the Macedonian War ended, the flaves in Tuscany made a dangerous Rebellion, but were chastized, and quieted, by Attilius the Prator. And about the fame time was another victory obtained over the Galls.

54. The year after the ratification of the peace, some bickering there was in the A.M. 3810. City about the Women. Twenty years before, there had been a Law preferred V.c. $59. by Oppius, Tribune of the People, prefently after the defeat at Canna, forbidding women the wearing of Gold or Purple, and the use of any other kind of Pomp. This now did two of the present Tribunes labour to abrogate, the face of things being changed, and the occasion removed. M. Porcius Cato the Consul stood stiffy for preserving the Law, inveighing much against the Females; but partly through the apposite reply of L. Valerius) the Tribune unto the Conful, out of his own book, called Origenes, and especially through the the importunity of the Women themfelves (who with liberty of behaviour fufficient filled the streets, came to the Assembly, and constrained two of the Tribunes to let fall their interpolition) it was abrogated. Cato then betook himself into Spain his Province, where using severity towards himself as well as his Soldiers, he restored the Roman interest by good Discipline. Having led his Army upon the back of the Spaniards, and thereby neceffitated them to fight, he overthrew them in a great battel, and took their Camp; after which, notwithstanding the fickleness of the Natives, he reduced the Province to obedience. The same Summer did L. Valerius Flaccus his Collegue give another overthrow to ne Galls in Italy.

55. In Greece, Nabis the Tyrant of Sparta, still held it, and Argos, in flavery; wherefore the freedom of them still was wanting to the universal liberty of Greece, resolved to be vindicated from the oppression of the Macedonian party. Quintius, upon Nabis his refusal to quit Argos, besieged them both, and took in Gytheum a Port Town, which drove Nabis to ask peace. Quintius was not against it, urging to the Gracian Allies the length, which was likely to be of the fiege of Sparta, the unseasonableness of the Winter season, and the War that threatned from Antiochus King of Asia; but indeed fearing left one of the new Confuls taking Macedonia for his Province, might rob him of the glory of ending the whole controversie in these parts. Yet the Greeks being earnest for suppressing the Tyrant, he seemed to yield to it, and afterwards put them off by demanding such supplies as they could not furnish him with Notwithstanding this, the peace could not be made; for, Nabis accepted not of the terms, especially of parting with his Ships. Hereupon Sparta was fet upon round about, and had been taken, but that Pythagoras Son-in-law to the Tyrant set the out-houses on fire, which drove away the Inhabitants. Though the onset succeeded not, yet the danger put Nabis into fuch a fright, that he now accepted of the former conditions, and had peace

Sempronius the Conful killed many of the Galls, who, had fet upon his Camp, but with great loss of his own men. Several times had the Romans now the better against these people, and the Ligurians. Then came they flatly to fall out with Antiochus the Great, King of Syfile rouse ria; and began a War with him five years after the ending of the Macedonian, in rousy against the 563 year of the City, the second of the 147 Olympiad, the three and thirrieth the 6th. of Antiochus, and the thirteenth of Ptolomy Epiphanes, A.M.3814.P.Corn. He said that they once had belonged (though not of a long time) to his Predecessors; but the Romans being ambitious to fet all Greece at liberty, plainly told him that these Towns must not be excepted. When he was thus enough incenfed, and by Hamibal (who had fled to him) spurred on, the Ætolians importuned him to joyn with them against their late friends and benefactors. This they did, being an inconstant people, and very covetous, having taken offence at the small quantity of booty, as they accounted it, alotted to them in the War against Philip, by T. Quintius.

The Ætolians first of all attempted to get into their hands Lacedamon, and afterwards cut in pieces by the Inhabitants themselves. Antiochus having through the cunning infinuations of Those the Etolian, changed his purpose of sending Annibal into Africk, and thence into Italy, landed in Greece, with an intention to make it the Seat of War. He brought an inconsiderable Army with him; but feemed to have made a good beginning, having got Chalcie into his hands, and by that means easily brought under the whole Island of Eubera. After this, he sent and buried the dead bodies of the Macedonians flain at Cynoscephale, thinking thereby to oblige Philip, who taking it as tending to his reproach, because he had not done it before, it proved but an effectual means to make him his Enemy, the The falians being no better affected, because he had taken some of their Towns. Then wintring at Chalets, he fell in Love with, and marryed an obscure maid 5 his Army which before was indifferently good, falling with him into all idleness and

Hereupon he besieged Nanpactus (now Lepanto) and had utterly ruined them, but for the intercession of T. Quintius. For he having then received the Island of Zacynthus from the Athenians, came to the Camp, and though they had ill deserved at his hands by detracting from his worth, yet thinking it dishonourable for him, being the deliverer of Greece, that any one peo-

Corn:lius Aperantia, and Dolopio into his hands, it would not be good policy to preserve the Scipio the Actolians. For this respect, and at their humble sute he gave them Truce, that con the Great for they might fend to the Senate at Rome, and broke up his fiege. Whilft Acilius his Province did these things in Greece, his Collegue Scipio Nasica got a notable victory over with leave to pass into Asia. the Bois in Italy, which utterly broke their power in pieces.

4. Lucius Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lulius Nepos, being Confuls for the following year, came, according to the custom, to divide the Provinces by lot. Both were extreamly defirous to have Greece, and Lelius being a man in great favour, offered that the thing might be left to the discretion of the Senate. Scipio at first knew not what to do, but his Brother Africanus perswaded him by all means to assent to it. The thing was new, and the Senate expected many words on both fides, when Africanus standing up, told the Fathers, that if they would decree Greece to his Brother, he would go his Legatus or Lieutenant, whereupon there wasno need any more should be said; for it was presently voted with universal consent, and power given to the Conful to pass into Asia, if he saw it convenient. Coming into Greece he found Acilius fall'n upon the Ætolians again, because the Senate had given them no possitive answer, either as to peace or War; only two things were proposed: To cast themselves wholly upon the Senate, or pay down one thousand Talents, and have the same Friends and Enemies with the Romans. When they defired an exposition of the former, no answer would be given, but a command to their Ambaffadors to depart: The Conful profecuted what his Predeceffor had begun, and with much ado, through the intercession of the Athenians by Africanus; another Truce was granted that they might have time once more to fend to Rome. There their Ambaliadors instead of confessing their faults, and asking pardon, boasted what friends and affiftants they had been to the Roman State, which gave fuch offence, that they were commanded out of the City, as before.

5. Antiochus having with his Son Seleucus besieged Pergamus the chief City of Eumenes, the friend of the Romans, was forced to raise his siege. He sent to Amilius the Roman Admiral now on those Coasts about peace, who disowned any power of concluding it without the Conful. Then did the Rhodians at Sea defeat his Admiral, which was Hannibal, a man out of his proper Element, and afterward in a battel fought with Æmilius, Eumenes, and the Rhodians, he fully lost the Antischus at command of the Sea. Affrighted hereat, he foolishly left Lysimachia, which this frighted at his business at year might have kept the Conful in action, and adding one folly to another suffer-bea maketh ed Seipio to pass the Hellessont without interruption. Now he offered to quit all places in Europe, and fuch in Asia as were the friends of Rome, to discharge half of the costs sustained by the Romans in the War, and rather than not be quiet, he was content to part with a portion of his own Kingdom. These seemed but Which are re- small things to the Conful, who thought it just that he, who had been the cause of the War, should bear all the charges of it, and not only quit Ionia and Holis, but leave all the Greek Cities to their liberty, which could not be, except he parted with all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus. The Ambassador had in charge to procure the favour of Africanus, to whom was offered the restitution of his Son taken prisoner, and all that could be expected on this side the Title of King, if he would live with him. But all private Offices of kindness only would Africanno promife, desiring him by all means to procure peace, and, when he had received his Son, not to fight till he should (being now sick) return to the Camp, This caused Antiochus to delay fighting, but the Consul tollowed, and provoked him to give battel, wherein his own Chariots Armed with Sithes, being driven back upon his own men, procured his overthrow. After this, peace was granted on the fame terms as it had been offered to him before the battel. And thus this War

6. The year following, wherein M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius were Confuls, the former going into Greece fell upon the Ætolians, who now had taken from Philip Dolopia, and Amphilochia with Athamania; and belieging Ambracia, Liviu iik 381 drove them once more to fue for peace. They were referred by the Conful to Rone, where the Ambassadors of Philip made great complaints against them upon the former account. But the Rhodians and Athenians interceeding once more for them, their fute was granted, on condition to pay five hundred Eubecan Talents at

They inhabited vast and high Mountains, and in that respect were with difficulty to be come at; but the Conful by throwing Darts, especially at their huge bodies, made great flaughter and subdued them. Returning home through Thrace, he had well-nigh lost his booty by the Inhabitants that lay in wait for it in the woody passages, and hardly got leave to triumph, because he had undertaken the War on his own head. It is observed, that luxury and idleness were first brought to Rome by his Army, out of Asia, through the provocations to effeminateness there found, and his loofe and neglected Government.

8. In the third year after the ending of the War with Antiochus, and the same wherein he dyed, envy procured the fall of those by whom the Victory was obtained. For, Scipio Africanus was accused of having defrauded the Treasury of Legs Livism the booty taken in the War, and had a day fet him by the Tribunes to answer lib. 28. it before the People. It is not certain who was his accuser, some mentioning M. Val. Max. 1.3. Nevius, and others the two Patilit Tribunes, set on, as some delivered, by M. Gillium Nost. Silence being made, he put on his triumphal Crown, and told the People, how as that day he had overthrown Hannibal and Then he wished that such by the of them there present as thought it convenient, would accompany him, and the present the convenient of them there present as thought it convenient, would accompany him, and the present the convenient of the present the convenient of the convenien pray that they might have such principal Officers (Principes) as he had 9. Going up to the Capitol, the whole Affembly followed him, as also to all the Temples in the City, infomuch that the very Viators and Clerks left the Tribunes alone, who also followed, and from accusers turned admirers, (as appeareth from Valerius Maximus) out of very shame. The Tribunes accused him also grievoufly in the Senate, and defired he might be brought to his answer. He riling up, produced the Books of accounts, wherein was punctually fet down all the particulars, but he tore it in pieces before them all, disdaining to give account for so fmall a matter in comparison of those vast sums he bhimself had brought into the Treasury. The next day of appearance he absented himself, and his Brother pretending his indisposition, he was excused, and another day appointed, before which he withdrew himself to Linternum (or Liternum) a Sea Town of Campania. For he clearly perceived under what envy he laboured, it being also objected against He departeth him, that he had spent in idleness all that Summer he lay in Sicily, and his power with Antiochus, who having discharged his Son without ransom, honoured him above all others, which he willingly took upon him, as one, who alone fate at the helm, and could fleer matters concerning Rome according to his pleafure. Valerius Maximus telleth us, that he commanded this to be ingraven on his Tomb, Ingrata Patria ne offa quidem mea baber, which sheweth that he was not buryed at Rome. He had that hap which usually accompanyeth the best men, to find their Country ingrateful, being of excellent parts, and of a kingly spirit, which he ascribed to himself in Spain, when the Natives saluted him by, and would have had him take upon him, the title it self. And upon this account he might be hated by Cato, who though a virtuous man, was morose and fowre. Livy joyneth with his (in the same year) the death of Philopamen, and of Hannibal; so that the three great Captains of the World at that time, left it desolate as it were by agreement. After these things, the Ligurians were often descated by the Consuls and o-Living 1.400 ther Commanders; many a thousand of them being flain, as also of the Celtiberi- 41. ans and other Nations in Spain who were continually rebelling. The Istrians beat the Romans out of their camp, and put them to the rout; Manlius the Conful in vain oppoling it; but shortly after they were discomfitted by the said Manlius, and afterward fully lubdued by Claudius the Conful, who quelled also the Ligurians, as his Collegue Tib. Semprenius Gracelus did the rebellion of Sardinia, with the loss of one thoufand and five hundred of the revolters. About this time Corfica also was subdued. The year following, Cornelius one of the Confuls died at the bath at Currae, into whose place C. Valerius Levinus was elected. Petilius Spurinus the other Consul fighting against the Ligarians, laboured to take a certain Mountain called Letus, concerning which in his speech to his Souldiers he saying, that that day he would take Letin (Hodie ego Letin ntique capiam) by rath fighting confirmed what he had faid in another lence (viz. wherein Lethum fignifieth death) than he had meant it. These actions abroad were shortly after followed by the second Macedonian War, or that with Perseus, in the five hundred eighty and third year of the City, twenty four after the Peace made with his Father, and seventeen after the conclu-fion with Antiochus. 13. Perfeus in a manner succeeded to this War as well as the Kingdom, his Father having intended and made great preparations for it. Puffed up by these preparations, he fought to draw away the Allies of the Romans from their friendship, and abused several of their friends. Their Ambassadors he slighted, refusing to give them audience, which made the Senate refolve upon the War; but it was to be committed to one of the following Confuls; only for the prefent, Cn. Some were sent also into Greece to confirm the States in their friendship and alliance, who also demanding audience of Perseus, after long waiting, he renounced the league made with the Romans, as entred into at the beginning of his Reign meerly for fecurity. Hereupon the Ambassadors renounced also the confederacy made with him, and after that the Confuls P. Licin ins Crassus and C. Cassus Longinus had assumed their Office, the War was propounded to, and decreed by the People.

14. Quintus Martins and others being fent into Greece to establish the confederates in their fidelity, Perseus began to bethink himself, and was affrighted, hearing of the motions of the Enemy. He applyed himself to Martius about a Treaty for Peace, trufting to that friendship which had passed betwixt their two families. The Ambassadors were glad of this address, and to divert him granted him Truce; Peace deni that he might fend to Rome, for he had all things in a readiness, and might have ed him by the begun the War, as with great advantage to himself, so too speedily to the Romans; who as yet had neither Army nor Leader arrived. this he did in reference to the Army; he reduced the Souldiers to that antient dif-cipline which his predecedfor had let fall. Q. Murcius Philippus fucceeding him at Profes before his first enterance into his Province might easily have been defeated, had he met medical with a prudent enemy, the wayes being to difficult and dangerous, that the Souldingstein ers could scarcely for wearines hold their weapons. And after he had got into the plainshe might eafily have been shut up on every side, and samished, but that Perseus besotted with sear ran away to Pydna, and lest the Straights open to him. Yet Martius did nothing of consequence, leaving all to be performed by his Successor L. Æmilius Pailus, who had been Consul seventeen years before. He caused the Eclypse of the Moon to be foretold to his Souldiers, lest they should be discouraged by it, which brought great terror to the Enemy, that knew nothing of the natural cause. He kept them from fighting when they were weary, though the circle 1.44 Officers much defired to ingage. But the Armies lying incamped on each fide of Platarch in the River Emipeus, it hapned that a Beast passing over from the Roman side, was similar feized on, and being rescued by degrees drew both the Armics into an ingagement, wherein Perseus lost the day, and with it his Kingdom. Flying into the Ille of Crete, when all forfook him, he delivered up himself into the hands of Cn. Oddahogenhous viss. Emilies severely chastized the Epirots, who had joyned with Perfess, plundering and demolishing about seventy of their Towns, whereby so much booty was got, as each Foot-man had two hundred Denarii, and every Horse-man as much more. But the Souldiers having got little or no plunder in Macedonia, nor any of the Kings Treasure, denyed their General a Triumph, which yet he obtained, and that very iplendid. Of his four Sons, the two eldest he granted to be adopted to Fabius Maximus, and Publius Scipio the 8on of Africanus, and of his two youngest, the one dyed five dayes before his Triumph, and the other three dayes after, which loss he fultained with great courage. Before his Triumphal Chariot was led Perfens with his two Sons, and this same year Triumphed Cn. Octavins the Prator at Sea, besides L. The Ambassadors also that were sent to Carthage, finding the City full, and flour-Entropy the City full, and f rishing, from that peace they had now enjoyed about fifty years, and provided also copy and provided also copy as for war as well as peace, spake much of the danger which threatened Rome from it; especially Cato, who never came into the Senate, but after that he had spoken his mind to any bufiness, added, This Ithink, and that Carthage is to be destroyed. He was carneftly contradicted by Scipio Nasica, who feared, that this rival for Empire once being removed, fecurity would breed the destruction of the Commonwealth, as it too truly proved, this fecurity being strengthened by luxury and avarice, which the Afatick Triumphs had brought in. But Cato's reasons drawn from present danger, so, in the apprehension of the Senate, over-ruled Scipio's forecast, that they resolved upon a War, and kept the resolution close till they could catch at a convenient opportunity and pretence.

19. There being at this time three factions in Carthage, one affected towards the Romans, another standing for the true interest of the State it self, and the third for Masanisa, this later was expelled by the second, and a Law made that they should never be again received. Those men flying to Majanifa, he sent Guluffa his Son to intercede for them, who being laid in wait for by Amilear Samnis, although he escaped, yet thereupon the King besieged Horoscopa, a Town he much defired; which act was exprelly against the Articles of the League. Ajdrubal went with a great Army to raise the siege, and a bloody battel was fought, wherein the Carthaginians were overthrown; but more dyed of the Plague, being incom-

This year dyed Masanissa ninety years old, leaving a Son but of four years behind him; and trufting his Kingdom with Scipio, to be at his discretion disposed of to his Chillived not to see the too much desired ruin of Carthage. 21. The year following, Calpurnius Pifo the Conful, and Mancinus the Admiral did no great matters, belieging Clupea, and Hippo (à Town fituate betwixt Carthage and Utica) to no purpose. Within Carthage, Asarubal Grand-Son to Mafanissa by his Daughter, being joyned in commission with the other Astrabal without, was accused by him as intending to betray the City to his Uncle Gulussa, and having nothing to fay for himfelf, or being too flow in it, was knocked on the head by a Form in the Council-house. Now at Rome were all mens eyes upon Scipio Æmilianus, looking on him as destined to end the War; and whereas he fought but the Ædileship, and it was against the Law for him to be chosen Consul Scipio Amili- so young (being but thirty fix, whereas the Law required forty three) it was dif-

Then securing the Isthmus leading to the City, he cut off all Provisions from out of the Country, and blocked up the Haven; but the Citizens with incredible industry cut, out an other passage into the Sea, whereby at certain times they could receive necessaries from the Army without. Scipio therefore in the beginning of Winter let upon their Forces lying abroad, whereof he flew feventy thousand, and took ten thousand, so that now no relief could be obtained from without. In the beginning of Spring, he first took

The Carthaginians therefore had now had an Army in the Field, and that against a confederate of Rome, which was against the tenour of the last League. This advantage the Romans took, and ordered the Confuls to undertake the War, though the other condemned those that had broken the League, and most humbly offered any reasonable satisfaction. M. Manilius Nepos, and L. Marcius Cenforinus being now on their journey, it was artiwered, that they should enjoy all as formerly, if within thirty dayes they would fend three hundred Hostages, (all Sons of Senators, or the principal Citizens) to Lilybeum, and do what the Consuls should further command them. The Carthaginians desirous to give satisfaction within the time limited sent the Children, and when now the Confuls were landed at Utica (which being a Sea-Town convenient for their purpose had been seized on before-hand) thither they sent their Commissioners to wait on them, and know their pleasure. Now with tears imploring mercy they defired to know their last doom, and were commanded to leave their City (which the Consulshad order to level with the ground) and build another any where in their own Territories, so it were but ten miles from the Sea. This they received with great horror and rage, and all resolved rather to die than forsake, or give way to the ruin of their antient feat and habitation.

20. The Confuls delayed to begin the War, as not doubting in the least but to take the City thus disarmed and naked at their pleasure. But they found it not so for the Inhabitants acted by indignation and fury, though at first scarce themselves, fetled their minds to reliftance, men and women working night and day in making of Arms. Where iron and brass were wanting, they made use of Gold and Silver; and the women gave the hair of their heads to supply the defect of Tow, or Flax. They made also Afdrubal (whom before for fear of the Romans they had condemned) their General in the field, where he had already a good Army. When the Confuls came against the City, they found such resistance that they were disand the war couraged, and the resolution of the besieged increased hereby. They ingaged several times to their disadvantage, and might have suffered much, had not the Army been secured and brought off, through the great wisdom and courage of Scipio Æmilianus, who drew off also Pharness, the Master of the Carthaginian Horse-Materilla and dren. This same year also dyed Cato, being about eighty five years of age, and

2. Now was it seventy four years since the Romans, in the second year of the feerend Puntok War, entred Spain in an hostile manner, and fince that time, especially since the departure of Scipto Africanue the elder, many had the risings and struglings of that People been, of all others most impatient of the yoak. These things so affire hre-consistent to ed the Roman Soldier, that he almost quaked at the sight of a Spaniard, and at Rome Men were feized with great fear and shame. Therefore Scipio Emilianus Africanus must be created Consul the second time, as the only refuge and hope of his Country.

4. At the first he restored discipline, the want of which had spoiled all, but then coming to engage, found the courage of the Enemy fuch, that he refolved to fight no more, but lay close fiege to Wannatia, and govern himself according to the comportment of Affairs. At length the Belieged, greatly straightned, offered to yield upon reasonable Conditions, or fight if they might have Battel given them, which being denied, having drunk ftrong drink on purpose, they affailed the Beliegers so fiercely, that the Roman had run, but that Scipio was the General. At last they fired the City over their own heads, and scarcely one of them remained to be led in triumph. This samous City was seated in the hithermost Spain, in the head of Galecia, and the confines of the Celtiberians. It had with four thousand Men, for the space of fourteen years, faith Flores, or twenty according to Strabe, born the brunt of forty-thouland Romans, and many times put them to shameful flight, with great slaughter. 5. Ever fince the beginning of the Tarentine War to this time, for the space of almost 150 years was there much modesty, abstinence, self-denial, valour and vertue amongst the Romans in general, of which yet especially the Fabit, Fabritii, Marcelli, Curii, Metelli, the Scipio's and Æmilii have left Examples admirable to be commended to all Posterity, such were their cautious and politick, yet just and noble carriage, both at home and abroad. But now the Affan Expeditions and Triumphs having brought in excess and riot, and the ruine of Carthage having taken away fear, idleness with security by degrees stole in upon them, and the infirmity of the Government (after that fear, which hitherto had preserved it safe, was removed) again effectually shewed it self. For though after this time many a People was subdued and brought under, and much glory gotten abroad, yet was it stained by emulations, jealousies, and contentions at home; and even by shed ding the Blood of one another in an open, though civil, feud, which first came to

But it came to pass, that by incredible impudence and licentiousness of the Rich. the Husband-men were outed of their ancient Possessions, which by Purchafing, and other ways, they got wholly into their hands, so that the Publick was defrauded of its Revenue, and the Poor of their Livelihoods. For restraining the avarice of the Rich, the Lex Licinia and Sempronia were enacted. Gracehus increased the former by adding that, lest the Law should be wrested. half should be given to the Children, and the rest divided to such Poor as had nothing. And if any went about to inlarge their Portion by Purchase, Trimwiri or three Men should be yearly appointed to judge what Ground was publick, and

There being now none to fly to in this Case, the People conceived great

Their reputation thence forward increased with various fuccess about the Publicans till Cicero's time, who boatting himself of this order, procured it firch honour, that from his Confulfbip it came to be as a peculiar order in the State (before being included in the Plebeian, though it had a diffinction by way of fervice) being added to the Senatorian and Plebeian; out of which respect it was written after them both. Thus in several times were there several Ranks and Diffinctions; the first diffinction was betwixt Patricians and Plebeians; then Plebeians wresting from the other a Communion in the greatest Offices and places, though Patricians, might still be diffinguished in reference to Families, yet all Dignites being continuon to the reft with them, such Photos are as could rife to be Sensory, continued with the other the Sensory as raik (which included the Patrician, though the Patrician not it) thenceforth difficient from the Plebeian which still contained the Equites. 11. By this Law (faith Florus) Grazehus so divided the People of Rome, that he made it double headed (hicipitem, which expression Varro also used, as appeareth from N nius) and the Equites having the lives, and fortunes of Senators and Nobles in their hands, by feizing on the Revenue, with authority pilled the Commonwealth. He took the best time that could be devised for the making of the Law, because the Senators having had hitherto the power of judging, were become odious of late, in that for mony they had acquitted Aurelius Corta, Salinator, and M. Aquitius, persons Capitally guilty of corruption. It's said, he boafted, that by this Law he had cut the finews of the Senatorian rank. And so he did; for by the authority of judicature they passed sentence upon Rothe translation man Citizens, Italians and Senators, noting them with ignominy, banishing, or of the judicial putting them to death at pleasure, till such time as their power was abated, as power to the Equites by will be seen. For in the comitia, or Assemblies, they conspired with the Tribunes, and obtaining thereby what they pleased, had all things in their power, and flourished with riches, whereas nothing remained to Senators, but a vain shew of Dignity. The Senators prevailed with Servilius Capio when Conful, to make themselves partakers of the power of judging, by a Law which he got preferred; yet still had the Equites the better, for three hundred Senators only were added to them, who were in number fix hundred. By the Laws of Livius Drufus, Sylla and Cotta their power was abated, Drufus making it but equal in judgement with that of Senators: Sylla transferred it wholly to the Senators, and Aurelius Cotta communicated the power of judging to three forts; viz. Senators, Equites, and the Tribuni Ararii. But the Fquites alone were wont to farm the customs of the Cenfors for five years, and thence from their farming the Publick Revenue had the name of Publicans. These were the principal of the Equisional whenefocall Order, the Ornament of the City, and the strength of the State, who made so many Companies as there were Provinces subject to the payment of Toll, Tribute, Custom, or Impost.

freedom, and gave power of fuffrages to other Friends and Allies, contrary to cains attempt the custom; whom the Senate forbad to come near the City, at such time as they knew his Laws would be offered, and to please the people, they gave way to the fending out of twelve Colonies. Gracehus thus frustrated, departed into Africk with Flacens his Collegue, intending to plant a Colony where Carthage stood; but was disappointed therein also, Wolves, it's said, removing the bounds of the intended City by night, as they were laid by day, whereupon the South-fayers pronounced the defign unlawful. Having been twice Tribune, he ftood for it the third time, and had many voices; but his Collegues offended by his vehement carriage, got Minueins Refus cholen into his place, who reficinded many of his Laws. Gracehus inraged hereat; when the 'Affembly was met, went up to the Capitol, accompanied with Flacen, and his Friends privily Armed. There Attilius the Crier of Opimius the Consul taking him by the hand, and defiring him to Tpare his own Country, was flain. H then went about to excuse the fact to the People but could not be heard, and so together with Flacers, and his other Confederates got them home, the Conful keeping strict watch all night in the City. After this they were cited by the Senate to come and give an account of their actions, but they betook themselves to the Aventine Mount, where fortifying themselves, they offered in vain liberty to all flaves that would come in to them. But the Conful fending a party against A.M. 3884, them, Gracebus fled into a Grove beyond Tiber, and procured his Slave to kill olios, and the conful of the conful him, who instantly after he had cut off his Head, run himself through with the Ptol. Hence enfued a most fearful Plague, both of Men, Cattle and Fowls. In Numidia, where Micipsa was now King, eight hundred thousand died; upon the Sea-Coasts about Carthage and Utica two hundred thousand; and in Utica it self thirty thoufand Soldiers there lying in Garrison, fifteen hundred being reported to have been carried out in one day through one Gate alone. Two years after, Q. Metellus the Conful fubdued the Islands Baleares, and restrained Piracy there maintained, and at the same time was carried on the War, called Bellum Allobrogicum; which

Fabius Maximus (Grandson of Paulus Æmilius, by his Son adopted into the Fabian family) defeated them, with the Arverni and Ruteni, in a bloody battel, wherein one hundred and twenty thousand are reported to have been slain, and taking Bituitus (or Betultus) King of the Arverni Prisoner, obtained the sirname of Allobrogicus. These Allobroges inhabited about the Countries now called Daulphine and Savoy: the Ruteni nearer to the Sea; the Arverni more toward the North; the Edui in Burgundy, cofar de bill and the Saloii or Sayles in Piemont. These transactions of Thrace are of all others most unknown; either because they are confounded with those of Illyricum, Pannonia; Mysia, or

Macedonia; or because what has been written of that subject in particular, hath miscarried. Now we arrive at two Wars both together, and carrying noise sufficient with them through the variety of events, and fulness of History: viz. that with Jugureha, and the other with the Cimbri and Teutones. Now to know the Original of the former, it's necessary to fetch things a little higher. 16. Mafaniffa King of Mumidia, that old and constant friend of the Romans

17. Calpurnius invaded Numidia with great fierceness, and took in some Towns, but was presently stopped in his career, being allured with the golden balls of Jugartha; fo that a Treaty of Peace was fet on foot. The Senate was moved hereat, and at the power of M. Scaurus, who accompanying the Conful as his Friend and Counfellor, was guilty of the same crime. The People were persuaded to fend L. Cellius Longinus the Pretor to fetch Ingurths to Rome upon the publick Faith, to discover his Complices, whereof he had by Gold procured many in the Senate it self. Cassius perswaded him to cast himself upon the Peoples mercy, and he came to the City in a mourning habit. But coming into the Affembly to do as he was Commanded, Balus the Tribune bade him hold his Peace, being also bribed to put off the business, and delude the People. At this time there was one Massina the Son of Gulussa his Cousin-German at Rome, who when he had murdered Adherbal escaped out of Africk. Him Albinus the Conful, (who gladly would have had to do with Numidia) perswaded to beg the Kingdom of the Senate: but Jugurtha having some notice hereof, procured him to be killed, and conveyed away the murderer into Numidia. Hereupon within a few days he was commanded to be gone, and being out of the City, he looked back upon it, and uttered these words, O City that wouldst be fold if there was but a Chapman for thee. This he faid, as having himself experience of the corruption of its Inhabitants; fo horribly were they now degenerated from the fidelity and

18. Albinus followed him with an Army, and at first seemed to be very ambitious of finishing the War, before the creation of new Consuls. But upon fome account he prolonged it, and his Brother, by virtue of some compact, withdrew from Suthul, where the treasure of the Kingdom lay, when he was about to befiege it. The Centurions also were so corrupted, as Jugartha was suffered to break into the Camp, whence beating out the Army, he either forced, or by former agreement, brought Albinus to submit unto most dishonourable terms. In this condition Metellus the following Conful found affairs and the Army spoiled turis home for want of discipline. But bringing the some into good stand him of feveral Towns, bed by Mule of two years he overthrew Jugartha several times, outed him of several Towns, which constrained him to submit for want of discipline. But bringing the Soldiers into good order, within the space and chased him further than his own borders, which constrained him to submit and beg Peace; but the conditions thereof he brake, and the former hosfility returned. Now was there one C. Marius, Legatus or Lieutenant to Metellus, whoby his good demeanour won much upon the Soldiers, for being defirous of the Confulling, he took all ways to purchase their favour. He calumniated Metellus privily to the Merchants at Utica, avowing that he was able with half of the Army Marius by um and that within a few days, to take Jugartha. By these Speeches he procured dermining many complaints to be written to Rome against Metellus, and getting leave to go ten the Contributions, obtained his desire, being created Consul, and had the management of contributions. the War committed to him, which now was even ended. Nothwithstanding, the People was fo grateful to Metellus, that at his return, being certified what he had done, they both granted him a Triumph, and bestowed on him the sirname of Numidicus.

19. This was the fourth Metellus, who from the Nation subdued, obtained a firname. The first was Q. Cacilius Metellus sirnamed Macedonicus, of whom we have formerly spoken. Much is said of this mans felicity, whereof this is chief, that when he died, he had, of four Sons, feen three Confuls, and the Several of the fourth Prator. Of these, the first was Q. Metellus firnamed Balearicus from confute Val. his subduing the Baleares, who was Consul in the 631st year of the City: the Mix. 1-7.6.1. second L. He was Son to L. Cacilius Metellus Calvus, who was Conful in the 612th year. Lastly, the fourth thus firnamed was this Q. Carilius Metellus

20. Marins, after some time, took the City Capsi, a place very rich and strong, and after this another called Mulucha. Jugurtha finding himself too weak, drew, in to his affiftance Boschus King of Mauritania his Father in Law, by the help of whose Horse he very much wearied the Roman Army. Coming to raise the Siege at Cirta, before which Marins was fat down, what by the number of the Horse reported to be fixty thousand, and what by heat and dust, the Romans were forely diffressed, and the fight continued dangerous and terrible to them for three days; Then a Tempest of Rain fell, which spoiled their Enemies Weapons, and relieved Marius his Men, almost killed with thirst; and the course of fortune changing, the two Kings were defeated and fled. In another Battel Marius, as it's faid, killed ninety thousand, after which Bocchus began to repent of his enterprize, and fent to Rome to enter into a League, which he could not procure, but obtained pardon of his fault. Not long after, Marius took Jugurtha in an Ambush, whither he had drawn him by specious pretences, and delivered him up to Sylla his Quaftor, who had brought over some Forces gathered in Italy. Sylla having little or no skill in matters of War before, under him got that skill, which afterwards he used against his General, Jugartha being led in Triumph by Marius with gartha, who is his two Sons, was after, by order of the Senate, put to death, and so the ream In

With a fort of Germans called Tentones (from Teuto or Tuisco the Patriarch, or reputed god of that Nation) they brake into Illyricum in the 641 year of the City, and there put to flight Cn. Carbo the Conful, to whom the Province had fallen by lot. Some three years after they made an irruption into Gall and Spain, but being repelled, fent to Silanus the Lies Floring made an irruption and the Conful, defining fome ground wherein to plant and fettle themselves. After him Capio the Consul made War upon the Testolages or Tolosans, whose chief City Tolose (now in Gascoigne) he took, and therein a great Treasure, which some said was taken out of the Temple at Delphos by the Galls. His command was continued to him for the following year, as Proconful, in conjunction with Manilius (or Mallius) his Successor. These two could not agree, but divided the Army, and parted the Province betwixe them. At length they were overthrown in a bloody Battel by the Cimbri, to whom the Teutons, Tigurins, and Ambrones, another People of Gall joyned themselves: eighty thousand Men were slain, and forty thousand Lackies and Drudges, as also both the Camps taken. Capio for this was cast into Prison, where he died, these great defeats being charged upon his facrilege, of which those Galls that were guilty, were still followed and consumed by one plague after another. After this, the Cimbri made another Expedition into Spain : but being thence repelled by the Celtiberians, returned into Gall, whence with the Tentons and Ambrones; they relolved to pass over the Alpes into

22. C. Marius having vanquished Jugurtha, was in his absence made Consul the fecond time, to manage the War against the Cimbri. Whilst they continue ed in Spain, he waged War against their friends the Tolosans, whose King Copilus was taken by Sylla his Lieutenant. Being created Conful again the following year, he neglected to fight till their fury was abated. In his fourth Confulship they were ready in three Bands to pass over the Alper, which he considering, attended their Motions. His Army was almost oppressed with thirst, the Tentons and Ambrones lying betwixt it and the water, which made him defirous to ingage with which Marin them, and coming to fight, in two days he utterly destroyed them, taking Pri-

The third Band of the Tigarines came to nothing; and so an end was put to this War, on the third of the month Sextilis, as Plutarch writeth, after it had continued twelve years, in the 653 year of the City, C. Now was Marius Conful the fifth time, and there being nine of the ten terculum 1, 2 Tribunes chosen, and A. Nonius standing in competition with him, by the affistance "15. of Marius he murdered him, and got the place. Now being again in power, he preferred a Law for dividing of fuch Lands as Marius had recovered in Gall, and compelled the Senate to fwear to it, which Metellus refuling to do, he fet him a day to answer it before the People; but for fear of him and Marius, Meetllus fled to Smyrna. Saturninus being Tribune the third time, and finding C. Memmius to fland for the Confullip; he also made him away to prefer Glaucius the Prator, a Man most addicted to his own Party. At these things the Senate being startled, took up resolution, and Marius now the sixth time Conful, seeing him in a falling condition, withdrew himself from his friendship. The Confuls were, as indangerous times, impowered by the Senate to fee that the Common-wealth received no damage. Marius therefore with his Collegue L. Valerius Flaccus, fet upon Saturninus in the publick meeting-place, and drove him and his followers into the Capitol, where for want of water (Marius having cut the Pipes) they were forced to yield. This they did upon his faith given for their fafety; for Saturninus and Glaucius much relied upon him, not sticking to give out, that they were but the actors of his defigns. Notwithstanding, they were killed in the Court-house 2. C. 654. by the Equites, which brake in amongst them; and Metellus, through the labour of his Son especially, was re-called, with the general applause of the People.

24. For the space of about eight years after, there was not any open Sedition; ret free place of about eight years after, there was not any open securious, yet great diffarisfaction amongit thofe of the Senatorian Order. For, it lay un. Let apias, definition of the Power of Judicature, which was by Graze the letter in the Brown of the Power of Judicature, which was by Graze the letter in the Brown of the Power of Judicature, which was by Graze the letter in the late of the Brown of the Power of Judicature, which was by Graze the letter in the letter in the Power of the Po farmed the Customs, and publick Revenues, being, as Equites, both Judges and Parties. It hapned, that thirty years after Gracehus his Law, M. Livius Drusus the Tribune cast in his mind how to restore the Fathers to their ancient Power, and yet not offend the Equites. He preferred therefore a Law, that because the Senators were reduced to a small number, as many Equites bouring to re- should be added to them, and the Power of Judicature committed to this Fathers, and Body. But herewith neither Party was fatisfied. Not the Senators, because they disdained that the other should be equal to them, and neither the Equites, for that they feared the Power would at length be wholly removed from them. Capio alfo, one of Druss his Collegues, one that Capio, as some mistake, who had been formerly Consul, had proposed such a Law, which took not; he himself being condemned, and dying in Prison as was faid) opposed him, and coming into the Senate, there accused some of the chief of unlawful seeking for Offices. Drusus to withstand his endeavours, by the favour of the People proposed again the Agrarian Law, and that the Allies and Confederates of Italy, now Possessions of the Lands, might not be aggrieved; he gave them hopes to make them free of the City. Great concourse there was, and as fion of Lands, and for that was foundly buffeted by a Traveller. Drusus in this particular disappointed, still bent his min I how to make good what he had offered to the Italians; but going home, accompanied with a great multitude, he was flabbed in the Court of his own house, it's unknown by whom, the Knife being left in his body, and died within a few hours. He was a Man excellently accomplished, both with understanding and morals, whose good intentions had not the fortune to be rightly understood by the great ones, but to distatissie all Parties. And fill more unfortunate he was in that great and dangerous War, which by his 4. M. 3914. 25. This War is called by divers names. Sometimes Bellum Sociale, because of the Affociates of the People of Rome, who managed it: fometimes Bellum Marsicum, from the Marsi, who began it: and otherwhiles Bellum Italicum, from Italy the Seat of it, Corfinium a City of the Peligni, being before all others chosen for the place of the Conspiracy. The occasion of it was the disdain conceived by the Italians, because they were not admitted to the freedom of the City, which Strabo lib. 5. had been partly promised them thirty fix years before by Flaceus the Conful, who cap. 15, 16,17: being earnest for it, was diverted into Gall by the Senate, and afterwards joyned ciero pro arhimself in the Tribuneship with the younger Gracehus, to no purpose endeavouring with him the passing of it; with whom also, as is formerly shewn, he lost prahis life. Now again, their expectation was heightned by Drulus; but then was he murdered, and all the great ones banished who stood for them, by a Law which the Equites by force of Arms obtained, who hoped that having the Power of Judicature in themselves, the profit would be great which would arise in ridding away their Enemies. They also thought they had reason enough to expect this Priviledge from that City, which was maintained both in its fubfistence and Empire by their valour, they ever fending out Forces double in number to those of the Romans. Upon these grounds they resolved to procure by force what could not be by fair means obtained, fending Messages to and fro, and for the performance of what was agreed on, receiving Hoftages from tious contests, Spies were sent out into the several quarters. One of them seeing a young Man of Afalam carried into another City as an Hostage, there with acquainted Servilius the Proconful, who going to Afalam, and chiding the Citizens, was set upon and slain, together with all the Romans. After this, the Conspiracy being quite discovered, all broke out into open Rebellion: The Marsi, Peligni, Vestini, Marrucini, Ferentani, Hirpini, Picentes, Pompeiani, Venusini, Apulians, Lucanians, and the old Enemies of the Romans, the Samnites, They thought good first to fend to Rome to complain; but the Messengers could not be admitted without repentance for what was already done. Hereupon the War was committed to both the Confuls, L. Julius Cafar, and P. Rutilius Lupus, to whom were added Cn. Pompeius Strabo (Father to Pompey the Great) C. Marius, who had been fix times Conful, L. Sylla Licinius Crassus, C. Perpenna, Q. Capio, Q. Metellus Pius, (Son to the Numidian) M. Marfellus, Val. Melfala, and I. Didius, who were all feir with Proconfular Power. The Forces on either fide amounted to one hundred thousand fighting Men. Rutilius the Consul quickly lost his life, falling into an Ambush laid for him by the Marsh, and many other The Romans blows did the Romans receive; fo that they were forced to lift fuch as once had been Slaves. The Bodies of the Conful, and those of several others being carried into the City, the fight of them so discouraged the People, that the Senate made a Decree, that thenceforth the flain should be buried where they died, which as a prudent example was followed by the Enemy.

> 27. None fucceeded Rutilius all the year, for that Cafar could not come to a new Election, but his Army was committed to Marius his Lieutenant, and Q. Capio. Capio was killed not long after, being intrapped by Popedius, one of the Italian Generals. Marius now alone commanding the Forces, did good Service, as did also Sylla. For the following year, Cn. Pompeius Strabo, and L. Porcius Cato were made Confuls. Now the Senate thought fit to make fuch Italians free of the City as had not revolted, which thing established those, who something wavered in their minds, and took off the courage of the other already ingaged: yet they chose them not into any of the thirty five Tribes, but placed them by

He was sirnamed Eupator and Dionysus, being a Man of a vast mind and ambitious spirit. Succeeding his Father, who was a friend of the People of Rome, at thirteen years of age, within two years he made away Memon apath his Mother, who was left Partner with him in the Kingdom, and after her his Photiam. Brother also, and in his youth he subdued the Kings about Phasis beyond Caucasus. Thirty years after his coming to the Kingdom, he thought of no less than the Empire of Asa, the Romans, as he fancied, being now sufficiently imployed in the Cimbrian and Italian Wars. He began with Paphlagonia, parting it betwitt Strabol. 12. himself and Nicomedes King of Bithynia, and being checked for this by the Ro- Julia 12. mans, and commanded to defift, he pretended it was his Fathers Inheritance, and to amend the matter he feized on Galatia too. Then casting his Eye upon Cappadocia, he caused to be murdered Ariarathes King thereof, and his Sifters Hufband, and when she married to Nicomedes, he drove out his Forces, and pretended to feize upon it for the use of her Son, whom then he murdered also, and beflowed it on one of his own Sons. The Cappadocians refused to obey him, and called out of Asia Ariarathes one of their former Kings Sons; but him did Mithridates drive away, and he shortly after died. Nicomedes afterwards procured one to counterfeit himself the Brother of Ariarathes, and beg the Kingdom of the Marius hid himself in the Fens of Minturnum, and being discovered, a Gall was sent to kill him, but could not do it, he was so dashed at his presence; so that being conveyed out of that place, he escaped into Africk. To him Cethegus and others, who had sled into Numidia, joyned themselves, expecting an opportunity to invade their own Country. Pompey the Conful, to fecure Italy, was appointed to receive the Army of Cn. Pompey, who had done such good Service in the Mursian War; but the Soldiers unwilling to leave their old General, who also took it heavily, made away the Consul. For the year following L. Cornelius Cinna and C. Octavius were Consuls, whereas Cinna, as some think, corrupted, was altogether for the new Denisons, and recalled Marius, with the rest of the Exiles; but he was driven away by his Collegue, and L. Merula was put in his place. He then going about to the

But the Cappadocians protested that they could not live without a King, and being therefore allowed to chuse one from amongst themselves, made choice of one Ariobarzanes. Mithridates sorely repining to be thus overruled, procured Tigranes the King of Armenia and his Son in Law to be an Enemy to the Romans, and perswaded him to expel Ariobarzanes, whilft he did as much by young Nicomedes, who now had succeeded his dead Father. Both of these Princes fled to Rome for relief, which was decreed them, and Commissioners were appointed to re-establish them, whereof Manius Aquilius was chief. This being performed, they perfwaded both the Kings to invade and referred Mithridates. Nicomedes did it, though unwillingly, whilft Mithridates oppo-

fed him not, that he might have an advantage against him; only he sent Pelopidas to the Commissioners to complain of him. They considering that Mithridates was a powerful Prince, returned this Answer, That they did neither like that he should molest Nicomedes, nor Nicomedes him; for the former was not convenient for the Roman Common-wealth. He nothing moved with this Answer, re-invaded Cappadacia, fending Pelepidas back with a bold expostulation. They hereupon raised a considerable Army against him on their own heads, without any decree of Senate or People. Nicomedes ingaging first of all with him was put to flight, though Mithridates his main Body never ingaged, and next after him Manius was discomfitted. Then seized Mithridates upon Bithynia, Phrygia, Misia, Lycia, Pamphylia, and other Provinces, as far as Ionia. He took also Q. Oppius and Aquilius, the later whereof he killed by melted Gold poured into his mouth, being ever wont to upbraid the Romans with avarice and corruption.

Marins took Hoftia by force, and Cinna being not able to do any thing at Rome, fformed Ariminum. The Confuls, for that they could not recall Syds, fent for Metellus then lying in Samnium, but he differing with them about fome conditions, had them granted by Marius, to whom then he joyned himfelf. In the mean while the City it felf was near being betrayed to Marius by Appins Claudius a Tribane of the Army, who being intrufted with the Janiculum, thus requited him for former kindnefs.

5. Though he and Cinns brake in, they were repelled by Oct. voius, and C. Pomper the Proceedal, who shortly after was killed with a Thunder-bolt. Marius after this took in feveral Towns about Rome where Provisions lay, and Cinna, by promife of liberty, drew many Slaves out of the City, which the Senate understanding, lest the People should make disturbance within, sent to him about an agreement. He refused to admit of any address made to him as a private Man, fo that they were forced to treat with him as Conful, and defired he would swear to abstain from Blood. This he flatly refused to do; but promifed, that wittingly and willingly he would not be the cause of any Mans death; fo he was received, and the Law abrogated for banishing Marius, and his Affociates. Upon their entrance began plundering and flaughters in all places. Octavius, though having the Oath both of Cinna and Marius, refufing to f.y from his charge, was killed, and his Head fet upon the Rostra, to which was afterwards added that of Antonius, (Grand-father to the Triumvir) an excellent Orator, who for a good space defended himself by his eloquence from the Soldiers, and feveral others. None were spared, either for dignity, worth, or age. The dead bodies, being mangled and abused otherwise, were left to be torn in pieces by Dogs and Fowls, none daring to bury them. All Sylla's Friends were killed, his House defaced, and his Goods put to fale, he heing judged and declared an Enemy. Merula, though he never fought the Confulfhip, but had it put upon him, and Catulus, having their days fet them to anfwer, destroyed themselves.

6. Thus cruel were Cinna and Marius; but however they raged against their Country-men, the common People shewed much Abstinence and Justice at this time. For when they had exposed the Wealthy Houses of the profcribed Persons to to profesibled be plundered by them, none were found that would inlarge their own fortunes, or take a share out of the publick calamity. They abstained now from other Mens Goods, how indigent foever they were; although when accufromed to fuch Tragical fights, the People of Roser, as it happens, grew more hard-hearted. For it carried not it felf with the same moderation afterwards, in the Proscription made by Sylla, when many were found that bought the Goods of the Profcribed Persons. And yet in that made by the Triumvirs, few would be inticed to make fuch Purchases; and afterward when Cremona was taken, and the Citizens were exposed to fale by the Soldiers; the Italians bravely disdained to make Slaves of

Cinna and Marius having thus fatisfied their bloody minds, made themselves Confuls for the following year: But Marius died e're the months end, having born this Office now feven times; a Man more profitable to his Country in the time of War than of Peace. To him fucceeded Valerius Flaceus, whom Cinna fent into Asia, to supply the room of Sylla there. But he by this time had done the work, and was coming home to revenge the former injuries, having subdued Mithridates in less than three years, killed one hundred and fixty thousand of his Men, recovered Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, Asia, and other Countries, which he had got into his hands, taken his Navy from him, and forced him to be content with his own

Then fent he Archelaus his General into Greece, leaving Pelovides in Lycia to carry on the War there, he himself providing Forces, and punishing such as he found inclinable towards the Romans.

9. Archelaus first recovered Delvs, which from the Athenians had revolted to the Romans, then joyned he to himself the Achaians, Lacedemonians, and Baotians. After this he was fought by Brittius, who had put to flight Metrophanes fent also into Greece from the King; but having fresh Supplies, Brittius withdrew himself to the Piraus, or Haven of Athens, which shortly after Archelaus took in with his Sylla arriving Fleet. Now Sylla arrived in Greece with five Legions, and some Companies of Vide Appian. Horse, and having furnished himself with Money and Provisions in Atolia and in Mitbrida-

Theffaly, marched into Attica against Archelaus, almost whole Baotia, with Thebes ture in silla. the chief City, revolting to him in his paffage. He befieged Archelaus in the Pireus, a very ftrong Place, as fenced with a Wall almost forty Cubits high, confifting of square Stones, and built by Pericles during the first motions of the Peloponnesian War. Having also besieged Athens it self, he spent the whole Summer in the Siege, and at length took it, the Inhabitants being unable to make any more refistance through famine, which so far prevailed, as they made meat of sodden Taketh Athens Leather, and fed upon the Bodies of dead Men. The Pireus was also shortly after taken and the Wallsthere of demolished, with the Arcenal, and all the Rarities there-fifteen thousand being slain, the rest betaking themselves to their Camp were also killed or taken, a vast slaughter having been made. Archelaus having lost his Son Diogenes hid himself in a Fen, and thence fled to Chalcis once more. After this Sylla chaffized the Baotians for their fickleness (for they would stand to neither Party long) and took up his Winter Quarters in Theffaly, providing himself of Shipping, because he heard nothing of Lucullus, whom he had sent into Agypt to procure a Navy. Now at this time was Flaceus, who had fucceeded Marius, fent into Alia by Cinna to fucceed Sylla. Him Fimbria his Questor killed in a quarrel about lodging, being hated by his Soldiers, and he headed his Army, with which he feveral times fought, and that prosperously, against Mithridates his Son, and drove the King himself into Pergamus, and thence to Pitane, where he took Ship and field to Mitylene, and might have been taken if Lucallus would. Then did Fimbria harrace Capradocia, and burnt Ilium the Daughter of Troy, for that the Inhabitants had given up themselves to Sylla, and not to him; so that though a Roman and so akin to them, he is said to have used them worse than did Agamemnon himself. This hapned to Ilium in the latter end of the 173 Olympiad, about one thousand and fifty years after the first taking it by the Greeks. 11. Mithridates receiving intelligence of the blow he had received at Orcho-menus, wrote to Archelaus, to procure his peace on as good terms as he could. To a Peace Sylla was not now averse, being in great want of Money, and receiving no recruits from the City, where he was declared an Enemy, and defiring above all things to carry back a good Army into Italy to revenge himself. He offered Peace therefore on these conditions: That he should deliver up all his Navy, A. He begged pardon, and it was granted him, so he would take thip and depart out of Alfa; but he faid he had a better way, and going to Personals, there destroyed himself. Sylla gave him to be buried, faying, he would not imitate the barbarism of Marius and Cinna towards his friends at Rom, whom they deprived both of Life and Burial; yet he kept in this mind but a while after his arrival there, whither he now hafted, having fined Asia grievously for its revolt, and settled Assairs according to pre-He marcheth fent occasions. He took Aihens in his way, whence he carried with him the Library of Apellican the Teian (in which were most of the Books of Aristotle and brary of Apellicon the Teian (in which were more to the Books of Theophrassus, then not vulgarly known) bought by him of the Posterity of nies there.

The Senate hereat affrighted, sent to treat with him, offering their endeavour for his satisfaction, if he would presently make known his mind. Cinna they ordered to stop his Leavies; but he only returned them a plaufible Answer, and proceeded, defigning himself and his Collegue Carbo Confuls again for the following year, that there might be no need of going to Rome to a new creation. He paffed over some of his Forces into D. Imatia, there to fight Srlla; but the hindermost were driven back by a Tempest, and they refused absolutely to fight against their Country-men; so that those, who as yet had not passed the Sea, refused to go aboard. 13. Cinna and Carbo had by a Law abrogated Sylla's command, and procured War to be decreed against him, before the Senate was affrighted into the offer of a mediation. He answered, that he would never be reconciled to such wicked Persons, as they defired he should; but if the People of Rome would give them indemnity, he should not oppose it; yet he thought those that would come to him might be more fafe, feeing he had at his devotion fuch an Army. Hereby declaring sufficiently what his intentions were, he also demanded restitution of his Estate, his ancient Dignity and Honours; but the Messengers coming to Brundusum, and there hearing of Cinna's death, and the disturbance of the Common-wealth, returned back to him. Then crossed he the Sea to Brundussum with a Fleet of sixteen hundred Ships, and sixty thoufand Men. Being landed, Metellus Pius, who had absented himself from Rome for fear of Marius and Cinna, came to him, as also Pompey, afterwards sirnamed the Great, who though his Father was no friend to Sylla, yet coming now to him with some Forces, became afterwards his greatest favourite. Besides these came Cethegus, who having joyned with Cinna, now begged pardon. C. Norbanus and L. Scipio the Confuls, with Carbo, made all preparation for relistance. The first tryal at Arms was at Canusium, where Norbanus lost six thousand Men, and fied to Capita. He then passed on in Italy, making havock of all things, as Carbo did, who A.M. 3922. getting into Rome, procured Metellus, and the rest that joyned with Sylla, to be declared Enemies to the State. Both Parties sent up and down the Italian Cities, labouring both by fair means and foul to procure Forces; and fo all this Summer was Ipent, wherein the Capitol was burnt none knoweth how. Their Goods he fet to fale, and willing the People to be of good cheer, for that he was necessitated thus to act, he left a sufficient Garrison, and departed to Clusium, where he and his Officers several times overthrew Carbo's Armies. Carbo fent to Praneste to relieve Marius his Collegue eight Legions, which Pompey meeting in a ftraight place, flew many of them, and most of those that escaped, departed to their own homes. After this, Carbo and Norhams in a Fight with Metellus had ten thousand of their Men slain, and fix thousand yielded, whereupon many fell off to Sylla's Party, as also all Gall within the Alps. Norbanus fled to Rhodes, where fearing to be given up, he kiled himself; Carbo into Africk, though he had thirty thousand Men at Clusium, and other Forces, which were then broken in pieces by Pompey. Carinas, with other Commanders, attempted to break through, by the help of the Samites; and relieve Marius; but this being with no effect, they then made for Rome it

Norbs a little after was taken, and burnt to the ground by a Fire which the Inhabitants kindled over their own heads, some one way, and some another, destroying themselves. Marius, a Man of Confular Dignity, and Brother to Sylla's great Enemy, had at the Sepulcher of Catulus his Eyes first pulled out of his Head, and then his Hands and Legs cut off at several times, that he might die by degrees. Pompey drove Carbo into Sicily, and thence into Coreird, where being taken and brought to him, after he had inveighed against him in an Assembly, he caused his Head to be cut off, and sent it to Sylla.

Sect. 5. He then wrote to him to ask the People, that feeing the necessity of Affairs required fo great an Officer, a Dictator might be created, and that not for any limited time, but till all evils should be redressed: and now he spared not to mention himself. This the People was forced to yield to, as being in his Power, and He maken tion himfelt. In still recipie was 1010000 of the finded Dida for this Office, which for the face of one hundred and twenty years (ever fince the years after Hannibals quitting of Italy) had been intermitted, was conferred on him without any limitation of time. After the Funeral, the Confuls fell into a greater diffention. Lepidus would reftore the Grounds given away by Sylla, and abolish his Laws. The Senate was fearful of another War, and caused them both to fwear, that they would not decide the Controversie by the Sword; but Lepidus was refolved not to return out of his Province, till the new creation was over, and when he should be out of his Office begin a War, as then discharged from his

Lucullus Consul for the following year procured it to be sent livil Epitom, him, lest the War that was renewed with Mitbridates should be committed to him if he came back into Italy, which he affirmed else he would. Being now supplied with men and money, he, and his affiltants fell upon the places subject to Sertorius; yet did they this year no great matters. But many of Scrtorius his Army came over to them, being aggrieved that he made the Celtiberians his Guard, as diffrufting themselves, and upon suspition of the alienation of their minds, being cruelly used by 21. The year following Pompey and Metellus being more bold, made excursions into several places, and with more success; yet no considerable battel was there fought. Indeed it needed not. For, Sertorius now grown lazie, spent his time with Women, and falling into an humour of cruelty had put many to death, whereby he wrought his destruction from his own party. Perpenna fearing it might fall to his lot to be made away amongst the rest, resolved to prevent it, and so inviting him to a Feast, murdred him after he had besotted him and his attendants with Wine. He offered, if his life might be spared, to disclose certain things of confequence in private unto Pompey; but he to his great commendation, commanded him to be killed, left acculing any man he should bring the State into further trouble. 22. Sylla, upon this departure for Italy, had left Murena behind him in Afia, to fettle such things as were not yet composed, with the two Legions that belonged to Fimbria. Murena being ambitious of a Triumph, had catched at all occasions to renew the War, and had one presented to him after this manner. Mithridates waging War with them of Colchos and Bosphorus, who had revolted from him; the former defired and obtained his Son for their King. Against the Bosphorians he made then great preparations, insomuch that every one thought he deligned another Waragainst the Romans. Archelaus was now at this time out of favour, for that he was thought to have granted too much unto Sylla in the Treaty of Peace, and therefore fled to Murena, and stirred him up to invade Mithridates, who neither had restored the intire possession of Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes. Murena did so, slighting the mention of Peace, which was objected to him. Mithridates fent to Rome, to complain of Sylla, and expecting the return of his Ambassadors, stirred not, though the other passing over the River Halys fired three hundred of his Villages. Afterwards came Callidius from Rome, who though he shewed no Decree of the Senate, yet faid, it was the pleafure of the Fathers, that all acts of hostility should be forborn. and afterwards he talked with Murena alone. Yet did not Murena forbear, fo that the King judging that War indeed was intended, resolved to look to himself, and passing over the River overthrew Murena in battel, who sled into Phrygia, This

na's Garrisons out of Cappadocia. Sylla now dictator, was not well pleased he should be thus disturbed, and therefore sent A. Gabinius to command Murena in good earnest to forbear, and reconcile the King to Ariobarganes. Mithridates gave him his Son of four years of age for an Holtage, and received part of Cappadocia.

Sect. 5. So things were fetled again, and the fecond War, as Appian faith, ended in the third vear. But some seven years after another was begun. 23. Presently after the last conclusion, he sent to Rome to have the conditions of the League recorded, but the thing was neglected. Ariobarzanes fent also to complain, that he kept the greater part of Cappadocia from him, whereupon Sylla commanded him to quit it, which accordingly he did. Afterward he fent again to defire that the League might be recorded; but Sylla being now dead, the matter was not as much as reported to the Senate. Hereupon he underhand procu-The War a- red Tigranes King of Armenia his Son-in-law to invade Cappadocia, whence he led gain breaketh away three hundred thouland persons, and there built a City, to be the Metropo-out and why lis of the Kingdom, which from himself he named Tigranocerta, i. e. the City of Tigranes. 24. In the 680 year of the City, L. Licinius Lucullus and M. Aurelius Cottabe- Appian at faing Consuls, the former of them was sent against Mithridates with one Legion out prid. of the City, to which were joyned those two that belonged to Fimbria, and two culto. more, so that in all he had an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and one thousand six hundred Horse. He found the King before Cyzicus a City of Propontis, and presently besieged the besieger. He drove him to such straights by the help of L. Maniw (who now again revolted) that though having a great defire to the place, he la-boured much to take it, yet through extreme famin he was forced first to fend away and had granted to him Bithynia and Cappadocia, receiving from him as a Captain

the Horse, and sick Footmen, into Bithynia, whereof sifteen thousand were intercepted, and then to fly himself with the rest that could escape the great slaughter made of them in their flight. During this double siege, Eumachus one of Mithridates his Captains made incursions into Phrygia, subdued the Pissda, and Isauri, and endeavoured to do the same by Cilicia, till he was repelled by Deiotarus one of the Tetrarchs of Gallogracia. But Lucullus improved his success on land by several Victories at Sea, wherein he took divers of Mithridates his Commanders, and hasted into And forcing Bithynia to overtake him. In the space of a year he got together forty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, with which force he once or twice repelled the Romans, and struck some terror into them. But Lucullus sending out some Horse for provisions, he also sent a party to interrupt them, which fighting in a disadvantageous place was worsted. Being now destitute of Horse, he thought of removing from Cabira, where he had wintred; and communicated his intention to his friends. They not expecting the fign began to pack up, and fend their baggage out of the Camp before day, which the Army taking notice of, thought much they should flye without any warning given, and in great fear and disorder breaking out of the Trenches ran away. The King went about to hinder them, but none taking notice of him, he was born down in the crowd, and being got on Horseback betook himself also to slight, and might have been taken, but that the Romans were too busie in plundering the Camp, though warned by their General to

25. Mithridates first fled to Comana, and thence into Armenia to Tigranes, who admitted him not to his presence, but caused him to be entertained like a King, though in fenny and unwholfome places. All Pontus, except a few places, yielded to Lucullus, to whom also Machares King of Bosphorus sent a Crown of Gold, and purchased the Title of his Friend and Allie. After this Lucullus purfued Mithridates into Armenia, intending to fall on Tigranes King thereof, if he gave him occasion by defending his Enemy. Tigranes at this time was a very potent Sect. Prince, having conquered several Nations. He wrested Asia from the Parthians, transported many thousands of Greeks out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, into a City built by him near Euphrates, and called Tigranocerta; he obtained Spria and Pale-Stine, displacing the Kings thereof, as was acknowledged by Lucullus. This made him intollerably proud, so that when he rode, he would have four of those Kings he had fudued to run beside him like Lackies, and stand before him with their hands folded in token of subjection, when he sate on his Throne. Lucullus sent to him Appine Claudius his Wives Brother, to demand Mithridates; but he was then bufied in Phanicia, in reducing some places, which the Messenger made an opporcunity in his absence, secretly to withdraw from him many, whom his intollerable pride had rendred impatient. At his return he gave a negative answer, and therefore Luculius with two Legions and scarcely three thousand. Horse, passed over Euphrates, being not acknowledged a General, because he had not given him the title of King of Kings.

26. Tigranes had no good intelligence of his coming, for he hanged him that first brought the news, as a disturber of the Peace; but when he perceived it was so indeed, he fent Mithrobarzanes with two thousand Horse to interrupt his passage, lest Manceus to guard Tigranocerta, and went himself up and down levying Forces. Whilst he was bringing two hundred and fifty thousand Foot, and fifty thousand Horse, the former was beaten back, and the later could not defend the City. Mithridates advised him not to hazard all in a battel, but rather starve the Romans, as they had done him at Cyzicus, but he flighted the motion, and jeered at the smallness of their number, faying, that if they were Ambassadors they were very many, and if Soldiers, very few. But Luculus pitching upon an Hill, sent his Horse to provoke and A. M. 3935. verthroweth in battel Ti-

After this, another great Army was railed and committed to the conduct of Mithridates. They then endeavoured to incompass Lucullus, but were croffed in their expectation, and both parties continued without any great matter performed, till want of victuals forced them to depart. Then went Tigranes further into his Kingdom, and Mithridates marched away into his own, being purfued by Lucullus.

27. Mithridates overthrew Fabius, who had been left in Pontus by Lucullus, and after him Triarius, who being fent with a new supply, out of a desire of glory after him Iriarius, who being tent with a new imprity, out of a define of giory ventured to fightere the General came. Heloft in one engagement twenty four plan capture, ventured to fightere the General came. Tribunes, and one hundred and fifty Centurions (which numbers were feldome Alexandrian heard of in an overthrow of the Roman Armies) and seven thousand in all were slain near the Mountain Scotius, about three miles diftaut from Zelaa City of Pontus, Lucullus having heard of the Kings intention to fetupon Triarius, procured the Soldiers of Fimbria to march, who through the procurement of P. Clodius mutined against him, as formerly against Flaccus by the means of Fimbria. But Mithridates taking away all the necessaries he could carry, and destroying the rest, departed into Armenia the less. Lucullus would gladly have followed him, and might have put an end to the War, but that now by the procurement of A. Gabinius the Tribune, Manius Acilius Glabrio that years Conful, was appointed his Successor, and an order way to finish made for disbanding of Fimbria's Soldiers. This being known, Lucullus was slighthe war, is ted by his Army so much, that hardly could his men be drawn to stay, though they by the coming marched no further against Mithridates; so that the King began to recruit himself, Dio. 135. and Tigranes wasted Cappadocia. Shortly after, Glabrio arrived in his Province, and Platarobia Lefent about to give notice, that the Senate was displeased with Lucullus for prolong-callo. ing the War, disbanded his Army, and would confiscate the estates of such as should difobey it's order. Hereupon all the Army forfook him, except fome few poor men, who had no cause to regard the threatnings; and Lucullus being outed of his command, Mithridates recovered almost his whole Kingdom, and did much hurt to Cappadocia; Glabrio not as much as coming to the Army, but loitering in Bithyria. This hapned in the eighth year after Lucullus had undertaken the War; the fix hundred and eighty seventh of the City, C. Calpurnius Pife and the faid M. Acilius Glabrio being Consuls. The year following the War was committed to Cneius

Spartacus a Thracian born , was a Fencer in the house of Lentulus at Capua, where he perswading about seventy of his condition, rather to fight for their own confut apples liberty than the pleasure of spectators, they broke the house and fled to Vestiving ! the hill in Campania, where receiving to them all fugitives, they fell down upon Plat in craffe. the hill in Campania, where receiving to them an inglitive, the left advisor of the booty, he Florant's the parts adjacent, and robbed them. Spartacus now having got together seventy thousand men, and making great preparations, began to be formidable to the Romins, who thereforesent against him L. Gellius Poplicola, and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus the Consuls with two Legions. Crixus was at the Hill Garganus defeated and slain. Spartacus making for Gall, was befet before and behind by the Confuls; but one after the other he overthrew, and putting them both to flight, killed three hundred Prifoners to appeale the Ghost of Crixus. Marching then towards the Alps he was opposed by Cassius the Prator, whom he also overthrew, and who hardly escaped from

29. Spartacus puffed up by such success, now consulted of no less than setting upon Rome it self. At the Comitia for Prators, when the Candidates appeared, M. Licinius Crassius, a person of great Nobility, and exceeding rich, undertook the Office, and was fent against Spartacus with six Legions. He ordered Mammius his Lieutenant with two Legions to attend the Enemies motions, but not to fight, which doing, he was worsted, and many being taken, many also cast away their Arms and fled. Crassus to terrific others, used great severity against such as for sook their Colours, decimating five hundred who had first begun to fly; which antient kind of Discipline being of a long time disused, he hereby revived. Spartacus having by this time passed to the Sea, thought of going over into Sicily; but failing of his design upon some Cicilian Rovers, he satedown in the Peninsula of Rhegium, where Crasfus as it were belieged him, having drawn a line through the Isthmus from Sea to Sea, to cut off all Provisions. Spartacus in a tempestuous night made a shift to fill up the Ditch, and get over the third part of his Army, then ingaging with Crassian lost twelve thousand men. After this defeat he went toward the Petiline Mountains, and the Lieutenant and Quastor of Crassus pursuing him, he faced about and put them to flight, whereby his men being encouraged, refused not to give the Romans battel. Craffis now defired also to fight, Because Pompey, who was lately reagainst another, Spartacus engaged with all his forces, and made at Crassus through the midst of Weapons and Wounds, whom yet he missed, but killed two of his Centurions. At length fuch as flood nearhim running away, whileft he flood his ground manfully he was flain, and the rest were disordered and put to flight. Some that escaped from the battel, and made head again Pompey suppressed, three years before he undertook the War against the Pirates. 30. The Pirates who had been a little repressed by Servilius Isauricus (as we The infolence said before) were now grown so numerous and powerful, that there was no pasfing of the Seas, nor any dwelling upon the Coasts; for they not onely took and robbed Ships on the Sea, but also whole Provinces on the Land; the chief place of their Rendezvous being Cilicia the Rough. Because they made choice of Cilicia, as most commodious in the Mountainy and Craggy places thereof to fecure themselves, they all went under the name of Cilices. They had defeated feveral Roman Pretors, Murena did little good against them, and Servilius but a little repressed their violence; for so impudent were they now grown, that besides their incursions into Sicily and other places, which made the Inhabitants of the Coafts for fake their habitations, they landed in Italy near Brundulium, whence they took away several women of quality; and more then that, two Armies with their Enligns.

31. The People of Rome being very sensible of these disgraceful losses, a Law was preferred by A. Gabinius the Tribune, ('tis uncertain whether at the motion of Pompey, or from his own defire to ingratiate himself with him; for being none of the best men, he little valued the good of the Commonwealth) that some one from amongst those of Consular dignity should be Created General with full power for three years against the Pirates, to whom also should be granted large forces and many Lieutenants for carrying on the War. This Law little pleased the Fathers, who now began to be jealous of Pompey's power; but to him was the bufiness committed, having equal authority with Proconsuls any where within fifty miles distance from the Sea, and full power over all persons within that compass;

whether Kings or others, that they might affift him in the work. The Senate permitted him to chuse out of their body fifteen Lieutenants, to whom he might commit feveral Provinces to take up as much money out of the Treasury and from the Publicans ashe pleased; to raise what force he would, and take two hundred Ships. But he obtained greater things of the People, and doubled his pre-parations, getting five hundred Ships, one hundred and twenty thouland Foot, and fome five thousand Horse. He had also out of the Senate about twenty five Vicegerents, two Questors, and took up fix thousand Attick Talents; so difficult a thing it feem'd to destroy so many Fleets as the Pirates had, in such a Sea, where there was so many places of retreat and refuge.

Then in the space of forty dayes he reduced Cilicia unto Roman obedience; for though he had provided

Thus having taken well nigh four hundred Ships, killed ten thousand men, and taken one hundred and twenty Forts, he finifled this War in three Moneths, using the Conquered with more clemency than did Q. Pompey commanded him to lay down Arms, and deliver up all Fugitives; who fearing they should be given up, and the other Soldiers mutining for being about to be deprived of their help, a great trouble infued, which he evaded, by saying that he onely sent to make an espaid, and by fwearing that he would never be reconciled to the Romans, because of their infatiable avarice. Then marched Pompey into Galatia, where meeting with Lucullus, Stirs betwint much ado there was betwint them. Lucullus faid the War was finished, and that the Commissioners sent from Rome were to decide the business, and when Pompey would not hear of this, he reviled him with an immoderate thirst after power; Pompey again objecting covetousness to him, so that the accusations could on neither fide be denyed. Lucullus gave out commands as yet in power, but Pompey by his Edicts forbade them, nulled all his Acts, and at length drew away most of his men. But at his return he was received with great honour by the Senate, carrying with Cherry-Tree out of Pontus (from a City of which Religion it was called Cerafus) cp. 25.

35. Mithridates had now got together a confiderable Army; but coming to ingage with Pompey was inferiour to him in all skirmishes. Pompey considering how Dia mick went into Armenia the less, subject to Mithridates, who fearing he might get that Countrey into his hands, followed him thither. First here Mithridates had hopes to starve him; but was disappointed with considerable loss, and was himself encompassed with a Trench one hundred and sifty furlongs about. Hearing that Marcius was joyned to Pompey, who had Provisions at will, he fled away, having first He defeateth killed all fuch as were fick, and useless, about him. But Pompey pursued, and prevented him from paffing over Euphrates; then forced him to fight in the night, being furprized, and at unawares. The Moon being low, and on the backs of the Romans, folengthened their shadows, that his Soldiers thinking him nearer than they were, shot most of their Arrows without doing any execution. He lost many thousands; but he himself brake out with eight hundred Horse, whereof but three hundred stayed with him. Then wandring through the Woods with his Horse in his hand, he lighted of some Mercenaries and about three thousand Foot, by which he was conveyed into a Castle where he had laid up much Treasure. Hence he sent to Tigranes, who refused to receive him, laying to his charge, that by his means Tigranes his son (by the daughter of Mithridates) had rebelled against him, Who flieth to and offered one hundred Talents for hishead. Phraates hereupon invaded Armenia, and Tigranes sent to Pompey for aid, who being unwilling to begin a War with Phraates without an order from Rome, fent three Commissioners to agree them. Antiochus son of Antiochus Pius, to whom Lucullus granted Syria his inheritance, thought first of betaking himself to the Parthian; yet upon second thoughts, resolved to cast himself upon the good nature of Pompey. But he having obtained it without a stroak, put him beside it, commanding him to content himself with Comagena, though he had never ill deferved of the People of Rome: for knowing he was not able to right himself, he excused the matter, saying, it was not fit that Syria, whence Tigranes had banished the posterity of Selencus, should now rather fall to it being conquered, than to

After this Castor his Governour of Phanagoria Applan. a Port Town of Pentus revolted, and calling the People to their liberty, took the Castle held by Mithridates his Sons, whereof four he sent to Roman Garrisons. Hereupon several places fell off, which made him put many persons to death, amongst whom were divers of his own friends, and one of his Sons. Seeing also that many revolted, and his new Army had no heart to the service, he fent to the Princes of Scythia to hasten their supplies, sending his daughters to them with a convoy of five hundred Horse; but these men killing the Eunuchs who had molefted them about the King, carried away the Women unto Pompey. courage still he had, as to think of passing through Scythia and Istria, and joyning with the Galls of Europe to invade Italy, hoping there to find many enemies of the Romans; though Pompey coming out of Syria had through ambition done what he condemned in Lucullus, having reduced his Kingdom into the form of a Province, whilft he was yet alive, and provided for new opposition. But his Army was startled at the news of his intentions, hating the tediousness of the journey, and having small hope to conquer those in Italy, whom at their own doors they could not withstand. Yet such was his authority, as for a while they were quiet, till his own Son whom he had most loved, and destined his successor, became the procurer of their defection and his death.

39. This was Pharnaces, who either out of apprehension that this attempt upon Italy would cut off all pardon from his Family, or upon other grounds, conspired against him. The Temple being very strong by it's situation, was after much labour taken in the third money, Faustus the Son of Sylla having first mounted the Walls. Twelve thousand Jews were flain, of the Romans very few. Pompey entred the Holy of Holies, but medled with nothing, restored Hyrcanus to the Priesthood and Government (yet with command not to wear a Diadem) and took Aristobulus along with him, making Judea tributary to Rome, as is more largely related in it's proper place. After this, leaving Syria with two Legions to Scaurus his Quastor, he fully subdued Cilicia, and thence returning into Pontus, fetled things there, bellowing the Kingdom of Bosphorus upon Pharnaces. At his return he wintred at Ephesus, whence having subdued many Princes, and joyned others as Allies to the State of Rome, having taken one thouland Castles, nine hundred Cities, and restored thirty nine; having planted Colonies in eight Cities and Countries, and ordered the policy of fuch as through the Continent of Asia belonged to the Romans; and having magnificently rewarded his Soldiers he returned into Italy, and at Rome triumphed two A. Lentulus had been Consul seven years before, and now was Pretor (as also Cethegue) being driven on by a vain confidence he had in the Books of Sibylla, which he would often say did portend that the Soveraign power, should be in the hands of three Cornelii, viz. 42. The plot was discovered by Fulvia a Courtisan, to whom Q. Curius one of the Conspirators (a man that for his debaucheries had by the Censors been removed out of the Senate) blabbed it out, while he boafted to her, that shortly he should be a very considerable man. She gave intelligence to Cicero, who out of them two got the whole matter, how, and where they had met, and what defigns they had in hand, particularly for his own destruction to be brought about by L. Vasgunteius a Senator, and C. Cornelius of Equestrian rank, under pretence of a kind visit. He appointed guards to the several parts of the City, and on the eighth of November (as the year then went) called the Senate together, whither came Cataline amongst the rest; but none of the Senators would come near him, fo as that part of the bench whereon he fate, was wholly void. Cicero, whether fearing him, or angry to fee him there, made his first Oration against ciano maketh him, wherein he commanded him to depart the City. He went away late in the night with three hundred Armed men, and Lictors carrying Axes and Rods before him as a Magistrate, into Etruria, gathering Souldiers all along, intending to return and make prey of the City, which upon his departure he had given order to burn, as also to kill Cicero, which Lentulus and Cethegus took upon them to do, as foon as he should come to Fasula. In the mean time the Amballadors of the Allobroges, who were come to Town to accuse their Magistrates, were also drawn in, to stir up the Galls against the Commonwealth; but declaring it to Fabius Sanga their Patron (it was the custom for each Nation or State to have one in the City) it came to Tullie's ear, and so was prevented.

43. The day after Cataline's departure, the Conful made his fecond Oration, wherein he congratulates the People, and Commonwealth, concerning his absence. The Senate judged Cataline an Enemy, and Manties, with whom in Etruria he had joyned; they deprived Lentulus of his Office, by whom the Ambaffadors had been drawn in, who confelled they had often heard from him what he idlely conjectured out of Sibylla's Books. Cicero's third Oration declareth what was done in the Senate. The times being very dangerous, he propounded to the Fathers to confider what course was to be taken with Lentulus, Cethegus, Stalius, and Cassius, all whom he having secured, this bred a great disturbance; for the Slaves and Dependents of the two former got together a great company of Artificers, and indeavoured to break in upon the back-fide of the Pretor's house, and rescue their Lords. This being known, the Conful hasted out of the Senate-house, and appointed a watch to be fet, then returning, asked the opinions of the Senators. Silanus defigned Conful for the enfuing year, being first asked his opinion, according to the custom, was for putting them to death, and so were divers others. till Nero dilliwaded it, judging it better to secure them till Cataline were suppressed, and the thing better fifted out. Of this opinion was C. Julius Cesar, something suspected to be privy to the design. He would have them dispersed in feveral Towns in Italy by the Confuls appointment, afterwards to be tryed, and not put to death altogether unheard. This feemed very plaufible, till Cato (great Grand-Son to M. Porcius Cato the Censor) very earnestly pressed the contrary, falling foul upon Casar as a suspicious person. Then the Consul made his fourth Oration, wherein he so disputeth of the two contrary opinions, as he evidently inclineth to feverity, as fearing what the guilty party might do the night following out of necessity and desperation. Hereby the Senate was induced to put them to death as surprized in the fact, which Cicero saw done accordingly ere the house arose. After this Cataline was overtaken by C. Antonius, the other Consul, near the Alps, as he was going into Gall to perfect his Levies, and there fighting most valiantly was slain. Afterwards in the taking of Mitylene he deserved well, and served under Servilius Isauricus in Cilicia; but not long. For, hearing of Sylla's death, and hoping to make his fortune out of the diffentions raited by Lepidus, home he came; but not finding a convenient opportunity, and having to no purpose accused Dolobella, to shun the Envy thereby contracted, he went to Rhodes to hear Apollonius, whence fayling in Winter; he fell into the hands of Pirates, and was forced to purchase his freedom with fifty Talents; to revenge which, he procured some ships, and took some of them, whom he nailed to Crosses, though without leave from the Pretor, who would have fold them. After this he gave a stop to Mithridates his Lieutenant, and faved divers Cities in Alia. He affifted Pompey the Conful, and others, in restoring the Tribuneship which Sylla had broken. 45. Having got leave to return ere his time was out, he joyned presently factious per with the Latine Colonies in demanding the freedom of the City, and had incited them to some desperate design, but that the Senate for fear of the worst, retained the Legions some time, which were raised for Cilicia. He was suspected to have been of the party of M. Crassus, of P. Sulla also, and Autronius (who having been deligned Confuls, were found to have indirectly fought for the Office, and fo according to Law forfeited their places to the discoverers) in the beginning of the year to fet upon the Senate, and kill whom they pleased. Crassus being made Dictator, he was to have been Master of the Horse-men under him, and all things being ordered according to their pleasure, the Consulship was to have been restored to the other two. Some have affirmed (whom Suetonius citeth) that he also conspired with Cn. Pifo, that the one in the City, and the other abroad, should Made Adilia, rife, which was prevented by Pifo's death. Being after this Ædilia, he fo managed the business of publick buildings, and shews, that all was ascribed to him, and nothing to his Collegue; by which means, and others, he procured the favour of the People, and effayed by the Tribunes to get Egypt affigned to him, which, now having expelled the King, he thought would afford him an opportunity of an extraordinary command. But he was croffed by the great ones, whom that he might vex, he restored the Trophies erected by Marius over the Cimbri, which Sulla had caused to be pulled down, and suborned those who accused Rabirius. By his means especially the Senate had suppressed Saturninus the seditious Tribune, and now being brought before Cafar as his Judge, he was so severe against him, that nothing fo much helped the man in his appeal from him to the

Clodins out of malice to Cicero feeking for the Tribuneship, whereas he was a Patrician, thereby uncapable of the place, he procured himself to be adopted by a Plebeian, and so with the loss of his former dignity obtained it. Then did he prefer a Law, that who sever had put to death any Roman Citizen unheard, water

Pomps at first stood stiffy for the accused, saying, he would rather dye himself than Tully should be hurt; but Casar took him off, because Cicero having desired to go his Lieutenant into Gall, upon Clodius his seeming willing to be reconciled, had changed his resolution, and hereby displeased him. This is certain, that he who was wont to defend others so earnestly, was very timorous in his own cause (which hapned also to Demostheres) and

4. Clodius having thus rid himself of Cicero, for that Cato's presence was very troublesom to him, sent him also out of the way, under colour of doing him honour. He preferred a Law against Ptolomy King of Cyprus (Brother to Auletes to spoil the of Agypt) for the spoiling him of all his estate, and reducing that Island into a the form of a Province, though this man had nothing ill deferved. He was intend until what he form of a Province, though this man had nothing ill deferved. He was intend until what he had; but the truth was, Clodius had been taken by the Pirates, and fending to him for mo-tage pairs. ney to redeem him, he would part but with two Talents, and therefore he took char in cities the consecution to he have need on him and Cata both towards. The King Land Middle this occasion to be revenged on him and Cato both together. The King hearing of Cato's coming, killed himself, and some said that he cast his treasures into the Sea. Cato fold his goods, and brought a great fum of money into the treafury. But, by this time Pompey repented that he had forfaken Cicero; for, Clodin wanting other matter now to work on, vexed all the great ones, and re-pealed fome things which he had done, so that now he set himself to have him recalled. Clodius withstood it, but thereupon the Senate passed a Decree, that

Consul propounded it on the Calends of January; but the matter being hindred; feveral wayes, was brought down to the People on the eighth before the Calenda of February, where was great endeavour used by T. Annius Milo and P. Sextins two other Tribunes for his restitution. Clodins their Collegue taking some Fencers belonging to his Brother Appins, fell upon the multitude and killed many: chair recalled The Tribunes were wounded, and Q. Cicero Brother of the banished (newly returned from Asia, which he had governed three years) lay for dead amongst the slain. Now the People began seriously to bethink themselves. Mile ventured to draw Clodius by force to judgment, and Pompey possessing himself of the Forum, put the People to their suffrages, who with universal consent voted his restitution. The Senate decreed honour to fuch Cities as had entertained him, and that his House and Villages should be re-edified at the publick charge. So Cicero who had been banished the year before about the Calends of April, returned this year in the month Sexilie, or, the day before the Notes of September, and therefore was absent about fixteen months. As Plutarch more rightly computeth than * Simplon, who strangely forgetting himself, blaming him, for saying he return- a. M. 39481 ed in the fixteenth month, contended that from the first of April to the month Sextilis or August of the following year, intervene but fourteen months. Now P. Cornelius Lentulus and Q. Cecilius Metellus were Consuls.

5. But Cefar, as we said, obtained of the People Gall within the Alpes and Illyricum with three Legions; and the Senate added Gall without the Alpes (which in part we now call France) with another Legion. This gave occasion to a War of fuch confequence as none at this time was greater, and being described by the Theocosion department connequence as none at this time was greater, and being described by the office sellict days in the Account we are obliged to give of it. His first work was to repel the by car him. Helvetii (Ats Helvetiens & Suisses) who having burnt their Houses and resolutions. ved to feek out more convenient Habitations, intended to pass over the Rhone, and so through his Province. But before he come to shew how this was done, at the entrance of his work he gives his Reader a short description of Gall in this

Sect. 6. 6. All Gall is divided into three parts, whereof the Belgæ inhabit one, the Aqui- cofar de Bullo tani another, and those which they call Celtes, and we (Romans) call Galls a third Gallico lib. 1. His Geogra- all which, differ each from other in Maners, Language and Laws. The River Garunna or Garonne seperates the Galls from the Aquitanes, and Matrona, and Sequina (Marne and Scine) bound them from the Belga. The Belga are most Warlike as being at most distance from the Civility and Politure of the Province, and less frequented with Merchants or acquainted with such things as are imported to render effeminate mens minds, as also being seated next to the Germans beyond the Rhine, with whom they have continual Wars. For which cause also the Helvetians excel the rest of the Galls in valour, being in daily conslicts with the Germans, for defence of their own territories, or by invading theirs. The part inhabited by the Galls, begins at the River Rhone, and is bounded with the Garonne. the Ocean and the Confines of the Belge; and reaching also to the Rhine as a limit from the Sequani, it stretcheth Northward. The Belgæ take their beginning at the extreme Confines of Gall, and inhabit the Country which lyeth along the lower part of the Rhine, inclining to the North and the rifing Sun. Aquitain spreadeth it self betwire the River Garonne and the Pyrenean Hills, as far as the Ocean which lyeth toward Spain, between the West and North.

7. This division of Gall hath by reason of the Authority of the Author, been Montes Juli esteemed a Rule for the Geography of that Country; and yet a late accurate Sur-its is 60g everyor of it thinks himself obliged to hint several either faults in it, or mistakes of the standard of the standar those that ordinarily read it. For, he contends that by all these words laid to-sigmani officgether it is not to be understood that Cefar makes a threefold division of Gall, vi cititie last but that the Cellich was twofold as including C. II. N. I. but that the Celtick was twofold as including Gallia Narbonensis, though not expressed. And he accuseth Cesar of want of diligence in assigning the Borders of Gallia Celtica towards the East, where he writes that B₃ the Sequani and Helvetii it reaches to the Rhine, as if the Sequani in any part bordered upon the Rhine, or the Helvetii, at a further distance, were seated on that River. And as improperly he writes that the Celtick Gall took its beginning from the River Rhone. For the Rhone except in a very little tract at the Lake Lemanus gives no limit or bound to Gall, but perpetually cuts through it, from Geneva to the Sea of Marseilles. Such faults Monetus findes with Cafars's beginning of his Commentaries, as to his Geography. And we shall see he makes other Exceptions to his Narratives, both as to Countries, Nations, and his very own Acts. Let us first hear as compendiously as we can what Cæfar faith.

- 8. Amongst the Helvetians Orgetorix was most Eminent both for the Nobility of his Descent and Riches, and in the year when M. Messala and M. Piso were Consuls, out of ambition to reign, moved the Nobility to a Commotion, and perfwaded the State as an easie matter for them, who in valour excelled all other Nations, to invade their Neighbours with their whole power, and make themselves Masters of all Gall. He did the more easily perswade them because the Helvetians were shut up on every side, by the strength and Nature of the place they inhabited. On the one fide with the depth and breadth of the River Rhine, which divides their Country from Germany; on the other fide with the high ridge of the Mountain Jura which runs betwixt them and the Sequani ; and on the third part they were flanked with the Lake Lemanus, and the River Rhone parting their Territories from the Roman Province. Being thus straightned they could not easily inlarge themselves, or make War upon the bordering Countries; and thereupon being men wholly bent to Arms, and War, were discontented as having too little roome for their multitude of People, and the fame they had obtained for their valour; their Country containing two hundred and forty miles in length, and in breadth one hundred and eighty. They refolved to make preparation for an Expedition, for which purpose they bought a great number of Carts and Horses for Cariages, sowed much Corn that they might have plenty in their Journey, and made peace with the confining Countries. For this they thought two years would be fufficient, and in the third inforced their fetting forward by a folemn Law, appointing Orgetoria to give order for what remain-
- 9. Here we see that the straitness of their Country, and its inability to nourish and fustain their Multitudes, was the great motive of this defign of the Helvetians, as the like hath been to most other Nations for transmigration; and if Monetus be heard, they had much more reason afforded from that inconvenience than Cafar imagined. For, whereas he here writes that their Country contained two hundred and forty miles in length, and one hundred and eighty in breadth, he affirms him to make it bigger by two thirds than it really was. Indeed the Helvetians themselves in their Geographical Carts give out that from the Town of Geneva to the Acronian, or Lake of Constance, may be found the length affigned by Cafar, and from Tura and the Rhine to the Alps that border upon them, the breadth of eighty miles; but he affirms they will never prove it to any Foreigner that knows the ways, but that their first affertion exceeds all belief. Then they challenge that Country lying at the roots of the Alps which the Rhati (Grisons) the Nantnates and Le-pontii will not yield them, as neither will the Latobrigi (* Vaudois or Vaussis) * People de that are adjacent to the Lake Lemanus, the Confederates indeed of the Helvetians, but not of their Body or Nation. To the Latobrigi he faith, of right belongeth as far as from the Mountain Jura and the West, to the Veragri and the East, whatsoever ground lyeth upon the Lake, as far as the Region of Berne toward the North; although Cæsar in his running discourse, and intent upon something else, assignes it all to the Helvetians. But he either having seen these places but once, and but for a few dayes, or disturbed with the noise and cares of the Helvetian War, or for that, after the Gallick and Civil Wars were over, he published his Commentaries at a long diftance, speaks little considerately and accurately of this Country and

10. But Orgetorix, still acted by his ambitious design, communicated it to two of his Neighbours, and perswaded Casticus one of the Sequani, and Dumnorix one of the Ædui, to fet up also for themselves, and get the Soveraignty of their Counother people tries. But his practiles were discovered, and when he should have been called to account he was found dead, not without suspicion that he killed himself. However the Helvetians purfued their former delign of leaving their Country; and when they thought themselves prepared, set fire to all their Towns, in number twelve, and four hundred Villages, besides private Buildings, and burnt all the Corn but what they carried along with them, that all hope of return being taken away, they might the more readily undergo all hazards; and order was given that every man should carry with him so much meal as would sustain him for three moneths. They perswaded the Rauraci, Tulingi, and Latobrigi to do the like and go along with them; as also the Boii, who once dwelt beyond the Rhine, but were now feated in the Territories of the Norici, and had taken the Capital Town of that Country. There were only two wayes which gave them passage out of their Country, the one through the Sequani very narrow and difficult, between the Hill Jura and the River Rhone, through which a fingle Cart could hardly pass, and having an high Mountain hanging over, so that a small force might easily hinder them: The other was through the Roman Province far easier and readier, the River Rhone running betwixt the Helvetians and the Allobroges (who lately had been brought into obedience to the People of Rome) giving passage in divers places by Fords. Now the utmost Town belonging to the Allobroges, and bordering upon the Helvetians was Geneva, where there was a Bridg leading to the Helvetians. They doubted not to perswade the Allobroges (who seemed yet but little affected to the people of Rome) or at least to force them to give them passage. Being now ready for a march, they appointed a day whereon to meet on the Banks of Rhone, which was on the twenty fifth of March , L. Pifo and A. Gabinus being Confuls.

11. Here Monetus again reprehends this great Man as unskilfully delivering that there were onely two ways through which the Helvetians could pals to their Neighbour Nations, so as to come to the Country of the Santones, on which they intended to seize. It's certain, saith he, that the Allobroges both then and now were passable by two ways, as well by the Helvetians as other Nations, and those leading through the Borders of the Latobrigi; and that the Sequani were passable by as many; of which certainly the Helvetians would have chosen the most commodious. Of the two ways leading from the Latobrigi to the Allobroges, one lies beneath the Western Head of the Lake Lemanus and Geneva, through which the Helvetians attempted to pass, as shorter; where yet the Rhone is seldome fordable, as always fwelling with the waters flowing out of the Lake; and the other lies above the Eastern Head of the Lake in the Territories of the Veragri, where the Rhone is not deep, but easily fordable. From the Latobrigi also to the Sequani lies two ways. That of which Cafar speaks at the root of the Mountain Jura and the right hand Bank of the River Rhone; and another almost fix leagues distant from it, toward the West, in the Straits of Jura, leading to Pons Ælius, now Pontarbier

Sect. 6. and Vesontio, or Bezanzon. And besides there was still another leading from the Helvetians to the Sequani, and that was through the Territories of the Tulingi their Confederates, the most large and even, but longer and more turning than the rest, by the Confines of the Lingones and Ædni. And so there were not onely two, but five ways, by which the Helvetians might have passed out of their own Bounds, as well by the Sequani as Allobroges contrary to what Cafar delivers, who is neither more to be believed when he writes that the Rhone runs betwixt the Borders of the Helvetians and Allobroges, giving pallage in certain places by Fords. For the Rhone doth not touch the Helvetians but the Latobrigi; as also doth the Lake Lemanus: and as for the Latobrigi, though in this Expedition and War they were aflociate to the Helvetians, yet were they no portion of their Nation, Cafar himfelf being witness where he delivers, that the Helvetians perswaded them, as also the Rauraci and Tulingi their Neighbours to joyn with them in the Expedition. Moreover what he writes concerning the Rhone being fordable near to its paffage out of the Lake Lemanus, will not eafily go down with any that are acquainted with those places. But to proceed.

12. Cafar having notice of the defign of the Helvetians posted from Rome into Gall, and came to Genevi, where he brake down the Bridge, and raifed Forts throughout the Province, there being but one Legion in those parts. They hainterpretation of the ving intelligence of his Arrival fent their Ambaffadors, the choiceft of their Nobiliability, to defire his permiffion to the processible themselves the choiceft of their Nobiliability. ty, to defire his permission to pass peaceably through the Province, having no other way to go. But he remembring how L. Caffins the Conful was flain, his Army defeated, and his Soldiers put under the Yoke, thought it not fit to grant their request; for he did not think that men so ill affected would forbear to offer wrongs and injuries, if permitted. However for the better gaining of time, and railing sufficient Forces, he took space to deliberate till the Ides of April. And in the mean time with that Legion he had ready, and the Soldiers that came out of the Province, he made a Ditch and a Wall of fixteen foot in height from the Lake Lemanus that runneth into the Rhone, to the Hill Jura, which divideth the Sequani from the Helectians, being in length nineteen miles. The work being perfected, he disposed Garisons, and fortified Castles to hinder them if they went about to break out by force. At the day appointed for return of the Ambassadors he utterly denied to give any leave to pass through the Province, as having neither Custom nor Precedent from the People of Rome to warrant him in that kind. And if by force of Armes they would indeavour it, he faid he should use his endeavour to oppose them. Here again Monetus asks the question what need there was of fo long a Wall and Dirch, seeing that Ceciar a little before had faid, that this Pallage was so straight that a single Cart could scarcely get through it? Was it for that he would draw this Fortification from the Bank of the Lake toward the inward Champion of the Latobrigi, the better to keep off the Helvetians from patting the Fords of the Rhone, and from the Town of Geneva? But a little after Cafar shall confess openly that the Helvetians entred these Fords, and yet broke not through his Fortifications; and when he fo writes will manifeltly contradict himfelf. Let us hear it as it comes in order.

He denies

They attempt 13. The Helvetians frustrated of their former hope, went about, some with Boats joyned together, others with Flats whereof they made store, and the rest by Fords where the River was shallow, sometimes in the day and oftentimes by night, to break out; but being beaten back by the help of the Fortification, the concourse of Soldiers and multitude of Weapons, desisted from that attempt. Now, faith Monetus, the Northern Bank of the Lake Lemanus, and the declining Horn of the Mountain Jura, by this their vicinity make that Region of the Latobrigi, whom Cafar not rightly calleth Helvetians, of the form of a Wedge, through which the Wall that was nineteen miles in length must be drawn in a transverse line, at distance from the straights of the said Wedge, and the Rhone at that place issuing out of the Lake Lemanus, from the Mountain Jura to Lemanus, towards the inward Regions of the Latobrigi; that by that Fortification the Helvetians might be excluded from that other way that lay to the Sequani, more remote from the ftraights of that way. But beyond that Wall fortified with a Ditch on this fide at a longer distance the Western Head of Lemanus was left, and from that Head the Rhone illusth forth, which being so, let us see, saith he, how little consistent Cafar is with himself, who must necessarily be said to have spoken contradictions, or else at that time the fite of Jura, Lemanus and the Rhone were otherwise than now, although he represents it the same as at this day is found. For, if when the Hel-vetians indeavoured to gain the Bank of the Rhone, they were prevented by a Sect. 6-Ditch and a Walllying to far before it, and yet this Fortification was not broken thorough by them, (the Legions driving them back from it.) then must the Helvetians by flying in the Air or by passages under ground, have got to the Rhone fo fortified, and attempted their pallage by Boats joyned together, the Romans being utterly ignorant which way they came. But if that Fortification of Cafar was on this fide the Passage of the Rhone, from the Lake, and consequently on this side the whole Bank of that Lake, why is it faid that a Wall was railed from Lemanus as far as the Mountain Jura? And why fo long a Wall in fo straight a Paffage, that a fingle Cart could scarcely pass through it? Then with what pridence could Casar raile a Wall of Stone on this fide, and not beyond the River, of which he defired to have the Command, and so might, his design being affished by the great conve-

Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

14. There was only another way left (Cafar proceedeth) through the Sequami, which they could not pass, it was so narrow, but by the favour of the Country. They themselves could little prevail as to that matter, and therefore they fent to Dumnorix an H. duan to defire his mediation, who having married the Daughter of Orgetorix an Helvetian, being of good authority in his Country, and ambitious of Dominion, undertook the buliness and procured them leave to pass, each Nation giving the other pledges, that the Sequavi should not interrupt the Helvetians in their Journey, nor they offer any injury to the Country. Cafar now having intelligence that they would pass through the Territories of the Sequani and Hadui on the Confines of the Santones, who were not far distant from the borders of the Tholosans, a People of the Province, and knowing how ill the consequences might be, lest T. Labienus his Lieutenant to defend the Fortifications and posted into Italy, where he raised two Legions and took three more out of their Winter quarters, near to Aquileia, with which five Legions he hafted back again into Gall, and though opposed in his return by certain Nations, got into the Country of the Allobroges, and so into that of the Sabulians that were the first beyond the Rhone, bordering upon the Province. By this time the Helvetians having passed the Straights and Frontiers of the Sequani, wasted the Country of the Ædui, who thereupon fent and complained to Cefar, as also did the Arabarri, who had alliance and dependency with the Ædui. In like manner did the Allobroges quit their farms and possessions beyond the Rhone, and fled to him, complaining they had nothing left but the foile of the Country. Cefar therefore feeing it was not convenient to linger any further, till the Allies of Rome were spoiled of their fortunes and strength, and the Helvetians were come to the Santones, when he heard that they were to pass the Arar (Soane) runing through the Confines of the ÆThey are do in and Sequani, about the third Watch of the Night he fell upon them with three feated by Co Legions, and furprized part of them, which had by the affiftance of Flats and bridges made of Boats got over; flew many of them, and the reft escaped to the woods. Of the four Cantons into which the Helvetians were distinguished, this was the Tigurine (of Zurick) which Canton alone had formerly flain L. Callins the Conful, and put his Army under the yoak. But now Cafar took revenge not only for the publick, but his particular loss, for in that battel with Cassius they slew also L. Piso the Grand-Father of L. Piso his Father in

15. Now as Cafar pursued the Helvetians, so Monetus pursues him. Here he faith he layes down two things that look little like truth, whereof one is that leave was obtained for the Helvetians to pass through the Country of the Sequani by the mediation of Dumnorix the Æduan; the other is the story of their pasfage through the inward Territories of the Sequani; not by the outward straights of the Mountain Jura, and the Rhone which they neither paffed by Fords nor Boats. The first he saith, he shall never perswade a prudent man to believe. For it was not in the power of the Sequani to grant them leave, who were then after a servile manner oppressed by Ariovistus, a most proud German King, who would never have suffered the Armed Helvetians, a most numerous and sierce People to have passage through his Dominions. To obtain this leave, the Address was not to be made to the Sequani, who had no power over their Countries, or themselves in their own hands, but to Ariovistus, from whom there could be no hope, that leave should be obtained. But of this siction convenient for the time, Cafar served himfelf, to prevent the difgrace that must fall upon him and his men, the Helvetians having broken through his fortifications, during his absence in Italy. For its both Dadaaa

Elius, and Vefontio, without acquainting Arivoirflus, and that the Seguani duft attempt it, or could obtain leave. But Cefar was aliamed to acknowledge that the Helvetiams in his ablence broke through his Trenches, and thence conceived great hatred againft them, and to be revenged, oblitinately purfued them which way so-ever they turned from him, and the Roman Province through the Territories of the Edni. Two things perfivade that, they passed the twenty Juva and the Rome. They would not venture to provoke Arivoirflus, nor endanger being stopped by him in their Journey. And the way by the Rhome was better and shorter, and one only Legion at the Wall, especially in the absence of Cefar, ould not hinder their passed fage. Their passage through these Straits is attested by their wasting of the Territories of the Substiani Ambarit, Eduis, and the complaints thereof made to Cefar, but no devastation made in the borders of the Seguani. But for certain Reasons he adds most things are otherwise witten by Cessar than indeed they were, of which we shall admonish the Reader in our Commentations, as fit occasion presents it self. So bold is Monetus, and bold he is indeed as well in his own affertions as resuting what hath been written by others. It were well if he were as perspicuous.

16. Cafar after this overthrow, paffed the River Arar and carryed over his Army, to purfue the rest of the Helvetian Army. They much daunted at his sudden coming, sent their Ambassadors (for he had got over the River in one day which they could fearcely pass in twenty) who yet, as the custom is, were not wanting to urge all the Conveniences on theirs, and all the inconveniences on the other fide. C.efar made answer suitable to the state of his Affairs, and Divice chief of the Ambassadors replyed with so little satisfaction, that the next day they removed their Camp, and so also did Casar. But he sent all his Horse before, to the number of four thousand, which he had raised in the Province, and drawn from the Ædui and their Affociates. This was to efpy which way the Enemy took, and they falling in upon the Reere, were forced to ingage with the Cavalry of the Helvetians in a disadvantagious place, and thereby lost some few of their Company. With this fuccess they were elevated, and thereupon several times made Sallies, But Casar kept back his men, judging it enough for the present to keep the Enemy from harrying and spoiling the Country, and for fifteen dayes ordered his march in such a manner, that there were not above five or six miles betwixt his Army and the Reere of theirs. In the mean time Cafar finding no forage, preffed the Hedui daily to bring in Corn, according to their promise, for, the River Arar flood him in small stead at that time, by reason that the Helvetians had taken their Journey, clear from the River, and he would by no means forfake them. But the Ædui delayed to bring any in, and thereupon Casar called to him besides others, their chief Magistrates (who had the Name of Vergobret and power of life and death over their Subjects) for this year Divitiacus and Lifeus, whom he blamed exceedingly for not supplying him in such a place and condition, where he could have none elfe, and when for their fake, and at their request he had undertaken the

17. Lifeus gave out fuch words as hinted that Dumorix the Brother of Divitiacus, though a private person, had more Authority with the People, than they the Magistrates, and having ambitious designs was a great Enemy to the Romans. Cafar in the Assembly would not make any inquiry, but privately got the whole matter out of him; how by keeping Taxes low he had obtained his wealth and Authority at home, and by Marriages Contracted friendship with other Nations. How he wished well to the Helvetians, but hated the Romans, and especially Cafar, because that by their coming into Gall, his power was weakned, and Divitiacus his Brother restored to his antient Honour and Dignity. Besides this it was found that the route of Cafars Horse came by his means, for he commanded the Troops which the Ædui fent to his Affistance, and from their disorder the rest of the Cavalry took the fright. He had a great mind to punish him, but durst not do it without acquainting his Brother, who upon breaking it to him, burst out into tears, imbraced Cafur, and though he had devised the ruine of him as well as of the Romans, yet he obtained that he should be spared as well for Brotherly affection, as for avoiding a general alienation and diffaft of Gall. Cefar now having intelligence that the Helvetians were lodged under an Hill, fent a party to get possession of the Top; but by the Cowardise of P. Causidius, one who had been counted a great Souldier in the Army of L. Sylla, and afterwards with M. Craffus, was prevented of his purpose. He commanding the Discoverers his fear caused him to imagine that the Helvetians were possessed of the Top, and so acquainted Carlor; whereas Labinus who was sent for that purpose, had gained it, and in vain expected Casin to come and affift him, according as they had agreed. The Enemy being dillodged, Casin followed and incamped within three miles of him; the day following the Army being to be paid in Corn. Two dayes after being but eighteen miles disant from Bribratie (the same with Augustsodunum, A gasta Julia Heldurum, Flavia, Florentia and Pollia, now Autum in the Duchy of Burgundy) a great and opulent City of the Edui, he turned aside from the Helvetian and made

18. Hereupon the Helvetians turned back, and fell upon the Romans in their Reer, which Cafar perceiving, drew his Forces to the next Hill, and fent his Horfe to fustain the charge of the Enemy. In the middle of the Hill he made a triple Battel of four Legions of old Souldiers. Upon the highest ridge he placed two other Legions newly raifed, together with the Affociate Forces. The whole Front of the Hill he filled with men, and bestowed the Carriages so as to be guarded by the uppermost Battalions. The Helvetians also placed their Carriages for best fecurity, and having beaten back Cafars Horse with a thick thronged Squadron, put themselves into a Phalanx, and pressed under the first Battel of the Legions. To take away all hope of flight, he fent away first his own Horses and then the rest, and after some incouraging words, began the Battel. His Souldiers with the advantage of the Hill, by their Piles, eafily brake the Phalanx, and then with their Swords came to a furious close. The Piles of the Romans falling on the Targets of the Galls, struck them through and joyned them together, so that they were glad to cast them away, and retreat to an Hill a mile off. Thither they were purfued, and a furious charge was made on both fides, not one man being found to have turned his Back, although the fight continued from one a clock, till the Evening. And it was kept still on Foot, at the Carriages of the Helvetians, till it was far in the Night, and then after a long Conflict the Baggage was taken to-Gives the Halt gether with their Camp, and therein a Son and a Daughter of Orgetorix. About vitians a great one hundred and thirty thousand persons were saved out of the Battel, who, marching all the Night, came the fourth day into the Confines of the Lingones; there being no pursuit made after them, by reason of the wounds of the Souldiers.

and the burial of the flain wherein three dayes were spent. 19. Cefar sent to the Lingones (les Langrois) forbidding they should supply them with any fort of necessaries, or he would esteem of them as of the Helvetians themselves, and after three dayes followed with all his Forces. The Helvetians seeing in what condition they were, fent to treat of their rendition, and then were commanded to come up to that place, and there attend his pleafure. He required their Arms, their Servants, and Hostages to be delivered up, as also the fugitives. But while these things were performing, about six thousand men of the Canton called Verbigene, either out of despair of Lise, or hoping to escape in such a multitude, in the beginning of the Night, left the Helvetian Camp, and made towards the Rhine, and the German Confines. Cafar commanded those through whose Territories they passed to bring them out, as they also tendered his displeasure, and being brought back, dealt with them as Enemies. All the rest, the conditions performed, he received to mercy, and commanded then the Tulingi and Latobrigi to return into their Countries. He ordered the Allobroges to supply them with Corn, and willed the Helvetians to reedifie their Cities and Towns, that the Germans, invited by the richness of the foil, might not remove thither and become near Neighbours to the Province of Gall and the Allobroges. The Ædui defired that they might take the Boij, knowing them to be men of great Valour, to dwell in their Country, and he permitting it, they gave them lands, and the same liberties and privileges as they themselves injoyed.

20. In the Helvetian Camp was found a List or Register written in Greek. Containing by Pole the whole Number that lest their Country; how many of them were able to bear Arms, and the Boyes, Old Men and Women were also involled by themselves. The Summary whereof was, that the whole Number of the Elevatians amounted to two hundred fixty and three thousand; of the Taling; to thirty fix thousand, the Latobrig; to fourteen; the Rauraci to twenty three, and the Boij to thirty two. Of these there were that bare Armes ninety two thousand, and the Total of all was three hundred and sixty eight thousand. A view being taken by Cassian appointment of those that returned home, there were found one hundred and ten thousand persons. So many Cassia this he found, which if so

Its certain, he writes. both from Casar and others, that from the Mountain Jura to the Rauraci on this fide the Rhine, is the longest extent of the Helvetian Borders, which yet is not an Interval of thirty French Leagues, or fixty Roman Miles; and as for the breadth. their Territories were much more Contracted where most large. Whence necesfarily either Cafar or his Books have been abused, and whence also it may be gathered, that two hundred and fixty three thousand Souls could hardly proceed out of fo fmall a Country. And whereas he writes that after the Battel of the three hundred and fixty thousand Helvetians and Associates, only one hundred and thirty thousand persons remained, it follows that the Number of the Armed men being but ninety two thousand, there must have been killed by him almost two hundred thousand persons that were weak, helpless or unfit for War. By this he must have procured great Infamy for his Cruelty, or elfe there is a great miftake and error Committed by him in his Account, or by the Transcribers of his Co-

The Estates of 21. But the Estates of Gall, he saith, Congratulated his victory, and procuring leave Gall open to to call an Affembly, after they had confulted together defired fecrecy, and by their him the con Deputies revealed to him their grief. Divitiacus the Reduan told him, that Gall was divided into two Factions; that the Ædui were the Head of the one, and the Arverni of the other, each contending many years for the Principality. The Arverni with the Sequani their Clients hired the Germans to take their Part, of whom one hundred and twenty thousand had passed the Rhine, with that success that the Edui opposing them received an utter overthrow, both of Nobility and Senate. With these losses they were so broken, that having formerly struck a great stroke throughout Gall, they were now forced to deliver up the chiefest of their State to the Sequani, and to bind themselves by Oath never to seek their release or freedom, nor the aid of the People of Rome, nor use means to free them-felves from their Soveraignty. Only he himself refused to take the Oath, and give up his Children, but fled to Rome and craved aid of the Senate. Yet for all this, the victory became more grievous to the Sequani than to the Hedui; for Ariovifities King of the Germans was planted in their Territories, and being already posfessed of a third part of their Country (the best part of Gall) now required them to forgoe another third part, for twenty four thousand Harudes, who being lately come over to him, Lands and Possessions were now to be allotted them. By this means it would come to pass in short time that all the Galls would be driven out by the Germans, who were allured by the goodness of the Country, betwixt which and theirs there was no comparison. Ariovistus having once deseated the Galls in Battel proved a cruel Tyrant, whom they could not bear, but must forfake their Habitations, as the Helvetians did, if Casar and the People of Rome by their Authority or Arms afforded them no relief, and hindred not the Germans from transporting any more Colonies into Gall. But if Ariovistus should know any thing of this Complaint, he would rage cruelly against them, especially the Sequani, who were in his Power.

Heundertakes 22. Cofar diffmissed them with good words, and concluding that it was neither their quartel honourable nor safe for the People of Rome to have such troublesom Neighbours against the conclusion of t againt at the Germans, and esteeming the insolency of Ariovistus intolerable, resolved to

German Ring. prevent such mischief with all speed. He sent to him to appoint some indifferent place for a Parly about some publick affairs which nearly concerned them both. To this he answered, that had his occasions required Casars assistance, he would have farthered them with his own presence, and he thought it as reasonable, that if it were in his power to pleasure the Romans, Casar ought not to think much of the like labour. He said plainly he durst not come into those parts of Gall which were in Cafars Hands, without an Army; and that an Army was not to be drawn up without much trouble and expence. The thing he most wondered at was, that Cafar had to do in that part of Gall which the Law of Armes had made his Inheritance. Now the Reader must know, that in Casars Consulship the People of Rome had vouchfafed to efteem of Ariovistus as a King in his Dominions and as of a Friend to their Commonwealth. Cafar therefore returned, that for as much as he so requited the honour done to him by the State and himself, he would let him know that he required, that he should not transport any more Troops of Germans over the Rhine into Gall. In the next place, that he should deliver up the Hostages of the Ædui, and suffer the Sequani to do the like, and cease all Hostilities against the Ædm, and their Associates; if not, he would not neglect the injuries done to them, being injoyned by the Senate to take care of their Friends

Ariovistus his and Confederates. Ariovistus replied, that the Law of Nations allowed a Conque- Sect. 6. Answer to Carrie for to rule a conquered Nation as he pleased. That the People of Rome thought fit to order their matters as they themselves pleased; and why should they direct him more than he did them. That Cafar had much wronged him, in that his coming thither had made the Tribute of the Ædni much less than formerly. That he would still retain their Hostages: That he would make no unjust War upon them or their Associates, but if they failed of their Tribute, the Society of the Romans would come too late. In conclusion, that no man ever contended with him but to his own destruction. And try when he would, he should find the Germans invincible and most exercised in Armes, having for fourteen years had no House over their Heads.

23. At the same time Ambassadors from the Ædui complained, that the Harudes, lately transported into Gall, wasted their Borders, and that though they gave up Hostages they could not buy their Peace of Ariovistus. And others from the Treviri brought News of an hundred Townships of the Suevi that were come to the Rhine to feek a passage into Gall, under the conduct of Nasna and Cimberius two Brothers. Hereupon Cefar refolved to use all expedition to prevent the conjunction of the Suevi with Arioviftus, who, he understood, after three days journey, was with all his Force gone to take in Vesontio, the strongest Town of the Sequani. Knowing the place to be well provided, and so sitted that he that Commanded it might prolong the War at his pleasure, he prevented him by taking the Town and therein left a Garison. There as he rested a few days to furnish himself with Corn and other necessaries, the Romans enquiring of the Galls and Merchants concerning the Germans, received fuch an account concerning their Stature, their Courage and their Experience in War, that they were feized with a wonderful fear and consterration. From the Tribunes and Commanders of Horse and such as for friendship followed him from Rome, and had small or no skill in War, it proceeded even to the old experienced Soldiers. And many fluck not to tell Cafar that whenfoever he should give Command to march and advance the Standards, the Soldiers would refuse to do it.

24. Upon this Cafar called a Counsel of War, and admitting all Centurions of what degrees foever to it, exceedingly blamed them for this their fear. He shewed how vain it was from former experience, when the Cimbri and Tentoni were vanquished by Marius, and in the late servile Tumult in Italy, though then they were not a little affifted by what they had learnt of the Romans; and from what had been done against them by the Helvetians, who had had the better of them in divers conflicts in their own Country, and at their own dores, as well as in Gall, though the Helvetians were not able to contend with the Romans. Indeed they had beaten the Galls, but these had been wearied with continual Wars, and surprized when dispersed; and Ariovistus must not think to infnare the Roman Armies with the like subtilties. He told them that such as pretended the want of Corn and dangerousness of the ways, seemed arrogant and to direct their General; that the Sequani and Lingones had undertaken that charge, and Corn was now ripe every where in the Fields. He shewed they had no reason to disobey his Orders; for he was neither Unfortunate nor Covetous, as his success against the Helvetians and the whole course of his Life could shew, and therefore he was resolved to diflodge by the fourth watch of the Night, though it were with the tenth Legionalone as a guard of which he had no doubt or sufficion, having chiefly cherished and put most trust in it, and that deservedly for their Valour. The effect of this was, that the tenth Legion gave him thanks for his good opinion, and affured him of their readiness; and then the rest made means by the Tribunes and Centurions of the first Rancks to give him satisfaction. This being taken, and Divitiacus having upon viewing the ways reported, that in fetching a compals of fifty miles he might carry the Army through open and Champion Countries (for the Soldiers were frighted at the Woods) in the fourth Watch of the Night, according to his former faying, he diflodged.

25. Continuing his March, the feventh day he received a Message from Ariovistus lying but twenty four miles off the place, that now being out of danger he was content to treat, and Cafar refused not the offer. The fifth day following was appointed for the Parly, but Ariovistus refused to meet if any Foot-men came, admitting only of Horse to attend each Party. Casar not willing to break upon this account, resolved to set on Horses the tenth Legion which he could most trust. The Legion he placed two hundred paces from a Mount on which they were to meet, and the Horse of Ariovistus stood at the same distance; and accord-

Sect. 6. ing to his defire they brought ten Persons each along with them, and difcoursed on Horse-back. Casar began, by shewing him the unusual favour conferred on him by the Romans through his means. He declared how of a long time they had had Friendship and Alliance with the Ædui, who long before that had He and Aric held the Principality of Gall. That they were kind to, and cherished their Allies, and therefore could not permit that to be forced from them, which when they entred into a League with the Romans they quietly possessed; and then he required the fame things he had formerly done by his Meffengers. Arioviftus made little answer to Casar's demands but spake much of his own vertues and valour. He laid the blame of his Actions upon the Galls themselves, who had incited him and provoked him to their own loss. He affirmed that he was seated in Gall before the Romans came thirher. That that part of it was his Province, in which they ought to give him no diffurbance, no more than he gave them in theirs. If his Tributaries would pay their Afrears they should have Peace, if not, he regarded little that they had the Romans for their Friends. If Cafar would not be gone out of the Country, he should take him for an Enemy. And if he killed him he should perform a very acceptable service to many great men at Rome, as he well understood by Letters and Messages received from them.

If he would depart and leave him the possession of Gall he would well reward

without either his peril or charge. 26. C. of ar replied as to many things, and shewed that he could not defift from the course he had taken; which while he was doing, he was told that Ariovistus his Horse approached nearer the Mount, and assaulted his men with ftones and other weapons. Hereupon he brake off the Parly, but forbore to charge the Germans, left it should be said that under pretence of an enterview he had intrapped them: But the Army upon hearing how Arioviftus and his men demeaned themselves, were more provoked to fight. Arioviftus two days after fent to Cefar to give him another meeting, or that he would fend him Commiffioners to treat concerning those things that were left imperfect. This later Cefar refused not to do; but as foon as Ariovistus saw the Messengers, he asked wherefore they came thither, and whether they were not fent as Spies, and he commanded them to be put in Irons. Then did he remove and get two miles beyond Cafar, and there he incamped himself to cut off all Provisions that might be sent to the Romans from the Ædui and Sequani. Casar for five days together stood prepared to give him Battel if he should offer it. But he kept his Army within his Camp, and daily fent out his Horse to skirmish with the Romans. The Germans were wont to exercise themselves with this manner of fighting. They had fix thousand Horse-men, and as many strong and nimble Foot, whom the Horse-men selected out of of the whole Army, every man one for his desence; these they had with them in Battel, and unto them they reforted for fuccour. If the Horfemen were overcharged, these ever stept in to help them. If any was wounded or unhorfed they came about him and relieved him. If the case required that they should either hast forward or speedily retire, their continual exercise had brought them to that fwiftness, that hanging on the Mane they would keep pace even with the Horses.

27. Cafar to prevent the defign of Arioviftus of intercepting entercourse betwixt him and his Friends, drew out his men in three Bodies and with one of them, notwithstanding all the opposition the Germans could make, fortified a second Camp about five hundred paces beyond them. Arioviftus attacqued this fecond lesser Camp to no purpose, but would not bring out his Army to a battel because they had a cuftom, that the Women by cafting of Lots and South-faying should declare whether it was good for them to fight or not; and they found by their Art that they could not get the victory, if they fought before the New-moon. The next day Cafar, to make a shew, because his Legionary Soldiers were few in comparison of the Germans, placed all his Auxiliaries before the lesser Camp, and putting his Legions in a triple Battle, marched and provoked the Germans to fight. They fet every Tribe and People by themselves in like distance and order of Battle. There were the Harudes, Marcomanni, Tribocei, Vangiones, Nemetes, Sedusti and Suevi; and they invironed their whole Army with Carts and Cariages, that there might be no hope of flight. And in them they placed the Women, that by their Tears and Hands stretched out they might move the Soldiers to to demean themselves, that they might not be brought into the thraldom of the Romans. Cafar affigned to every Legion a Legatus and a Questor, that every man might have a witness of his valour; and perceiving where the Germans were weakest, he began the Battel from the Right Wing.

28. The Roman charged fiercely, and the Germans came on fo speedily, that the Legions had no leisure to cast their Piles, but betook themselves to their Swords, which the Germans received according to their manner in the form of a Phalans. But many Legionary Soldiers were observed to leap upon the Phalans, to pull up the Targets that covered it, and to wound and kill those that were underneath. The left Wing of the Germans was overthrown and put to flight; but in the mean time the left of the Romans was overcharged with an unequal number. This being perceived by P. Craffus a young man who commanded the Horse, he sent the third Battalion to releive their fellows; by means whereof the fight was renewed and the Enemy was put to flight, and never looked back till they came to the Rhine about fifty miles off, which some passed by Swiming and by Boats, and the rest were killed by the Horsemen. Ariovistus lighting upon a Bark tyed to the shore recovered the other side, but both his Wives perished, and of his two Daughters the one was slain and the other taken. Cafar in the pursuit recovered his two Messengers he had sent to him. The noise of the fuccess drove back the Snevi that were come to the Banks of the Rhine, whom the Inhabitants of that Quarter finding terrified, streight pursued, and slew a great number of them. Cesar having thus ended two great Wars in one Summer, brought his Army into their wintring Camps in the Country of the Sequani fomewhat sooner than the year required, and leaving Labienus to command them went into the hither Gall (as the Romans called it) to hold the publick Affemblies. And thus with this war he concludes the first Book of his Commentaries, having done these things in the Consulship of his two Creatures, Piso and Ga-

29. While he was yet in his Winter Quarters, he was continually alarmed Cafar de Bello with news of the motions of the Belge, who were the third part of the further Gallicollè a. Gall. They were, he faith, descended from the Germans, who passing over the Rhine time out of mind, and finding the Country very fertile drove away the Galls, and feated themselves in their possessions. They alone kept the Cimbri and Tentoni from entring into their Country, and thereupon they challenged Authority, and beafted much of their feats of Armes. Upon notice of Cofars fuccess they thought themselves in danger as well as their Neighbours, and being excited and incouraged by fome of them, thought themselves highly concerned to give some stop to that progress the Roman power had made in Gall. Cafar upon notice raifed two Legions, and when Summer came on fending them away by Q. Pedius his Legate, followed himself as soon as there was forage for the Army. Within fifteen days he came to the Borders of the Belga, which being unexpected, the Rhemi who lay next to Gall (Celtick he means) fubmitted themselves and all they had to the Roman Empire, affirming they were innocent as to the Conspiracy of the rest of the Belg. Of them the Bellovaci (les Beauvasois) the Compinacy of the test of the Beggs. Of them the Belovaer (les Beauvoigns) exceeded all others, in power, authority and numbers, being able to make an hundred thousand fighting men, out of which they promised fixty thousand to this undertaking, and in that respect they demanded the Administration of the whole War. Here again Monetus is difficult of belief, though a Jesinit, affirming that if Cestr (or the Embassadors of the Rebens), he should have said, if from them he had his information) said true, they must have had vast Territories which could afford an hundred thousand fighting men, and indeed far larger than he can find in his Geography. But he faith C.efar himfelf puts him out of belief of it, who makes none of the neighbour States to be their Clients, but fets them down as Clients of the Ædui. He affirms that Cafar is wont to increase the Power of certain Nations above measure, to make way for his own glory, which would receive augmentation from so valiant and warlike People being vanquished by one or two Battels. Yet he denies not but that the Bellovaci were always most famous amongst the Belga, of which there still remain eminent evidences in the fingular priviledges of their chief Town, which now is

30. Next to them lay the Sueffones (Les Soiffonois) Inhabitants of a large and fruitful Country, whose King Divitiacus had lately possessed a great part of these A Conspiracy Territories and also of Britain, and was the most powerful King within Gall. At other Nations, Prefent Galba was their King; and on him, for his Justice and Prudence, they unaBook III

33. But the Navii that bordered upon them were another fort of men. There was no recourse of Merchants to them, neither did they suffer any Wine, or what else might tend to riot, to be brought into their Cauntry. They were a savage people and of great valour, often upbraiding the rest of the Belgæ, for yielding their Necks to the Roman yoke, and openly affirming that they would neither fend Ambassadors nor take peace upon any condition. They all assembled on the farther fide of the River Sabis (Sambre) and there attended the coming of the Romans. With them were joyned the Atrobates and Veromandui, and they expected a Power from the Aduatici. Casar passing the River had some skirmishes with them, and indeavoured to fortifie himfelf; but they made fuch fudden onfets, and were fo fwift both in their coming and retring, that they seemed, he saith, to be in and out of the Woods at the same time, and gave him no leisure to prepare for a Battel by his wonted methods. He had all parts to play at one time; the Flag to be hung out to give warning, the Trumpet to be founded for the Charge, the Soldiers to be called from their work of Intrenchment; and fuch as were gone to fetch Turf and Materials for the Rampire, to be sent for, the Battel to be ordered. the Soldiers to be incouraged, and the Signet to be given; the most of which were cut off by shortness of time and assaults of the Enemy. But these things he tells us were supplied by the experience of his Soldiers, who could as well prescribe to themselves what was to be done as any Commander could teach them. And notwithstanding Casar had given order to every Legate not to leave the work or forfake the Legions, till the Fortifications were perfected; yet in extremity of danger they exspected no countermand, but ordered all things according to their own dis-

34. Cafar had time only to defire the tenth Legion to remember their antient valour, and be couragious; and to give the fign of Battel, the Enemy being within a weapons cast. In the Fight, the Legions that stood in the Left Wing had the better at first, and put to flight their Enemies; but those of the Right were forely diffressed and disordered, insomuch that the Belga got into the Camp. The Enfigus were crouded together into one place; the Soldiers of the twelfth Legion were fo thick thronged on an heap, that they hindered one another; all the Centurions of the fourth Cohort were flain, the Enfign-bearer killed, the Enfign taken, and the Centurions of the other Cohorts either flain or fore wounded. Cafar feeing them turn tail, and matters to be almost desperate, took a Target from one of the hindmost Soldiers, and pressing to the Front of the Battel, called the Centurions by name, and incouraging the rest, commanded the Ensigns to be advanced toward the Enemy, and the Maniples to be inlarged, that they might with more facility use their Swords. By his presence being incouraged, his men recovered themselves, and he caused two Legions that were oppressed to joyn back to back, and thereby making two Fronts they secured each other. But the whole face of things was changed by the coming in of the tenth Legion, which T. Labienus, having won the Camp of the Nervii, fent to the affiftance of their fellows. Now the wounded men began to fight afresh; the Horse strove with extraordinary valour to wipe away the dishonour of their former flight; nay the Boyes and Scullions perceiving the Enemy amazed, ran upon them unarmed, not fearing their

35. Howbeit, as amazed as they were, they shewed such manhood, that as the foremost were overthrown, the next in place bestrid their Carcases, and fought upon them; and these being likewise overthrown, and their bodies heaped one upon another, they that remained possest themselves of the mount of dead Carcases, as a place of advantage; thence threw their weapons, and intercepting the Piles returned them back to the Romans. But the Battel was however thus ended, and the Name and Nation of the Nervii was well nigh destroyed; of five hundred Senators, but three men being left, and of fixty thousand fighting men fcarcely five hundred. The Elder fort, with their Women and Children, being before conveyed into Illands and Bogs, Cefar, upon their submission pardoned, granting them the free possession of their Towns and Country, and Commanding their Neighbours not to offer them any wrong. The Aduatici being on their way to affift the Nervii, when they heard of the defeat of their Friends, returned, Eeeee

Sect. 6. nimoully bestowed the management of the War; they had twelve Walled Towns, and promifed to fet forth fifty thousand men. The Nervii (the People Towns, and promited to let forth arty, thoulang men. The Nervii (the People of the Territory now called Henalt by the French from the River Hene) who were most barbarous amongst them all, and dwele farthest of promised as many. The Arrebatii (the People of Artici) sistem thouland. The Ambiani (the People of the Territory of Amien) ten thouland. The Vellocassi of Veneticeassii (inhabiting the Territory of Rouen), and the French and the People of Vermandois) as many. The Morini (Balenois, Ominois, Ossens maritime & deterrence forme) five and twenty thouland. The Menagh, (Sunclavois, Clevois & Justiers) him Thousand. The Caleric (Lee Cauchois the beauth of Caucho tent) foundated. nine Thousand. The Caletes (Les Cauchois, le peuple de Caux) ten thousand. The Aduatici twenty nine thousand. The Eburomi (Les Liegeois) Condruss (le peuple des Ardenes) and others called Germans forty thousand, as was reported. Cafar received Hostages from the Remi, and after that to provide against the multitudes of the Enemy, he perswaded Divitiacus the Aduan to enter the Territories of the Bellovaci and waste them, thereby to divert them and hinder the Confederates from uniting in one Army. And to secure himself against their great va-lour, as it was represented to him, he resolved not to be too hasty in giving them battle; but first by skirmishing with his Horse to try what they could, and what his own men durft do.

They affem-

31. But finding them all affembled together, and at no great distance, he hastble together. ed and passed over the River Axona (Aine) which parted the Rhemi from the other Belg.e, and there incamped. No Enemy here could come on his Back, and he might receive Provisions from Rheimes and other Cities; but that he might command the paffage back he fortified a Bridge, and caufed Titurius Sabinus, a Legate; to intrench himself strongly on the other side. The Belge in their way indeavoured to take in Bibrax (Beurai en Retelois) a Town of the Rhemi, and had done it, but that upon notice given by the Governor, Cafar fent him speedy relief. Disappointed here they then made towards Cafar, who finding his own men no whit inferior to them, by feveral skirmishes drew them out, placed himself conveniently for a Battel on a rifing ground, and left the Enemy should by their multitudes incompass him, he drew a Ditch behind his Army from one side of the Hill to another, fix hundred paces in length, the ends of which he fortified with Bulworks, and therein placed flore of Engines. There was a little Marilh betwirt the Armies which neither party would adventure to pass over to the other, but skirmishes were maintained betwixt the Horse, in which C.esar having the advantage thought it sufficient, and so retired to his Camp. The Belg.e immediately took the way to the River Axona, either to break the Bridge, take the Fort held by Titurius, or cut off Provisions from Cafar; but Cafar followed with a strong party, and cutting off many of their men, hindered their design. In which being prevented, as also in their attempt upon Bibrax, when now their provisions began to fail, they resolved to break up and go to their several homes; where if he invaded any of them they could be supplied, though they intended to waste the Country where-ever he came, and thither to hafte from all parts to give him battel, rather than in a strange and unknown place. The Councel was the rather imbraced, for that the Bellovaci having intelligence that Divitiacus with a greatpower of the Ædui approached their Borders, hafted homeward to defend their Country.

32. In a tumultuous manner they returned, striving who should be gone first, fo that Cufar perceiving them to fly rather than retreat, at first suspected some defign, and conteined his Army within his Camp; but at length finding the truth he fent some Parties after, who made great flaughter of them as they fled, to long as the light continued. The day following he still gave the chase that they might not have time to take breath, and led his Army into the Territories of the Sueffones, wherein he came to Noviodunum, which he attempted to take by furprize; but in regard of the breadth of the Ditch, and the height of the Wall, was forced to beliege it. Yet when the Inhabitants faw the Vince (little Hovels made for shelter of the Soldiers) the Mounts raised, and the Turrets built with fuch expedition, afrighted at the greatness of the works, they defired to yeild, and by mediation of the Remi obtained their fuir. Having received besides others, two Sons of King Galba for Hostages, he took the Snessen mercy, and led his Army against the Bellovaci, who desiring the same savour, with Hands stretched out according to their custom, he granted it at the fuit of Divitiacus; for he spake well of the Common People as drawn into the Confede.

Sect. 6. and put themselves, and all they had into one Town, very strong by its situation. They were discended from the Cimbri and Tentoni, who in their journy into Italy left fuch Carriages as they could not conveniently take along with them on this fide the Rhine, and fix thousand men to look to them. They after the death of their fellows were many years disquieted by their Neighbours, and sometimes invading their States, and sometimes defending themselves, at length procured peace, and chose this place to settle themselves in, which some think to have been about Doway or Bolduc in Brabant.

36. Casar laying seige to the place, at first they despised him; and when they faw the Vines framed, the Mount raised, and a Tower built afar off they scoffed, and demanded with what hands and with what ftrength, especially by men of that stature (for the Romans were but little in respect of the Galls) a Tower of such huge and maffy weight should be brought to do execution. But when they beheld the Tower removed, and approaching, they were astonished, and fent to treat with this complementing message, that they believed the Romans did not make war without the special affistance of the Gods. They submitted all they had to Casar's mercy, but defired that their Arms might not be taken from them, for fear of their Neighbours. Yet he thought fit to require them, faying he would take the fame care for them as he had done for the Nervii, that they should not be molested. However when they gave up their weapons they concealed a third part, and in Town of the! the Night, thinking to surprize the Fortification of the Romans, they set upon it, but were beaten back with the loss of four thousand. The next day Casar brake into the Town, and finding none make defence, he fold all the People, with the Spoil to the number of fifty three thousand bondslaves. At the same time P. Crassus fent him information, that the Veneti, Unelli, Osifmi, Curiosilita, Sesuvii, Aulerci and Rhedones, being maritime Cities that lay to the Ocean, had submitted to the Peo-ple of Rome. The same of this Cafars success in Gall produced so great effects, that beyond the Rhine several Nations sent and submitted. But hasting into Italy he placed his Army in its Wintring Camp, and willed the Ambassadors to come to him in the beginning of the following Summer. The Winter Quarters he took up next to those places where his Wars had been, amongst the Carnutes, Andes and Turones. For his Atchievements, upon the fight of his Letters, a supplication was decreed for fifteen days, which honour had formerly happened to no man.

37. Cafar going into Italy, gave order to Ser. Galba, with the twelfth Legion Cafar de Bello and Part of the Horse, to march into the Territories of the Nantuates, Veragri and Gallico, lib. 3. Seduni, which extended from the Rhone and Lemanus, to the tops of the highest Alpe, to clear them from Theives and Robbers, who intercepted those that trafficked that way. Two Cohorts of his Legion he placed amongst the Nantuates, and with the other took up his Winter Quarters in Octodurus, a Town of the Veragri, in a narrow Valley, over which hung mighty Hills. Here he thought himself fecure because of the Hostages these Nations had given up, and for other reasons; but they taking it to heart, that they should be so deprived of their Children, and that the Romans should lay these their Territories to their Province, and moreover incouraged by the smallness of the number Galba had brought, resolved to affault his Camp. And this they did with fuch fury, that by their numbers they overpowered the Romans and put them to great diftress, which had been followed by their ruine, had not the advice of P. Sextus Baculus, the Primiple of that Legion, tures of Galos. and C. Volusenus Tribune of the Soldiers, men of fingular courage and wisdom interposed. They ran to Galba, and told him there was no hope of safety if they did not break out upon the Enemy himfelf, which being refolved the Soldiers by their Centurions were commanded to cease fighting, to receive such weapons as were cast into the Camp, and having taken a little breath, upon the watch-word given, to break out. This they did with such courage and alacrity, that the Enemy sur-prized was eafily put to flight, and beaten from the feveral Gates at which they issued, and of thirty thousand lost the third part. Galba glad of the success, yet considering he wanted Forage, and that he had met with difficulties he never dreamed of, burnt the Town, and the next day returned without opposition, and brought the Legion fafe into the Nantuates, and thence to the Allobroges, where he wintered.

38. The Belga being now overthrown, the Germans driven out, and the Seduni, who lived amongst the Alps subdued and vanquished; Cafar, who was gone into Illyricum imagined not but that Gall would be in repose; but there suddenly fell out another commotion. P. Craffus wintring with the feventh Legion in the Country of the Andes (Anjon) near to the Ocean, and wanting Provisions, fent out the Prefects of Horse and Tribunes to demand Corn of the next Cities and States; particularly of the Unelli or Venelli (Normans about Caen) the Curiofolite (those of Connovaille) and Veneti (people of Vanes) of most authority of all Nations in that Tract. For they had great store of Shipping, with which they traded into Britain, had most skill in Navigation, had command of all the Ports on these Seas, and of those that used them, as their Tributaries. The Veneti retained the Messengers sent to them, hoping thereby to recover the Hostages they had given to Crassis. And the reft followed their example, and made a League to maintain their liberty against the incroachments of a Stranger. Thus united they sent to tell Graffies, that if he chies unite would have his Medlengers returned, he must send back their Hostages; whereof he certified Cefar. casting the Messengers into Irons, gave order for Ships and Gallies to be made upon the Ligeris, (Loire) and they on the other fide made as effectual preparations as they could to maintain what they had done. And the Veneti incouraged themselves from the nature of their foil, which was defended by Arms and Greeks of the Sea, and by their experience in Maritime affairs, wherein, as in the knowledge of Ports in their quarters, they thought they were far superior to the Romani. 39. Cafar by chaftizing them, refolved to prevent the like infolency of fuch as had fubmitted. And confidering how quick the Galles were to make a war, he fent into all parts, where he thought there might be danger, Forces to hinder their rifing and union with the Veneti. He made D. Brutus cheif Admiral of the Navy; and of those Ships he had got together from the Pictones (Poiteuins) Santones (Saintongeois) and other Provinces which continued quiet, with orders to make for the Veneti with what speed he could, and he himself marched thitherward with the Foot-Forces. But do what he could, the Tides were fo much their Friends, being fituated in Points and Promontories, and their Ships so accommodated to the nato compine the Sea, that they could in danger, remove themselves from one Town to another, and they deluded him the greatest part of the Summer. Yet, he tells us, that instead of Cables they made use of Iron Chains, and raw Hides and Skins for Sails, either for want of Linnen Cloth, or ignorant of the use of it, or because Sails of Linnen would hardly ferve to carry Ships of that burthen, or endure the tempestuousness of these Seas, and the violence of the Winds. If they wanted Linnen. how great is the alteration we find at this present time in that Country which affords fo much Linnen, that thence (from Morlaix in Britany and other places) are we furnished with Sails for our Fleets, to its great advantage: and their Linnen we now find fufficient to carry Ships of the greatest burthen, to indure the tempestuoulnels of those Seas, and the violence of Winds.

40. The Romans took one Town after another; but the Veneti still conveyed themselves to the next; so that Cesar seeing it lost labour, attended the coming of his Navy. And when it came there was but fmall hope of fuccess against two hundred and twenty Sail of Ships, of fuch height and strength, that his could do no execution upon them. But this device made amends for those Inconveniencies. The Romans had provided themselves of sharp Hooks or Sicles, which putting upon long Poles, these they fastned to the Tackling which held the Main Yard to the Mast; then forcing away their Ship with force of Oars, they cut the Tackling and the Main Yard fell down. Thus the Galls loft the use of their Shipping, and so the Controversie fell within the compass of Valour, in which the Romans being superiours obtained the Victory; for to their natural Valour was added a defire of Glory, they fighting in the fight of Cefar, and the whole Army; for all the Hills and Cliffs, which afforded prospect into the Sea, were covered with the Roman Forces. Their Main Yards coming by the Board, their Enemies with fury took many of their Veffels, at the fight of which the rest fled, but on a suddain were becalmed. fo that the Romans coming up with them fought Ship to Ship, and eafily mastered them. Of 60 great a Navy very few escaped after eight hours fight, by the advantage of the Evening, and so the War ended with the Veneti and the other Maritime Nations. For all forts of People, young and old, that were fit either for Council or Action were prefent at the Battel, and all the Shipping they could make ingaged. These that remained, not knowing how to dispose of themselves, veilded to Cefar, who to terrifie other Barbarous People from violating the Law of Nations, put to death all the Senate, and fold the ordinary fort for Slaves. 41. In the mean time L. Titurius Sabinus, with his Forces entred the Territories of the Unelli, With them joyned the Aulerci and Eburones (People of Maine, Normans of Anlanion Sees and Evereux) and Lexobii (People of Lifeux) having flain their Senate because they would not countenance the War. They were headed by Viridrix, one of the Unelli, who marched and offered battel to Subinus. He counterfeited himfelf fearful to fuch a degree, that they were thereby moved to attacque his Camp, which being placed upon an Hill, he caufed his men to take the advantage of the upper ground, and of the Enemy his being burthened with Turff and other Materials for filling up the Trenches, and isluing forth at two Ports. they fell upon them, and did fuch Execution, that they flew great numbers, and chasing their Horse suffered very few to escape. Upon the noise of these two Victories obtained much at the fame time, all the Cities and States yeilded themselves to Titerius; for as the Galls were eager to undertake a War, so were they weak in fuffering, and impatient of, the Confequents and Calamities thereof. 42. At the same time it happened, that M. Crassus coming into Aquitain, found he was to use no small diligence; for the Country was large and Populous, and there L. Valerius Praconius, the Legate was flain, and the Army overthrown, and thence L. Manlius was forced to fly with the lofs of his Carriages. Having made what provision he could, he invaded the Sontiates who presently raised very confiderable Forces and opposed him in his march, but the Roman Soldiers, desirous to shew what they could do, without their General and the rest of the Legions. under the Conduct of a very Young man, put them to flight, and flew a great Adolescental number; and then he belieged their chief Town, which he attacqued with Vines, Duce. Turrets and Mounts. The Towns-men defended themselves both by fallying forth and undernaining, wherein the Aquitains were very skilful. But seeing the industry of the Romans they offered to furrender, which being accepted, it was expected irajus taketh they should deliver up their Arms. In the mean time Adeantuanus, their Goverthe Town of nor or chief Magistrate, issued out at another Port with six hundred devoted the Socialistic Companions, whom they called Soldurii, the manner of whom was to enjoy all good things in common with their chofen friends, and if any misfortune befell them, either to dye with them, or presently to kill themselves; neither was it ever known in the memory of man, that any of them refused to dye when his Friend was flain. But making a noise they were discovered and driven back again into the Town, by the Soldiers that kept that Fortification; where, according to his defire, the Governor was taken in the number of the submissive multitude.

43. The Barbarous Galls allarmed at the taking this Town, affembled their Forees together, and got aid out of Spain and the adjoyning Countries, with fuch Commanders as had got experience in Sertorius his Wars. Craffus being come into the Confines of the Vocates and Tarufates, these began, according even to the Custom of the Romans, to take place of advantage, to fortifie their Camp, and to intercept the Enemy from necellary intercourses. Crassis perceiving this, resolved it was most expedient to give them battel, and prepared for it; but when he offered it they refused, hoping to end the War without bloodshed, and if for want of Provisions the Romans retreated, they intended to fall upon them when they were weary and out of heart. Crassus perceiving their drift, resolved to set upon them in their Gails a great Camp, and this his resolution was heartily received by his men, and put in execution. As they were with all alacrity attacquing one part of the Fortification, some of the Horse informed Crassis, that the Rampire at the Decumane Port was weak. and would admit an easie entrance. This place was easily surprised and entred by four Cohorts, which making a noise, and coming on the Backs of the Galls so unexpectedly, put them into a fright, and this fright drove them over the Rampart to flift as they could for their lives. But the Country being Champion, the Horse purfued them with fuch execution, that of fifty thousand which came out of Aquitain and Spain, scarcely the fourth part remained.

44. This fuccess of Crassus had such effect, that most part of Aquitain submitted. Most of Ani- and of their own accord gave him Hostages. Amongst them were the Tarbelli, Bitain thereup- gerriones, Preciani, Vocates, Tarusates, Elusates, Garites, Ausci, Garumni, Sibusates and Cocosates. Only some few that lived farther off, trusting upon the coming in of Winter, held off and did not submit themselves. To this enumeration Cafar maketh of People subdued thus by Crassus we must also reckon the Sontiates, which make up the number of twelve; and now, if you will believe him, they were all feveral People or Nations, or as such he represents them. But Monetus the Geographer will tell you, that but three of them were truly People; that the rest in no fort were such, but of Towns or Villages, and for the affistance of young Beginners he takes the pains to enumerate them. The Auscii, Bigerriones, an I Tarbelli were People. The Cocolates, or Cosates, were no other than the Citizens of Sect. 6. Cocoffium or Coffium, now Balas the Metropolis of the Vafates or Bafadois. The Elusates were also Townsmen of Elusa, now Euse a Town at the bottom of the Territories of the Aufeii, (les Aufeiois, and Armagnaquois) neither of old nor now to big as Cafar would have it. The Garites, or rather Gaurites, were Inhabitants of the Valley of Gaura, in the Country of the Convene or Comingeois, the County of Gaure, of which fome Towns are at this day reckoned unknown to the Romans, as Baumont, Granate, and Gimont. The Garumni inhabited a Village, or Villages, in the Valley adjoyning to the Mountains of St. Beat at the head of the River Garumna, or Garonne.

Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

45. The Preciani were Inhabitants of some ignoble Valleys near the Garumni, in the Territories of the Convena. The Sibnsates also possessed a Ground no whit famous, called now Seboufan, or Siboufan, in the Confines of the Convene. The Sontiates, or rather Sottiates, as Pliny hath it, were Inhabitants of the Mountains of Sotti. now Mons de Sant, in the Grounds of the Western Bigerri, or Bearnois. The Tarusates were the Townsmen of Tarusa, now Tartas, in the Borders of the Tarbelli. Baionnois, or Basques. And lastly, the Vocates in Pliny Basobacates, were Inhabitants of the Town of a Valates not now standing, in a Ground where at present is a Village. But Cafar, though the Summer was well nigh spent; yet for as much as all Gall was at peace, only the Morini and Menapii stood out in Arms, and had never either sent Ambassadors, or otherwise treated of Peace, hoping yet the Warwould quickly be at an end, invaded their Territories. They managed their matters far otherwise than theother Galls; for upon his approach they conveyed themselves and Goods into the Woods and Boggs, and thence skirmished with the Romans. Cesar set his Men at work, who with admirable speed, cutting down much Wood, cleared the Ground, and by that means took their Goods and Cat:el; but they themselves fled into the thicker Woods, of which they had plenty. Now fell abundance of Rain, which so distressed the Soldiers, that they could neither work, nor lie under their Tents of Skins; and therefore he burned and spoiled their Country, and placed his Army amongst the Aulerci, Lexovii, and other late subdued Cities, therein to winter.

Domitine to stand for the Confulship, telling him he should contend not for Magi-stracy, but for liberty, against the Tyrants. But Pompey searing Cato's vehemency, lest, having the whole Senate in his power, he should persuade the People to what was best, sent some armed Men upon Domitius as he went down to the Forum, who killed the Slave that carried the light before them, and differfed them all, Cato being the last that fled, who received a wound on his Arm whilst he fought for Domitius.

Pompey and Crassus having thus by force obtained the Consulship, bore themselves nothing more moderately afterwards. The People being about to give Cato the Pra-Pampy and craffin, accor. torfbip, Pompey pretended a strange fight from Heaven, and dismissed the Assembly ding to agree then corrupting the Tribes with Money, he procured Antias and Vatimius to be chosen he spent his time in Shows and Pastimes. Crassis much rejoyced in his part, scarcely being able to contain himself abroad and at home, but contrary to his wonted gravity, breaking forth into childish expressions of joy. For, he sleighted the thoughts of Syria and Parthia, as one who would fo order his affairs, that the exploits of Lucullus against Tigranes, and of Pompey in the War with Mithridates, should seem craffin against but toys, extending his hopes as far as Baciria, the Indians, and the utmost Ocean, 47. But Craffus betook himfelf to force, which when the Tribunes faw themselves unable to withftand, they defifted, but loaded him with curfes, and when he made the accustomed prayers in the Capitol for prosperous success, they spoke of unlucky auspicia and prodigies which had hapned. Atteius the Tribune laboured to hinder him from going, many exclaiming against it as an unworthy thing, that he should fall with War upon those who had nothing ill deserved of the Romans, but were at peace with them. This made him fly to Pompey to conduct him forth, at the fight of whom those who came to stop him gave way. But Atteins meeting him, carnestly exhorted him to delift, and when that would not do, fent a Viator to lay hold of him; but the rest of the Tribunes not permitting this, and the Viator not quite dismissing him, Atteins got before to the Gate, where he had some fire ready, and as Crassus came by, throwing his Odours upon the Coals, devoted him with horrible and bitter curfes, invocating certain terrible and unheard of gods. These secret and ancient execrations the Romans thought to be of that force that no man ever escaped destruction to whom they were denounced, and that they also proved unfortunate to the denouncer, and therefore they were feldom used, and Crassis was blamed on the behalf of the City. * Florus calleth this Tribune Metellus, and others write, that the Tribunes generally * Lio. 3. c. 11, thus devoted him, but it appeareth, * from Cicero, that P. This King of Parthia, against whom Crassus miscarried, (called Orodes, Herodes, and Hyrodes) was something skilled in the Greek Tongue, and other learning. Artabazes, or Artavasdes, the Armenian, (that first offered kindnessto Crassus) had reconciled himself to the Parthian, who was now with him. He being also learned, (for he wrote Tragedies, Orations, A. M. 3952. and Histories) part of Euripides his Bacche was repeated, and the head of Crassus was brought in as it were by chance, and thrown at their feet. But the Surenas was afterwards punished for his treachery, being killed by his Master, who envied him his glory. And Orodes himself having lost his Son Pacorus, in a Battel against the Romans, and fall'n into that kind of Dropsie, called Anasarca, Phraates (or Phraortes) his other Son, gave him Aconitum, or Wolfs-bane, which working to upon him, as with it felf it brought out the humour, and gave him eafe, he made short work of it,

The Winter after Cofar his Action against the Morim and Menapii, Pompey cofar at 1800 and Crassus being Consuls, two German Nations, the Uspeter and Tenchtheri palled Gallio 115. 4. with great multitudes over the Rhine, not far from the place where it falleth into the Sea. They had been ill treated for many years by the Suevi, the greatest and most warlike Nation amongst the Germans, who had one hundred Pagi, which yearly afforded to their Wars a thousand Men apiece; the rest living at home maintained themselves and them, and succeeded them in the War the following year. By this means both Tillage and experience in War was continued. No Man had any Ground peculiar to himself, neither might they abide longer than a year in one place. They lived chiefly upon Cattel and Milk, and used much hunting; being for that, and because they were not urged to any thing against their disposition, strong and of large stature. Their Bodies were but covered in part, and that but with Skins and Hides, and they washed them in the Rivers. Merchants frequented their Ports; not fo much to bring them any Commodities, as to buy what they got in War. Oxen they cared not for, though the Galls would purchase them at any rate; but made use of their own rugged ugly Cattel, which by use they rendred tame and fit for service.

that one way the Country lay wast from them six hundred Miles together. 51. Next to the Suevi inhabited the Ubii, a State also great and potent, somewhat more civil than the rest, by reason of their entercourse with Merchants, and with the Galls. These the Suevi had much brought under, though they could not drive them out of the Country; as also they handled the Usipetes and Tenchtheri beforementioned, who for three years were forced from their Possessions to wander through the Continent of Germany, and at last fell upon the Menapii, inhabiting either side of the River Rhine. They being terrified thereat, forfook all their dwellings on the German side, and betook themselves to that of Gall, to hinder them from farther passage. And they did so far hinder them, that they counterfeited a Retreat to their old habitation; but their Horse, after three days Journey, speedily returned, and furprized, and flew fuch as upon their absence were returned to the farther side. The Girmins Thefe being flain, and their Shipping taken, they got over the River before the oput the Rhint ther Menapii had notice of their coming, eafily dispostessed them, and lived that Winter upon the spoil. fted to his Army fooner than he was wont to do. 52. He found what he had suspected, that the Germans were invited by some Galls to come farther into the Country, and they proceeded as far as the Confines of the Eburones and Condrust, who were under the protection of the Treviri. Yet Casar thought fit to diffemble the matters, and incourage the Princes now got together in their loyalty. But he resolved to oppose the Germans, who in his march sent their Ambassadors, desiring, that being forced out of their Habitation, they might have leave to fix in Gall; and feveral things they propounded, as Cefar believed, to fpin on the time till their Horsemen were returned, which were gone for spoil and provifion over the Mosa. He gave them truce for one day, but notwithstanding that Truce, they set upon and defeated a Party of five thousand Horse. Then did he not think it safe to hearken to them any more, especially seeing that by that fraudulent Act they gained reputation amongst the Galls, to whom he durst not give space to think upon it. He resolved to fall upon them even in their Camp, which when he communicated to the Legates and Questors, a very fortunate accident hapned. For the next morning the chiefest of them came to excuse their late practice, and to de-

Sect. 5. fire a further Truce. He detained them in hold, and marched with his Army in a triple Battle (the Horse behind the Foot, because lately discouraged) to the Camp He descareth of the Germans. At first the Soldiers found some resistance, but upon the screeking of the Women and Children, who running away, were purfued; the Menalfo took themselves to their heels, and such as had escaped the Fight, coming to the confluence of the Mofa, and the Rhine, what through fear, weariness, and the force of the water, were all drowned. In the Conflict the Romans loft not a Man, yet the number of the Enemy, with Women and Children, was four hundred and thirty thousand. He gave leave to them he had kept in hold to depart; but they fearing the cruelty of the Calls, for the mischief they had done them, defired they might continue with the Konians, which Cafar granted.

53 The German Horse that was absent at the overthrow, fled into the Confines of the Sicambri, who refused to give them up, upon Casars demand; saying, that if the Germans were forbidden Gall, why should the Romans challenge any Authority in their Territories? But Cafar thought fit they sould fee that the Romans could pass the Rhine to well as they; especially being defired by the Ubii, who had alone accepted of his friendship, to send them aid against the Suevi. To pass the Rhine he resolved, but to do it by Boats, was neither safe, neither for his own honour, nor for the Majesty of the People of Rome; and therefore, notwithstanding the difficulty in so large, deep, and swift a River, yet he resolved to try to make a Bridge, which if it fucceeded not, he determined not to pass over at all. But within ten days that the Timber began to be cut and carried, the Work was ended, and the Army transported; leaving then a strong Party at either end of the Bridge, he invaded the Sicambri, receiving in the mean time many Ambassadors, and requiring Hostages. The Sicambri, at the persuasion of the Usipetes and Tenchtheri, had forsaken their Country, and betaken themselves into Woods and Deserts. He wasted their Territories, and marched to the Ubii, to whom he had promifed aid against the Suevi. By them he understood that the Suevi, upon rumor of the Bridge, had sent all their Wealth, with their Wives and Children, into the Woods, and refolved, that all that were able to bear Arms should make Head, and give Battle to the Romans in the middle of their Country. But Cafar having terrified the Germans, been revenged upon the Sicambri, and fet, as he faith, the Ubii at liberty, (the things he defigned) and spent eighteen days beyond the Rhine, having done enough for his own Ho-

54. Before this he had understood, that in most part of the former Wars the Galls had received their Supply out of Britain. Though the Summer was fo far spent, that it would not suffer him to finish a War, yet he thought it would be to good purpole, if he came only to view the Island, to understand the quality of the Inhabitants, and to know their Coast, their Ports and Landing places. Hereof the Galls were altogether ignorant; for feldom any but Merchants did travel to them. Neither had they discovered any thing but the Sea-Coast, and those Regions which were opposite to Gall. Calling Merchants together from all Quarters, he neither could understand of what quantity the Island was; what Nations, or of what power they were that inhabited it; what use or experience of War they had; what Laws or Customs they used; nor what Haven they had to receive a Navy of the

It is most probable, saith Cambden, that the Inhabitants conful. cambwere called Britains from their painted Bodies, for whatfoever is thus painted and densm in Bricoloured, in their ancient Country speech they call Brith, having been of old much given to paint themselves, as many Writers do testifie. Now the Ancient Greeks, who failed by the Coasts, understanding that the Nation was called Brith, might unto it add Tania, (which word in Greek, as the Gloffaries shew, betokeneth a Region) and thereof make the compound name Berravia, that is Britons-Land, which is corrupted into Berraria, but by Lucretius and Cafar the two first Romans that make mention thereof is truly called Britania. In confirmation of this opinion Cambden observeth, that in the names of well-nigh all the ancient Britains, there appeareth fome fignification of a colour, which no doubt (he faith) arose from this kind of painting. The Red colour is of the Britains called Coch and Goch, which in his judgment lieth couched in these names, Cogidunus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The Black colour called Du, sheweth it self in Mandubratius, Cartimandua, Togodumnus, Bunduica, Cogidunus. The White colour called Gwin, in Veautius and Immanuentius. The Wateriff called Gwellwe in Vellocatus, Carvilius and Suella. The Blew, which they call Glass in Cuniglasus, and he proceedeth further. But this Learned Man coming to speak of the time wherein Britain came to be known abroad, denieth that the Britains were with Hercules at the rape of Hesione; that Ulysses was ever in Britain; that the Britains bestowed any Presents upon Cato; that King Alexander the Great, or Hannibal, was ever in the Island; he doubteth whether ever the Ship of Hiero, mentioned by Atheneus, came hither; yet thinketh that the Britains were mingled with the Cimbri and Galls, in their Expeditions into Italy and

56. But as the Romans, Galls, and Spaniards, were unknown to Herodotus, and the ancient Greek Geographers, so of this mind he ever was, that it was late e're the Greeks and Romans heard of the Britains name. For he judgeth that little Book of the World, which goeth abroad under the name of Aristotle, and makethmention of the Britains, of Albion and Hierne, to be of latter days by far than that Philosopher, as the best learned Men (saith he) have judged. He accounteth Polybius the ancientest Greek Writer that mentioneth the British Isles; who yet knew nothing of them : then doth he, in reference to other Nations, count it but a fable that Himileo the Carthaginian, being commanded by his Superiours to discover the Western Sea-Coasts of Europe, entred into this Isle many years before that time. And the first Latin Author to his knowledge that made mention of Britain was Lucretius, in his Verses concerning the difference of Air. Now that Lucretius lived but a little before Casar no man denieth: at what time we are taught out of Casar himself, that Divitiacus King of the Soissons, and the most mighty Prince of all Gall, Governed Britain, which, as also appeareth from Casar, is only to be understood of the Maritime Coasts. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth, that Britain had experience of no Forreigners rule; for neither Dionysus, (or Bacchus) nor Hercules, nor any other worthy, or Demi-god have we heard (faith he) to have attempted War upon that People. Now Cafar, who for his noble Acts is called Divus, was the first that subdued the Britains, and forced them to pay a certain Tribute. From his time (faith Cambden) and no further off must the Writer of our History fetch the beginning of his Work. if he throughly weigh with judgment what the learned Varro hath in time past written, (viz. of the three distinctions of times which we have formerly mentioned. Uncertain before the Flood, Fabulous before the Olympiads, and Historical fince the beginning of them) and my felf already heretofore fignified. This most learned Man mentions this division of Varro, because that the British History of Geffrey of Monmouth taketh its beginning three hundred and thirty three years before the first Olympiad. This History we must absolutely disclaim as utterly fabulous in reference to King Brutus, and other fictions depending on his Story. But whether or no Britain was not known abroad till so late time as our Antiquary judgeth, must be examined for the honour of our Country, saving ever that respect which is due (and that justly) unto his name, and will not be at all diminished, seeing the contest is betwixt him alfo, and Bochartus himfelf. 57. The controversie is décided clearly against Cambden, if two things can but be made out. 1. That the Casseterides or Islands of Tinne were known very anciently, and 2. That the Cassacrides were no other than the British Isles. The first is proved from the Testimony of many that the Phanicians were wont to trade to the Cassiterides, and thence to fetch plenty of Tinne. Strabo affirmeth it, and that they first traded thither a- Lib. 3.9. 174: lone from Gades, hiding from others this course of Traffick, in so much that a certain Phanician Sailor being chafed by a Roman Veffel, chofe rather to run his Ship aground, cians being unwilling that any should know them but themselves, the Greeks bought Tinand Lead, either of them, or the Veneti, or Narbonenjes, to whom it was wont (d) vidita to be carried by Land in a journey of thirty days, as Diodorus tellethus. Sect. 6. Festus Anienus speaketh of them under the name of Oestrymnedes, expresly of the failing of the Phanicians to them, and that Hamileo, who was fent from the Senate of Carthage to discover the West, came thither, as he himself recorded, whom Festus professed to follow in the description of the West, having made his Collections out of the depth of the Punick Annals. These things considered, prove sufficiently, that the Cassiterides were known in very ancient times.

58. For the second, that the British Isles are those Cassiterides or Stannaries, there needs no proof, Cambden himself confessing, nay proving by many Arguments, that the Islands of Silly lying off from the Promontory of Cornwal eight Leagues, and in number one hundred and forty five, are the very same that from the plenty of Tin were called Calsterides, from their site Hesperides, and Oestrymnides, from Oestrymnis the Promontory of the Artabri, now Gallitia in Spain, over against which they lie. Now for the consequence of the thing, can any imagine that these Islands should be folong known, and not Britain it felf to which they lie fo close, and from which they are deservedly called British Isles? And what reason is there to think, (as Cambden doth) that such dream as believe that Hamileo came hither? It's a wonder he should fay, that there's nothing for it but a Verse or two of Festus Anienus; when Festus faith, that he read the story of the whole Navigation, described by Hamileo himself in the Punick Annals. Cambden himself contendeth, that from the Cassiterides was Lead first of all carried into Greece, whence it followeth, that they were known before the time of Homer, who maketh mention of the Metal. As for what he urgeth concerning Polybins, that he was utterly ignorant of these Parts, if it were granted that he was, yet the Phanicians, who in the Heroick times fent out Colonics into the Ocean beyond Gades, knew these Coasts sufficiently. But Cambden mistook the Historian, as may appear from all that passage read together, which only importeth. that as it was not known whether Asia and Africk on the South side were terminated by the Sea, so neither whether the Sea flowed about the Northern parts of Europe that lie above Narbon; which truly at this day we know not certainly, though in so much light. That this interpretation is to be made, and that Polybius did not mean, that in his age whatever lay above Narbon was unknown, and that they dreamed who spoke or wrote any thing of it, hence appeareth. For he himself accurately described the Fountains of Rhodanus, with Corbilon upon Ligers, and many other places of Gall above Narbon. And in his third Book he promiseth he would write of what lay beyond the Sea, and what was there remarkable, nay, (which is especially to be noted) of the British Isles, and making of Tin. That he performed his promise in the Books that are lost, appeareth from *Strabo, who telleth us, That Polybius describing the Regions * Lib.29.104. of Europe, faid, he would let pass the Aucients, and inquire into such as reprehended them, as Dicearchus, and Eratosthenes, who last of all had handled Geography, and Pytheas who had impossed upon many. For, he (Pytheas) said, he had not viewed all the Soil of Britain; but the Island was above forty thousand (Stadia or Furlongs I sup-

59, From this place it appeareth, that several whom Polybius calleth 185 dexales or Ancients, wrote of these Parts, before eitheir Dicearchus or Eratosthenes, Pytheas. or himself. Now Eratosthenes, who, as he saith, was the last that handled Geography, Suidas writeth to have been born in the 126 Olympiad, which was celebrated in the thirty seventh year of the Seleucida, the seventh of Antiochus Soter, the minth of Ptolomy Philadelphus, and the 478 year of the City, when Q. Fabius Gurges and C. Genutius Clepfina were Confuls, Pyrrbus then warring in Sicily, two hundred and seventy four years before the birth of Christ. But Dicearchus boasteth in Atheneus, that he had Aristotle for his Master; and then Pytheas, who was cited by both, must needs have preceded them, Yet these Writers were but of late in comparison of Orpheus the most ancient Poet, one of the Argonauta, by whom Cambden himself affirmeth Britain to have been described. Although in truth Orpheus was not Author of those Poems fathered on him, but Onomacritus an Athanian Poet, who lived under the Pisstratida, as both (a) Clemens Alexandrinus, and (b) Tatianus inform us; (3) Smeather yet two advantages we have hereby. For first, Cambden is inconstant, denying that (b) to at a re-Britain was known to the ancient Greek; and secondly, this Island must have been 173 Idit set known then long before the former Geographers; for the Pifistratide were banish- can although ed Athens in the third year of the fixty seventh Olympiad, the twelfth of Davius Hy. 126 For Staspis, the 244 of the City, (at the same time that Tarquinius was banished) five object. hundred and eight years before the birth of Christ, though they write that he flourished in the fiftieth Olympiad, in the first year whereof Pifistratus indeed got the Sovereignty over the City. These things sufficiently prove, that Britain was known of old to several Nations, though we mentioned not what Bochartus probably conje- Sect. 6. Etureth concerning the Etymology of the name. The Phanicians trading hither for Lead or Tin, might justly call it Barat-Anac, that is, The Land of Lead or Tin, as the Greeks Calliterie; and this might eafily be changed into Bretanica. Anac fignifieth both Lead and Tin, no places in the World are so fruitful of either as the British Ifles. And it may feem no wonder that the Word should be so altered, seeing that from Phanice are derived Panicus, Punicus, Puniceus, and Panus. He also giveth other marks of the Phanicians their planting in those Islands, in the thirty ninth Chapter of the first Book of that excellent Work entituled Canaan, concerning the Colonies and Language of that People, to which we refer the studious in Antiquity, having thus far in some fort seemed to vindicate the honour of our Country. Now to return to the course of our History.

60. Cafar fent out C. Volusenus with a Gally to discover what he could concerning the quality of the Island, and its Inhabitants, with order speedily to return, and get all his Ships together on the Coast of the Morini; in the mean time his resolution being known, many private States of the Isle sent and submitted themselves, offering to give Hoftages, and he returned back the Meffengers with good words. E're Volusenus returned, who durft not go ashoar, the Morini submitted, and being unwilling to have an Enemy at his back, he received them and their Hostages. Eighty Ships of Burthen he thought fufficient to transport two Legions. He divided the Gallies to the Quastor, the Legates and Commanders of the Horfe, appointing other eighteen Ships of Burthen which lay wind-bound at another Port for the Horsemen. In the third Watch he put to Sea, commanding his Horse to follow, which was but slowly performed. About the fourth hour of the day he arrived upon the Coast, where he found all the Cliffs posfeffed by the Forces of the Enemy. The Place where he arrived was such, that the Hills lay fo freep over the Sea, that a Weapon might easily be east from the higher ground; and therefore he thought it not fit to land, but cast Anchor till the rest of the Navy were come up. Then after a Counsel called of the Legates and Tribunes, wherein he required a quick obedience to Orders, he removed eight Miles further unto a plain and open Shoar.

61. The Britains fent their Horse and Chariots (which they commonly used in War) before, and followed with the rest of their Forces. Casar found that his Men did not use the same courage as formerly in landing, for the Ships were so great, that they could not be brought near the Shoar, and the Soldiers were forced to wade deep with their heavy Armour, in places unknown; whereas the Britains well knowing where they were, managed their matters with great advantage. He caused the Gallies to be rowed toward the Shore, with which the Britains unacquainted, and thence offended with Slings, Engines and Arrows, began to give back. But still the Soldiers lingering, by reason of the depth of the Sea, the Ensign-bearer of the tenth Legion desiring the Gods that it might fall out happily to the Legion, told the Soldiers, That if they would for fake their Eagle, and betray it to the Enemy, for his own part he would do his duty both to the Common-wealth, and to his General. Therewith he cast himself into the Sea, and carried the Eagle towards the Enemy, at which sight the Romans exhorting one another not to fuffer fuch a dishonour to be committed, all leaped out of the Ship, and were followed by others near at hand with great alacrity. The Fight on both fides was very eager, the Romans strugling with great disadvantages, and keeping with the Enligh they first met. The Britains over-powred them, till Cafar caused the Ship-boats and smaller Vessels to be manned with Soldiers, and where he faw need, fent them in to the refcue. Having got footing on Land, his Men made Head together, charged the Enemy, and put them to flight. But the Horsemen were notable to pursue, nor take the Island; which thing (he faith himfelf) was only wanting to Cesars wonted fortune. 62. But the Britains being overthrown in this Ingagement, fent and furrendred themselves, gave some Hostages, and promised that others should be delivered, excufing themselves by ignorance for what was done amis, and casting the blame upon the Multitude. Their People they commanded to return to their Quarters, but the Governours and Princes came out of all Parts, and commended themselves and their States to Cafar. Peace was hereby concluded, and four days after that he was come into Britain, the eighteen Ships appointed for the Horsemen put out to Sea with a gentle Wind, but were so distressed with a Tempest, that when they were within view of the Roman Camp, some were forced to return to the Port from whence they came, others were driven to the Westward, and there casting Anchor, took in so much water, that they were forced to direct their course back again to the Coast of Gall.

Seft. 6. Moreover the Flext that Cesur brought over with him, as well Gallies as Ships of burthen, were miferably distressed by the Tide, of which the Romans were ignorant; many were spit and rent in pieces, and the rest lost both Anchors, Cables, and other Tackling, and became altogether unserviceable. Hereat the whole Army was exceedingly troubled, there being no Shipping to carry them back, nor Provisions to sist in them; for here in the Island they could not continue. And the Britiss Poinces knowing this; besides, that they wanted Horse, and considering the smallness of their Camp, (for Cesur had transported his Forces without such necessary Carriages as they used to take with them) they resolved to intercept their Provisions, keep them in till Winter, and so start them; concluding, that if they were cut off, no Man would everaster adventure to bring an Army into the Island.

63. Cesur guessed that the event of the losing of his Shipping would be such, especially when he faw that they brought not their Holfages; therefore he fetcht in Corn out of the Fields, and so repaired his Ships, that he lost but twelve of the number, the rest being made able to abide the Sea. But the seventh Legion being sent out for Corn, were set upon by the Britains, and over powered; which Cesar suspections from a greater dust than was usually discovered in that Quarter, hasted thither, and found his Men incompassed with their Horsemen and their Chariots. Their manners of fighting in Chariots was to ride up and down, and cast their Weapons as they saw advantage, and with the terror of their Horses, and the rating of their Wheels, to disorder the Ranks; and when they brought themselves within any Troops of Horse, they forsook their Chariots, and sought on foot; in the mean time the Drivers would go a little asset, and so place them, that upon occasion they might have an easie passed, and help their Malters. In all Fights they performed both the nimble motion of Horsemen, and the firm stability of Footmen, being so ready with daily practice, that they could stop in the declivity of a steep Hill, turn short, or moderate their going as they pleased, and run along the Beam, and rest upon the Yoak or Harness of their Horses, and return as speedily again when they thought fit.

64. Cafar came in to the rescue in very good time; upon which the Enemy stood ftill, and his Men received courage; but having staid some time in the place, he thought not fit to provoke the Enemy, or give him Battel, and so drew off back again to his Camp. After this, by tempettuous weather, the Romans were kept in their Camp, and all Action prevented. But in the mean while the Britains incorraged one another from the smallness of the Roman Forces, and resolved to attacque their Camp. Cafar gave them battle before the Camp, and eafily defeated them, of whom great flaughter was made, though he had with him but forty Horse; and their Towns were burnt far and near. The same day they sent to treat, and Casar required double Hostages to be brought over to him into Gall. For the Æquinoctial being at hand, he thought it not fafe to put to Sea in Winter, and therefore a little after midnight he set sail, and brought all his Ships sase to the Continent, only two of Burthen, not able to reach the fame Harbour, put in somewhat lower in the Land; and when the three hundred Soldiers that were in them went on shoar, they were set upon by the Morini, but relieved at length by a Party of Horse which Casar sent. The next day he fent T. Labienus against these revolted Morini, who having not whither now to escape, their Fenns and Boggs being dried up, fell under the power of his mercy. Q. Titurius and A. Cotta, two other Legates also, after they had wasted the Territories of the Menapii, who were retired into thick Woods, returned to Cafar. He placed the wintering Camp amongst the Belge, to which two only of the States of Britain fent Hoftages, the other neglecting. These things being related by Cesars Letters, the Senate decreed a Supplication for thirty days. Now the Ceremony of Supplication was this. After the Magistrate had publickly proclaimed that the General had happily and fuccessfully administred the Affairs of the Common-wealth, the Roman People cloathed in white, and crowned with Garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and there Sacrificed, to gratulate the Victory in his Name; and in this time they were forbidden all other business but what appertained to this Solemnity. At first it lasted but one or two days, then came to four, five, ten, afterward to fifteen in honour of Cafar; and for his further Honour was now increased to the number of twenty.

65. Cosar going into Italy from his Winter Quarters, as every year he was wont to cosar at his of the word of the the L. Domitius and Appins Claudius were Confuls, gave order to his Legates Gallicolib. 5 to build as many Ships as they possibly could, and repair the old; and the new ones he would have lower and flatter for lading and unlading, and transporting Horse, and all of them made for the use of Oars. From Gall within the App he passed to Illyricum, where the Piruste infested the Province, whom having terrified into a Sect. 6 compliance, and received Hostages, he deputed certain Persons to compound differences, and punish the guilty, and so he returned the same way he came to his Army into Gall. After his Arrival he went to the Treviri, whom he suspected of a design to revolt, because they came not to the Assembly of Estates, and for other reasons. Amongst them Iudatiomarus and Cingetorix contended for Superiority, of whom the latter presently came over to Cesur; but the former resolving upon War, secured all persons unable to bear Arms in the Wood Arduenna, which being very large, began at the Rhine, and ran through the Treviri to the Borders of the People of Rheims: But finding all the chief to fall off, left he should be left alone, he also submitted. Casar resolving upon another Expedition into Britain, accepted of two hundred Hostages, and reconciled the chief of the Treviri to Cingetorix, whom he found to be for his Interest; which so vexed Induciomarus, that of no friend he became to the Romans a bitter Enemy. Having fetled matters there, he came back with the Legions to the Port Itius, (now of Calis) where finding things in good readiness. and Horse to the number of four thousand, he resolved to take over with him some of the Galls from among the chief Men of every City that were come to him. And he pitched in particular upon Dumnorix the Æduan, knowing him to be a Man defirous of change, greedy of Rule, of courage and resolution, and one of greatest Authority. He was very unwilling to go, and when Intreaties could not prevail for his ftay, he endeavoured to make a diffurbance, and when that would not do, he fled, but by Cafars order was killed refifting, by those that were fent to pursue him.

Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

66. Cafar having left Labienus in the Continent with three Legions, and two thoufand Horfe, to fecure the Roman Interest, with five Legions, and as many Horse as he left behind him, imbarqued in a Navy of in all above eight hundred Veffels, and put out about Sun-fetting with a foft South-wind. The Wind continued till mid-night and then he was becalmed; but was carried with the Tide till morning, when he perceived the Island to lie on his right hand. By rowing as the Tide changed, he endeavoured to reach that place where he formerly landed, and this he did by the great industry of the Soldiers, who by Oarsmade the great Ships of Burthen to keep way with the Gallies. Arriving at high Noon, he found the Britains had been on the Coast, but upon fight of so huge a number of Ships, they retired, and hid themselves in the Woods. Having sortified his Camp, and left a Guard for his Ships, in the third Watch of the night, he marched towards them, and found them at twelve Miles distance, where at a River they made some opposition, but were beaten back and retired into a Wood. The Place was strongly fortified both by Art and Nature, and seemed to be made for a defence in their Civil Wars. For all the Entrances were closed with great Trees laid overthwart the Passages. They endeavoured to hinder the Romans from entring the Fortification. But the Soldiers of the seventh Legion with a Testudo and a Mount took it, and drove them out of the Woods without any loss; but being ignorant of the Place, he would not suffer them to pursue, resolving to imploy the remaining part of the day in the further fortifying of his Camp.

67. The next day early he fent out his Forces in three Companies to feek them out. but received news in a short time from Q. Atrius, with whom he had left ten Cohorts and the charge of the Shipping, that the whole Navy by an hideous Tempest was either fore beaten or cast on Shore. Casar called back the Legions, and found that forty Ships were loft, and the rest not to be repaired but with great industry and pairs. He chose Carpenters and Shipwrights out of the Legions, caused others to be sent for out of Gall, and wrote to Labienus to provide what Shipping he could. And how laborious foever it was, he thought fit to take up all the Ships on Shore, and bring them within the Fortification of his Camp; in which work, and fortifying the Camp, were spent tendays without intermission either of day or night; and returning to the Place whence he came, he found the Britains in great numbers affembled, and the management of the War conferred on Cassivellaun, whose Kingdom was divided from the Maritime States, by the River Thames, beginning at the Sea, and extending it felf for fourfcore Miles into the Island. He had made continual War with his neighbour States; but, upon coming of the Romans, they all forgot their homebred quarrels, and cast their whole Government upon him, as the fittest to direct in the War.

Britain, by whom inhabited.

68. Now, the inner part of Britain was inhabited by such as were reported to be born in the Illand, and the Maritime Coasts by such as came out of Belgia, either to make Incursions or Invasions; and after the War was ended, they continued in the Possessian.

Sect. 6. Possessions they had gained, and were called by the Names of the Cities from whence they came. The Country was very Populous, and well inhabited with Houses, much like unto them in Gall. They had great store of Cattel, and used Brass for Money, or Iron Rings weighed at a certain rate. In the Mediterranean Parts was found great quantity of Tin; and in the Maritime Parts Iron, but they had but little of that: their Brass was brought in by other Nations. They had all forts of Trees, as in Gall, except the Fig and Beech. Their Religion would not fuffer them to eat either Hare, Hen, or Goole; notwithstanding they had of all forts, as well for novelty as variety. The Country, faith he, is more temperate, and not so cold as Gall. The Island lieth Triangular, whereof one fide confronteth Gall, of which fide that Angle wherein Cantium (or Kent) lies, is the usual Place of landing from it, and pointeth to the East, and the other Angle to the South. This containeth about fifty Miles. Another fide lieth toward Spain, and the West, the same way that Hibernia. (or Ireland) being an Island half as big as Britain, and as far distant from it as Gall. In the mid way, betwixt Britain and Ireland, lieth Mona, (now Anglesy) and many other Isles; of which some write, that in Winter time, for thirty days together, they have continual night, whereof we learned nothing by enquiry; only we found by certain measures of Water, that the Nights in Britain were shorter than in the Continent. The length of this fide, according to the opinion of the Inhabitants, containeth feven hundred Miles. The third fide lieth to the North, and the open Sea, faving that this Angle doth something point towards Germany. This is thought to contain eight hundred Miles; and so the whole Island in circuit two thousand. Of all the Inhabitants, they of Cantium are most courteous and civil, all their Country bordering upon the Sea, and little differing from the fashion of Gall. Most of the In-land People sow no Corn, but live upon Milk and Flesh, cloathed with Skins, and having their Faces painted with a blew colour, that they may feem more terrible in fight: They have the hair of their Headslong, and all the parts of their Body shaven except their upper Lip. Their Wives are common to ten or twelve, especially Brethren with Brethren, and Parents with Children; but the Children that are born, are put to them unto whom the Mother was first given in Marriage.

Roman Affairs

69. The British Cavalry and Chariots gave a sharp opposition to the Roman Horse in their march; but, Cafar tells you, so as the Romans got the better every way, driving them with great flaughter to the Woods and Hills, and being too venterous in the Pursuit, they lost certain of their own Men. After some intermission of time, when the Romans little thought of them, and were bussed in fortifying their Camp, the Britains, from out of the Woods, suddenly charged upon such askept Watchbefore it. Casar sent out two of the chiefest Cohorts of two Legions to affist their sellows. However he confesseth, that Q. Laberius Durus, a Tribune, was slain; and the Britains were repelled with more Cohorts which he fent to relieve the fotmer; and he adds, that the Soldiers upon the Watch first set upon, and terrified with a cefar encoun. Strange kind of Fight, while the Cohorts sent to their relief fought with a Lane or ters with the Alley betwixt them, brake through, and came to their fellows. He owns farther, that the Fight happening in the view of all the Camp, it was plainly perceived, that the Legionary Soldiers, neither able for the weight of their Armour to purfue the Enemy, nor yet daring to go far from their feveral Enfigns, was not a fit Adversary to contest this fort of Enemy; and that the Horse likewise fought with no less peril in as much as the Enemy would retire back of purpose, and when they had drawn them a little from the Legions, they would then light from their Chariots, and incounter them with that advantage which is betwixt a Foot-man and an Horseman. Befides, they never fought thick and close together, but thin, and at great diflances, having flations of Men to fuccour one another, to receive the weary, and to fend out fresh Supplies.

70. The next day they made a stand upon the Hills afar off, and shewed themselves not so often, neither were they so busie with the Roman Horse as the day before. But about noon Cafar fent out three Legions, and all his Horse to forage, and they made a fudden affault upon the Foragers, and fell in close with the Enfigns and the Legions. The Romans charged to fiercely, that they beat them back, and the Horse incouraged by having the Legions behind them, put them to flight, and did great execution, giving them no respite to make Head, or forsake their Chariots. After this overthrow all their Anxiliaries forfook them; neither did they afterward contend with the Romans, with any great power. But Cafar knowing their delign, led his Army to the River Thameses, and the Confines of Cassivelaun, which River was paffable by foot but in one place, and that very hardly. At his arrival he found a great power imbatteled on the other fide, and the Bank fortified with many sharp Sect. 6. Stakes, and many other were also stuck under the water. These things being discovered by the Captives and Fugitives, Cafar put his Horse before, and caused the Legions to follow presently after; and notwithstanding they had but their heads above water, the Soldiers proceeded with that violence, that the Enemy was not able to sustain the Charge, but left the Bank, and betook themselves to slight. Cassevellann having no courage to contend any further, dismissd most of his Forces, and retaining only four thousand Chariots, observed the motions of the Romans, keeping the Woods whither he had driven the People and Cattel out of the Fields; and as their Horse made any Sallies for Forage or Booty, he sent his Chariots out upon them, and put them to great peril, in so much that the Horse durst never venture further than the Legions; neither was there any more spoil made in the Country, than what the Legionary Soldiers made themselves.

71. In the mean time the Trinobantes, being almost the greatest State in the Country, sent to Casar their Ambassadors, to offer submission, and that Mandubratius might be sent to reign amongst them, and be protected from Cassivellaun; for, his Father Imanuentiss holding that Kingdom, had been flain by Caffievllaun, and he had fled to Cefar into Gall. Cefar requiring forty Hostages from them, and Corn for his Army, sent Mandubratius to them. After this the Cenimagni seeing how the Trinobantes were delivered from all violence, as also the Seguntiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Cassi, yielded themselves. From them he understood that the Town of Cassivellaur was not far off; that it was fortified with Woods and Boggs, and well stored with Men and Cattle. Now the Britains call, faith he, a Town, some thick Wood inclosed about with a Ditch and Rampire, made for a place of Retreat, when they stand in fear of incursions from the Borderers. Cefar marched and found it well fortified both by Art and Nature. He affaulted it at two several places, and the Enemy unable to keep it, withdrew himself by a back way, and so he took it; therein he found great store of Cattle, and slew many of the Britans.

73. In the mean time Cassivellaun sent into Kent, wherein were four several Kings. Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax; them he commanded, with all the power they could make, to fet upon the Camp wherethe Roman Navy was drawn up. The Kings obeyedhis Order, but by a Sally made out upon them, were overthrown, many of their Men flain, and Lugotorix a great Commander taken Priloner. The ill fuccess of this Attempt concurring with the former losses, and especially the revolt of the fore-named States, moved Caffivellaun to defire peace. Cafar was refolyed to winter in the Continent for fear of Commotions in Gall; and confidered that the Summer was far spent, and might easily be lingred out. He therefore appointed what Hostages he would have, and what yearly Tribute the Britains should pay to the Romans; and gave a strict charge to Caffivellaun to do no injury to Mandubratius, or the Trinobantes. Having received the Hostages, he found his Ships repaired, and at twice transported his Army over into Gall, which he was constrained to do, because of the number of his Prisoners, and that some Vessels were cast away. 73. This is the account which Cafar himfelf gives us of his two Expeditions into this Island, of the behaviour of the Britains, and the success. We have no relation of the Britains themselves to compare with it, who probably would have told us several passages; which either he did not observe, or wittingly omitted. As to the main of the Affair, other Writers have agreed, that he rather affrighted the Inhabitants, than performed any great matter. Tacitus faith, he rather thewed than delivered Britain to the Romans. Eutropius writes, That in his first Expedition he was wearied with bitter fight, and seized with an adverse Tempest; but Lucan (indeed no great friend to the Family of the Cefar) fings how he ran away in a fright from the Britann, whom he had fought out. To freak indifferently, his Narration of Territa questions. this British War is something odd and different from other parts of his History, in the offending the boldness of Style, and vigour of Spirit, wherein he excelled. In relating the turga Britannia The fuccess of Skirmishes that hapned in the march of the Romans, he makes rather excuses why Cofar queffio his Men did no better, than any thing elfe. He acknowledgeth, that the Legionary Soldiers, by reason of their heavy Armour, and because they durst not go from their feveral Enfigns, were not a fit Adversary to contest this kind of Enemy. And yet he also acknowledges, that his Horse fought with no less danger, by reason of the advantage the Britains received from the nimble management of their Chariots, and their manner of fighting and fuccouring one another. He confesseth that his Horse was put to great peril, and for that Caffivellaun fent his Chariots by unknown ways, and surprized them, they durst never adventure farther than the Legions, neither was

Sect. 6. there any more spoil made in the Country than what the Legionary Soldiers made

74. It's to be feared, that had not the Revolt of the Trinobantes, and other States happened, Cafar would have been put more to his invention to excuse his want of success, and by reason of the temptation accompanying such as write Commentaries of their own Acts, to make fairer glosses and flourishes than possibly the severity of truth might require. However, wanting direct matter to oppose him, we shall not undertake the buliness. Suetonius tells us the report went, that he came over into Britain to feek for Pearls, to which the relation made by Pliny doth bear some testimony, who writes, that being returned victorious out of the Island, he dedicated cambiden is a Breast-plate made of British Pearls to Venus Genetrix in her Temple. The place Brit. where he landed is believed to have been Deal, where the Coast is flat, and easie of access, and some risings of ground are to be seen, which the Inhabitants call Romesworke. He passed the River near Otelands in Surrey, at a place called Coway Stakes, from the Stakes which Beda in his time faid were still to be seen, as big as a Mans Thigh, and covered with Lead, sticking in the bottom of the River. The Town of Cassivellium is thought to have been Verulam, in the Hundred of Caishow, afterward a famous Municipium of the Romans. To conclude this matter concerning Cafars Expeditions into Britain, I know no Historical Relations Authentick, before those that he hath made; neither do I think, that we have any thing certain concerning British Affairs before his time, except what I have faid concerning the Cassiterides, and that Divitiacus King of the Suessiones had Dominion here. As for them that will have a Brute, let them have a Brute if they will; but give leave to them that will have no Brute, to have no Brute; as he faid concerning the May-pole. Now Lefar again in let us follow Cafar into Gall.

75. Having held a Councel of the Galls at Samarobrina, he found that by reason of the scarcity of Corn which had followed a drought, there was more necessity of dispersing his Army into their Winter Quarters, than there had been the years before. To several Officers he gave several Legions to be placed in several Countries, yet all within an hundred Miles, except that where L. Roseins select, in a quiet and peaceable part. This was, as the present Copies have it, amongst the Fishi. But our Geographer Monetus tells us, that in Safar Commentaries several sorged People are put for true and genuine, by unskilful Transferibers or Interpreters; and he instanceth in this place, where he saith, That instead of Essi is to be read Sossii, the word being corrupted first, by transfposing the two former Letters, and one put out of the middle. He tells us, That the Salevic Diablines; or Diabline, being one, were divided into two private People, viz. the Selswii, (now those of the Territory of Seer in Normands) who possissed the upper and Northern Parts, whose Metropolis was Noviodunum, now Seer; and the Arovii, inhabiting the lower and Southern, (now the People of the Territory of Alansion') whose chief Seat was Vagorium or Alangen. Now he gives a reason why Cesar calls this Tract of theirs quiet and peaceable. Because in the bordering Nation of the Cambiti reigned Tasseins, a great lover of Cassar, who contained the neighbouring Nations in the bounds of peace.

76. Casar indeed continues his Narration by telling us, that there was now among the Carnutes a Man of great Birth called Tagerius, whose Ancestors had born the chief Rule in their State. That this Man for his fingular valour and good will towardshim, (for he had done him very good fervice in all his Wars) he reftored to the Dignity of his Fore-fathers. But before he had reigned three years, his Enemies, by a conspiracy of divers of his Citizens, killed him in the open Streets; which thing was complained of to Cafar, He fearing, that in regard fo many Menhad an hand in the Murther, the City, at their instigation, might revolt, commanded L. Planeus immediately to march thither with his Legion from his Quarter in Belgium, and there to winter 5 with Orders to apprehend fach as were Ringleaders in the death of Tafgetius, and fend them to him. Bur fifteen days had fearcely passed after the Legions were fetted in their wintering Camps, but a Commotion happened; and Sabinos and Cotta, who wintered amongst the Eburones, were attaqued by Ambiorise and Catinulcus, who commanded that People, at the instigation of Inductionarus of Triers, who owed Casar an ill turn, and now thought it a fit time to pay him. The Romans so well desended themselves, that they could not compass their ends, which when Ambiorix perceived, he betook himself to a fraudulent practice. Having desired that fome might be fent to treat with him, he pretended he was conffrained to do what he did by the People, the Galls having univerfally agreed to fall upon the Romans in their difperfed Quarters that day; he pretended great love and gratitude to Cefar for great benefits received from him, and in way of return advited, that foraf. Sect. 6. much as there was a great number of Germans coming, they would remove from that Gamp, and joys themfelves either to & Gereo to Labienus, of whom the one was not past fifty miles off, and the other but a little farther. And he affirmed by

Oath, that they should have safe passage through his Territories.

77. A Council of War met to consult what to do, where by the vehemence of Titurius Sabinus it was carried that they should discamp: and all shings were disposed in such fort, as to make the Soldiers believe they could not say without danger, and that the danger might be augmented by being wearied with watching. As soon as it was light they began their march, in length, and with as much Baggage as they were able to carry; and some two miles off were way-laid by the Galler, who in the Woods had placed two Ambuscados. Titurius now ran about like a distracted man, and so fearfully and after such a manner did he dispose his Cohorts, as if all things had gone against them, as it happeneth for the most part what would happen, and was against the Journey, did all things required, both from a General and a private Soldier, and it was proclaimed that the Romans should forsake their Baggage, and cast themselves into an Orb. This was not to be reproved; but the Enemy then conceived hope, out of apprehension that they were discouraged and possesses and cast themselves into an Orb. This was not to be reproved; but the Enemy then conceived hope, out of apprehension that they were discouraged and possesses the proceived hope, out of apprehension that they were supposed to the surface of the surface good execution, yet the Galler by advice of Ambiorix gave way to them, pursued them in their retreat, and then by their missills Weapons sorely distressed them as they stood in their Orb. Many being killed, and some exceellent Soldiers wounded, Titurius the cause of all the mischief went over to Ambiorix his Friend, and intreated him to spare him and his Soldiers, and he gave him good words till he was incircled about and slain. The Galler then crying out vistory with a great noise, assaulted the Romans and routed their Troops. Cotta was slain, and most part of the Soldiers with him. The rest returned to their Camp, amongst whom L. Petrofidius, the Eagle-bearer, when he saw himself overcharged, cast his Eagle within the Rampire, and sighting with great courage within the Camp was killed. The rest with much ado indured the fight till Night, and then despairing of succours killed themselves. Some sew escaped; and by unknown ways through the Woods got to Labiense, and acquainted him how all things had fallen out:

78. Ambiorix puffed up with this fuccess, using all speed imaginable, got to the Aduatici his Neighbours, and from the late success easily perswaded them, the Nevaii and others, to purfue their good fortune, and to attacque the Camp where Cicero wintered. Many Soldiers fent out upon Forraging, they cut off, and violently attacqued the Camp, which the Romans as valiantly defended, and that for feveral days together, fill making preparations by Night for the defence of the following Day. In one Night were built one hundred and twenty Towers. No rest was given to sick or wounded. Stakes hardned with fire were prepared, many mural Piles made, the Towers floored, and Pinacles and other devices framed. Cicero himself though ever sickly and of a weak Constitution, rested not by night till the Soldiers of their own accord by way of intreaty compelled him to spare himself. The Nervii seeing things not to succeed, indeavoured by fair words and the like Arguments to deceive Cicero as Ambiorix did Sabinus, but in vain. And when this would not do, they drew a Ditch and a Rampire round about the Camp, according as they had learnt by conversation with the Romans and from Fugitives. They had no Iron Tools for this purpose, but cut the Turf with their Swords, gathered Earth with their Hands, and carried it away in their Mantles yet was the Rampire eleven foot high, and the Ditch fifteen foot deep, and the Fortification of fifteen Miles in circuit, finished in less than three hours, whereby may be gathered what multitudes of People there were at the feige. And they provided Towers, Hooks and strong Penthouses for fafeguard, as the Cap-ged in his Camp.

79. The seventh day of the siege they cast hot balls of Clay out of Slings, and burning Darts upon the Cabbins of the Romans, which being thatched with Straw, after the manner of the Galles, took fire, and the day being windy, it was carried over all the Camp. Then did they with all their force with scaling Ladders, and such Engines as they had, attacque them, but by the great valour of the Roman Soldiers who attended their Fortiscation, and never looked back at the burning of their Wealth, they were repulsed, and a Tower they had made was burned. The Centurions of the third Cohort drew back their men from the place.

Sect. 6. and bid the Enemy enter if they thought good; but none durft adventure to make a trial. Here was remarkable the valour of two Centurions Pulfio and Varenue. who were at perpetual contention amongst themselves who should be first openerred, coming on apace to the Dignity of the first Orders. Pulfio issued out upon the Enemy, and drew the other after him, and they were both difficultly ingaged; and each faved the others life, and came off upon fuch equal terms, that it could normer auterned who had got the greatest honour.

80. But the seige daily growing hottes, and many Messengers having, been seit with Letters to Cafar, but intercepted, and some of them tortured to death before the Camp, at length one of them being a Gall, of the Nation of the Nervii, by his Habit and Demeanour escaped their observation, and reached Casar with the Letters. He sent for several Legions that lay nearest in Quarters; but Labienus being in a manner allready beseiged by the Treuiri; he could get but exists however with them he marched, using all celerity, and hired a Gall to convey a Letter to Cicero of his coming, which he did by tying it, according to his directions, and throwing it into the Camp. It happed to flick on a Turret, and there stuck for two days, but at length discovered and read, being in Greek Characters, it brought no small joy to the beseigedgivenich was confirmed in them shortly by the fight of the fires. The Encaryampon discovery hereof raised the seige and went toward Cafar, of which Green fearthim motice by his former Mellenget s. He perceiving himself much overmenthed in numbers (he having but seven, and the Galla forthe fixty thousand men) fortified his Camp, and by counterseiting fear, drew Relieved by the Enemy over a Valley before his Canny, not a place very difadvantageous for them. They were confident us Victory; and made some brisk attempts, but he fallied out upon them from all Ports at once, eafily put them to flight with great flaughter, and not thinking fir to putthe them into the Woods, went to the Camp of Gieero, whom he incouraged, together with his valiant Legion, and comforted them in the revenge of the loss lately fulfained through the temerity of Sabinus the Legate. The report of Cafars victory put a stop to several Designs of the Galles, of attacquing other Wintring Camps of the Romans; but upon the noise of the overthrow of Sabinus, great Combinations had been made, and Refolutions taken for profecuting that Advantage, and now they were still promoted by Inducionarus, who bestirred himself all manner of ways against the Raman Interest. He caused a Council of Arms to be called, which according to the manner of the Galles was allways the beginning of a War, being such as constrained all men of years, by the Common Law of the Land to affemble together prepared; and he that came last was in the fight of all the rest put to death' with exquisite torture. His first attempt he told them should be to take the Camp of Labiende in the Marches of the Treviri, amongst the men of Rheimes. And accordingly he beleiged him, who counterfeited fear the more easily to draw him one but when he and his men infulted, he caused to iffue out the Horse which he got in readiness, which with some Cohorts easily put the Braggadocio's to flight, and kil-Industriant led Indusionarus as they had it given in effectal charge, before any other execution performed. His Head was brought into the Camp from the Foard of a Ri-

> 81. But for all this he found reason to fear greater commotions, and there cofor de Bullo fore to let the Galles see what the Romans could do, he raised new Forces, Gallico lib. 6. and procured Pompey the Proconful, forafmuch as he continued at the City, about publick bufinefles, to recall to their Enfigits and fend to him fuch Soldiers as he had raifed in Gall within the Alps when he was Conful. By this means, before Winter was ended, three Legions were inrolled, and brought unto him, whereby that number of Cohorts was doubled which was left with Titurius. Though Induciomarus was dead, the Treviri gave the Government to his Kindred, and drew Ambiorix into their fociety. The Nervii, Aduatici, Menapii and all the Germans beyond the Rhine were in Arms; the Oenomer being funmoned came not, but were in Council with the Carnutes and other neighbouring States. Cefar therefore thought it best to begin betimes and surprize them; and so he did the Nervii, whom fodainly invading he wasted their Country, took a great number of men and Cattel, and caused the People to come in and give Pledges; which business having speever wherein he was furprized 5 which being known, the Eburones and Nervii departed home, and afterward Cæfar had Gall better fetled and quiet.

dily ended, he brought back the four Legions into their wintering Camps.

82. In the beginning of Spring he called a General Affembly of all the States in Gall; from which the Senones, Carnutes and Treviri only absenting themselves, he took it for a Defection. That he might feem to fet all other things apart, he Sect. 6: transferred the Council to Lutetia, a Town of the Parifit, who were Confines to the Senones, and in the memory of their Fathers had united their State unto them. but were held cleer of this Confederacy. The fame day he marched, and by great journies came into the Territories of the Senones, who furprized with his fodain Arrival, fued for pardon, and obtained it by mediation of the Ædui: and the Carnutes obtained the like favour by means of the Remi, upon giving Hostages as the other had done. Now did Cafar bend his indeavours to reduce the Treviri and Ambiorix. He understood that he had friendship with the Menapii (People of Geldres and Cleve) who being inclosed with Bogs and Woods, had never sent to Cofar about any contract of Peace. Them he invaded, and by wasting the Country brought them to submit; and he accepted of their submission, on condition that they would not receive him into their Country, or any Messengers from him,

Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

83. In the mean time the Treviri were got together to attacque Labienus, who was come into their Confines, and they expected the arrival of some Germans to their affistance. Betwixt them and Labienus there was a River, and he being posted on an advantagious ground, did all he could to draw the Enemy over to fight before the Germans should come to them. And by counterfeiting fear, and prefeateth the Tie tending to fly and forfake his Camp, he drew them over; and then turning head defeated them, and took in their whole State. For the Germans hearing of their overthrow returned home, and with them went the Kinsmen of Induciomarus, the Author of the Defection, who being gone, the Government was given to Cingeto-rix, and he from the beginning had been true and faithful to the Romans. Cefair being come from the Menapii to the Treviri, passed over by Bridge again into Germany to chastize such as had sent succours and supplies to them, and that Anibiorix might have no entertainment against them. He found by the information of the Ubii, that the Suevi had been the Offenders, and they upon his coming had retired to their utmost Confines, where was a Wood of an infinite greatness, called Bacenis, which served for a Rampire and defence to keep the Cherusci from the incursions of the Suevi, and the Suevi from the injuries of the Cherusci. At the entrance of this Wood they expected the coming of Castar, who here makes a ftop without entring, and instead of an attack, gives us a more profitable account concerning the Customs and manner of Life both of Galls and Germans.

84. As for Gall, not only in every City, Village and Precinct there were Factions and Parties; but almost in every particular House. Before Casar came into Gall, the two great Parties were of the Edui and Sequani, of whom the later got the better, till he by his Power and Interest repaired the Authority of the other; and also brought the Remi into repute; so that at this time in Power and Authority the Ædui excelled all other States, and next unto them were the Remi. Throughout all, there were but two forts of men of any Reckoning or Account, For the Common-people were in the condition of Servants, and of no value in themselves, nor admitted to the publick Councils, but kept under by Debts, Tributes, or oppression of the great ones, and putting themselves into the service of the Nobles, who had the same power over them as Lords injoyed over their Slaves. The two forts were one of the Druides and another of those Casar calleth Equites. The Druides managed matters of their Religion which they expounded, and gave order for the publick and private Sacrifices. To them being held in great veneration, the Youth reforted for Learning, and they determined almost all Causes betwixt publick and private Persons. Controversies both Criminal and Civil they decided, rewarded the virtuous and punished the wicked. If any, either private man or State, did not obey their Decree, they interdicted him their Sacrifice; and this was the greatest punishment amongst them. For such as were thus interdicted. were reckoned in the number of impious and wicked men; every man left their Company, and avoided to meet or speak with them, lest they should receive any hurt by their Contagion: neither had they any benefit of the Law, though desiring it, neither was any Respect or Honour communicated to them.

85. Over all the Druides one prefided with chief Authority, who was fucceeded by him that next excelled, and if equals pretended, they went to election, which fometimes was attended with force and Arms. They met at a certain time of the year in the Confines of the Carnutes, being the middle part of Gall, where they fate in a fecret place, and determined Controversies from all quarters. The Art Their Learning and Learning of the Druides was first found out in Brainin and was thought thence in the state of the s original here to have been translated into Gall; and in Cafars time such as would attain to the * Ggggg 3

Sect. 6. perfect knowledge of that Discipline travelled hither to learn it. The Druides were exempt from Warfare, Tribute and all other Duties incumbent upon other men, which allured many to the Profession. They were said to learn many verses, and fome to have applied themselves to that learning twenty years. To commit any thing to writing it was unlawful; in other publick and private bufinefles they made use of Greek Letters, but they seemed to do it, that their knowledge might not become common and vulgar, and that their Scholars might not truft so much to writings as to their memory, it happening for the most part, that men relying upon Books and Papers, in the mean time omit the benefit of good remembrance. Their indeavour was chiefly to teach that the fouls of men do not dye, but remove out of one Body into another, which they thought very important to stir men up to virtue, and to neglect the sear of death. They also disputed and delivered many Traditions to the Youth concerning the Stars and their motions, the magnitude of the Earth and the World, the nature of things, and the might and power of the Gods.

What they

86. The other fort of men amongst them were Equites, who upon all occasi-The Equites. ons, as before Cafar his coming there never wanted, were conversant in War, each according to his Power and Wealth being attended with Clients and Followers. which they esteemed the only note of Nobility and Greatness. The whole Nation was much addicted to that they accounted Religion. If fick, or ingaged in War, they would either facrifize men, or vow the oblation of themselves. Using herein the ministery of the Druides, they conceived that the Immortal Deity could not be pleafed but by giving the life of one man for another, and to that purpose they had publick Sacrifices appointed. They burned men in Images made of Oliers. The Religion but wanting them they spared not the Innocent. They chiefly worshipped Mercury as the Inventor of all Arts, the Conductor in all Voyages, and having great power in all Merchandize and gain of Money. Next to him they preferred Apollo, Mars, Jupiter and Minerva, having the same opinion of them as other Nations. They vowed to Mars the spoil of an Enemy they were to incounter, and such Beafts as they took they facrificed; other things they laid up in some facred place, heavy punishment being inflicted upon any that either kept back, or took them

87. Being made believe by the Druider that they were descended from the God Disthey boafted themselves in their descent. For that reason they determined the spaces of time by the number of Nights, not of Dayes, observing their Nativities and the beginnings of their Monthsand years, so as the Day followed the Night. Contrary to the custom of other Nations they suffered not their Children to come publickly unto them till fit for War. To the Portions of their Wives they added as much of their own; and the use of all the mony was laid apart, and together with the principal Coin to the Surviver. They had power of life and death both over Wives and Children. The death of great men was wont to be inquired into by the Kindred, and a suspected wife was examined by torture; if guilty, put to death by fire and all other torments to be imagined. Their Funerals, as their Life, were magnificent and fumptuous, and with the Corps was burned whatfoever the man delighted in, not fparing living Creatures: Nay, not long before the time that Cafar wrote, the custom was to bury such Clients and Servants with him as he had favoured in his Life-time. Such Nations as were careful, prohibited by a special Law, the communicating of Rumors or Reports concerning matters of State, to any but a Magistrate; it being found that rash and unskilful men had been put upon dangerous attempts by fuch reports. The Magistrates kept fecret what they thought fit, and what not they published; but it was not lawful, except in State Aflemblies, to speak of State Affairs.

The Cufloms

88. The Germans, Cafar adds, did much differ from the Galles in their course of Life, for they had neither Druides nor Sacrifices. Nor Gods did they worship but fuch as they could fee, and by whom they were manifestly benefitted, as the Sun, Vulcan, and the Moon. In hunting, or in War they spent their lives, being from their Childhood inured to labour. They liked of fuch as continued longest beardless amongst them, some thinking it to conduce to their Stature, others to their Strength and Sinews. Before twenty years of age they held it abominable to know a Woman; and fuch matters could not be hid; for they bathed themfelves together in Rivers, and used Skins and other small coverings on their Reins, but were naked on the rest of the body. They used no Tillage, the greatest part of their Food being Milk, or Cheefe, or Flesh. Their Magistrates and Princes every year alotted certain portions of Lands to Kindreds and Tribes that inhabited together, where and as they thought convenient; and the next year appointed them in a new place; and this they thought they did for feveral good reasons. In case of War a State made choice of Magistrates to have the command with power of Life and Death; but in time of peace they had no common Magistrate, but the Principal Persons of the Regions and Pagi interpreted the Law, and determined Con-

89. Theft committed out of the Confines was commended as an exercise of the Youth. Such as would not follow their Great men in an exploit publickly declared, were held in the number of Traitors, and had never any credit afterward. Strangers they religiously protected from all injuries, to such every mans House being open and his Table common. The time was when the Galls excelled the Germans in valour, and made War upon them, and by reason of themultitude of People, and want of Ground, sent many Colonies over the Rhine into Germany. By that means those fertile places of Germany lying near the Wood Hercynia (known by the name of Orcinia to Eratosthenes and other Greeks) were posfessel by the Volce Tettologes, who in Casars time still there inhabited and retained their antient opinion of Justice and Military Glory. The Germans still continued in the same poverty and patience as in former times, using the same Diet and Apparel; but the Galls having knowledge of other neighbouring Nations, lived in a more plentiful manner, and had by little and little been overthrown and weakned, so that at this time they stood not in comparison with the Germans. The Hercynian Wood was nine days journey over; for they had no difference, he faith. of space, but by days and journeys, as at this day in those Countries they reckon not how far it is to fuch a place by Miles or Leagues, but fay it is fo many hours to fuch a Town or City. It began at the Confines of the Helvetii, Nemetes and Ranraci, and ran along the Danube as far as the Daci, whence it declined to the left fide, and by reason of its large extention, bordered on many other Countries. No German could fay that he himself had gone, or heard that any other had reached to its beginning, though therein he had travelled threescore days. In this Wood, he faith, were many forts of wild Beafts not to be feen in any other place. He instanceth in one like a Hart, and the Beasts called Uri somewhat lesier than an Elephant. But most remarkable was that other fort called Alces and remarkable indeed, not for being like a Goat, somewhat bigger and without Horns, but having their Legs without Joynts, fo that when they took their rest, they neither sate nor lay upon the ground, but leaned against Trees; and if they chanced to fall could not rise again. The Hunters therefore, to catch them, were wont either to undermine or fo far cut the Trees, that with their weight, leaning upon them, they might bear them down and fall with them. And who would not but give mony now to fee this rare fort of Beaft? 90. But Casar thought fit to return, and no further pursue the Suevi; but to leave some terror behind him, he cut down part of the Bridge next to the Ubii, the length of two hundred foot, and in the end of that which remained built a Tower of four stories, and left a Garison of twelve Cohorts with young C. Volcatius Tullus to defend it. He himself, as the Corn ripened, went forward to the war of Ambiorix, by way of the Wood of Arduenna, the greatest in Gall, extending from the Banks of the Rhine, and the Confines of the Treviri, to the Seat of the Nervii, and carrying a breadth of five hundred miles. He fent before him L. Mi-Ambierix denutius Basslius with all the Cavalry, who surprized Ambiorix, and took all his Horfes and Chariots; but he himfelf escaped on Horseback, being affisted in his flight by the Woods, that were about his House; for the Galles to avoid heat did commonly build near to Woods and Rivers. The People had by Ambiorix his advice betaken themselves into Woods, Bogs, Islands and other places of Refuge. Cativuleus King of one part of the Eburones being drawn in by him, curfed him for it doing, and not able by reason of his age to undergo the trouble of War or Fight, drank the juice of Yew (whereof was great store in Gall and Germany) and poyfoned himfelf.

91. The Eburones being fo dispersed that Casar could do no good upon them, he gave notice to the Neighbouring Nations, that all men should have liberty to fack and make a spoil of their Country, for he durst not suffer the Legionary Soldiers to stragle from their Ensigns. Upon the noise of this, the Sicambri dwelling in Germany next to the Rhine, fent over a Party of two thousand Horse, which Sect. 6. got great booty, being bred and born in Theft and War. But being by one of the Captains informed, that in a place called Vatuco the Romans had left all their Baggage, they took him for their Guide, and went also thither. For there Casar had placed it, having divided his Army into three Parties, and fent them to fuch Quarters as he thought convenient, he himself going to the River Scaldis (now the Scelde) to hunt out Ambiorix, but with purpose to return after seven days, There he had left Q. Cicero with the fourteenth Legion newly raised, and two hundred Horse for a guard. Of these, five Cohorts went out to gather Forage with three hundred old Soldiers that had been left, because infirm. The Sicambri having first attempted to break into the Camp, set upon these Romans as they returned. And they cut off most of them that belonged to the Cohorts, being raw and unexperienced; but the old Soldiers fo discreetly ordered their matters, that they brake through their Enemies and got to the Camp. The Sicambri now out of hope to take the Camp, returned with their Booty over the Rhine, and Cafar also returned feafonably; for the Soldiers were in fuch fear, that they would not believe but that the Legions were cut off. The Country being most grievously depopulated he brought his Army back to Daro cortum in the State of the Remi, where an Assembly was called to question the conspiracy of the Senones and Carnutes. By order taken therein, Acco the great Ringleader was put to death, as others had been, had they not escaped. This done, Casar dispersed his Troops into their Wintering Camps, and having made provision of Corn went into Italy, to hold the Assemblies

to Rome it felf. There we shall find him deeply concerned while he was fighting bello civil-like with the Galls; for, his Daughter Julia, the Wife of Pompey, while he was thus imployed, died in Childbed, and the Infant with her. Hereby was the Bond of Friendship betwixt them dissolved, and their mutual emulation and envy which thereby had been restrained, now wanted but an occasion to vent it self. The following year produced great stirs in the City, and those no less in Gall. For now were the times fo altered, that Rome could not be found in Rome. Nothing was managed by antient equity and moderation, all Offices were purchased by Money, or elfe by Stones, Clubs, or Swords; and the inconveniences of popular Government now grew ripe, the name of a Free-State, or Commonwealth, covering the greatest injustice, disorder, and oppression of the Peoples liberty. The Confuls being debarred by the power of the Tricipitina from leading out Armies, or waging Wars according to the antient right and cultom, made up their Markets out of the publick Revenue, or their Offices by indirect practices, and therefore none of honour would feek after the Confulship. Pompey connived at this, hoping that a necessity of affairs would draw upon him the Distatorship, as some of his Creatures, though not in his name, did not stick to him. This year especially was there such an horrid contention amongst the Canditates (all or most men of large Consciences) that for a long time no Consul could be elected; and this height-ned the matter, that T. Annius Milo, one of them, being at great enmity with Clodius, killed him as he met him in the way not far from the City. This fact

94. In like manner Vercingetories, of the Nation of the Ariensi, being the Son of the Galler a Celtillus, and named King by his People, though, they had flain his Faither for aptempting to fet up a Kingdom, perswaded them to revolt, and shough opposed and cast out of the Town of Gergovia by his Uncle Gobantio, and these of the compare Party, got together a great Force, and expelled his Adversaries by whom he had been cast out. The Senones, the Paristi, Pittones, Cadurci, the Turones, Aulerra, Lunt vices, Ander, and all the rest that bordered upon the Ocean quickly joyned in confes deracy with him. He took Hoftages of them, rated every City and made provide on of Horse especially. To extraordinary diligence he added extraordinary byerity. and the Bituriges fided with him, their Patrons the Hidus having in vain attendent to protect them from him. Belides this, Lusterius, one of the Cadurci, united the Rutheni to the Aruerni, and farther proceeding, received Hollages from the Nition briges, and the Gabali, and laboured to break into the Roman Province, and brocked

95. Cefar having heard those things in Italy, as foon as he synder thought thin theseer, state, in Rome by the means of Pompey, riade what hat he could, and understanding in his Passage of Lastering his Dosigo, went simplest to Narba, and prevented him. He marched to the Italia, and thehee over the Hill Gebenna, though the Snow was five foot deep, into the Confines of the Arverni, who therewith exceedingly furprized, betook themselves for fuccour to Vertical torix. Knowing, what Vertingstorix would do, with wonderful celerity, he passed to the control of the contr the Lingones, and got the Legions together before the Asverni could have any notice of it. This being known, Vercingetorix laid fiege to Gergovia, a Town held be the Boii, whom Cafar had left there after the Helvetian War, and given the Jurisdiction of the Place to the AEdui. Cafar was now in perplexity, whether his foundations to affift the Friends of Rome, or by drawing out his Army from its Winter of the ters fooner than ordinary, expose it to hardships and danger for want of the ordinal

But resolving to adventure all hazards, rather than defert his Allies in their heceffity, he fent Orders to the Adm to make supply of all neversaries as far as possible. and by a Message incouraged the Boil with news of his coming. In his Pallage he took by furrender Vellaunodunum, a Town of the Senones. Genabum, now Orleans, was a City of the Carnutes upon Ligeris, over which lying a Bridge, the Townsmen were about to pass over it, and escape by night; but he being aware of it, had appointed two Legions to watch, who burnt the Gate, took the Place with most of the People, fet it on fire, and facked it; which done, he passed over into the Territories of the Bituriges. There he resolved to become Master of Noviodunum; (110w Vierson), and when he was about it, Vereingetorix his Forces shewed themselves, who having heard of his March, left the Siege of Gergovia, and went to meet him. But he sent out first his own Horse to charge them, and then four hundred Germans, who put the Galles to flight, and many of them being flain, the reft retired to the Army. Hereupon the Towns-men yielded, having delivered those that stirred up the People

97. Vercingetories, upon to many loffes received, with much adoe perswaded the Galler to lay wast their Countrey, to cut off all forrage from the Romanis, and to prevent their taking refuge in any Towns, to burn them all; and none escaped but Avaricum, (now Bourges) at that time the fairest City in Gall, incircled with a River Seft. 6. and a Bog, which the Bituriges, proftrating themselves at the feet of all the Galles, defired and obtained to defend. Cosar, after the taking of Noviodunum, resolved to attempt this Place, and accordingly fat down before it, and made preparations for an Affault in that narrow place, where it wasapprochable. Vercingetorix followed and incamped himself fifteen Miles off to intercept all the Foragers he could. And Casar was really distressed for want of Corn, and the Army subsisted meerly by Cattel fetcht afar off, which made him offer to the Legions to raise the Siege, but they stoutly and generously refused. To remove this distress, he himself left the Siege, and attempted to surprize the Enemy, but by reason that he had placed similes upon a convenient ground, not willing to expose his Men to danger in such disadvantages, he retreated without any thing done, and gave order for re-inforcing the Siege of the Town. And the Galler took as great care to fortifie it, by the addition of ten thoufand Men chosen out of all their Forces. For being perswaded that it was their main bufines to make this Town good against the Romans; they thought it not fit to commit the common fafety of Gall to the Bituriges.

98. And the Garrison all manner of ways possible defended the Place, both by mining the Mounts, erecting Towers, and making Sallies where and when the case required, being incouraged by the goodness of their Wall, which was framed so, both of Wood and Timber, that the Stone kept it from burning, and the Wood from the violence of the Rams. The Romans raised a Mount in the space of five and twenty days of three hundred and thirty foot in breadth, and fourfcore in heighth. This Mount, when it began to touch the Wall, did the Besieged by a Mine set on fire, and great contest there was about it, till the fire was at length quenched by the Romans. The Belieged finding that nothing would do, but the Siege increased every day in vigour, resolved to quit the Town, and get through the Marish to Vereingetorix, but were hindred by the Women, who when they could not prevail with them to flay, cryed out, and fignified their flight to the Romans. Thereupon they defifted from their purpose. But Cafar having perfected his Works, took the advantage when a Rain fell, and the Walls were flenderly manned, to make an Affault, which the Legions carried on with that success, that they took the City, and made fuch flaughter in revenge for what had been done at Genabum, that sparing neither Sex nor Age, of forty thouland, or thereabouts, scarcely eight hundred came safe to Vercingetoria, who received them in the night with great filence, for fear of a Sedition through the commiferation of the People.

99. Vercingetorix comforted the Galles for the loss of Avaricum, by laying the blame upon the Bituriges, by calling them to witness, that the keeping of it was against his opinion, and telling them that he was in a way to unite all Gall together, and now he first perswaded them to be at the pains to fortifie their Camp to prevent an Affault of the Romans. For the accomplishment of his Promife of uniting Gall, he omitted no endeavour, and commanding each State to fend in their Supplies, and gesting together all the Archers, of whom there was great store, he speedily repaired his losses at Avaricum. At this time arose a great controversie amongst the Ædui, about the election of their Annual Magistrate. There were two, of whom each presended to be duly elected, Cotus and Convictolitanis, and the matter must come to a Civil War, if Cafar did not take it up. Fearing the consequence might be otherwife bad, and that one Party might be drawn to fide with the Galles against the Romans, he went and decided the Controversie in behalf of Convictolitanis, as legally chosen, and then marched by the River Elaver against the Arverni, and notwithstanding the watching and great diligence of Vercingetorix, having by a Bridge got over his Army, laid fiege to Gergovia.

100. In the mean time Convictolitanis being corrupted by the Arverni, perfwaded fome young Noble-men to revolt from the Romans, and draw their State from the fociety with them, as Enemies to the liberty of Gall; and by lying stories told how the Romans had cut off their Brethren, the Princes, and some Horse-men, they induced ten thousand Men that were to be sent from the Edui to Cesar, to march for Gergovia, to joyn with the Arverni. Cafar having notice of this from his friends, took along with him four expedite Legions, and met with the ten thousand Men, and shewing to them the Princes, whom they believed to be slain; when they saw Fin Trates the they were abused, they cast down their Arms, and submitted. But their Country-Defign of the men not knowing thereof, and being led by coverouness, or by anger and raffinels, robbed and killed divers Roman Merchants; for it was natural to the Nation to take a light Hear-fay for a certain Truth. count fuch as had robbed the Romans, exposed to sale the Goods of such as had been Sect. 6. Authors of the Revolt, and fent their Ambassadors to Casar to excuse themselves. This they rather did to recover fuch of their Men as were in Cafars Hands, who though he understood well enough, that out of fear of punishment, and to avoid greater inconveniences, they under-hand studied how to raise a War, and solicited other States to a League and Alliance to that purpose, yet gave them good words, cafting the blame upon the common People.

101. While Cafar was absent, the Galles had violently assaulted the Camp before Gergovia, and put the two Legions to great extremity to defend it, till he, having received the News, made all halt imaginable, and arrived before the riling of the Sun. Fearing a greater Revolt of the Galles, and that he should be incompassed by them, he thought to raise his Siege and be gone, but his purpose was diverted by a discovery he made of an opportunity to advance the Service upon the Town. An Affault was made in pursuance of this Discovery, wherein the Romans were too hardy, and the Enemy so vigilant and industrious, that he over-charged them on all hands, to their loss of fix and forty Centurions, after which they beat them off, and they secured cafar receives their flight as well as they could, as well as Cafar can make it, who confesseth, that few less than seven hundred of his Souldiers were wanting. But he tells us that the next day he rebuked his Army, forasmuch as they themselves judged how far they were to go, and what they were to do, neither would they ftop upon founding a Retreat, nor hearken to the Tribunes or Legates that would have kept them back. Yet he attributed the fuccess the Enemy had, not to his valour, but the in-equality of the Ground and Place where they fought. To evidence this, he faith, he drew out the Legions several times, and skirmished successfully where the Ground was indifferent, and then thinking it sufficient to abate the pride of the Galles, and incourage his own Men, he removed his Camp into the Territories of the Edui, the Enemy refuling to make after him. Yet still did the former Revolters amongst the Ædui so bestill themfelves, that for all this that State revolted; which Defection, procured by the means of Litaricus especially, was perfected by two other Noble-men, whom Casar had had with him, viz. Virdumarus and Eporedorix, who defired to be gone, under pretence of putting a fton to it; and Cefar dismissed them, though he perceived their intentions, lest he should seem to be injurious, or give any suspicion of fear. They burnt and wasted the Country, and used other Arts to terrifie the Romans. Casar knowing he wasto use Expedition before all their Forces could unite, marched with incredible celerity, and got his Army over the Lore, (the Foot passing with their Arms and Shoulders above water) and having refreshed it with Corn and Cattle, resolved to march toward the Senones.

102. At this time Labientes, with four Legions, coming to Lutetia, a Town of the Paristans, built in an Island in the River Sequana, (as Casar describes it) and being to pass the River, by making a show to attempt it in several places, deceived and divided the Enemy, and gave them a notable defeat. But, for all this, the Revolt of the Ædni being known; in a Council of all Gall affembled at Bibratte, Vercingetorix was chosen general, and the Ædui disappointed in their expectation of having the chief Command; so that if they had not been already engaged in the War, they would have thought again of Casar. He perceiving the Enemy to be stronger in Horse than himself, and the Passages to be so shut up, that he could not send into the Province nor Italy, procured Horses from such States in Germany as he had quieted the year before, with such light-armed Footmen as were used to fight amongst the Horse, whom he furnished with Horses he took from the Tribune; the Roman Equites, and the Evocuti. Resolving then to protect the Roman Province. Vercingetorix made Head against him, as having a notable opportunity, with his Horse, and perswading his Men that so indeed he had, they required that this Resolution might be strengthened with an holy Oath or Imprecation. Let him never be received under any Roof, nor haveacce's to his Wife, Children or Parents, that did not twice Charge through the Army of the Enemy. The thing being approved, and every one forced to take the Oath. he divided his Cavalry into three parts, whereof two Bodies shewed themselves on either fide, and the third began to oppose Cafars Front. Cafar caused his Horse to be divided also into three Parties, and to charge the Galles, having received the Carriages within the Legions, which he so placed, as to succour the Horse upon occasion. The Germans having possessed themselves of an Hill, forced the Galles to give ground and the advantage was fo profecuted, that all the Horse was routed, and many Prifoners taken of good note. After this Vercingetorix marched towards Alefia, a Town of the Mandubii, and Cafar following him in his Rear, as long as the day would give *Hhhhh

At the foot of the Hill ran two Rivers on each fide of the Town: Before the Town lay a Plain of three Miles in length: The other fides were inclosed with Hills, at a reasonable distance, of equal height with the Town.

103. Casar resolved to inclose the Town with a Ditch, and a Rampire, and the whole circuit contained eleven Miles. At the Camp, fited in a convenient place, were made three and twenty Castles, well manned both day and night. The Work being begun, there happened a Fight betwixt the Horse on both sides. The Romans were over-powered, till Cefar fent the Germans to their Relief, and drew out the Legions for their Refuge, with which animated, they routed the Galles, and driving them back into their Camp, killed many, and took very many Horses. Vercingetorix upon Vercingularia, this, thought best to dismis all the Horse before the Fortifications were perfected by his preparation the Romans, and he sent them away in the night, every Man to repair to his own State, and to fend all to the War that were able to bear Arms, and to procure his fafety who had so well deserved of them; but in case they were negligent, fourscore thousand Men he affirmed should perish with him in that place. He husbanded his Corn. which would ferve, at the former rate, but thirty days, measuring it out sparingly; and the Cattel he delivered to the Soldiers by Poll, whereof there was great store brought from the Mandubii. All the Forces which he had placed before the Town he received within the Walls, and so purposed to attend the Supplies of

104. Cefar understanding this from Fugitives and Prisoners, took a prodigious
The prodigic course to fortissie himself. He drew a Ditch of twenty foot in breadth, and depth, ous Works of as broad at the bottom as the top. At forty foot distance from this he made two Ditches of fifteen foot in breadth and depth, the innermost whereof drawn through the Fields, and the lower ground he filled with Water out of the River. Behind them he made another Ditch, and a Rampire of twelve foot, which he strengthened with a Parapet and Pinacles, and with great boughs of Trees cut like to an Hartf-Horn, which were fet where the Hovels were joyned to the Rampire, to hinder the Enemy from climbing up. He made Towers round about the whole Work in the distance of fourscore foot one from another; and his design of having the distance of forty foot betwixt the Ditch first mentioned, and the other Work, was, that the whole Body of the Romans might not eafily be inclosed with an Army, which he thought to prevent by taking in so great a circuit of ground, and lest the Enemy, in a fudden Sally, should by night attempt to destroy the Works, or by day trouble the Soldiers by miffile Weapons, as they were bufied about the Fortifica-

105. But the Roman Forces being imployed both in fetching Materials for the Works, and fupply of Corn, were much weakned, and the Galles, by fallying out of divers Ports, attempted to destroy the Works. That therefore the Fortifications might be made good with the less number of Men, he still thought fit to add unto them. He made Trenches round about them of five foot deep, wherein he planted either the Bodies of Trees, or great firm Boughs sharpened into many Pikes and Snags, and bound together at the bottom, that they might not be easily plucked up. There were of these five Ranks so combined and infolded one in another, that which way foever the Enemy should enter upon them, he must necessarily run himself upon a sharp Stake. These they called Cippi, before which, in oblique courses, after the manner of a Quincunx were digged holes three foot deep, narrow at the top. These they set with round Stakes, of the bigness of a Mans Thigh, with sharp points hardened with fire, in fuch fort, that they fluck not above four fingers out of the Earth, and, for the better faltening of them, they stuck a foot within the ground; the rest of the Holes, for the better ordering of the matter, were hid with Ofiers, and brushy Wood. Of these were eight Courses, three foot distant one from another, and these they called Lilies, from the resemblance they had to the Figure of that Flower. Before these were Galthrops of a foot long, fastened in the Earth, and headed with barbed Hooks of Iron, bestowed up and down in all places at a reasonable distance; and these they called Stimuli. The inner Fortifications thus finished, he followed the level ground as much as the nature of the place would permit, taking in fourteen Miles in circuit, and made the like Fortifications in all Points against the Enemy without, as he had done against the Town; that if he were driven upon occasion to leave the Works, he might quit the Camp without danger, a

them, as we now find in Cafars Copies. But that the Text is corrupted, Monetus tells us, loudly inveighing against the Transcribers and Correctors of the Copies for bringing in fuch confusion into a few words written by Cefar, and committing such mistakes in the Numbers. For the Names, that of Helenteri is commentations, there Great Errors never having been such a People in Gall, no not in Europe. In stead of Heleuteri he are Names reads Helvin, who were Neighbours to the Velaum and Arverti. He observes, that a many fome People of these that are named are placed far from their own native and proper in the company of the control of the in Colors pre-fem Copies. Seats. As the Ambivariti and Aulerci are here put as Neighbours and Clients of the Hedui, whereas they were far distant each from the other, and those were far from being Clients to, and joyned in fociety with them. For the Ambivariti were the same we now call Brabinters upon the Mens. And the Auteri, as now, were feated at the mouth of the Sequana, or Seine, partly that People called Cenomani, (or Manceaux) and partly Cimbrocelta, or Normans. Therefore for Ambivariti is to be read Ambarri.

which was a Neighbouring People, and Clients to the Edui, now divided into the Charolois and Maconnois.

108. The Boii he affirms ought not to be joyned with the Rauraci, but with the Segusiani and Ambarri, with whom they were Clients of the Ædui, being seated in the Country of Bourbon, as it's now called, near the Segusiani. More absurdly still are the Lemovices, by some ignorant Transcriber or Annotator put amongst the Aremorican States, or those upon the Ocean. For nothing is more errorieous in Geography, than that they, being a Mediterraneous People, and situated Southward near the Pittones, an hundred French Leagues from the Ocean, should be placed in the Shore thereof amongst the Ossaii and Venelli; from whom they are separated by two great Provinces of Poitiers and the Aremorican Britain. Instead of Lemovices, who are to be left in the place formerly affigued them in Cefars Enumeration, Eburovices are rather to be read, the Country of whom lay by the Lexovii, at the mouth of the Seine. Further, whereas Aulerci and Cenomani are divided in this Enumeration. they ought not, but to be joyned together, being one and the fame People. But this Error is too ofien committed in the Text of Cofar, of severing the Cognonina of certain People from the Namesthemselves. For as Cenomani, Diablintes, (or Diablita) and Eburaici, or Eburovices, were the Cognomina of the Aulerci; fo were Cubi and Vibifei of the Bituriges. In like manner the Volce, one People, had feveral Cognomina, being from Narbon to the Rhone called Areconici, and those of Tolouse and toward the South Tettolages; and both by the Romans were called Provinciales. because of the Province of Narbon, proper to the Romans.

109. But yet further he observes, that Nations most distinct in situation and original, are in this Enumeration joyned for contributing Soldiers to this Social War. As the Ambivariti upon the Meufe, and the Segusiani upon the Lorre; the Senones seated at the Seine, and the Santones at the Garonne, the Pictones at the Western Ocean, and the Helvetians at the Rhine, and the Oriental Alpes; the Sueffiones not far distant from the Northern Ocean, and the Nitiobriges not far from the Garonne, and the Mediterranean; the Caletes seated upon the very Shore of the Northern Sea, and the Lemovices toward the South near the Petrocorii. How heat large amends this place, and

Sect. 6. endeavours to reftore it to it felf, is too teadious here to show though from what we have faid already it receiveth light. As to numbers of Soldiers, what is more incredible, he demands, than that upon the Boii and Rauraci should be imposed thirty thousaud Men, as some Copies have it, and upon the Bello-Cassi, Lexovii and Eburones, populous Nations, no more than three thousand; upon the Suessiones, Ambiani, Nervii, Morini, Mediomatrici, Petrocorii, and Nitiobriges, seven powerful People, but five thousand men; and as many upon the Cenomani alone, a People contained in narrow Bounds? Other Instances of the like in-equality might be made.

110. But what soever these Numbers were, the Bellovaci refused to give theirs, declaring that they would not serve under any Man's command, or make War in any other than their own Name. Yet Comius, one of the Atrebates, perswaded them to fend two thousand Men, which Comiss having served Cesar faithfully in Britain, The Generals had been rewarded by him, by freeing his State from all Duties to the Roman Empire, restoring them to their ancient Laws, and by giving to him the Morini. But he would not for all this be wanting to the general confent of Gall, now bent to redeem its liberty and reputation in War. Having already mustered eight thousand Horse, and two hundred and forty thousand soot in the Confines of the Edni, they gave the Command to Comius of Arras, Vindomarus and Eporedorix, both Ædui, and Vergufilaunus of the Arverni, the Cousin-german of Vercingetorix; and as well Officers as Soldiers were full of hope, in confideration of their Numbers both within and without Alesia, whither they marched.

111. In the mean time they that were belieged in the Town, the day being past by which they expected relief, knew not what course to take. Some were for a Surrendry, and others for Sallies to be made upon the Enemy; but above all, the Speech of Critognatus, a Nobleman of the Arverni, was so remarkable for its singular and Propur ijus nesarious cruelty, that Casar thought sit to give an account of it in his Commentaries. singularin, at a The Design of it was to perswade them to hold out as their Fore-sathers did in a War addition. against the Cimbri and Teutones, who being shut up within their Towns, and brought to the like necessity, fatisfied their hunger with the Bodies of such as were unfit for War; neither did they yield themselves to the Enemy. Nay if they had not had fuch an Example, he would have it begun now, and to beleft to Posterity, no War being like to this. For, the Cimbri left the Country, and the Laws and Liberties all The Refoluti- intire, whereas the Romans would bring them to flavery and bondage, as they had on of fuch as, fufficient evidence by the manner wherein they treated already that part of Gall which they had reduced into a Province. Having delivered their feveral Opinions, they resolved, that such as through Age, or other Insirmities, were unsit for War, should depart the Town, and that they should try all means before they yielded to Critognatus his opinion: and yet if the matter fo required, to confent unto it; and to attend their Succours, rather than yield to any furrender or condition of Peace.

their Town, were themselves thrust out with their Wives and Children, and coming to the Roman Trenches, defired with Tears to be received and nourished with Bread, though on condition of flavery, but Cefar rejected them. Now all the Gallick Forces came to the relief of Alelia, and though they appeared so numerous, yet Cesar drew out his Horse, and caused it to ingage the Enemy. Herein he had the better, by means of the Germans; but was attacqued both by them that were newly arrived, and those in the Town, who with Hurdlesindeavoured to fill up the The Galles re- Ditches, and with other Instruments of a Siege to scale the Works, but were forced to retire with loss; for, some fell unwittingly upon the Galthrops, others falling into the Holes, were struck through their Bodies with sharp Stakes, and others died by Mural Piles cast from the Rampire, and the Towers. Being repelled twice with great loss, they fell into consideration what course they were best to take, advifing with them that were best acquainted with the Nature and situation of the Place.

112. However, in the mean time the Mandubii, who had received the Army into

113. This done, the Captains chose out fixty thousand of those States, which had the greatest repute for courage, and attacqued the Roman Camp at the declivity of an Hill, where they might belt mafter the Works, giving diversion at the same time in other places. But the Industry and Fortune of Cefar furmounted all difficulties, by fending Supplies where there was need, and being affifted by the conduct of Labie. 186, who having got together thirty nine Cohorts, charged the Enemy with great execution. Threefcore and fourteen Enligns were taken and brought to Cafar, and very few of so great a number returned safe into their Camp. They in the Town, discouraged, drew back their Forces from the Works, which being known, the Galles presently fled out of the Camp, and if the Soldiers had not been wearied, they Sect. might eafily, in the opinion of the Conqueror, have destroyed all their Enemies However, the Horse being sent out about mid-night to fall upon the Reer, slew and took a great number. The next day Vercingetorix calling a Council, told them he had not undertaken the War for his own Interest, but for the common concern, and publick liberty; and feeing they must necessarily yield to fortune, he offered either to fatisfie the Romans by his Death, or to be delivered up to them alive. Ambaffadors were fent to Cefar, and upon his Command the Captains were brought to him. fitting in the Fortifications before the Camp, and Vercingetorix amongst the rest, with whom their Weapons were delivered. The Hedui and Arverni being reserved, of whom he dismissed twenty thousand Captives, of the rest he gave throughout the Army every Man a Prisoner by way of booty. He marched to the Bani, and received them, having been so kind to them and the Arcerni, out of hopes by their means to bring in other States. Thither did the Arverm fend their Ambassadors, and promifed to obey his Orders. He required a great number of Hostages, and sent the Legions into their wintering Camps: He himself determined to winter at August odurum or Bibratte. The Atchievments of this year being known at Rome, a Supplication for twenty days wasinjoyned.

114, Such account Cafar himself gives of this Action before Alesia, and therewith concludes his Commentaries of his Wars in Gall. His Works and Fortifications being fuch as he describes them, though in down-right Language, without ornament of Rhetorick, hath stupified all Readers with admiration, as too great for a Man to effect. The fingle Work to incompase the Town was wonderful; but doubled with another without to keep the Galler from raising the Siege doth double the wonder. Hereby he did befiege, and was befieged, took the Town, and overthrew the Enemy in the Field. The Galles in this War were acted by a natural and generous heat tafin won the ricid. The Canal in this was though they failed therein, and the unfaith definitation to preferve the liberty of their Country, though they failed therein, and the unfaith fulness of any of them in not standing to their former Ingagements cannot be excufed. Above all others Vercingetorix was remarkable both for his Valour and Conduct, the manner of whose delivery Plutarch describeth. Being armed at all Points. mounted on an Horse, and furnished with a rich Caparison, he came to Casar, and rode about him, as he fate in his Chair of State; then lighting, he took off his Caparison and Furniture, and disarming himself, laid all on the ground, and went and sate down at his feet, and said never a word. Casar at length committed him as a Pri-

115. Florus also writes of his coming as a Supplicant to the Camp, and casting down his Ornaments and Arms before Cefars Knees with these words: Take them, thou hast overcome a Valiant M.m., O Man most valiant! But where this Campwas, this Writer was vilely mistaken. You have heard Casar all along tell his own story. Certainly he knew what Town it was he took, and about the Siege of which the great stress of the War lay. He himself faith it was Alesia, but Florus writes that it was Gergovia, a Town of the Arverni; that here is was where so great Munitions were raised; where Vercingetorix was taken, and the War being in a manner finished, all Gall was reduced to the obedience of the Romans. Now could Cafar be ignorant what Towns he took, or which he was forced to quit? (as he did Gergovia) and two hundred years almost after his death Florus must undertake to correct what he had written. But this he did out of his forgetfulness, or rather his impudence, in fallifying History, according to his Custom, as we cannot but observe upon

116. Roman Writers speak of Gall as now subdued; but for all that, Cafar could not pass the Winter in quiet; though having rested no part of the former Summer, Hirtimo he was desirous to refresh his Soldiers. For the Galles concluded, that though the Roman Army could not be mastered in one place, and altogether; yet if they raised Commotions in divers places; Cafar should not be able to prosecute all at once. To prevent the effect of this Consultation, Cafar leaving M. Antonius with charge of his Winter Garrisons, with all speed invaded the Bituriger, and making no usual signs of an Invalion,, by Fires prevented all relief which one City could afford unto another, and thereby surprizing many thousands of such as lay in the Fields, constrained them to submit. He drove the Carnutes to great extremity, by forcing them into the Woods in the violence of cold weather; from which not able to defend themselves, they were scattered abroad, and with the loss of a great part of them, difperfed into the neighbouring Cities.

117. This, notwithstanding the Bellovaci, under the conduct of Corbens and Comius the Atribatian, levied Men, with resolution to invade the Suessiones. Casar thinking not only his Honour, but his fecurity concerned to fave his Allies, which had well deferved of the Common-wealth, with three Legions marched against them. The Galles he found feated on the higher ground, from which they would not descend, notwithstanding the smallness of the number of the Romans compared with theirs; and Cefar confidering their multitudes, would not attacque them with fuch difadvantages, but strongly fortified himself to make them believe he was fearful, and thereby to draw them down to Battle. Yet we are told that he faw it necessary to fend for three Legions more, the coming of which while he expected, the Enemy defeated by an Ambush a Party of the Rhemi, which was appointed to guard the Foragers, and killed Vertisco the Prince of their State, and Captain of their Horse, while, though an old Man, and scarcely able to fit on Horse-back, he too greedily pursued them. And on the other side the Germans, whom Casar had sent for from beyond the Rhine to fight, intermingled with his Horse-men, boldly passed the Marith that lay between the Camps, and routed fuch flying Parties of the Galles as they

118. The Galles, upon hearing of the coming of more Legions, were discouraged, and fent away by night with their Carriages fuch among them as were infirm or wanted Arms, fearing fuch another Siege as had been at Alessa. Casar perceiving they would all be gone, and that the Marish would hinder the Pursuit, made Bridges over it, and possessed himself of a ridge of an Hill which ran betwixt the Marish and the Enemies Camp; and so ordered his Battel, that thence the Engines might play amongst the thickest of them. They being fearful to stay, and not knowing how to secure their retreat from Casar, who stood ready to pursue them, cast up a great heap of Faggots betwixt the two Camps, and fet them on fire, thereby to intercept his fight when they fled, and that with fuch fuccess, that though he fent out the Horse after them, as suspecting their Design, yet his Men were assaud to venture into the thick slame and smoak, and the Bellovaci escaped to a place ten Miles off; whence, by laying Ambushes both of Horse and Foot in divers places, they did the Romans great displeasure in their foraging. Corbens chose out of his whole Army six thou-land Foot, and lay in Ambush with them in a place so incompassed with a River and Woods, that the Romans coming thither should be taken as in a Toile. But Cafar by a Captive got notice of it, and sent his Horse-men to the place, so ordering his Are defeated. matters, that being readily attacqued by the Enemy, they were fuccoured first by light Foot-men, and he himself was presently at hand with his Legions. Upon knowledgehereof the Galles would have fled, but could not, being themselves caught in the trap they had laid for the Romans. Yet they adventured to enter the River, and the Woods, but were all overtaken and flain; and Corbens refusing quarter, but fighting and hurting many Men, exasperated therewith the Victors so much, that they could not forbear to throw their Darts at him, and dispatch him. 119. By some few that escaped through the Woods, the Galles incamped at eight Miles distance, perceived the misery they were in, for Casar would be suddenly upon them; they called a Council by found of Trumpet, and fent their Ambassadors to him, to whom they accused Corbeus, as Author of the Revolt. Casar told them it was an easie matter to cast the blame upon the dead; and he put them in mind how the Fellevaci had flood most stifly in their opinion, and would not be reduced, when the other States had submitted. Nevertheless he was satisfied with the punishment which they had brought upon themselves; for they lamented, that besides the loss of their Horse-men, many thousands of their choicest Foot were cut off, scarcely any escaping to bring tydings of the slaughter. The rest of the States having staid to fee what success they would have, when they saw that they were admitted to give Ho-They submit stages, submitted themselves, and did so too; only Comius having, upon his revolt from Cafar, been almost affaffinated by procurement of Labienus would trust his life with no Man, but kept himself with the Germans, whom he had procured to assist in the War. Cafar perceived that no Nation now stood against him, the most warlike being fubducd. And therefore he disposed of his Forces into several parts of Gall. He himfelf invaded the Country of Ambiorix, which he harrased with Fire and Sword, on purpose to make him hated by his People. Having slain, and taken Prisoners a great number of Men, he fent Labienus with two Legions amongst the Treviri, the Country of whom, by reason of its nearness to Germany, being daily inured to War, was not much unlike it in rudeness and savagness of its Inhabitants. Neither did they obey Casars Commands at any time longer than he had an Army in their Country to compel them.

Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians. 120. In the mean time a new War was raised in the Territories of the Pictores, Sect. 6. a part of which State renounced their obedience. But they were happily reduced by

C. Fabius, who before had received many Cities by composition, and now in an encounter caused the death of above twelve thousand Men; after which he went against the Carnutes, and the other States, the power of whom he knew to be crushed by that overthrow. Giving them no respite, he speedily brought them to subjection; for the Carnutes, who, though often before roughly handled, yet would never liften to peace, now gave Hostages, and submitted. And besides them, the Are-morican States sollowing their example, upon the coming of Fabius with his Legions among them, received his Command without delay. Drapes, one of the Senones, and Luterius of the Cadurci, having escaped from the Battel, fled toward the Province, and were purfued by Cavinius the Legate with two Legions. Perceiving that they could not upon his approach enter the Province without danger, they took Uxellodunum, a Town of the Cadurci, excellently well fortified by its fituation. Hence, as they went to gather Forage, Cavinius fell upon them, and quite defeated their Forces, which done, he sate down before the Town, and Fabius the next day came to

121. E're this, Casar having lest M. Antonius the Quastor with fifteen Cohorts among the Bellovaci, to prevent new Confederacies, visited the other States, and charged them with more Hostages; but incouraged them with comfortable words. Yet when he came amongst the Carnutes, he demanded Guturvatus, as Author of their Revolt, to be given up into his Hands, and Hirtius tells us, he was compelled by his Soldiers to punish him, who imputed to him all the dangers and losses they had suftained by the War; so that being in a manner scourged to death, he was beheaded. Having received information from Cavinius, how Drapes and Luterius were defeated. and that the Towns-men stood it out, he resolved to go and punish them too, lest occasion should be given to the rest of the Galles to think that they wanted not strength, but constancy and resolution to withstand the Romans, and other Cities trusting to the strength of their situation, and incouraged by their Example, should attempt to recover their liberty. For he was fensible that all the Galles knew his Power was to continue but one Summer longer; which if they could weather out, they thought they should need to fear no danger after. Coming beyond all expectation before the Town, he presently saw there was no means to conquer it, but by cutting off the Water. For a River ran below the high Hill on which it stood, and a Spring of Water gushed out under the Walls; with much labour and expence of Blood he caused Batteries to be planted, and drove them both from River and Fountain. They set fire to his Works, and by a Sally hindered him from quenching it. To divert them he refolved to affault the Town, which apprehenion caufed them to retreat. And at length, by Mines, he diverted the course of the Spring another way; with which they were so daunted, that thinking it above the wit of Man, and to have been effected by the Gods, they yielded themselves. Casar judging that his clemency was fufficiently known, and could receive no blemish from one Act of severity, for an Example to others, cut off the right Hands of all such that were able to

Treviri; of them he flew many, as also of the Germans, who were ready to affist

122. While Cafar was thus imployed, Labienus warred prosperously against the

any Man against the Romans. Casar having conquered, and subdued Gallia Celtica, and also Belgica, but never all this while visited Aquitania, further than that he had made a kind of entrance into it by certain Victories obtained by P. Craffue, with two Legions marched thither with intent to bestow there the latter part of the Summer, and that he did also with such success, that all the States thereof sent unto him, and gave him Hostages. This done, he went with his Horse-guard to Narbon, and The States of disposed of his Foot into wintering places, so as no part of Gall was without an Aquitaint sub- Army. Having staid a few days in the Province, and inquired how every Man had behaved himself during the general Rebellion of Gall, which he had overcome by the faithfulnes and affilfance of the faid Province, he returned to his Legions into Belgium, and wintered at Nemetocenna. In the mean time Comius the Atrebatian lived by robbing and intercepting fuch Provisions as were carryed to the Roman Camps. Against him M. Antonius sent out C. Volusenus, whom he encountered, and wounded dangeroully in the Thigh, but the Roman Horse, out of indignation that their Commander was wounded, inforced the Fight with such violence, that Comine his Party was routed. And though he himself escaped, yet he thought it best to submit, and offer Hostages, which Antony received, and besides pardoning him, granted him

Sect. 6. his request, that he should not come into the fight of any Roman, which resolution he had taken, upon the danger he had formerly escaped.

123. Casar, being come into Belgium, bent his Indeavours to this end, that at his departure, and withdrawing of his Army, he should not be constrained to have War, and leave troubles behind him. He therefore took this course, to treat the several States obligingly, by highly rewarding the Noble-men, and by burdening the Country with no new Impolitions, by which means he eafily kept it quiet, now tired out with many unfortunate Battels; for fo long as a sence of the miseries of War remains upon an harrased People, they listen not to their turbulent and unquiet fancies; but when that is off, they return to their whim again, which is wont to come upon them no otherwise than the fits of an Ague at Terms and Periods. Winter being over, Casiar, contrary to his cultom, halfed into Italy, his chief business being to commend to the Municipal Towns and Colonies the Suit of his Questior M. Antony for the Pricthood. He had sent him before to sue for that promotion, and made all the Friends he could; and was now so far ingaged, that some few Men were grown factious and troublesome about it, and by putting Antony beside his purpose, sought to disparage Casar now going out of his Com-

124. Yet before he came near Italy, he understood that Antony was made Augur. Notwithstanding he thought fit to visit the Towns and Colonies, to give them thanks for their appearing for him, and to recommend to them his own business. For, he intended to fue for the Confulthip himself for the following year, being concerned that his Adversaries made their brags that L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus had been advanced to that dignity to deprive him of all Honour and Authority, and that it was wrested from Sergius Galba, though he had more Voices on his fide, because he was a familiar friend of Cafar, and had been his Legate. He was received with extraordinary afferably received ction and respect, upon this his first coming from the Wars in Gall. For nothing was omitted which they could devise for the adorning of their Gates, Ways, and Places where he was to pass. The People with their Children met him on the Road, Sacrifices were every where offered, the Temples and Forums were hanged with Tapestry, and, as if some great Triumph had been provided for, great expense was made by the Richer, and great Expressions by the meaner fort. 125. Having lightly passed through the Countries of Gallia Togata, he returned with all speed to his Army at Nemetocenna, and called all his Legions out of their Winter Quarters into that of the Treviri, where he mustered them. Of Gallia Togata he made Labienus Governour, thereby to obtain more favour and furtherance in his Suit for the Confulship. He heard oftentimes that Labienus was sollicited strongly by his Enemies; and was informed, that by the prevalency of a small Faction, it was carried in the Senate to take away from him part of his Army; yet would he not give credit to any thing faid of Labienus, nor would be drawn to act contrary to the Authority of the Senate, believing, that if the Members thereof might have freedom of Voice, he should easily obtain what he defired. For C. Curio, Tribune of the People, had often propounded, that if any were terrified by the Army of Cafar, forasmuch as the Power of Pompey kept other Persons as much in awe, both of them should disband their Armies, and so the City be free to use her own right as she pleased. The Senate was just and civil enough to him, as appeared both at this time and the year before, when Marcellus, opposing his Dignity contrary to the Law of Pompey and Crassis, brought in a Bill for his discharge, before the time of his Authority was expired. Yet did not this discourage his Enemies, but rather excited them to make good their Party, and compel the Senate to approve of what they had deter-

126. Hereupon it was refolved, that Pompey should send one Legion, and Cafar another, to the War against the Parthians. But Hirtius tells us, it was easily discerned that both these Legions were taken from Casar; for, the first Legion Pompey had fent unto Cæfar, and given it him as out of his own Number, being levied in the Province. Yet did Casar, though no Man doubted but that he was weakened at the pleasure of his Enemies, send Pompey his Legion again, and of his own Forces he ordered the fifteenth Legion which he had in Gall within the Alps, to be delivered according to the Decree of the Senate. And in the room thereof he sent the thirteenth into Italy, to lie in Garrison in the same place whence the other was drawn. Now did he place his Army in its Winter Quarters amongst the Belge and Edni, as the best way to keep Gall in quiet, the former being the most valiant, and the latter of greatest Authority. Then took he his Journey into Italy, whither when come, he understood that the two Legions which he had dismissed to be according to the De- Sect. 6. cree of the Senate imployed in the Parthian War, were by Marcellus the Conful delivered to Pompey, and kept still in Italy. By this dealing was sufficiently evident what was intended against Cosar. Yet he determined to take all things patiently, as long as there was hope of determining the controversie rather by Law than by the

Containing the History of the Civil War betweet Casar and Pompey, to the Absoluteness of Julius Calar.

The space of five years.

5. Such is the account which Hirtius, or whoever wrote the eighth Commentary of the Gallick War, giveth us of the beginning of the Civil betwixt these great Persons; but it is our part to enquire farther into the original of it. For wholoever was the Author of that Book, who wrote moreover Commentaries of the Wars of Alexandria, Africk, and Spain, till the Death of Cafar, was no small a Friend and Admirer of him. In his Preface he tells his Balbus by whose daily Admo-Hirtiss favou. nition he was constrained to write, that though all that read the Writings of Cesar rable to Casfar. admired them as well as he, yet he had more reason to do it than others, because they considered only in them the purity of Phrase, and excellency of Stile; whereas he who knew with what facility and expedition he wrote, had a more particular Subject of Admiration. He was it feems present at the Gallick War, and for the General had very great Honour and Respect; but he had not so much reason and opportunity to understand the Intrigues relating to the Civil; neither was he possibly willing to reflect upon Cæsar, as, or where he did deserve.

2. The Truth is, Cafar's carriage, especially in his Consulfate, had rendered him very diffafful to the Senate. Pompey on the other fide, by his fair demeanour, had of late gained much upon it, which Cafar being aware of defired leave to frand for The grounds a second Confulfair in his absence. This was granted him; but he, fearing the malice and occasions of his Adversaries in case he were reduced to a private condition, further importuned Wars betwise the Fathers that he might have his Government of Gall prorogued, casting about all Panys and manner of ways to keep his Army till he should be Consul. This was hindered by manner of ways to keep as farmy an included to some the Conful, who had fucceeded Pompey; whereupon Cafar laying his hand upon his Sword, faid, That that should obtain it for him. This Marcellus was very Apian dividible. bitter against him, pressing hard that a Successor should be sent him; but this was so civili lib. crossed by Pompey, either out of good nature, or policy. an inveterate Enemy of Cesar, was made Tribune. Yet all these, except Claudius, were drawn afide by Money; Paulus by fifteen hundred Talents, and Curio, who was much indebted, by one hundred thousand Sesterces. Marcellus then urging, that a Succession for was to be fent to Cafar, Curio stifly withstood it, alledging, that then ought Pompes also to dismis his Army; for that his power was equally dangerous to the publick liberty. Pompey outwardly feemed willing, and faid he would disband his Men;

but Curio fell foul upon him, telling him, that promife without performance was nothing; and, that he might feem to stand for the good of the Commonwealth, and not curry favour with Cafar, he defired, that if they both refused to disband, they should, the one as well as the other, be declared Enemies to 3. Pompey exceedingly netled hereat, threatned him; but he ceased not to urge the thing. The Senate could have wished them both reduced, but feared to disband Pompey's Army, looking upon Cefar as the more dangerous person. Pompey sent now to him for the Legion he had lent him, two being ordered into Syriato defend the Eastern Parts now in danger by the overthrow of Crassus: he sent him this Legion, and another of his own; but there being no need or them in Syria. they wintered at Capua. Those that brought them into Italy did ill Offices for Cafar, and gave out, as if his Army at his return would all revolt, which though very falle,

Sect. 7. was believed by Pompey, who thereupon neglected to provide for so dangerous a War as followed. The next year C. Claudius Marcellus and L. Corn. Lentulus were Confuls, and it was propounded to the Senate, whether both Pompey and Cæsar should lay down all Power. Though once it was carried that Cafar only should, when the Conful propounded it feverally, yet * Curio again putting it to the question, it * conful aparama di viva was carried against both by three hundred and forty eight Voices. Hereat the Con-planua di viva fuls inraged, left the City, and gave Pompey power as from themselves to fight for his pres 446. Country against Cæsur, which he seemed not altogether to approve. Now Curio perceiving himself in danger, and that he could do no more service for Casar, fled unto

4. Cafar himself tells us, that all things were carried impetuously and confusedly; Debillo civili that leifure was not given to his Friends to advertise him, nor yet to the Tribunes to Cofars account avoid the danger falling upon them, nor to use the Right of opposition left unto them by Sylla; but within feven days after they were entred into their Office, they were forced to shift for their fafety, notwithstanding the most turbulent and factious Tribunes of former times were never put to look into their Affairs, nor give account of their Actions before the eighth Month. In the end they betook themselves to that extream Act of Senate, which was never made but when the City was upon the Point of burning, or in the desperate estate of the Common-wealth: Let the Confuls, Prators, Tribuni Plebis, and such Proconfuls as are about the City, do their en- confules, ivadeavour that the Common-wealth receive no detriment. This Senatus-consultum was torts, Tribusi made on the seventh of the Ides of January; so that in the five first days in which confust fint the Senate might sit, after that Lentulus had entered the Consulship, the two Comi-ad urbin, ntial days excepted, most heavy and bitter Decrees were made against the Power of trimestica-Cafar, and against the Tribunes of the People, famous and worthy Men, who there-piat. upon fled prefently out of the City, and came to him, who being then at Ravenna attended an Answer to his easie and modest demands; if by any reasonable course matters might be drawn to a peaceable conclusion.

5. Others write, that Curio, being called to a Consultation, would have had him what others write.

What others write.

What others with the Alpes and Illyricum, until he should be Conful again; which though it seemed fomething reasonable to Pompey, the Consuls would not admit of it, Then wrote he cis. Ep. 11. to the Senate a menacing and bitter Letter, for soit is stilled by Cicero, who now was Philatchis Greturned from Cilicia, his Province, which he had governed a year, and for his good erront. Service in the Field had been faluted Imperator, and had a Triumph decreed him by the Senate, which these disturbances hindered, he saying, that so an agreement were made, he had rather follow the Chariot of Cafar than triumph in his own; and to effect it, he omitted no travel, writing to Cafar, and speaking unto Pompey. But Cafar in that Letter, after an honourable mention made of his own Exploits, fignified, that he was willing to refign his Power, in case Pompey did the like; otherwise he should retein his Forces, and speedily come to revenge these Injuries which had been offered as well to himself as his Country. At the reading of these last words all cried out, that War was denounced, and they fent L. Domitius to succeed him in his Command, with four newly raifed Legions. Antonius and Cassius the Tribunes being of Curio's Judgment, the Confuls bad them depart out of the Senate, left their Persons Sacrosantt (as the term was) by their Offices should be violated; and they in a great rage departing, that night fled toward Cossar. So began this famous Civil War, in the fourth year of the CLXXXII. Olympiad, the DCCV. of the City, XLVII. before the Birth of Christ; A. M. MMMCMLVI. the aforesaid C. Claudius Marcellus, and L. Cornelius Lentulus being Confuls.

The begin-ning of the Civil War.

6. Amongst other things ordained by the Senate in order to preparation for War, Casar writes, that two Consular, and the other Pratorian Provinces were given to private Men, that had no Office of Magistracy. That Syria fell to Scipio, and Gall to L. Domitius. That into the other Provinces were fent Prators without consent or approbation of the People, as had been practifed in former years, who having made their Vows, took their Paludamenta, and went their ways. That the Confuls (which before that time was never feen) went out of the City, and had their Lictors privately within the City, and in the Capitol, against all Order and ancient Custom. That Levies were made throughout Italy, Arms were required, and Money was exacted from Municipal Towns, from Temples and Religious Places. That all Divine and Humane Rights were confounded. Provoked by these things, he called the Soldiers together, acquainted them with all the Injuries he had received from time to time by procurement of his Enemies, and how they had alienated Pompey from him, of whom he had well deferved. He lamented that the Power of the Tribunes, which former times had re-established, should now be suppressed by force. For Sylla having stripped the Tribunitial Power of all Rights and Prerogatives, yet continued to it the freedom of Intercession. But Pompey, who would feem to restore it to its Dignity, took away that Power which alone was left unto it. As for the Senatus-consultum, whereby the Magistrates were required to take care for the fafety of the Common-wealth, and by the Voice of which the Roman People were fummoned to take Arms, it had never been practifed, but when pernicious Laws were propounded, upon the violence of the Tribunes, and the mutiny and feceffion of the People; when the Temples, and more eminent Places were seized, which Examples of former Ages had been expiated by the fortune of Saturninus, and the Gracchi. But at this present there was no such matter attempted, no not in thought; no Law published; no tampering with the People; no secession. Therefore he exhorted them to undertake the Defence of the Reputation and Dignity of their General, under whose Conduct for nine years together they had most happily managed the common Interest, fought many prosperous and victorious Battels, and settled all Gall and Germany in Peace. The Soldiers of the thirteenth Legion being only present, for the other Legions were not yet come, cried out instantly, that they were ready to undertake his Defence, and protect the Tribunes. 7. Having founded the minds of the Soldiers, he went, he faith, directly toward Ariminum, and there met with the Tribunes of the People that were fled to him; fent for the rest of the Legions from their Wintering Camps, and gave order that they should follow him. Plutarch relates, that he had not in all above five thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse about him in Gall within the Alpes, having left the rest beyond the Mountains to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. That confidering how for the execution of his Delign he needed not fo many Men, but that his Interest was to come upon his Enemies on a sudden, and surprize them, rather than by great Preparations to give them notice and time to make opposition, he commanded his Officers to go before, without any other Armourthan their Swords, to take Ariminum, (the first City * one comes to out of Gall) with as little blood-shed * Now Rim! and tumult as they could possible. Then committing the Army he had with him to in Ramathe care of Hortensus, one of his Friends, he continued an whole day together on the straight had a straight him to a straig penly in the fight of every Man, to fee the Gladiators exercise before him. At night the Popes Dohe went to his Lodging, and bathing his Body a little, came afterwards into the Hall, ninional and made merry a while with them he had invited to Supper. When it was pretty late, and very dark, he rose from the Table, and prayed the Company to be merry, and not to stir, for he would straight be with them again; but he had secretly given order to a few of his truftiest Friends to follow him, some one way, and some another. He himself having hired a Carriage, made at first as if he would have gone fome other way; but fuddenly turned back again towards Ariminum. Now, when he was come to the little River Rubicon, which parted Gall within the Alpes from Italy, he stopped his course upon a sudden.

8. For, the farther he went, and nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorfe he had in his Conscience, to think what it was he took in hand, and his thoughts were more perplexed, when he entred into a confideration of the desperateness of his Attempt. He was plunged into various thoughts, and spoke never a word, waving sometimes one way, and sometimes another, and often changed his determination contrary to himself. At length he fell into discourse with his Friendshehad with him, amongst whom was Asimus Pollio, telling them what mischiefs this Passage over the River would breed in the World, and how much Posterity would talk of it. But at last, with Courage, casting from him all these Melancholick thoughts, he spake such words as Valiant Men are wont when they attempt dangerous Enterprizes, as that a Desperate Man feareth no danger, Come on; and paffing the River, never stopped; so that before day-light he was within Ariminum, and took it. It's faid, that the night before he passed over this River, he dreamed that he lay with his Mother.

9. The City of Ariminum being taken, and the rumor thereof dispersed through- Platarche out Italy, as if open War had been begun both at Sea and Land, as if all the Laws The great of Rome had been broken, together with the extream Bounds and Limits of the Examples his State, not only Men and Women, but whole Corporations themselves quitting their Habitations, fled from one place to another. Rome was immediately filled with *Iiiii 2

Sect. 7. multitudes that flocked thither, like droves of Cattel, being not to be commanded by any Authority of Magistrates, nor perswaded by any Arguments, so confused they were, to the great danger of the City. For, in all places Men were of contrary opinions, and Tumults were raifed by fuch as were glad of this trouble, who could keep in no certain place, but every where fell out with fuch as feemed either afraid or angry at it, and boldly threatned them with that which was to come. Pompey himfelf was amazed, but much more was troubled with the reflecting words which were given him on both fides. Some faid he had done bravely, and paid for his folly, in making Casar so great and powerful both against himself and the Common-wealth. Others blamed him as having refused the honest and reasonable Conditions offered by Cafar, and fuffering Lentulus the Conful too much to abuse him. Phaonius bade him stamp on the ground with his foot; for Pompey one day in bravery faid in the Senate, that none needed to trouble themselves about Preparation for War; for when he lifted, with one stamp of his foot, he could fill all Italy with Soldiers. At this time Pompey had a greater number of Men than Cafar; but those about him, and concerned with him would never let him follow his own Determinations, bringing him so many lies, as if Casar had been already at their heels. Dion Cassius writes, that he was affrighted by what he learnt from Labienus concerning Cafar. For Labienus, who had been one of Cafars greatest Friends, and had fought valiantly under him, as his Legatus in Gall, forfook him and went to Pompey, to whom he revealed all his Secrets. A wonder it is made by Dion, what the cause should be that moved Labienus to this Revolt. But he concludes it was, because being now puffed up with his Wealth and Reputation, he carried himself very highly, and Cosar disclaining he should think to equal him, did less respect him than formerly. This alteration of mind Labienus not enduring, and standing in fear of what might be the consequence of it, revolted from him.

10. Pompey being altered in his Inclinations by this means, fent Meffengers to Cafar, namely, L. Cafar his Kinsman, whose Father was Legate in his Camp, and Roscius the Prator, who voluntarily undertook the Imployment. L. Cafar told him, Pompty fend. that Pompty defired to clear himself, left he should take those things to be done in contempt of him, which were ordered only for the Service of the State. The good of that he faid he always preferred before any private respect, and that Casar was also obliged in honour to lay aside all indignation and affection, for the sake of the Common-wealth, and not to be fo transported with anger and disdain as he seemed to be, lest hoping to be averaged upon them at Rome, he should endamage his Country. Somewhat more he added with excuses on Possess part, in all which he was feconded by Roscius. Casar answered, That he had ever held the Dignity of the Common-wealth dearer than his own Life. He grieved that a kindness bestowed on him by the People should be spitefully wrested from him by his Adversaries; that six Months of his Government were to be cut off; and so he was to be called home to the City; and that notwithstanding at the last Creation of Magistrates it was resolved, that regard should be had of him though absent; Yet for the Common-wealth sake could he be content to undergo the los of that Honour. But having writ to the Senate, that all Men might quit their Armics, he was fo far from obtaining it, that a Levy thereupon was made throughout Italy; moreover, that the two Legions, drawn from him under pretence of the Parthian War, were still reteined about the City, which were also in Arms. He perceived well enough that all this tended to his destruction, and yet was he content to condescend to all things, and to indure all inconveniences for the good of the Publick. Let Pompey, faith he, go to his Government and Provinces. Let both the Armies be discharged. Let all Men in Italylay down their Arms. Let the City be freed of fear. Let the Comitia be left to their ancient Liberty, and the whole Administration free to the Senate and People. For the security hereof let an Oath be taken, else let Pompey come near to me, or me be permitted to go nearer to Pompey, that by conference an end may be put to these differences.

11, The Messengers delivered this Answer to Pompey, and the Consulsat Capua, to which, after Confultation, they made a Reply by Writing, and the Gondard Confultation, they made a Reply by Writing, and the fame Meffengers. This was the drift of it, that Cofir thould return into Gall, quit Ariminum, and diffmils is Army; which if he did, Pampey would then go into Spain; in the mean the Antwer time, till fecurity could be given that Cofir would do this, the Confulsand Pampey unfairfieldory would not forbear to levy Men. These Conditions were very unequal, that Casar should quit Ariminum, and return into his Province, and Pompey hold Legions and Provinces belonging to others; that Cafar should dismis his Army, and Pompey raise new Troops; that Pompey should promise to repair to his Government, but assign no day for his departure; so that if he had not gone till Casars time of Sect. 7. Government had been expired, he could not have been accused of breaking his word. But there being no time appointed for a conference, nor any show made of coming nearer, there could be no hope of Peace. Cafar seeing this, sent out M. Antony, and others, and took in feveral Municipal Towns by the affiltance of the Decuriones of Auximum, though Adius Varus, who held that Town, opposed it, making Levies of Men through the Country of Picenum.

12. The noise hereof flying to Rome, struck the City with such terror, that Lentulus the Conful being to deliver out Money to Pompey, according to a Senatus-confultum, and having opened the inner Treasury, forthwith fled away; for it was reported falfly, that Cafar approached, and that his Horse was near at hand. Marcellus the other Conful, and most of the other Magistrates, followed after. Pompey departing the day before, was gone to those Legions he had taken from Casar, and had left in Apulia to winter. In the mean time the Levies ceased in the City, and no place feeded fecure betwixt that and Capua, where they began first to assemble. There to secure themselves they pressed for Soldiers such Coloni as by the Lex Julia were placed there. The Gladiators, which there Cafar kept in exercise, were by Lentulus brought out of the School, fet at liberty, and had Horses given them, being commanded to follow him. But afterward upon advice how ill it was spoken of, Hurlburly up- he differfed them throughout Campania for their fafe keeping. So writes Cefav on noise himself as to the flight of the Consult, and Pompey out of Rome. Plutarch adds, that thereof. Powpey, wearied with the frights, fury, and madness of those who cried still that Cefar was at hand, and seeing all things in tumult, concluded there was no ways but to forfake the City, and commanded the Senate to follow him, and not a Man to tarry there, except he loved tyranny more than liberty, and the Common-wealth. And so the Consuls themselves, before they had offered their common Sacrifices, as was wont, upon going out of the City, fled away; as did most of the Senators, taking away in half fuch things as came to hand, as if they had ftoln them. And in this hurlyburly some even of Cesars Friends took the same course, being out of sear, carried with the stream of this Tumult. 13. Dion Cassius having told us how the great ones were unwilling that Casar and Pompey should meet and confer, lest they should conspire together against their Interest; and that Pempey was unwilling to be reduced to a private Life, because he knew, that in that condition he should not be so great with the People as Casar Paparand the would be 5, adds also, that before the Meffengers were returned he went into CamSeason leave pania, where he thought he could with more convenience raife the War. He comman, and go where he thought he could with more convenience raife the War.

manded, that all the Senate and Magistrates should follow him, by a Senatus-consultum having propounded Impunity to fuch as would quit the place upon this occasion, and having declared that he would efteem him that continued here no other than a publick Enemy. He procured alfo a Decree that they should take along with them all the publick Money, and all things confectated to their Gods, thereby hoping to be able to raise a great Army: And almost all the Cities of Baly had that kindness for him, that a little before having heard he was dangeroully fick, they made publick Vows for his recovery; which was an extraordinary Honour, and happened only afterwards to them, who obtained Sovereign Authority; although it was no ftrong Argument, that therefore they would continue constant in sidelity to him. And although it was decreed, that all the Treasure and Consecrated things should be carried away, yet was neither fort removed out of their Places. For when it was heard that Cofar had not given any peaceable Aniwer, but blamed the Meffengers as having failly reported thingson his fide, and that he had many Men bold and couragious, and refolved to make havock of all things, (as in fuch Cafes things are usually made worfe, and more terrible than indeed they are) affrighted therewith, before they touched them, they ran away in great tumults and diforder. They called to mind what horrid things had been committed by Marine and Sylla, and could not think better of Cafar, whose Soldiers for the most part were Barbarians. But in such manner did Pompey leave the City, and with him most of the Senators; for some few staid behind, who were addicted to Cafar, and some others that resolved to 14. Celar having notice hereof, went not strait to Rome, for he knew that the City would fall to the Victor as a reward, and he professed that he did not make War upon Rome, but for her fake against his Adversaries. But throughout Italy he dispersed Papers, whereby he challenged Pompey to debate the matter betwixt them, and indeavoured to perswade others to be void of sear, and to keep themselves at Scct. 7. home. Dislodging from Auximum, he passed through the Country of Picenum, and there was most willingly entertained by all the Governments. But a stop was given to him at Corfinium by Domitius Ænobarbus, who had raifed twenty Cohorts out of Alba, the Marst, Peligni, and adjacent Countries. Cejar passed the River, which Domitius in vain attempted to hinder, by breaking down the Bridge at three Miles distance from the Town; but the Party he sent vvas beaten off by Casars Vanguard, who then fate down before the Place. Domitius fent to Pompey to defire aid, affirming, that Casar vvith two Armies, by reason of the straitness of the Passages, might eafily be thut up; vvhich opportunity if he neglected, he himself with above thirty Cohorts, and of Senators and Equites a great number, must needs run a very great danger. In the mean time he took care for effectual defence, and to incourage his Soldiers, promifed to each Man four Acres out of his oven Lands, with a fuitable proportion to the Centurions and Evocati; for having been of Sylla's Party he had got great Possessions.

15. Cafar made great Works to fortifie his Camp, and begirt the Town with Castles, and other Fortifications, which while he was about, the Messengers returned to Domitius. Pompey vvrote back that he vvould not hazard the Cause by driving it to fuch extremity; and vvhereas Domities had, vvithout his advice or confent, ingaged in keeping Corfinium, he advised him, if possible, to quit it, and bring the Forces to him. But he diffembled the matter, and gave out, that Pompey vyould come speedily to their relief, and at the same time consulted with his intimate Friends, hove to make his escape out of the Toven; which being at length known by his demeanour, and other Circumstances, his Men seized on him, and sent to cefor taketh Cefor, offering to deliver him up, and furrender the Place. He concluded that the importance of fuch a Tovvn vvas not to be neglected, but kept his Men from entering that night, left any violence should be committed, which he resolved to prevent, as good policy it was in his undertaking. Lentulus Spinther being in the Town, came forth to him, begged pardon, and put him in mind of their former familiarity, acknowledging the favours received from him, which indeed were of the greatest size; for by his means he had been chosen into the Colledge of Pontifices, upon leaving his Pratorship had obtained Spain for a Province, and had been affilted by him in his Suit for the Confulship. 16. Cafar interrupting him faid, That he came not out of his Province to do any harm, but to defend himself from the affronts of his Enemies; to restore the Tribunes of the People, vvho had been driven out of the City, to their Dignity, and to put himself and the People of Rome into liberty, being oppressed by the saction of a fevy persons. Lentulus put into heart by this Answer, desired to return into the Town to incourage others who were desperate as to their fortunes; and the next day Cafar fent for the Senators, and Senators Children, the Tribunes of Soldiers, the Equites and Decuriones, a great number of which Domitius had culled out of the Municipal Towns. All these he protected from the Infolencies of the Soldiers, and having a little upbraided them with their Ingratitude, dismissed them in safety. And that he might not feem more sparing of the Lives, than the Monies, of Men. fixty Sestertia, which Domitius had brought with him to Corfinium, and deposited there, being prefented to him by the Dunmoiri of the Town, he restored to him; though he knew it was publick Money, and given out by Pompey to pay Soldiers. Domitime his Men he commanded to take the Military Oath to himfelf, and having staid seven days at Corfinium, through the Confines of the Marricini, Terentini, and Larinates, he came into Apulia.

17. Pompey having notice of what had passed at Corsimum, took his Way from Luceria to Brundusium, raising all the Force he possibly could, even to the arming of Shepherds and Slaves, whom mounting, he made fome three hundred Horfe. In the mean time feveral Cohorts revolted to Cafar, and Cn. Magines of Cremona, Master of the Works of Pompey, was taken on the way, and brought to Casar. Him he fent back with this Message to Pompey, that seeing there was no opportunity of meeting, he was refolved to feek him at Brundustum; it highly importing the Commonwealth, and every Mans fafety, that they two should confer together: Neither could matters succeed so well at a distance by the Intervention of a third Party. Coming then to Brundusium with fix Legions, he found that the Consuls were gone over to Dyr-Follows Pom- rachium, and Pompey was in the Town with twenty Cohorts. He knew not whether piy to Branda-he staid there to command the Adriatick, and the Coasts of Italyand Greece, or only wanted Shipping to make his Passage; but he would not endure that he should think he could not be forced to quit Italy, and therefore he refolved to block up the Haven, 18. Where and to take away the use of it from him.

Earth, and where the Sea was shallow near unto the Shoar; and farther in the deep where no fuch Mounts could be raifed, he placed flat Boats two together, over against the Mounts, of thirty foot square, which he fastened with Anchors to keep them from being toffed with the Waves; to them thus placed he added others of the same

19. The Work being half perfected, after nine days, the Ships that had transported the Confuls, and the other part of the Army, returned, and thereupon Pompey began to fit himself for his departure, either moved by these Works of Cesar, or else pursuing his former Determination. And the better to retard the profecution of Cafar, he stopped up the Gates, Streets, and Passages, sunk Ditches cross the ways, and therein stuck sharp Piles and Stakes, which he covered lightly with Hurdles and thin Earth, leaving only two ways free, which led to the Haven, and thefe too he fenced with a strong Palifado of huge and snarp Stakes. Then did he command the Soldiers to get aboard without noise or tumult, leaving here and there upon the Walls, and in the Towers, some of the readiest Slingers and Archers, to be called away upon warning when the Soldiers were shiped; appointing Vessels of burthen to take them in at a convenient place. The Citizens of Brundusium being disobliged Pompt follows the Cornet tice to Caefar of their departure, as they were running here and there, from the tops of their Houses. Caefar prepared to scale the Walls, but Pompey weighed Anchor, and the light armed Soldiers got to the Veffels e're his Men could mount them. Then were they feafonably advertised of the blind Ditch by the Inhabitants, and avoiding the danger, were brought a great compass about, and came to the Haven. There, by Skiffs and Boats, they feized

the best Stratagem that he ever used in all his life, and indeed he had made it evi-two Ships with Soldiers, which stuck by chance upon the Mounts Casar had 20. This flight of Pompey, accompanied with all the Circumstances, is esteemed dent to Cafar, if it had not been for the Information given by them of Brundusjum. However, his quitting the Place is censured but for a faulty resolution, though handfomly carried. Cefar marvelled much, that lying in a strong City, and expecting his Army to come out of Spain, and being Master of the Sea besides, he would leave Italy. Cicero also blamed him for abandoning Italy, therein following the Example Platarch. of Themistocles rather than of Pericles; whereas this troublesome time and affair was rather to be compared with that of Pericles than of the other; Cafar himself having shewed that he was afraid of the time in that he sent to Brundusium to treat His departure with Pompey. But so as Dio observes, did Pompey quit his Countrey, in such a manner, as was both in deliberation and action contrary to his former practice, when he came into Italy out of Asia; and therefore he procured a Fortune and Reputation contrary to his former. For he who once dismissed his Soldiers from Brundusum, that they should not molest the Citizens, now carried others out of Italy to molest them, and he who before had carried the Riches of the Barbarians to Rome, now carried all things from it he could to other places; and despairing utterly concerning his Country, resolved to use against it the assistance of Strangers, and of such as he had formerly reduced into fervitude; and he put more confidence in them for his fafety and Power, than in those of whom he had well deserved. Therefore he went fize, and covered them with Faggots and Earth, that Men might move upon them readily, and defend them. He fenced them with Hurdles, and fuch stuff, and on every fourth flote made a Tower two Stories high, to protect them from the force of Shipping and Fire. Pompey against them sent out great Ships of burthen with Towers of three Stories, full of all forts of Munition; and every day the Parties fought with Slings, Arrows, and other casting Weapons. Yet Castar, he himself tells us, carried matters so, as being willing not to let fall Conditions of Peace. Wondering that he heard nothing from Magius, he sent Caninius Rebilus, one of his Legati, to Scribonius Libo, (whose Daughter Pompey's Son had married) to whom he was allied, and an inward Friend, to perswade him to mediate a Reconciliation, and procure that Casar might speak with Pompey. It might be, he said, that both of them might yield to lay down their Arms upon equal Conditions, and then the greatest share of the Honour would fall to Libo. Having heard Caninius Libo went straight to Pompey, and within a while returning, brought word, that nothing could be done towards an agreement, because the Consuls were absent. Whereupon Casar

resolved to trouble himself no more about a Treaty, as he often had done, but to prepare vigoroully for War.

18. Where the mouth of the Haven was narrowest he raised great Mounts of Sect. 7.

Sect. 7. under such circumstances that he got instead of his former glory in War, a repute of pulillanimity and fear of Cafar; and for the Honour he had had of increasing the Renown of his Countrey, now procured the infamy of forfaking her.

21. But by this means became Cafar in threescore days Master of all Italy without Blood-shed. Now although he well understood, that it much imported his Interest to put an end to the War by pursuing Pompey, before he could joyn himself with the Transmarine Forces, yet confidering the lets and the length of time, and that he had no Shipping, but must stay for such as could be brought from Ancona, Gall, and the Straits, which at this time of the year would require a long and trouble-Cafar refolves some Passage; he resolved to steer another Course. He thought it not sit that Pompey's old Army, and the two Provinces of Spain, whereof one in gratitude was deeply ingaged to his Adverfary, should be affured and settled, or that time should be given them there to raise new Forces, or opportunity to wrest from him Italy and Gall in his absence. He resolved therefore for Spain, and gave order to the Municipal Towns to provide Shipping, and fend it to Brundustum. He sent Valerius and Curio with convenient Forces to feize Sardinia and Sicily, which they eafily did, Cotta and Cato the two Governours flying out of their Provinces.

22. Cafar then, to ease his Men and refresh them, carried them back into the Municipal Towns, and went himself directly to Rome, where, calling a Senate, he laid open to them the affronts and injuries offered him by his Enemies. He protested that he never fought Honour in the State by extraordinary means; but expected the legitimate time of the Consulship, and was content with that which it was lawful to an" Citizen to stand for. And the Tribunes of the People had propounded, that confideration of him, though absent, should be had; but it was contradicted by his Adverfaries, and by Cato's long refiftance, who frent the time according to his cultom in teadious Speeches; which if Pompey, being Conful, disliked, why did he fuffer it to be done? and if he did allow of it, why did he not suffer him to enjoy the kindness of the People? He declared how patient he had been, in having moved on his own accord, that both might quit their Forces, though this would have been very prejudicial to his Honour and Dignity. He shewed the malice and bitterness of his Enemies, in that they refused to do themselves what they required of others, and chose rather to put all things into consusion, than relinquish their Commands, and their Armies. He told at large what injury they had done him in taking away his Legions, and how cruel and infolent they had been against the Tribunes. He mentioned the Conditions he propounded, and the Conference defired and refused; and upon the whole, befought them to take the charge of the Common-wealth, together with him; but if, out of fcar, they refused, he would not be burthensome to them, but undertake it himself. He would have Messengers sent, neither did he regard at all what Pompey had faid in the Senate, That they to whom Messengers were sent had Authority attributed to them, and it fignified fear in those that sent them; these things being Arguments of pufillanimity; for his part, as he had endeavoured to excell in prowess and strength, so would he also in Justice and Equity.

23. The Senators were well pleafed that Messengers should be sent, but no Man was found that would go, for fear of Pompey, who, upon his departure from Rome, had faid in open Senate, that he would hold him that fraid there in the same condition with him that was in Cafar's Camp. Three days were spent in Debates and Excuses, L. Metellus the Tribunus Plebis being induced by Calars Adversaries to protract the Leaves it, and time, and hinder any matter that he should propound. Perceiving then their resolu-

goes into Gallition, after he had spent there in vain some few days, that he might not spend any more time, nor leave those things undone which he determined to do, he left the City, and went into the farther Gall. Such is the Account he gives us himself of what was done Gefars Relati- by himself and others during his stay in Rome, which is not full enough, if we conon not full e fult and regard other Writers. Dion Cassius mentioning his coming to Rome, adds, that the Senate was called without the Pomerium by Antonius and Cassius, who had formerly been put out of it. That his Speech was long and full of courtefie, he indeavouring thereby to gain their good wills, for the prefent, and put them in good hope for the time to come. For, beholding the multitude of his Soldiers, they were full of fears and suspicions, and therefore he thought it fit to cherish them, that they might keep quiet till he had done his business. Therefore neither did he blame any, nor threaten; nay, he inveighed against them who would make War upon their fellow Citizens, not without Imprecations, and moved, that Messengers might besent to Pompey about a Peace. After the same manner he spake to the People, which

of the Islands, promising also to bestow upon every Man three hundred Sesterces. Sect. 7. For all this, they at Rome confidered with themselves, that the words and the actions of Designers were very different, as was evident when such obtained what they fought for. That at first they promised all fine things to such as might be in capacity to oppose them; but having got possession of the thing designed, remembred their promises no more, but made use of what they had procured from them against them that gave them it, as they remembred that Marins and Sylla had pretended all fair things imaginable. Their fear was increased when they saw that no Mcslengers were fent; and that Pife the Father-in-law of Cafar was blamed exceedingly for making mention of a Mcffage. And how could they expect any Money, when what was left in the Treasury, was to be given to those Soldiers, of which they stood in fear, for their maintenance? Yet, as if all things went profperoully, did they refume these Habie which they were in time of Peace, and had laid by them.

24. The Proposal concerning Money was opposed by L. Metellus the Tribunus Plebis, who not being able to prevail, got him to the Treasury to watch the doors. But the Soldiers made no more of his watching than they did of his liberty of Speech, and breaking the Lock, (for the Confuls had taken away the Keys) took away the Money. Belides, many other Decrees were made, most of which Antony propounded under shew of equality, but indeed to establish Domination. But each fide called its Adversaries, the Enemies of the Common-wealth, and pretended for the fake of it to wage War, but both wrought only their own ends, and equally weakned the common Interest. Plutarch, as to the Messengers, adds another Reafon to that of Cafar, why none would undertake the Imployment. He faith, It was either because they feared Pompey, having forsaken him, or because they thought Cafar meant not as he spake, but that he used words of course to colour his purpose. When Metellus, one of the Tribunes, would not fuffer him to take any of the common Treasure out of the Temple of Saturn, but affirmed it was against the Law, he told him that times of War and Law were two things, and bade him, if what he was about did offend him, to get him gone; for, War could not bear such freedom and boldness of Speech; but when the War was ended, and all was quiet again, then he might speak what he would. He added, that he told him this of favour, departing therein from his Right; for, faith he, Both thou art mine, and all they that he went to the Temple door, where the Treasure lay, and finding no Keys, he caused Smiths to be fent for, and made them break open the Locks. Metellus thereupon began to hinder him, and some that stood by commended him for so doing; but Casar at length speaking bigly to him, threatned he would kill him presently if he persisted to trouble him; and further faid, Toung Man, thou knowest it is harder for me to say it than to do it. This word made Metellus quake, and he got him away, and ever after that Cafar had all at command for his Wars.

25. All this Cafar omits concerning this publick Treasure, which they say was preserved from the time that Rome was taken by the Galls, not to be made use of but upon some extream necessity. He pretends that Lentulus, who had orders to send it to Pompey, abandoned it by his flight, as we have seen, upon the first false report that Cosars Troops approached Rome. But, to say the truth, his Report is very different in many things that concern himself from what we read of him in other Authors, these two especially we make use of; and therefore we think it necessary to take in what others fay in this matter of the Civil War especially; it being difficult to a Writer in such a case to resist the temptation, and treat as indifferently of things which concern himself, as those wherein he is no way concerned. But, if you please, take along with you the excuse Appian maketh for him, who deriding the scrupulolosity of the ancient Romans that would not touch that Treasure but in extremity of War against the Celte or Galles, faith, That Cesar might lawfully take it, because he had conquered that Nation, and the Romans had no more cause to fear them. Dio tells us further, That he took in Sardinia and Sicily without a stroak, the Governours of them receding from their Commands; and that he fent away Aristobulus into Paleifine his Country, that he might act something against Pompey. He gave liberty to the Sons of such as had been proscribed by Sylla to sue for Offices of Magistracy ; and in conclusion, setled all matters both in Rome and throughout Italy, as might most conduce to his present Affair. Having committed the care of them to Antony, he resolved for Spain, which greatly favoured Pompey, and put him in fear, lest in hisabsence Gall might also be perswaded to revolt. In the mean time Cicero, having not come in the fight of Cafar, and with him certain other Senators, went to Pomdistance of time: And the Inhabitants of all the Cities which Casar had not secured

Sect. 7. pey, whom they looked on as having the better cause, and who would they imagined prove victorious. For, the Consuls before their departure, and Cicero himself, then Proconful, had commanded that all should follow them to Thessalonica, the Enemy having seized Rome. They were indeed the chief of the Senate, and whithersoever they went, they carried with them a resemblance of the Common-wealth. Therefore did most of the Senators and Equites follow them either presently, or after some by his Arms. But now let us hear Cafar himself relate what he did after he had left

26. Upon his Arrival in Gall he found that Pompey had sent into Spain Viballius Rufus, whom Cafar had taken at Corfinium, and dismissed; as also that Domitius with eight Gallies was gone to secure Massilia, (or Marseilles) the Inhabitants of which, upon a Message received from Pompey, shut their Gates against Casar; called into their City the Albicans, a barbarous People, who of ancient time had held amity with them, and dwelt upon the Mountains above Marfeilles, and made all preparations for defence. Cafir calling out some fifteen of the Citizens, expostulated with them, and told them they should rather follow the Example of all Italy, than apply themselves to the Will of any one Man. The Town made this Answer, That they understood the People of Rome were divided into two Parties, and whether of them was in the right they could not judge. That the Leaders of these Factions. Pompey and Cæsar, were both special Patrons and Benefactors to their City, the one having augmented their publick Revenues, and endowed their State with the Lands of the Volce Areconici, and the Helvii; and the other having conquered and subdued Gallia, (a Place it feems so called near the Town) gave it to them, and increased their Tolls or Imposts; that therefore, as they were equally obliged to both, they would carry an equal respect unto them, and not aid either of them against the other, or receive them into their City or Ports. But while these things were in hand, Domitius arrived, and was made both Governour of the City, and General for the War. A Fleet now they rigged up, and made Provision for a Siege; with cefar besseg. which injuries Cessar, he tells us, provoked, brought three Legions to Marselles, re-cits Marselles. folved to prepare necessaries for an Attacque, and to build twelve Gallies at Arelatum, or Arles. These in thirty days time from the cutting down of the Timber, were built, armed, rigged, and brought down to Marfeilles. And the Command of them he gave to D. Brutus, and left C. Trebonius, his Legatus, to follow the

27. Dion Cassius his Relation so far agrees with this of Casar, as to affirm that they of Marseilles were the only Men in Gall, who neither followed his Party, nor received him into their City. He faith the Answer they gave him was observable, that they were the Affociates of the People of Rame, and that at present they did not curiously inquire, nor were able to distinguish whether the one or the other was in the wrong. But if they pleafed to come as Friends, they would receive them both without their Arms, but neither of them, if they came in a State of War. He speaks nothing of Domitius his coming, which Cefar infifts upon, and the receiving of him as a just ground for the War; but adds, that being belieged, they both defended themselves against him, and also against Trebonius and D. Brutus a long time, that Casar himself spent some time in attacquing Marseilles, which he thought easie to be taken, thinking it a thing unfufferable, that he who had taken Rome it self without any trouble, should be shut out by them of that City. But perceiving the Siege would be drawn out in length, they making fuch reliftance, he left it to others, and He hasteth in hastened into Spain. He had dispatched thither C. Fabius; but fearing that he might be worsted if he engaged in Fight, he resolved to attend his business there in his own Person. Hehimself writes to the same effect. As that he sent from Marfeilles C. Fabius one of his Legati with three Legions that wintered about Narbon, commanding him with all care and diligence to feize on the Passage of the Pyrenean Hills, which were at that time kept by the Forces of L. Afranius. The other Legions which wintered further off he ordered to follow after. And Fabius according to his Directions hasted and put the Garrison from the Passage; and by great Journeys marched toward Afranius his Army.

28. After the Arrival of Viballius Rufus in Spain the three Legati of Pompey, which were Afranius, Petreius, and Varro, did so dispose and divide their Charges, that Petreius was ordered to bring his three Legions out of Lustrania, through the Territories of the Vectones, and joyn himself with Afranius in the hithermost Spain; and Varro was to keep the farther Province. Petreins accordingly hafted to Afranius, and induced by the opportunity of the Place, they agreed to keep the War on foot Sect. 7. near about Ilerda. Afranius had three Legions, and Petreius two, belides Scutati of the nearer Province, and Cetrati of the farther, some eighty Cohorts; and of both Provinces about five thousand Horse. Casar had fent his Legions into Spain, together with fix thousand Auxiliaries of Foot, and three thousand of Horse, which had been with him in his former Wars. And at his request he had the same number out of Gall, the most noble and valiant being called out of every City, besides those of the Aquitani and Highlanders, bordering upon the Gallick Province. Now was headvertised, that Pompey himself was coming through Mauritania into Spain with his Legions, and with all speed would be with him. Thereupon he borrowed Money of the Tribunes, and the Centurions of the Soldiers, and distributed it to his Army, by which larges he gained two Points. For by the Loan as a Pledge he ingaged the Officers to indeavour his good fuccess as their own Interest. And by the Largess he purchased the good Affection of the Soldiers.

29. Within two or three days Cafar arrived with nine hundred Horse, which he had kept with him for a Guard; and having viewed the Place, the next day in a triple Body he marched toward Ilerda, and offered Battel in an equal and indifferent place. But, Afranius was not disposed to Battel, which Cafar seeing, drew a Trench behind fome of his Legions, as they stood in Arms facing the Enemy, and fortified his Camp, though Afranius and Petreius to divert him brought down their Forces, and provoked his Men to fight. Betwixt the Town and the Hill where Pompey's Officers were incamped, there was a Plain above a quarter of a Mile over, and in it a rifing Ground, which Cefar endeavoured to possess himself of, thereby to cut them off from the Town and the Bridge, which lay over the River Sicoris; but his Design being perceived, Afranius his Men came thither first, and those of Cafar were forced to retire to the Legions. The whole Army was well-nigh affrighted, for as all Soldiers, by living long in a place, get much of the Usages and Customs of the Country. Afranius his Men now fought in a fashion like those of the Lustanians, who were wont to run furioully upon their Enemies, and bold to feize on a Place, not regarding their Orders or Ranks, but fighting in a scattered and dispersed manner. The Enemy now infolent upon their fuccess, vigorously pursued, till Cefar, bringing out the ninth Legion, forced him to turn tail, and retire under the Walls of Ilerda; but the Legion purfued them, till it came into a disadvantageous place under the Hill. whereon the Town stood. Here from the upper ground it was forely annoyed, and the Fight continued long in so unequal a Place, each Party relieving its Men with fresh Supplies. They fought some five hours, and Cafar's Men having spent their other Weapons, drew their Swords and made up to the Hill with fuch fuccess, that they forced their Enemy under the Walls, and the Horse got up in an easie afcent, and riding betwixt the Armies, the better fecured the Retreat of their Friends. On Cafars fide seventy Men were flain, and fix hundred at least wounded. And of that of Afranius two hundred Soldiers, and five Centurions. But as well the one as the other thought it had the better.

30. After this followed a great Rain, which caused the Rivers, betwixt which Ca-sar was incamped, so to swell, that all Provisions were cut off from him, and he was very much diffressed. And the Inconvenience grew to that heighth, that, on the contrary, Afranius his Party having plenty of all things, by reason of the Bridge of Ilerda, concluded the War in a manner to be at an end, and thereof they wrote Letters to Rome, where the News was so acceptable, that Visits were made to the Family of Afranius by those that congratulated for his success. Hereupon also many went out of Italy to Pompey, of whom some to be the first Messengers of the News, that they might not feem to expect the last event of the War, and come when they faw the quarrel determined. All the ways were kept by Afranius, and no Bridges could be made to serve in stead of those that had been broken down with the violence of the Waves. When things were come thus to extremity, Cafar caused some Boats to be made of light stuff, and small Timber in the Keel, and with Wicker in the upper parts, being covered with Hides, and in the night conveying them in Carts about twenty two Miles from the Camp, therewith made a shift to transport his Soldiers, and settle a course for Provisions. And he was cheared by news from Marseilles of a Defeat given by D, Brutus his Admiral to the Inhabitants, who sending out seventeen Gallies, besides many other Vessels, hoped to over-power him by their Numbers. But Cafar had taken the stoutest Men of all the Legions, as well of the Ante-

31. But, upon making the Bridge, fortune turned on Cafars fide, for he then had the Command of the Country. Many Cities and States sent and submitted to him, and the Enemy being discouraged, resolved to transfer the War into Celtiberia, where the Name of Pompey was very precious, and that of Cafar scarcely known: There they expected a good Addition of Horse, and other Supplies, and thought to draw on the War in length till Winter. Setting forward, they were much disturbed in their march by Cafars Horse, and the Legions in the Camp moved him by their Centurions and Tribunes, that they also might pursue them, refusing no labour nor hazard. Having with great difficulty got over the River, which he drained with Trenches as much as he could, they fetch'd a compass of some fix Miles, and yet came up with the Enemy about three of the Clock in the Afternoon, and still dogging him at the heels, forced him to incamp himself, and stop his Journey. Upon discovery, both sides found the way for five Miles was open and Champion. but afterwards Mountainous and Rocky, and that it was their Interest to possess themselves of the straits, which whosoever first should take, might hinder the Enemy from proceeding farther. Casar took a Circuit, and kept no High-way, the Soldier refuling no toil in passing broken Rocks and Stones, which did so hinder them, that they were forced to give their Weapons from Hand to Hand, and lift up one another for most part of the way. This course he was forced to take, because the Ways leading to Iberus and Octogesa were possessed by the Enemies Camp, and he had that good fortune that none of his Men thought much of their labour, because they hoped an end would be put to all their travel, if they could but keep the Enemy from paffing Iberus, and cut off his Provisions.

32. If had been resolved in a Councel of War by Afranius and Petreius, not to ftir in the night, and when they imagined that by Cofars course he took, he was returning back to Ilerda, they applauded themselves in their resolution. But finding at length that he did but fetch a compass, and that the Front tended directly to the Streights, they were startled, and hurried in all hast to get first the possession of them. Now the contention was which of the two Parties should first take them: Cafar's was hindered by the difficulty of the Way, and that of Afranius by Cafars Cavalry; and indeed if it should first get the Hills, it might happily quit it self of danger; but the Baggage and the Cohorts left in the Camp would be so intercepted by Cafars Army, that there would be no means to relieve them. It so fell out, that Cefar first came to the place, and being got from amongst the Rocks into a Plain, could put his Army in order to give Battel. Afranius thus disappointed, got to a small Hill, and thence fent four Cohorts with all speed to posses themselves of the highest Mountain, intending to follow after with all his Forces, and by the ridges of the Hills to get to Octogesa. But as, by a Circuit, they endeavoured to do this, Casars Horse set upon them, and cut them all in pieces in the fight of both the Armies. Now was a notable Advantage offered of doing fomething to purpose against the Enemy, who was discouraged by this Deseat, so as in probability not to endure a Charge. And the Legates, Centurions, and Tribunes came to Cafar, and defired him to improve it, for all their Soldiers were ready and forward to it. But he tells us he was in hope to end the Controversie without a Stroak, or any Wound of his Men, having cut off the Enemy from Provisions. Why then should he lose any of his Soldiers, though it were to gain a Victory? Why should he suffer those who had so well deserved of him to be wounded? Why should he put the matter to hazard? especially it being the part of a General no less to overcome by Policy than the Sword. He was also moved with pity toward such Roman Citizens as should be slain; and his own Men. rather defired to accomplish his business, and work out his ends with their safety. This opinion of his was fo universally disallowed, that his Men stuck not to say, That because he over-flipt such an opportunity of Victory, when he would have them, portunity given them, withdrew themselves into their Camp. 33. To be fure Cafar had shut up all Passages leading to Iberus, so that the adverse Party had but two Ways left open, either to return to Ilerda, or to Tarracon. Being troubled thereat, and that they were barred of all Provisions, they consulted what course to take, but were diverted by a necessity they were put upon to protect their

the Camp to the Water-fide, and upon this occasion, the two Generals being far off from the Camp, the Soldiers called to one another, and fought out their acquaintance, and they of Afranius his Party confessed they ought their Lives to the favour of Cafar, who had spared them when they were terrified the day before: They defired affurance for the Lives of their two Generals, left they should seem to look to their own fafety and betray them; which being granted, they promifed to come with their Enligns to Cafars Camp, and thereupon fent some of their chief Centurions as Deputies to treat. On both fides they invited their Friends, fo as they feemed to have one and the fame Camp, and feveral Persons applied themselves in particular to Cafar. And Afranius, upon notice hereof, left the Work he had begun, and retired into his Camp, prepared as it seemed to take patiently what should befall him; but Petreins was of another opinion, he put his Houshold into Arms, and with the Pratorian Cohort of the Cetrati, and some stipendiary Horse of the Barbarous People, whom he was wont to keep about him as a Guard, hasted to the Rampire, broke off the Discourse of the Soldiers, and drove those of Casar from the Camp, killing fuch of them as he could light on. This done, he went weeping about to the dered by Pt- Maniples, calling on the Soldiers, and befeeching them not to forfake him, nor Pompey their General. A concourse of Soldiers being made, hereupon an Oath they required of every Man, not to abandon or betray the Army, or the Generals, nor to Cabal in any Confultation without confent of the reft. 34. Such effect had the choler of Petreius, as to cause it to be proclaimed, that whosoever had with him any of Casars Soldiers, should bring them out; and some being brought, they were publickly killed before the Pretorium; yet most of them were concealed by their Acquaintance, and in the night-time fent over the Rampire. But Cafar took the contrary course. He caused enquiry to be made after such as came into his Camp in time of Treaty, and fent them away fafe; and his moderate and mild Proceeding had fuch operation, that many Tribunes and Centurions staid with him, whom he advanced together with fuch Roman Equites as were of the better Rank. In the mean time the Afranians were distressed, being hindered from foraging. The Legionary Soldiers indeed had some of them store of Corn, being commanded to take with them twenty two days Provision from Ilerda; but the Cetrati and Auxiliaries not being in condition to furnish themselves, nor their Bodies able to carry Burthens, a great number of them fled daily to Cafar. The Captains seeing in what extremity they were, resolved to return to Ilerda, as the most expedient course, where they had left behind them a little Corn; and this they attempted to do, but were so closely pursued by Cafar, that they could not incamp themselves in any

ficulties, he chose rather to force them to a Composition, than to fight. 35. For this purpose he endeavoured to inclose them with a Ditch and Rampart, to hinder their Sallies. They to prevent this, brought out their Legions, and imbatteled themselves under their Camp; yet still he refused to fight, both for the reafon now mentioned, and because the place betwixt the Camps was so narrow, that a Victory obtained would have been little advantageous to him. Notwithstanding he also drew out, and they stood im-batteled till Sun-setting, and then retired into their Camps again. The next day, when Cefar went about to finish the Fortifications, they tried to pass the River Sicoris by a Ford, but being hindered also from that by Soldiers he had disposed upon the Bank, they then sent and required a Parley; for they were now that up on all fides, their Horses had been without meat four days together, and they were in extream want of Water, Wood and Corn. They would have had the Conference private; but Cafar denied to treat, except in publick. Then did Afranius, in hearing of both the Armies, defire of him, that he would ' not be offended, neither with them the Commanders, nor the Soldiers, for being faithful to Pompey. But now they had done their duty, and having sufficiently fmarted in all respects, and suffered more in Body and Reputation than they were able to bear, they confessed themselves vanquished, and imploring his mercy, desired they might not undergo the extremity of Fortune. In answer to what Afranius ' delivered, as humbly and submissively as possible, Casar expostulated for the Injuries they and their Friends had done him, and shewed how all the Forces had been kept up in Spain, purposely against himself, the Provinces standing in no need of them; how the course of Elections of Magistrates had been broken to do him prejudice; and

pose them, and protect himself in that opposition; for which purpose he raised an extraordinary Tower not far from the Wall, which was built by Stories, and by degrees with admirable Art and Industry. The Work-men were defended by the out-jettings of Matrelles, and other Materials, till they brought to perfection fix Stories, and a Musculum or Mouse, which reached even the Wall it self, with such strength and shape, that it could not be forced down, nor over-powered. This Device had so great execution, that the Besieged discouraged at it, and looking for nothing but the destruction of their City, threw themselves unarmed out of the Gates. and with Lamentations and Weeping, joyned with Arguments that were moving. Their perfidi. Itility should cease till Casar himself arrived. But so perfidious they were, that after ous humour. a few days when the Romans were grown remifs and careless, they took theadvantage of the Noon-time, when all were alleep, or out of the way, and rushing out of the Gates, set fire to the Works and Engines. The Cafarians were at first amazed, but recollecting themselves as well as they could, they drove them back with great flaughter, and fell to re-edifie the Works with greater alacrity than before. They began a Mount of a strange and unheard-of fashion, raised with two Side-walls of Brick fix foot thick apiece, and joyned together with Floors. And the Work was carried on with fuch speed, that the loss of their former Labour was redeemed by their incredible Dexterity and Valour. They within perceiving all things to go contrary to their expectations, and confidering that the Neck of Land leading to the Town, might be so possessed with Fortifications, that their Soldiers could not stand upon their Works: That the Enemy had raised a Counter-mine against the Wall of their Town, and that Miffile Weapons might be cast upon them; knowing also that there would not be any more place for deceit and treacheed to yield. ry, they descended to the same Articles of Surrendry as had been formerly ac-

39. Marcus Varro in the further Province of Spain had all this while variously demeaned himself toward Casar. At first distrusting how matters would go with the contrary Party, he spake as kindly of him as of Pompey; but afterward upon report, and his own belief of Afranius his good fuccess, he set himself against him every way he could both by Word and Action. He levied Soldiers, he caused them of Gades to provide ten Gallies, and ordered many others to be made at Hippalis. He took all the Money and Ornaments out of the Temple of Hercules; made many reflecting Speeches against Cesar and his Interest, affirming in publick, that he had been feveral times worsted, and that a great number of his Men had revolted to Afranius. Varro his act-He exacted much Money and Wheat from the Provincials, conficated the Estates of fuch as he thought disaffected, and constrained all the Province to swear fidelity to him, and to Pompey; and being at length advertised what had happened, in the hither Province, he kept himself with two Legions, and all the Shipping and Provision. at Gades, as most fafe, knowing that the whole Province affected the Cause of Casar. And that so it did he found shortly by further experience. For though Casar by good Motives was called into Italy, yet refolving to leave no appearance of War behind him, he fent two Legions before him, and hasted himself with fix hundred Horse into the farther Spain. He sent also an Edict for calling an Assembly at Corduba, and thither the Towns fent their Deputies unanimously, and all Roman Citizens appeared. They shut their Gates of their own accord against Varro, and the Gaditans agreed with the Tribunes to drive Gallonius, whom he had left Governour there, out of their City; fo that of Varro's two Legions, one forfook him and went its way, he looking on, and then perceiving how he was diffreffed, he fent and yielded up the other; and afterward coming to Cafar at Corduba, delivered up the Money lying in his Hands, and gave an Account of the Corn and Shipping that was any where provided. After this Cafar gave thanks, and caused restitution to be made to his Friends; ordered the the things taken out of the Temple to be carried back, and making Q. Cassus Governour of the Province, he left with him four Legions. From Gades he passed by Ship to Tarraco, then by Land to Narbon, and thence to Marseilles, where he first received News of the Law made at Rome for creating of a Dictator, and that M. Lepidus the Prator named him to be the Man. The Mallilians being re-

supply them with Corn, and did accordingly perform it. 36. To this generofity of Cefar other Authors bear witness, who had sufficient opportunity to know the Truth. They rather make the dangers he underwent in this Expedition greater than he doth himself; and Dio writes, That at Rome they gave him for loft, and many, as well Senators as others, betook themselves to Pompey. He adds, That at the same time D. Brutus gave a defeat to the Massilienses at Sea, which if it had not happened, Cafar had been ruined; but the Report of this Victory being increased by design, and arriving in Spain, had such operation upon them there, that changing their opinions, they fetled themselves to his Party. Having promised Afrawins and his Companions to offer them no violence in any respect, and particularly not to constrain them to fight for him against Pompey, he kept himself strictly to his word; for he put none of them to death, although they had killed some of his unwary Soldiers in time of Truce; neither compelled he any of them to follow him in the Civil War, but the chief being dismissed, the rest of their own accord closed with him for advantage. This did him especial service both as to his Reputation and management of his Affairs. For all Spain, and the Soldiers in it, except fuch as in Betica, M. Terentius Varro, the Legate of Pompey commanded, he hereby got to his Party, which things fo fucceeding, he travelled as far as Gades, and did no other injury to any Man than in what concerned Money, a great quantity of which he raifed every where as he could. Many Honours he bestowed both publickly and privately, and gave freedom of the City to the People of Gades, which they of Rome afterward confirmed. And so in the opinion of Dio, he requited them for the Dream he had there when he was Questor, that he lay with his Mother, and for the hope he thence conceived of having all things in his sole Power. Over Spain he set Cassimus, who being Questor there under Pompey, had reason to understand the humour of the Nation. He himself went by Ship to Tarraco, and thence proceeded by the Prreneans, where he erected no Trophy, knowing his Adversary to have been blamed for so doing, but near that of Pompey caused a large Altar to be made of smooth

37. In the mean time, at Marseilles, C. Trebonius made Mounts, and did all things Casas de Billo he could to annoy the Town, at that place which gave passage by Land; for three parts of it were in a manner washed by the Sea. But such was the Provision of all necessaries for War, which in ancient time they had stored up in the Town, that no Hurdles made of Rods or Ofiers were able to refult the force of their Engines. For our of their great Balistae they shot Beams twelve Foot long, pointed with Iron, with fuch execution, that they would pierce through four Courfes of Hurdles, and flick in the Earth. Besides this the Albici made frequent Sallies, and set fire to the Mounts and Turrets; but they were cafily preferved by the Roman Soldiers, who forced fuch as Sallied out to return with great loss. While they tugged thus on both fides by Land. an opportunity was presented for a Sea-Battle, by means of L. Nasidius, who was fent by Pompey with a Navy of fixteen Ships. To these the Massilans joyned as many with all earnestness imaginable, and with Exhortations to one another, and Prayers to their Gods, as now being to adventure for all, for the Lives of themselves, and the Liberty of their City. But Brutus had also increased his Fleet with those which Casar had caused to be built at Arles, and he had the advantage of exhorting his Men to despile the Enemy as a vanquished Party, who had been overthrown in their very strength. The Massilians yet were wanting in no Point of Valour, fighting for all they had, as their Friends had adjured them; and their Vessels excelled in nimble ness of Swimming and Tacking. But however, they were out-done by Brutus, whose Ship also was so nimble, that it escaped two of theirs, which designed from contrary quarters to come upon her, so as they fell foul on each other, and did such mutual mischief, that their Enemies seeing them thus distressed, set upon, and quickly sunk them both. The Ships that came with Nasidius proved of no use, and quickly left the Fight, which had that iffue, that of those which came from Marfeilles five were funk, and four were taken. One escaped with Nasidius his Fleet; and one of them that remained carried Tydings of the Defeat to the City, which received the

40. In the mean time Matters had a contrary iffue in Africk under the Conduct of Curio, who transported two Legions into that Country. The Fleet of Pompey he beat and dispersed, and such Ships as were in the Bay of Utica he drew off to his Party, by proclaiming, that fuch (being in number two hundred) as would not presently come, should be taken for Enemies. At Utica lay Actius Varus, to whom King Juba had fent to affift that Party fix hundred Numidian Horse, and sour hundred Foot, having had acquaintance with Pompey by reason that his Father was his Guest, and he bare a spleen to Curio, for the Law he preferred when he was Tribune How Matters of the People, for Confiscation of his Kingdom. The Cavalry on each fide ingaged; the Numidians were not able to abide the Charge of Curio's Horse; but about an hundred and twenty being flain, the rest retired to the Camp. The next day he Incamped himself near the Town, but before the Fortifications were finished, a noise there was of great Forces that were coming from King Juba. Yet did his Horse, before the Legions could be well put in order, drive away all the Kings Forces that came marching without fear or care, and flew a great number of the Foot, the Horse getting almost all safe into the Town by the Sea-Shore. But so it happened that the next night after, two Centurions of the Nation of the Narli fled from Curio with twenty two of their Soldiers to Varus, to whom they declared, that the minds of the whole Army were alienated from him, and that it was very expedient that the Armies should come in fight, and find means to speak together: Hereupon Varus drew out his Soldiers the next morning, and Curio put his Men also into order. But it had further happened that Curio had carried over these Legions which Cafar had formerly taken at Corfinium; so that a few Centurions being slain, the Companies and Maniples remained the same. Now in Varus his Army there was one S. Quintilius Varus, who had been also at Corfinium, and being let go by Casar, went into Africk. This Quintilius taking the occasion so fitly offered, went about the Army of Curio, and belought the Soldiers as he could, that they would not forget the first Oath they had taken to Domitius, and to him their Questor, nor bear Arms against them that had run the same Fortune, and endured the same Siege; nor fight for those who by way of reproach had called them Fugitives or Turn-coats. And he added some Promises of Recompence, if they would follow him and Actius. 41. Hereupon Curio his Army stood mute, and was much disturbed in mind, but they declared not themselves by any sign either one way or other, and each Party drew back to their Camps. In conclusion, the Legions which before were in the Service of Pompey, willingly imbraced what was offered them; old acquaintance having made them forget what kindness they had lately received from Cesar, being also of divers Countries and Nations. Curio seeing himself and his Affairs in such danger, after the matter had been in vain debated in a Council of War, called together the Soldierrs, and in an exquisite Speech harangued unto them. He called to remembrance what they had done for Cafar at Corfinium; how by their furtherance he had gained the greatest part of Italy, all the rest of the Municipal Towns being drawn to follow him by their endeavours. He shewed how great folly it would be now to betray those who professed themselves wholly theirs and that afterwards they might come into their Power who took themselves to be undone formerly by their means. He related what Cesar had done in Spain; that there two Armies were beaten, two Generals defeated, two Provinces taken, and all within forty days after he came in view of them. He put them in mind that they did not forfake Domitius, but that he forfook them. For he thrust them out, and exposed them to all extremity. Without their knowledge or privity he fought to fave himfelf by flight; and then they were kept alive by Cafars Clemency. He demanded how he could bind them by the Oath of Fidelity, when having cast away his Fasces, and laid down his Authority, he himfelf was made a private Person, and became captivated to another Mans Power. He told them, in conclusion, what he himself had done in this Expedition, for which, though he was content to be called Cafars Soldier, yet they had stilled him by the Title of Imperator. And if it repented them, he would willingly again refign it, left they should feem to give him Honour, which might turn to

42. His Oration fo wrought upon the Soldiers, that they oftentimes interrupted him, as grieving to lie under a suspicion of Revolt, and at their desire he resolved to give Battel upon the first occasion offered, seeing that the minds of all Men were so Sect. 7 changed. And the day following an occasion was offered, which he so far improved. critiquis Vasa to put Varse his Army to the rout, and to force them to retire to their Camp, militaring build he middle have taken, but the his Man, not blinking of Citi, me to their Camp, which he might have taken, but that his Men, not thinking of fuch work, but only of a Battle, were not provided of fit Instruments. Of the Adversaries were slain fix hundred, with the loss of one Man on Curio's fide, one Fabius Pelignus, an ordinary Soldier, who in the Pursuit fought for Varus, calling him with a loud Voice, as though he had been one of his own Soldiers, and had something to say to him. Being often called, as he looked back, asking him what he would have, and ftood ftill, he made at Varus his Shoulder with his Sword, which was unarmed, and was very near killing him: Yet he avoided the danger by receiving the Blow upon his Target, and Fabius was presently inclosed and slain. Many more on Varus his side were wounded than were flain, who all, befides many others that feigned themselves hurt. left the Camp for fear, and went into the Town; which Varus perceiving, and knowing the aftonilhment of the Army, left a Trumpeter in the Camp, and a few Tents for show, and about the third Watch drew his Army in silence

43. Curio now as Conqueror, the next day prepared to beliege Utica, the Inhabitants of which favoured Cafar, and the rest in the Town being discouraged, all talked of a Surrender, and began to press Varus to it. But news arrived, that King Juba was coming to the Relief of the Place with all his Forces, This, Curio was fo confident, as not to believe at first, but when it was found affuredly that the Kings Forces were come within twenty five Miles, then he withdrew himself into a Place called Cornelius his Camp, from P. Scipio his Incamping himself there formerly, which was every way convenient for defence and supply of Provisions. Hither he fent to have the two Legions and the Horse brought out of Sicily, and here he thought to draw out the War in length; when another report was brought, that the King himself was not come, being deteined by some Controversies of the Leptitani; but only Sabura his Lieutenant was fent with some competent Forces, and was not far from Utica: To these Reports giving too light and easie credit, he altered his purpole, and refolved to give him Battle, being violently led to this refolution (Celar his Friend tells us) by his youthful heat, the greatness of his courage, the success of former times, and his confidence in managing of the War. He fent all the Cavalry the first night to the River Bagrada, where the Enemy lay indeed under the Command of Sabura. But the King followed after with all his Forces, and lay continually within fix Miles, or thereabouts.

44. The Horse fell upon the Numidians, as they lay scattered, in a barbarous manner, altogether secure, and killing many of them, put the rest to slight. Curio himfelf having left a Guard to his Camp, followed, and met with his Cavalry in their return, of whom demanding who was General at Bagrada, and they faying Sabura, he omitted for halt to inform himself of the rest, but told his Men, that now they faw was true what was formerly reported by Fugitives, that the King was not come, but had fent some small Forces which could not make their Party good with a few Horse; and he bade them therefore make hast to take the Spoil, and to receive the reward of their merits. The Soldiers incouraged with the fight of the Booty, which their Friends had taken, and their bragging Speeches, conceived also hope that it would be as he faid, and hasted to find the Enemy, affrighted and astonished, as Cario believed, who commanded the Cavalry to follow him; but the Horse-men having travelled all night, could by no means do it; but some stayed in one place, and some in another, and yet this did not hinder or discourage Curio. Now see the Islue. Juba having notice of the Conflict, in the night fent immediately two thouland Spanish and Gallick Horse, which he kept for the safety of his Person, and such of the Foot as he most trusted, to relieve Sabura; he himself, with the rest of his Forces, and forty Elephants, followed flowly after.

45. Sabura suspecting that Curio was coming, Imbattelled all his Forces, and gave order, that under pretence of fear they should retreat by little and little, till he gave the Signal of Battel, or other directions. Curio supposed they fled indeed, and drew his Forces down from an Hill into the Plain, having marched now fixteen Miles. Sabura gave the Signal for Battel, and with his Horse charged the Romans, who were harried and wearied, and the Horse-men being but two hundred in number, (the rest staying by the way) were spent with travel, yet wanted they no courage nor defire to fight, and on what part foever they charged, they forced the Enemy to give way; but they could not purfue them far, nor put their Horses to any round or from the King. Curio feeing his Men fo diffrayed, as not to receive his Orders, commanded them, as the last hope, to fly to the adjoyning Hills; but Sabura had also pos-

the Army, and malled them down behind, being often re-inforced by Succours fent felled these places, and so they fell into utter despair, some being slain as they fled, and others falling down without wounding. Cn. Domitiss, General of the Horfe, defired Cario to fave himfelf by flight to the Camp, promifing not to leave or for-fake him; but he confidently replied, That he would never come in Cafars fight, hair defeated and. A few Horfe-men faved themselves. The Foot were all killed to a Man; but flich Horfe-men faved themselves. The Foot were all killed to a Man; but flich Horfe-men faved themselves. Horse-men as staid behind to refresh their Horses escaped to the Camp. Such as defired to be transported into Sicily, when Boats were brought, sunk them by crouding in, and the rest of the Vessels would not come to Shoar, by that fight discouraged; fo that but a few Soldiers and Masters of Families that could swim to the Ships got over safe. The rest yielded to Varus, whom Juba challenging as his Booty, caused many of them to be flain, and felecting a few of the rest, sent them into his Kingdom; Varus in vain complaining that his Faith and Promife were violated. The King rode into the Town, accompanied by many Senators, and there remaining a few days, gave such orders for things as he thought fit, and then returned into his own Kingdom with all his Forces. 46. But now was Cafar Dictator, and held the Assembly for creation of Magistrates.

Cefar Dicta-

He himself and P. Servilius Isauricus were created Confuls; for at this time was he capable to be chosen, it being now ten years from his first Consulship, and consequently he was not obnoxious to the Law published by Sylla, wherein was provided, that no Man should be chosen to an Office within ten years after he had supplied the same. He took notice that credit was very scant, throughout Italy, and money lent was not repayed. He gave order that Arbitrators should be chosen to make an estimation of Estates and Goods according as they had been valued before the War, and that at that rate Creditors should take them for their Monies. He restored the ancient course of Rogations, made by the Pretors and Tribunes, to the People; as also certain that were condemned for indirect sping for Magistracy by a Law in Pompey's time, when he kept the Legions about him in the City, he reftored, and those who had offered him affiltance at the beginning of the War, though they did not do it, he procured to be absolved by the People, that he might not seem ingrateful, nor yet assume to himself what belonged to the Comitia. In accomplishing these things, celebrating the Latine Holy-days, and holding the Assemblies of the People, he spent eleven days; then gave over his Dictatorship, lest the City, and went to Brundusium, having commanded seven Legions, and all his Horse, to come thither. Such is the Account he himself gives us of what he did in his Dictatorship.

What other

47. And other Writers in their Relations do little differ from that of his. Plutarch faith in his Life, That when he returned to Rome, Pifo, his Father-in-law, advised him to fend Messengers to Pompey to treat of Peace; but Isauricus, to flatter him, was against it. That Casar, then created Dictator by the Senate, called home all the Banished, and restored to Honour the Children of them who had been slain in Sylla's time, and did somewhat restrain the Usuries that did oppress them; and besides made some other Ordinances, but very few; for he was Dictator only eleven days, and then made himself Consul with Servilius Isauricus; and after that determined to sollow the War. All the rest of his Army he lest coming on the way, and went himfelf before with fix hundred Horse, and five Legions, in the Winter Quarter, about the Month of January, which by the Athenians was called Posideon.

48. Dion Caffius having told us how this great Man took away all the Arms, Ships and Money of the Mafilians, and at length all the reft faving the Name of Liberty, because Pompey left free Phocea, from which the Mafilians descended, then acquaints us with a Mutiny of certain of his Soldiers at Placentia. They pretended they were fpent with labours, but the matter was, they took it ill that he would not give them leave to plunder and spoil the Country; and now they thought they could ask nothing but he would grant it, because of the need at present he had of them. But their hopes were very ill founded; for fo far was he from granting anything they mutinously defired, that calling them together, he shewed them in a long Speech 21.17 quiltum what it was they deferved, and not only by word but deed; for he caused them to be Cestaria vil incompassed with their fellow Soldiers for his own security, and then made them an Dissis, vide example of his Justice by taking out by lot, and putting to death the boldest of them; 105, 200. the the rest, as being of no use to him, he cashiered; but afterward received them again Sect when they had feen and repented of their Error.

49. But while he was still in his Journey from Marfeilles, Dion adds, that M. H. milius Lepidus, he who afterward was Triumvir, and at prefent Prator, advited the People to make him Dictator, which was speedily done according to the Custom. Coming to Rome, he entered upon his Office, but nothing tharp or levere did he the time he boreit: On the contrary, he gave liberty to Exiles, Milo excepted to return home, and ordained Magistrates for the following year, for hitherto none had been put into the places of them that were gone away; infomuch that there being no Hedis, the Tribum Plebis were obliged to discharge their Duties. He made new Pontifices in the room of the Deceased, yet therein not observing all things required by their Laws. He gave freedom of the City to the Galles inhabiting within the Alpes, because they had been under his command, and then laid down his Dictatorship, though indeed he still retained all its Power, the Senate permitting, that he should do what he would. And he improved this Power in a matter of great and necessary consequence. For now did Creditors with all bitterness imaginable exact what Monies were owing to them from those who borrowed of them for Supply in the Civil War, and most of them were utterly unable to pay, at this time it being very difficult either to pay or borrow. By occasion hereof many severe Acts were committed, and great milchiefs could not but follow; for although formerly the Tri-buni Plebis had done something to restrain Usury, yet was not thereby any provision made for paying Debts; the Debtors parting with their Pledges, and yet the Creditors exacting the Sums after the ancient manner.

50. To obviate this mischief, Cesar commanded the Pledges to be valued, and that Judges should be chosen by lot to take up these Controversies. And because many Persons were said to have much Money, and to suppress it, he commanded by an Edict, that none should have in Gold or Silver more than fixty Sessertia; which Law he did not make, but only renewed it, either that Debtors might pay something to their Creditors, or to discover who were rich; or else that no Man might have any vast Sums to raise any disturbance in his absence. However, with this Law the People were elevated, and began to require; that a Reward should be propounded to such Slaves as would accuse their Lords; but he not only refused to add this unto the Law, but laid Imprecations upon himself if ever he gave credit to a Slave that accused his Master. All these things done, and all Ornaments taken away both from the Capitol and other places at the end of the year, and before he entred his Confulship, he went to Brundusium. Dio here mentions, according to his Custom. Particulars prefaging what afterward happened, which caused his Diviners to defire him to haften his Journey, affirming that destruction would betide him if he staid in the City; but lafety and Victory if he passed the Sea. After he was gone the Boys of Rome divided themselves into two Parties, of which one took the Name of Pompeyans, and the other of Casarians; and making a show of Fight, without Weapons, those that called themselves Casarians departed with advantage over the other. While these things were done at Rome, and in Spain M. Offavius and L. Scribonius Libo, with Pompej's Fleet, drove P. Cornelius Dolabella out of Dalmatia, and thut bath the ad- up C. Antonius, who prepared to relieve him in a small Island, where being deserted by the Inhabitants, and pinched with famine, they took him and all his Men, except fuch as killed themselves, or escaped into the Continent. Dio's Story of Curio his defeat in Africk, otherwise agrees with that of Cafar; but he adds, that Juba was greatly honoured for that Action by Pompey, and the Senators with him in Macedovia, and had the Title of King. But by Cajar and those of his Party he was adjudged an Enemy; and Bocchus and Bogud were faluted Kings, because they were Enemies to Pompey. Now let us fee what Cafar himself writes of the coming to Blows betwint 51. He came, as we faid, to Brundusium, but with an Army much lessened with travel and fickness, by reason of change from the good and wholesom Air of Gall and Spains, into that of Apulia, and the Maritime Parts. And he found no more color de bulle Shipping ready than would hardly transport twenty thousand Legionary Soldiers, and civili lib. 2. five hundred Horse; and this want of Ships he saith hindered him from dispatching the War. On the other hand, Pompey having had a years space to provide himself without any trouble or molestation, had got together a great Navy out of Afra, and all places where he could build Ships. He had raifed great Sums of Money out of Asia and Syria, and exacted Supplies thereof from all Princes and States. From several Quarters he had raised nine Legions of Roman Citizens, to which he added, as *Lllll 2

Sect. 7. a Supply, a great number out of fome parts of Greece and Epirus. He mingled Antonies Soldiers amongst them, and expected two other Legions to be brought by Scipio out of Syria. He had from Crete; Lacedamon, Pontsu and Syria, and the rest of the Cities, three thousand Archers, of Slingers fix Cohorts, two others Mercenary, and of Horse-men seven thousand. Hereof Deictarus brought six hundred Galles; Preparations Ariobattanes, five hundred out of Cappadocia; and Cathe out of Thrace had fent the of Pappya like number with his Son Sadalis. From Macedonia came two hundred commanded by Rafcipalis, a Person of much worth. From Alexandria five hundred Galles and Genmans, which A. Gabinius had left as a Garrison with King Ptolomy. Pampey the Son with the Navy had brought eight hundred of his own Slaves, and of those belonging to his Cattel. Tarcondarius, Castor, and Donilaus, had fent three hundred out of Gallegracia; of whom one came in Person, and the other sent his Son. Two hundred did Antiochus Comagenus, to whom Pompey had given great Gifts, fend out of Syria, amongst whom most were those Cafar called Hippotocota, or Shooters on Horse-back. To these he added Dardani and Bess, partly mercenary, and partly procured by his Power and Favour; besides Macedonians, Theslatians, and those of other Nations and Cities, whereby he filled up the faid number. For Corn he provided great quantity out of Theffaly, Afia, Grete, Cyrene, and other Regions. He appointed the Winter Quarters at Dyrrachium, Apollonia, and all the Maritime Towns, to keep Cefar from palling the Sea; and for that purpose disposed of his Soldiers all along the Sea-Coalt. Now of the Egyptian Ships Pompey the Son was Admiral. Those that came out of Asia were commanded by D. Lelius and C. Triarius. C. Caffins had the command of those of Spria; and C. Marcellus, with C. Pomponius. of those of Rhodes. Of the Liburnian and Achaian Navy, Scribonius Libo, and M. Octavius, had the Charge. But M. Bibulus was General for Maritime Affairs, with chief Command. 52. Baggage behind them in hope of Victory, and his liberality, thipped feven Legions, over feven and in fafety landed his Men at a place called Pharfalus, not daring to venture into any known Port, which he believed to be possessed by the Enemy. Being landed, he fent back his Ships to Brundussum to bring over the other Legions, but in their return thirty of them fell into the hands of Bibulus, who sensible of his neglect of guarding the Passage, and in wrath, set them all on fire, and therewith consumed both owners and Mariners, hoping by this Example to terrific the reft. This done, with greater diligence than had been usual, he possessed all the Sea-Coast from Salone to Oricum with Men and Ships of War, he himself in the depth of Winter refusing no labour, but watching on Ship-board, nor expecting any Supplies, if he could meet Cafar. M. Oldavijer, with foundthing better facets by Sea, came and draw. Hifla from Cafars Party, and not being able to prevail with the Inhabitants of Safane, he befieged the Town. The Place was indifferently well fortified by Nature, and their Industry. but the Inhabitants being wearied and fpent with Wounds, fell at length to the last Refuge of infranchifing all their Slaves above the Age of fourteen, and cutting the Hair of their Women to make Engines. Their Resolution being known, Octavius begirt them with five Camps and Intrenchments, and they indured the want of Corn and other inconveniences. But the Siege continuing a long time, and this making the Beliegers remis and negligent, they took the opportunity of the Noon-time. and placing their Women and Children on the Walls to make a flow, they themselves and fuch as they had infranchifed, made a Sally, and with violence broke through all the five Camps, and with great flaughter forced Octavius, and his Men remaining, to betake themselves to their Ships, and leave the Place. He despairing of taking the Town, and Winter approaching, retir'd to Pompey at Dyrrachium.

53. Now did Casar, as he tells us, think fit to fend to Pompey about a Peace, and the Party on which he pitched to carry the Message was Vibullius Russes, whom, being one of Pompey's Lieutenants, Cafar had twice taken, once at Corfinium, and a second time in Spain. His Instructions were to let him know, that in his opinion it was time to give way to Fortune, and lay down Arms, either Party having had fuch loffes as might instruct it to prevent greater Inconveniences. That this was the only time to treat of Peace when both was confident of his ownstrength, and seemed to be of equal Power. That for Conditions, feeing they could not agree of them themselves, they ought to feek them from the Senate and People of Rome; and in the mean time it was convenient that both should take an Oath before their Armies within three days next following, to lay down their Arms, fend away their Auxiliaries, in which they confided, and confequently submit to the Decree of the People: And for alluChap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians rance, on his side, he would presently discharge his Forces, as well them in the Sect. 7 Field, as in Garrison. Vibullius hasted to Pompey; chiefly to less him know of Cefars coming, and he, upon the News, with all speed made towards Apollonia, lest he should possess himself of the Maritime Cities. In the mean time Cefar took in Oricum, Apollonia, the Town of the Bellidenses; and also Epiras submitted to him

When he came near the Town, he opened the Trenches, and incamped himself; but still his Men were in such fear, that Labienus stepped out first, and swore never to forsake him whatsoever should happen. Then was the same Oath taken by the Legates, the Tribunes, Centurions, and all the

54. Cafar understanding his Passage to be stopped to Dyrrhachium, Incamped himfelf upon the River Aplies, in the Confines of Apollonia, and there determined to winter under Skims, to expect the coming of his other Legions out of Italy, and protect fisch Places as had well deferred of him. And Pompey did the like, pitching his Camp on the other fide of the River, whither he aftembled all his Troops and For-reign Aids. Now did each Party mutually obstruct the Designs of the other. For Bibulus 1920 With his Fleet at Oricum, and kept the Sea and the Ports, to as Cefars

Army, could, not land from Brundsfuum; and kept the Sea and the Ports, to as Cefars

Army, could, not land from Brundsfuum; and then again, the Sea-Coaft was all along fo watched and guarded by Cefars Men, that he could neither get. Water nor Wood, nor his Stips to Land upon occasion; infomuch as he was brought into fund diffres, that he fetched his Water and Wood from Coregra 5, nay at one time, the Weather being very temperations, they were forced to content themselves with the Dew which by night fell upon the Skins that covered the Decks of their Ships. All these extremities they patiently bore, and would not leave the Coasts; and yet they fought by a pretence of a Treaty to draw Cefar to a Truce, who requiring that his Messengers might have fafe conduct to Pompey, when that was denied, he saw that their drift only was to avoid present danger, and began to think of prosecuting the War. In the mean time Bibulus, having contracted a Sickness by extremity of Cold and Labour, resolving never to be friends with Cefar for the loss of the Edility and Pretorship, ended his days on Ship-board. Now, Cefar tells us, he made again several offers for a Treaty, but the Conference was still broke off; once Pompey saying, that in case it proceeded to an Issue, he should be thought to enjoy his Life and the City by Casars favour; and at another time Labienus affirming, that no Composition could be made without Cesars

55. This made him the more to long for the Arrival of his other Forces from Brundulium, and they feeming to him to have omitted feveral convenient Gales, he wrote to them, and required them to take the first opportunity, which the Soldiers willingly did by the conduct of M. Antonius, and Fusius Calenue, for the love they bore to him. Three Legions of old Soldiers, one of new, and eight hundred Horfe, by favour of the Wind, fafely arrived, though they were purfued by Caponius, Admiral of the Rhodian Navy, of which fixteen Velfels perished by the turning of the Wind, and the roughness of the Weather. Only two of Cafars Ships lagged behind. whereof one yielded to Otacilius Craffus, upon a Promise of Life, but the Men being unexperienced young Soldiers, were put to death before his face; those of the other being old Soldiers, froutly defended themselves, and escaped. About this time Scipio, though he had received feveral loffes about the Mount Amanus, which feperates Syria from Cilicia, yet had taken upon him the Title of Imperator. This done, he imposed heavy Taxes upon the Cities and Potentates of these Tracts, and from the Publicans of his Province took all the Money in their hands for the two years past, and by way of Loan that of the following year; and from the whole Province he exacted a number of Horfe-men. He left then the Parthians behind his back, who Scipie moves had lately flain M. Craffies, and befieged M. Bibulus, and drew the Légions out of against him Spria. At his departure the Soldiers gave out Speeches, as if they would not march against a Citizen and Conful; but however, he brought the Army to Pergamus, and quartered it about in Winter in divers rich Cities; and for the better affuring of his Men to him, gave them great Largeffes and Gifts; nay, and belides, some Cities to plunder. In the mean time he most heavily oppressed the Province with Impositions. Upon Slaves as well as Free-men he imposed a Tax by Poll, and any Name or Pretence that could be invented for railing Money was most acceptable, they being esteemed the worthiest Men that would domineer, and cruelly exact most from such Cities and Villages as they were fet over. The poor Province besides this was op-

Sect. 7. pressed with Exactors, who made their own Markets; moreover with hard and heavy Usury, which oftentimes accompanied War; and yet they stuck not there to make Leavies, and to require Loans. Nay Scipio gave order, that the Treasure of Diana's Temple at Ephefus should be taken out, with other Images of that their Goddess. Which had been done, but that he received Pompey's Letters, who thereby let him know, that Cafar had passed the Sea with his Legions, and defired, that, fetting all things apart, he should hasten to him with his Army, Hereupon he determined concerning his Journey into Macedonia, and fet forward a few days after.

56. Cafar now being joyned with Antony, notwithstanding the endeavours of Pompey to the contrary, resolved to march further up into the Province. At the defire of some of the Inhabitants of Thessaly, he sent thither that Legion called the Seven and twentieth, confifting of young Soldiers, with two hundred Horfe, and five Cohorts, and a few Horfe into Etolia upon the same Invitation. Moreover two Legions called the Eleventh and Twelfth, he ordered into Macedonia, of which Province, that which was called the Free had professed a great deal of forwardness to his Service. Ætolia was easily gained; but the Thessalians stood divided in their opinions; and when Cn. Domitius Calvinus, who commanded the Legions, came into Macedonia, word was brought him that Scipio would speedily be with him. And accordingly he marched with great fury toward him, but when he was come within twenty Miles, he suddenly turned his course toward Cassius Longinus in Thessaly, and with fuch speed, that same did not prevent his Arrival. Cassine thus surprized, made away towards the Hills which inclose The sale and Ambracia. Scipio as earnestly purfued him; but in his heat he received News from Favonius, whom he had left at the River Haliacmon, (which divideth Macedonia from Theffaly) with eight Cohorts to . keep the Baggage, that Domitius would speedily be upon him, and that he was not able of himself to hold the Place. Upon receit of the Letters he altered his purpose, and hasted back day and night to help Favonius, whereby it happened, (both Scipio and Domitius arriving together) that as the Industry of Domitius did help Caffins, fo did Scipio his speed deliver Favonius.

57. Scipio after this passed the River Haliacmon, as to fight with Domitius, who embracing the occasion with alacrity, he was discouraged, and pittifully retreated to his former Post, fearing that the following day he should either be constrained to fight, or with shame keep himself within his Camp. After this Domitius drew him to a loss by an Ambushment, wherein M. Opimius, who commanded his Horse, was tarespy the kern. Cincins the Son of Pompey in the mean time, who common the flaven Son his faces Fleet, by Cefars confession had good faces as Sea, where he broke into the Haven ken. Cneins the Son of Pompey in the mean time, who commanded the Egyptian of Noricum, notwithstanding all endeavours used to hinder him, and burnt his Enemies Ships both there and at Liffus, and the Towns themselves he endeavoured to master, but with no success. At this time his Father lay at Asparagus, a Place belonging to Apollonia, and thither Cafar marched with his Forces, fate down near him, and offered him Battel. This he thought not fit to accept of, which put Cefar upon new Councils. He retreated toward Dyrrhachium, with design thereby either to constrain him to fight, to force the Town, or else cut from him all Provisions which there were laid up for the whole War. This last he effected, though Pompey at first thinking he had retired for want of Provision; upon finding his error, laboured to get thither before him. Being thus cut off from this Town, Pompey incamped himself in a convenient place to receive Provisions by Sea. Cafar now doubted that the War would prove tedious, and therefore the Sea-Coasts being blocked up by Pompey's Fleet, he took order for Grain to be imported out of the Mediterranean Tracts of Epirus. And these Regions being far off, he appointed Store-houses in certain Countries, and imposed carriage of Corn upon the Places adjoyning to

58. This done, he entred into such a courseas the nature of the Place where Pompey was incamped did prompt him to. His Camp was inclosed with many high and freep Hills. These Hills he took and built Forts upon them; then, as the condition of the Ground would bear, he drew Lines from one Hill to another, and so determined to inclose Pompey with a Ditch and Rampire. This he did being straitned for want of Corn, that he might now freely forage about without fear of Pompey's Horfe, in which he was frong; but chiefly he hoped to abate the exceeding great reputation he cefar befieges had amongst Forreign Nations, when it should be noised about that he was besieged the Fatherin by Cafur, and durst not fight. Yet, for all this, Pampey resolved to venture that, rather than quit the Commodity of the Sea, and Dyrrhachium, where all his Provi-

fion of War whatfoever was to land. He refolved to possess himself of as many Sect. 7. Hills as possible, and to keep as much of the Country with good and sufficient Guards, thereby to distract Casars Forces, as it fell out, taking in no less than twenty five miles in Circuit, in which he foraged, and there caused many things to be set and planted by hand which ferved for Food for his Horfes: Moreover, his Works excelled, for he abounded with Men, and had on the in-fide a less compass to fortifie. He refused to fight, but he forely galled Casars Men with his Archers and Slingers, fo that almost all of them made them Coats of Quilt, stiffening, or Leather, to keep them from danger. Mutual Contention gave occasion to many Skirmishes and Encounters; to be sure, in the opinion of Cefar himself, the War was carried on in a strange and unusual manner. And this was not only in respect of the great number of Forts and Castles, but of the whole Siege and Consequents thereof. For the weakest are wont to be belieged, and Sieges are made to cut off the Enemy from Provisions; but Pompey was the stronger of the two, and received Provisions by Sea. Cafar on the other hand was in great scarcity, and yet his Soldiers, he tells us, bore it with fingular patience, remembring how, notwithstanding such great want endured both in Gall and Spain, they had gone away Conquerors of many great Nations. They were content with Barly and Peafe instead of Wheat, and of a certain Root called Chara, which they made use of in the room of Bread. This, when Pompey's Soldiers jeered them, and objected their scarcity and misery, they would commonly throw at them, and featter in divers places, to discourage them in their hopes. 59. But afterward the Case quite altered, Summer coming on. For Pompey's Army could scarcely be kept alive, especially for want of Water, Casar having either turned another way, or dammed up all the Rivers and Brooks of the Country. On the contrary, Cofer Army was in extraordinary good health, having plenty of Water, and all Provilins, except Wheat; of which there was good expediation, Harvelt being to near at hand. After this followed feveral Skirmilhes, wherein Pompey had far the worst, and was forced to quit a Mount he had seized, to succour his Men, and return to his old Fortifications. Ceefar now by his Officers drew to his Party several Countries of Greece, and understanding that Scipio was come into Macedonia, fent to him to procure a Peace, which he would have perswaded him he might easily constrain Pompey to accept, having the Command of an Army. But this not succeeding, Cafar applied himself more strainty to block up Pompey, which brought him into such distress, that his Horses having consumed all the Leaves of Trees, and all the Barley, there remained no more fultenance for them, and now they were not able to go on their Legs. Hereupon he refolved to break out, especially after he had been informed of the condition of Cafars Fortifications by two Allobroges. Brothers, who having cheated the Soldiers of their Pay, revolted to him. He gave order to his light Armed Soldiers and Archers to defend themselves with Bavins and Faggots of Oliers, and drawing out threescore Cohorts, Shipped them, and fell up-

Pompty break. on a Fortification of Casars by the Sea, which was not compleated. This was done with fuch execution, that all the Centurions of the first Cohort were slain, except the first of the Maniple of the Principer; and though both Cafar and his Officers endeavoured to put a stop to the Proceedings of the Enemy, yet the Issue of the Attempt was, that Pompey got out of the Fortifications, and Incamped upon the Sea. in fuch fort as he might freely go out to forage, and have no less accels to his Shipping, than he had formerly. Casar perceiving the loss he had fustained, and that this course of War had not succeeded according to his expectation, resolved to change it, and fate down close by Pompey. He defigned to cut off a Legion which had taken up a Post by a Wood; but in the Attempt his Men were intangled within the Fortifications of the old Camps lately deferted, and therein fo over-powered by the Supplies fent in by Pompey, that he loft, by his own confession, nine hundred and threefcore Soldiers, befides Horfe-men of note, ten Tribunes, and thirty Centurions. belides thirty two Military Enligns. But the greatest part perished in the Trenches, and on the River Banks, preft to death, as driven by the fear and flight of their Fellows, without any Blow or Wound given them.

60. Pompey hereupon was faluted Imperator; and fo fuffered himfelf to be filled; though he used not the Title in any of his Miffives, nor had any Lawrel in the Bundle of Rods carried before him. Labienus having begged the Prisoners, caused them all to be flain; and Pompey's Party took fuch affurance, that not thinking any more of the the Course of the War, they carried themselves as already Victors, not at all considering the fewnels of Cæfars Men to be the cause of their Success, nor the disadvan-

Scct. 7. trage of the Place, nor that the Army was divided into two parts, in such fort, that neither of them was in a capacity to relieve the other. They did not remember the common chances and cafualties of War, wherein oftentimes very fmall caufes, either of false suspition, or of sudden fear, or scruple of Religion procure great and heavy losses, as often as, either by the negligence of the General, or the fault of a Tribune, an Army is disordered. As if they had overcome by down-right Force and Valour, and no alteration could after happen, they magnified this days Victory who altereth by Letters and Report throughout the World. But Cofar being driven from his former Purposes, resolved to change the whole course of the War, to omit the Siege, and withdraw the Garrisons. He cheared up his Army as well as he could, by pat-ting them in mind of their manifold Victories in Italy and Spain, and other Successes. which, put together, over-ballanced by much the late disaster. Having disgraced and displaced certain Ensign-bearers, the Soldiers were earnestly desirous, by a fresh Ingagement, to redeem their credit; but he thought it not fit to put it to the tryal. till their minds were setled, and he resolved to make a fair Retreat to Apollomia. This Retreats to A. he did with fuch speed, that Pompey could not overtake him, only some of his Horse came up with the Reer, but with loss were repulsed. Pompey followed a full Journey, but some of his Men rising hastily, had left a great part of their Baggage behind them, and induced by the nearness of their last nights lodging, left their Arms, and went back to fetch those things that were behind. Cafar took this Advantage which he had expected, and continued his diligence; fo that Pompey being staid the first day, and afterward striving in vain, and making great Journeys, and yet not overtaking him, the fourth day gave over the Pursuit, and betook himself to another Refolution.

61. Cefar, for accommodating his Wounded Men, for paying his Army, fetling his Allies and Confederates, and leaving Garrisons in the Towns, was necessitated to go to Apollonia; but in performing these things, made all hast imaginable. For he defired to be with Domitius with all possible celerity, left he should beingaged by Pompey's Arrival. If Pompey followed after him, he should by this means draw him from the Sea-fide, and from fuch Provitions of War as he had flored up at draw him from the sea-nac, and from their revenues on vear as the maintenant up at Dyrrhachium, and fo flould compel him to equal Conditions. If he flould go one ver into Italy, then having joyned his Army with Domition, he would go and fuecour that Country by the way of Illyricans. And if he flould befrege Apolloria or Oricum, and fo exclude him from all the Sea-Coafts, he would then befrege Scripts, and force Pointey to relieve him. Pompey conjectured as Cafer purposed, that he might attacque Scipio, and therefore thought it requifite to haft to hisrelief; but if he would not depart from the Sea-shore and Corcyra, as expecting more Forces out of Italy, he then resolved to fall upon Domitius. Each halted to relieve his Friends, and furprize his Enemies; but Cefar had turned out of the way to go to Apollonia, whereas Pompey had a ready way into Macedonia by Candavia. The News of Cafar being defeated at Dyrrhachium, did much incommode his Affairs; for thereupon feveral States drew off from his Parry, and the Ways were to tropped, that no inner-courde could be had betwirk him and Dometius, till he met with him at Highinium, a Town fituate upon the Frontiers of Ubefidie. The first Town of this Country by the Way leading out of Epirus, was Gomphi, the Inhabitants of which formerly had offered themselves and all they had to be disposed of at his pleasure; but upon the Rumor of his overthrow, Androsthenes, Preter of Thessales, had drawn the multitude of Servants and Children out of the Country into the Town, and fent to Scipio and Pompey for Aid. Cafar knowing of what confequence this Town would be, and to strike terror into the rest, resolved to storm it, and making the Attacque after three of the Clock in the Afternoon, notwithstanding the extraordinary height of the Walls, took it before Sun-set, and gave it to the Soldiers to be risled. Then presently Takes Gemphi removing, he went to Metropolis, by his haft preventing all Mediages and News, in Italyalii. The Inhabitants at first Manned their Walls; but understanding by the Captives in

Corn, which was almost ripe, resolved to attend Pompey's coming, and there to prosecute the remainder of the War. . 62. A few days after, Pompey came into Theffalie, and taking the Legions all into one Camp, he made Scipio, with whom he had joyned, Partaker both of his Honour and Authority, commanding the Trumpets to attend his Pleasure for matters

Cafars Camp what had happened to Gomphi, yielded, and faved themselves. And this their happiness being compared with the desolation of Gomphi, had that effect, that there was not one State of Theffalie, Lariffa excepted, which was kept in by

Scipio, but yielded obedience to Cejar; who now being got into a Place plentiful in of direction, and that he should use a Pratorian Pavilion. Pompey being strengthned Sect. 7. All Mengive thus with the addition of another Army, all Men gave Cassar for lost. His Enemies were in pain till their affured Victory was obtained, that they might return into Italy, and into heavy contests they fell, who should be successively Consuls, concerning Rewards and Preferments, and especially who should have Casars Priesthood; some begged the Houses and Goods of such as were with Cesar; besides, a great controversie grew in open Council, whether L. Hertius should not be regarded at the next Election of Prators, being absent, and imployed by Pompey against the Parthians. Other things they disputed, as not thinking so much of the means how to overcome. as how to use the Victory. As for Casar, Provision of Cornbeing now made, and his Soldiers well refolved after a fufficient time palled from the Battel at Dyrrhachium, he thought fit to try what Will Pompey had to fight. Every day he drew out his Men farther and farther from their Trenches, to imbolden them; and because he was much inferior to his Enemies in the number of Horse, he commanded certain lusty young Men of them that stood before the Ensigns, being nimble and swift in running, to fight amongst the Horse-men. They by their daily practice had learnt the use of that fort of fight; fo that Cafar tells us, one thousand of his Cavalry, in open and Champion places, upon occasion, would undergo the Charge of seven thousand of theirs, and they were not much terrified with their Multitudes. Now they made a fortunate Incounter; but Cafar thinking Pompey would not be drawn to Battel, refolved to shift his Camp, and be always in moving, hoping by often removes to be better accommodated with Provisions, and upon a March to find some good occasion to fight; besides, he thought he should weary Pompey's Army with continual Journeys, it being not accustomed to travel.

Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians,

63. But when the Tents were taking down, it was discovered, that the Enemy was advanced from the Hill, where he was formerly Incamped, fomewhat farther from his Trenches; so that it seemed they might fight in an equal and indifferent place. Thereupon Cafar Stopped his March, and drew out his Forcesto fight, and Pompey, as afterwards it was known, was resolved to give Battel, for all that were about him moved him to it; and some few days before he had given out in Council, that he would overthrow Cafars Forces before the Armies came to joyn. He told them (who wondered at it) that the Cavalry had, upon his defire, promifed him, when they drew near, to attacque Cafars right Cornet on the open fide; so that the Army being circumvented behind, should be amused and routed, before Casars Men should cast a Weapon, and thereby the War should be ended without danger of the Legions, or almost without any Wound received. Labienus seconded his Speech, and further incouraged them by affirming, that this was not the Army wherewith Cefar performed such things in Gall and Germany, which was either dead, gone home, or a very small piece of it was remaining; but was gathered from the Leavies made in the hither Gall, and most of them out of the Colonies beyond Padus, and yet all the flower and strength. of them was taken away in the last two overthrows at Dyrrachium. Affirming this, as not speaking rashly, but having been himself present at the Battels in Gall and Germany, he took a folemn Oath, not to return into his Camp, but with Victory, exhorting the rest to do the like. Pompey commending him, took the same Oath, neither was there any that refused it, all being now cockfure, and conceiving Victory already in their minds, as not imagining that anything should be spoken vainly by so skilful a Commander, especially in so important a matter.

64. In the left Cornet of Pompey's Army stood the two Legions which had The ordering been in the beginning of the War, taken from Cafar by decree of the Senate, of Pempi's Peter in the beginning of the war, taken from Out and what them flood Pomatic Battle flow. Scribb had the middle Squadron, with the Legions he brought out of Spria. pey. Scipio had the middle Squadron, with the Legions he brought out of Syria. The Legion of Cilicia joyned with the Spanish Cohorts, which Afranius brought, made up the right Wing. The rest of the Troops were interlaced betwixt the Squadron and the Wings. In all they amounted to one hundred and ten Cohorts, and fifty five thousand Men, besides two thousand old Soldiers, and Men of note, which Pompey had dispersed over all the Army. The remaining seven Cohorts he left in the Camp, or disposed about the Forts near adjoyning. The Right Wing was flanked with a River, having high and cumbersome Banks, and therefore he put all his Horse together with his Archers and Slingers in the Left. Cafar observing his former Cufrom, placed the Tenth Legion in the Right Wing, and the Ninth in the Left, though they were much weakened in the Fights at Dyrrachium, but to the Ninth he joyned the Eighth, fo as he seemed to make one of two, and commanded them to succour each other. In all he had about Eighty Cohorts, which made up twenty and two * M m m m m to Antonius, the middle Battle to Cn. Domitius, and the Right Wing to Pub. Sylla, and ftood himself against Pompey. Having well observed all things, and fearing less his Right Wing should be inclosed by the Multitudes of the Enemies Horse, he speedily drew five Cohorts out of the Third Battle, and of them he made a Fourth to incounter their Cavalry; showed them what he would have done, and admonished them that the success of that day rested in the Valour of those Cohorts. 65. There was so much space lest between both the Armies, as might serve either of them to meet upon the Charge. Pompey commanded his Men to receive the shock of Cesar's Soldiers without moving from the Place. This he did by the advice of C. Triarius, to the end that the first violence of the Soldiers being broken, and the Battel distended, they that stood in perfect order might have the advantage of them that were dispersed. Besides, it was hoped the Piles would not fall so forcibly upon the Army standing still, and that Cesars Soldiers, having so far to run, would by that means be out of breath. This in Cesars opinion was without reason, there being, he faith, a certain incitation and alacrity of Spirit planted in every Man naturally, which is inslamed with a desire to sight; which no Commander ought to repress or restrain, but rather increase and set it forward. However his Soldiers, upon sign of Battel, running out with their Piles ready to be cast, and perceiving that Pompey's Men did not make out to meet them, whom they looked upon as Men of experience, and exercised in sormer Fights, they stopt their course, and almost in the mid-way stood still, that they might not come to Blowsyupon spending of their strength: Then, after a little respit they ran on again, threw their Piles, and presently drew their Swords.

The manner a little refpit they ran on again, threw their Piles, and prefently drew their Swords, as Cesfar had commanded them. Pompey's Soldiers were not now wanting on their part, but having received the flock, eaft also their Piles, and betook themselves to their Swords, keeping their Ranks. His Horse-men did not sorget the Orders they received, but from his Left Wing, with the Multitude of Archers, made such a Charge, that Cessar's Horse was not able to sustain it, and they put themselves into Squadrons to inclose the Army. Now did Cessar give the Sign to the fix Cohorts to advance, who came with such sury upon Pompey's Men, that none of them were able to stand before them, but sled as sast as they could to the highest Hills, whereby the Archers and Slingers, being less finked, were put to the Sword; and now the Cohorts, notwithstanding any resistance, charged the Less Wing upon their Backs. At the same time Cessar commanded his third Battel, which as yet stood still, and was not removed, to advance forward; and these Men being fresh and found, and relieving such as were faint and weary, and others charging them upon the Backs, Pompey's Party was no longer able to endure; how all turned their backs, and sed. Thus it fell out according to Cessar opinion, and as he had spoken in his incouragement to the Soldiers, that the Victory would grow from the fix Cohorts placed in the fourth Battel against Pompey's Horse-men.

66. As foon as Pompey faw his Horfe were beaten, and perceived the Party he most consided in to be amused and affrighted, he distrusted the reft, and forthwith left the Battel, conveying himself on Horfe-back into the Camp: With aloud voice he commanded the Centurions, which had the Warch at the Pretorian Gate, to defend it diligently, to prevent any hard cafualty that might happen, faying. That he would go about to the other Ports to fettle the Guards; but into the Pretorium he went diffrusting the main Point, and yet expecting the Event. And he was followed into the Camp by his Soldiers, to whom Cefar would give no respit; but notwithstanding the great heat, it being now mid-day, perswaded his Men to force it, which they did without very much trouble, it being chiefly defended by Thracians and Barbarians, for the Soldiers were weary and wounded, and sought how to shift for themselves. Neither could they that stood upon the Rampire indure the multitude of Weapons but

Soldiers were weary and wounded, and fought how to fhift for themselves. Neither could they that stood upon the Rampire indure the multitude of Weapons, but, fainting with Wounds, for fook the Place, and fled to the high Mountains adjoyning, being led thither by the Centurions and Tribunes. In the Camp were found rich Furniture, and the Tents were strowed with fresh Herbs and Rushes, and many other faiperfluities there were, which discovered their extream luxury and affirance of Victory; and yet they upbraided Cesars patient and miscrable Army with riot and excess, to which there was always wanting such Requisites as were expedient for necessary.

Ensigns, got on Hosse-back, and from the Decumane Gate fled to Leriff with all the fast the could make, whence with the samesfreed he posted night and day, till he got to the Sea-fide, with a Troop of thirty Horse. Then went he aboard a Ship of Burthen, complaining, that his opinion only deceived him, being as it were betrayed by those that first fled, from whom he had chiefly hoped for Victory.

by those that first fled, from whom he had chiefly hoped for Vistory.

67. Cafe having got the Camp, persovaded his boldiers not to look after Booty, but to finish the Work they had been about. Then began he to inclose the Hills with a Fortification, which caused Pompey's Party to desert the Place, being without Waster, and take the way toward Larissa. With four Legions he followed them, and coming a nearer way, after fix Miles, Imbatteled his Forces, whereupon they betook hemselves to an high Hill, under which ran a River. Now Caster's Soldiers were spent with continual toil all this day, and night was at hand; yet for all this he prevailed with them to cut off the River from the Hill, by a Fortification, to keep them from watering that night. This being perfected, they began to send about, treating upon Conditions to yield themselves, and some few of the Senators escaped away in the night. As soon as it was light Caster caused them all to come down into the Plain, and to cast away their Arms, which done without resulas, they cast also themselves upon the Earth, spread their hands abroad, and shedding many Tears, desired mercy. He comforted, and commanded them to stand up, and having spoken some thing away their Arms, which done without refußl, they cast also themselves upon the Earth, foread their hands abroad, and shedding many Tears, desired mercy. He comforted, and commanded them to stand up, and having spoken something of his clemency alittle to ease them of their sear, gave them all their Lives with safety; commanding the Soldiers to hurt none of them, and that they should want nothing which was their own. After such wonderful diligence used, he sent for other Legions which had rested in the Camp, and that day went to Laviss. He tells us he lost in the Battel not above two hundred Soldiers, but of Centurions, valiant Men, he lost thirty. Of Pompeys Army were slain about sifteen thousand, and twenty four thousand yielded themselves. Such Cohorts as were in the Forts yielded to Spla, and many fled into the next Towns and Cities. Of Military Ensigns were brought out of the Battle to Cessir one hundred and fourscore, with nine Eagles. The News of this Victory arrived in good time in the Western Parts, where, at Sea, Cessira shaffairs went down the wind. Cessis in Stiely burnt his Ships in divers places, and if the Report had not come seasonably, Messara had been taken.

68. But Cessar resolved, that all other things he was to set asset, and to pursue

Pompey, left he should leavy Forces and renew the War. He made forward every day as far as his Men were able to go, and the same of his Victory slew before him, which caused the Cities to exclude Pompey and his Party as they went by Sea; and Pompey leaving off his purpose of going into Syria, directed his course toward Pelusium, There by chance was King Ptolomy, a Child within years making War against his Sister Cleopatra with great Forces, whom a few Monthsbefore, by means of his Allies and Friends, he had thrust out of his Kingdom. Pompey sent to him, that in regard of the ancient Hospitality, and the Amity he had with his Father, he would receive him into Alexandria, and by his Wealth and Power support him, now fall in into misery and calamity. And they that were sent, when they had done their Message, not despising the lowe beboe of Fortune to which he was brought. Their Speech was so properly applied, that amongst these Men there were many that had been Pompey's Soldiers, whom Gabinim had received out of his Army in Syria, and brought to Alexandria; a sad upon ending of the War had less them the Protomy, the Father of the Boy. But these things being known, such as were Protectors of the King, and flould be gained, (which afterward they affirmed) and thereby Pompsy might feize upon the Ciry and Higpst, or despising his Fortuse, (for the most part it happening, that a Mans Friends become his Enemies, when low) gavea good Answer openly to such as were sent, and willed him to come to the King; but secretly plotting among themesleves, sent Achillas, a principal Commander, and a Man of great boldness, together with L. Septimius, a Tribune, to kill him. They gave him good words, and he himself knowing Septimius to have led a Company under him in the War against the Pirates, went aboard a little Bark with a sew of his Soldiers, and there was slain by Achillas and Septimius. In like manner L. Lentulus was apprehended by commandment

Guardians of the Kingdom in his minority, either induced by fear that the Army

Sect. 7. Kingdom of Egypt, he was gone thither, where he might be furnished with other advantages. He proceeded therefore to Alexandria with two Legions, eight hundred Horse, ten Gallies of Rhodes, and a few Ships of Asia. In the Legions were not above three thousand and two hundred Men, the rest being either wounded in Fights, or spent with travel; yet trusting to the same of his great Performances, he doubted not to go with these weak Forces, thinking every place would entertain him safely. But coming to Alexandria, where he heard of Pompey's Death, his having Bundles to Alexandria. of Rods carried before him gave great offence to the Multitude, which at his landing, and afterward, was very tumultuous, crying out, that the Kings Authority was diminished. Hereupon he gave order for other Legions, inrolled out of Pompey's Soldiers, to be brought him out of Asia, he being stopped in Egypt, as he saith, by the Etelian Winds, which are against them that Sail from Alexandria. He now conceived, that the Controversie between the King and his Sister belonged to the Cognifance of the People of Rome, and consequently of himself as Consul, and the rather, for that in his former Confulship there was a League made by Decree of the Senate with Ptolomy the Father: In regard hereof he let them know his pleasure, that they should rather plead their Cause before him, than decide the Controversie by Arms. At this time one Photinus, an Eunuch, had the Administration of the Kingdom, who disclaining that the King should be called to plead his Cause, drew the Army fecretly from Pelusium to Alexandria, and made Achillas General, giving him Instru-Ctions what he would have done. Now old Ptolomy by his Will had left his eldeft Son - own Hands, to make use of the Authority of his Name and Title amongst his People, and to make it appear, that this War was moved rather by the private Practices of some seditious and designing People, than by his Order and Com-70. Achillas his Forces were not to be despised either for their number, or fashion of Men, or experience in War. For of them he had twenty two thousand in Arms. They consisted of the Soldiers of Gabinius, who by this time were grown into an habitual Custom of the Life and Liberty of the Egyptians; and having forgot the Name and Discipline of the People of Rome, had married Wives, and most of them and his eldest Daughter his Heirs and Successors in his Kingdom, and had charged the People of Rome by all things Sacred to see it duly observed. Casar was endeavouring to take up the Quarrel by a friendly and peaceable Arbitrement, when he was difturbed by the coming down of the Kings Forces. His own were not fuch as to hazard a Battle without the Town, but he ftood upon his Guard, and commanded the Soldiers to Arm. He procured also, that Dioscorides and Serapion, two Persons eminent for their Embassies at Rome, as well as for other Imployments, to be sent from the King to Achillas to know his Purpose, whom, as soon as he saw, he commanded to be put to death. Hereupon Cafar endeavoured to get the King into his had Children. To these were added such as were gathered from the Theives and Robbers of Syria, and other neighbouring Countries, belides many banished Men, and others condemned to die. For Alexandria always afforded a receptacle for all the Roman Fugitives, and there they had a certain Condition of Life for upon giving up his Name a Man was presently inrolled a Soldier. And if a Slave chanced to be apprehended by his Lord, he was prefently refcued by the concourse of Soldiers, who being all in the same condition, did strive and struggle for him as for themselves. These Troops thus constituted, would when they pleased cause the Kings Friends to be slain, they would rob Rich Men of their Goods to enlarge their pay, befiege the Kings House to expel his Ministers out of the Kingdom, and fend for others home, and that according to an old Custom and Priviledge of the Alexandrian Army. But beside, there were two thousand Horse that had been of ancient continuance in many Wars, and had brought back Ptolomy the Father, and restored him to his Kingdom; had slain Bibulus his two Sons, and made War with the Æg pptians; fuch experience they had

71. Achillas trufting to these Forces, and contemning them that belonged to Cafar, attacqued that part of the Town where he lay, and endeavoured by all means to break into his House. This caused a most fierce Encounter, and another as fierce happened at the Port where Achillas endeavoured to seize on all the Shipping, whereby he would have cut off all Supplies that might have been sent to Casar. This caused Cæsar to bestir himself, which he did to such purpose, that the Vessels he got into his Fower, and burnt them all, not being able to keep so many things with so few Forces, and prefently landed some Soldiers at Pharus. This Pharus, he tells us, was a Tower which took its name from an Island wherein it stood; the Island was of a great height, and the Town built with strange Workmanship. The Island lay over Sect. 74 against Alexandria, and so made it an Haven. But former Kings had inlarged it nine hundred Paces in length, by raising great Moles in the Sea, and by that means brought it sonear the Town, that they had joyned them both together with a Bridge. In the Island dwelt Æg yptians, who made up a Village resembling a Town, and robbed all fuch Ships as by Error or Tempest were cast upon the Place, none being able to get into the Haven by reason of the narrowness of the Entry, without the leave of such as held Pharus. Cafar afraid of this, while the Enemy wasing aged in fight, landed his Men, and feized the Place by a Garrison, so that Corn and all other Succours might come to him; for he had fent to all the confining Regions for Aid. He caused also several Places near him to be fortified in the City, while in the mean time the younger Daughter of Ptolomy, out of hope to obtain the Crown, now in question. conveyed her felf out of the Kings House to Achillas, and both joyntly undertook the management of the War. But they presently fell out about the chief Command, to the great advantage of the Soldiers, whom they both careffed with Largeffes. While they were thus busied, Photinus, Governour of the young King, and Superintendent of the Kingdom, fent Messengers to Achillas, desiring him not to defift, or be discouraged. Upon discovery and apprehension of such Messengers, Cafar caused him to be slain. And these were the beginnings of the Alexandrian

Gallo good. It's known sufficiently, that Cafar excelled or equalled in Language the most cap. 1. famous Orators of his time. But indeed the broken and loofe manner of the Compofition of these Commentaries, as now we find them, hath given occasion to Learned riegoing unthiol of their Commentants, and the sum of cefar were his intricate, here bare, and there fuperfluous, and far different from that Terfe and Astick Style of Cafar, which Cicero to exceedingly commends. Therefore Lipfing doubted. whether he should not ascribe these Books to Julius Celsus, having found in a certain Piece called Margareta Poetica, many fragments cited out of them, but always in the Name of Julius Celsus. Moreover, Johannes Salisberiensis, in his Policraticus.

Cafar, for Author. And Rodericus Sanctius, in the third part of his History of Spain, and the thirty third Chapter, commends the Authority of Julius Cellus for the History of the Alexandrian War, in Passages now found in the Book commonly ascribed to Hirtius. 73. It's therefore thought, that this Celfus tampered with the Commentaries of Celar; and if he did not wholly alter, yet he so interpolated them, that, as Claudius Cafar faid, The Author indeed appears, but the Rasure is evident. In an ancient Copy of Levinus Torrentius, at the end of the seventh Book, was found written The Ephemeris or Journal of C. Julius Cæsar, concerning the Gallick War, here ends. Julius

This Cæsar speaks of in bis Journal, where he commemorates his own felicity. For these Reasons, both Lipsus and others thought, that in those Commentaries we now make use of, the Matter and Narration was Cafars, but not the Words. Sect. 7. with his Writings, it will induce to think they might have the more reason for their opinion, and it tends not to the difference of Cafar. Prefuming however at the least, that the Matter and Story is his, it's convenient to examine what other Writers furnish us with that may attest or qualifie his Narrations.

74. What ever he speaks concerning his desire of Peace, and making means to obtain it, Writers centure as well him as Pompey, for designing high things, and out Writers say of of ambition more than any other Principle, driving on the War to such extremity. Pompey was not forward to purfue Cafar, so ashe might have done after the advantage he had got at Dyrrhachium, Cafar faying to his Friends, that his Enemies had won the Victory, had they known how to overcome. And indeed Pompey's Followers generally behaved themselves as if the War was then at an end, in so much that fome of them went to his Wife Cornelia to congratulate with her upon that account. and some took care about Possessions, and suing for Offices in Italy, crying out, that he should return thither. But now when he had Cefar in chase, he thought it not honourable to fly from him, especially to desert Scipio his Father-in-law, and other Senators dispersed through Greece, who upon his retreat must fall into Casars Hands. Yet he did not purpose to fight him; only to besiege, and cut him off from Victuals. Plutarch tells us plainly of a Report raised amongst the Equiter, that if Cafar was overcome, they must also reduce Pompey to a private Man again; that this confirmed him in his resolution, and was the cause why he would no more imploy Cato as one who intended to make him refign his Authority. This was finelt out by his Companions, who feeing him loiter, faid, he made not War against Casar, but the Senate and his Country, that he might ever retain his Authority, and have them for a Guard, and his Servants about him, to rule and command the World. The Taunts of Domitius Ænobarbus, who called him Agamemnon, and King of Kings, raifed him much envy, as also the Speeches of several others, amongst whom Afranius ranted against him, impatient to have Casars Offices disposed amongst themselves, with other Places of Dignity in the State. So, as Plutarch writes, they hurried him to a Battel, contrary to his Judgment of fighting Cafars Army, which had taken a thoufand Towns by Affault, had fubdued above three hundred feveral People, had won infinite Battels against the Germans and Galles, was never overcome, had taken a Million of Men Prisoners, and had slain as many in several Battels. This fatal one was fought on the Plains of Pharfalum, (not of Philippi, as Florus falily relateth, and with him Manilius and Virgil) betwixt that Town and the River Enipeus. The word of Pompey was, Unconquered Hercules, and that of Cæsar, Victorious Venus. It's said, that Cæsar gave order to his Horse-men to cast their Darts upwards into the Faces of their Enemies, which made the young Gallants not only fmart, but being aftonished at the manner of Fight, to cover them with their Hands, and

75. But thus, by the Valour of his Soldiers, as well as his own Conduct, was cafar railed Cafar railed from the extremity of his wants, and the diffrace of his former losses, to the highest to the chiefest Height of Earthly Glory and Power; so that what was wont to be pitch from a to the enterest Height of Earthly Giory and Powers to that what was work to be very lowebbe, faid of his Country, that the Fortune of the People of Rome was great, but still grew greater from troubles and difficulties, might be applied unto him. Now had Pompey, by his over great Power and Interest, brought the Common-wealth to that pass, that it could not subsist but by the benefit of Servitude, as Seneca words it, or with tibeing in the Hands of a fingle Person, who caused Servitude or Liberty as he was inclined. It's said, that at Mytylene, in his slight, he had much discourse with Cratippus the Philosopher, (the same to whom Cicero sent his Son to study) who in their talk made it evident, that his course of Government had brought a necessity of changing the State from the condition of a Common-wealth, to that of a Just Monarchy. When he was come into Egypt, and had sent to the King to be received, a Council was called by the Governours to confult what was to be done. during which he rode at Anchor, expecting their resolution. Some would have him received, and some not; but Theodotus of Chios, who taught the King Rhetorick, to shew his Eloquence, affirmed, that neither the one nor the other was to be done; for by receiving him they should make Cafar their Enemy, and Pompey their Lord, and by denying him they should disoblige him, and displease Casar for letting him escape. In conclusion, he perswaded them to send to kill him, for thereby they should win the favour of the one, and not fear the displeasure of the other; and fome fay, that he added this Saying, That a Dead Man bites not. This being determined, they gave Achillus order to doit, who took with him Septimius and Salvius, another Centurion, with three or four Soldiers, and perfwaded him to come out of his Ship into a Fishers Boat, the Shore being filled with Armed Men. None in Scct. 7. the Boat speaking friendly to him, he told Septimius he thought he should know him, having ferved formerly with him, at which the other nodded with his head, that it was true, but gave him no other answer, nor shewed him any courtesse. Seeing this, he took a little Book he had in his Hand, in which he had written a Speech he intended to make to Prolomy, and began to read it. When they drew nigh the Shore, he took hold of the Hand of Philip, his infranchifed Slave, to rife more eafily, and then Septimius coming behind him, thrust him through with his Sword. Now Salvius and Achillus drew theirs. Pompey did no more, but took up his Gown with his Hands, and covered his Face, then patiently and manly he received the Wounds they gave him, only fighing a little. Thus died he, fifty nine years old, the next day after that of his Birth. A great Man, as not only the Sir-name given him, but his Actions, in the Eastern Countries, and others. declared; but he was over-matched by his Rival, and was, however, too formal there was no Treasure left.

76. Having stricken off his Head, they cast his Body over-board, as a miscrable Spectacle for all that had a desire to see him. Philip his Freedman remained by it till they had all gazed their full, and then with an old Fishers Boat he found on the Shoar fearcely burnt it, being affifted by an old Roman, who had dwelt long in the Country, and prided himfelf in this Honour of doing to him this laft Office. Not long after came Cefar into Agpps, and Pompey's Head was presented to him, but he turned aside, and would not see it, abhorring him that brought it as a deteftable Murderer. He took his Ring with which he fealed his Letters, and. whereon was ingraven a Lyon holding a Sword, and burst out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinus (Plutarch adds) he put to death. King Ptolomy was overcome Less and rothins (rimaro acts) in put to death in Battel, vanished away, and was never heard of. Theodorus the Rhetoritian e-fcaped Cefars Hands, and wandered up and down Exprising great misery, despised by every Man, till Marcus Bratus, who slew Cefar, tubduing Asia, met with, and put him to death after cruel Torments. The Ashes of Pompey's Body were afterward carried to Cornelia his Wife, who buried them in a Town of hers by the City of Alba. This is Plutarch's Account, who blames this great Captain especially for being hectored by his Officers into a Battel, and deceived by his Father in-law Scipio, who, it is faid, intending to keep the greatest part of the Money he had brought out of Afia to himself, hasted and perswaded him to fight, by telling him

77. Dion Cassius relates the same Story as Plutarch, concerning Casar his weeping at the fight of Pompey's Head. He adds, that he lamented, called him his Son-in-law, and related what they two had done together. That he was fo far from owning his Murderers to have done him any Service, that he blamed them for the Fact, and gave the Head to others to be honourably interred. As hereby he deserved Praise, so in the opinion of the Writer he deserved to be laugh'd at for his counterfeiting. For having above measure covered Domination, hated Pompey always as his Adversary upon that account, devised all manner of things against him, and undertaken this War for no other reason, than that having removed him out of the way, he might obtain the Sovereignty, and being for no other thing come into Egypt, than to destroy him, if he was yet alive; he pretended a mils of him, and to be troubled at his Death. He being so made away, Cefar thinking there was nothing of Hostility now behind, spent his time in Egypt in gathering up money, and deciding the Controverse betwitt Ptolomy and his Sister Cleopatra, and became intangled in the Alexandrian War, as we have shown in the History of that Kingdom. In the mean time Pharnaces was at work in Pontus, where being incouraged by the late Civil War, he had attempted to seize on his Fathers Kingdom. And another, both Civil, and, as Dio terms it, Forreign War was begun by Cato and others in Africk. For he being left by Pompey at Dyrrachium to guard the Paffage from Italy, upon his overthrow, betook himfelf from Epirus to Coreyra, with whom joyned fuch as had fled from the Battel, or were of that Party; for though Cicero, and some other Senators, went strait to Rome, yet most of them with Labienus and Afranius (who both despaired of pardon from C.efar, the one because he had revolted from him, and the other because having once been pardoned he had again taken Arms against the Conqueror) went to Cato, and under him, as General, renewed the War. To them joyned Octavius. cato General who had plyed about the Ionian Sea, had taken C. Antonius, and many Towns, but his Men, after the Battel of Pharfalum, fell off from him. So did Cn. Pom-

Sect. 7. pey, who with the Æg yptian Fleet had made incursions into Epirus, and attempted Orienm, as also Brandusum, though without success, after the defeat of his Father, and the departure of the Az yptians; whereupon he betook himself to Caro, to whom also repaired C. Cassius, who had vexed many Parts of Italy and Sicily, and fought often prosperously both by Sea and Land. Cato using these Persons as his Councellors and Affiftants, paffed into Peloponne fus, with hopes of feizing on that Country, knowing yet nothing of the Death of Pompey. But Q. Fusius Calenus marching against them, they set Sail, and went to Cyrene, where, hearing of Pompey's Death, they then differed in opinion. Cato, who by no means would bear the Domination of C.efar, resolved for Africk, and was followed by such as despaired of safety, where they omitted nothing they could devise against Cafar. Most of the rest were dispersed, as it happened; and some went strait to Cefar, and obtained pardon, amongst whom was C. Cassius.

78. Calenus, before the Battel of Pharfalum, being fent into Greece by Cafar, attacqued the City of Athens, but could not force them to yield, till News arrived of his Success. Then they fubmirred, and Cefar forgave them without any injury offered to them, or any fine imposed, faying, That they having grievously offended, were preferved by the Dead; by which laying he hinted, that he spared them for the Glory and Vertue of their Ancestors. After this most other Towns of Greece reconciled themselves to him, and Megara paid dear to Fusius for its contumacy. At Rome, before the Controversie was determined, all openly spake well of Cafar, for fear of his Soldiers there left, and of Servilius his Colleague. When they believed the defeat of Pompey, they caused the Statues of him and Sylla to be demolished at the Rostra; but fearing he might yet recruit himself, they thought they had done too much. But when they understood for certain of his death, then what was it they would not do for Cafar, the principal Citizens ftriving who should exceed in flattery, and hoping to obtain Preferments for so doing, whereas it was known they were driven to it by the exigency of Affairs? They gave him Power to determine of those of Pompeys Party as he pleased, and they made him Lord of Peace and War against all Men whatsoever, though he neither confulted the People nor Senate. This Power he had taken to himself before in the management of the late Wars; but this is to be observed concerning these Times, and in reference to Casar and his adopted Son, that the Romans defiring to feem still Free Citizens, and their own Men decreed those things in their behalf, which they were already possessed of, and gave such things as they could not keep. Now was he voted Conful for five years together, Dittator not for half, but an whole year, and to have Tribunitial Power for his Life; fo as to fit amongst the Tribunes, and do their Work, which had not been granted to any before him. Having delivered the Provinces to the Confuls by lot, yet they decreed, that Cafar might grant them to Pretors without fortitition, and fo they returned both to Consuls and Pretors again, contrary to their former resolution. They ordered him a Triumph over Juba, and the Romans that served him, as if the Victory was already obtained, when Cafar knew not as yet whether there would be fuch a War. Now though he was out of italy, yet he prefently took the Dittatorship, and made Antony his Magister Equium, who as yet had not been Pretor. And after this Magistracy, he was made Consul, the Augurs making a clamour, that it was not lawful for a Magister Equitum to hold above fix Months. For this they were laughed at to purpose, in that having, against all Precedent, made the Term of the Dictatorship to be Annual, they would be so accurate as to that of his Magister E-

79. While Cafar was busied in the Alexandrian War, great Tumults happened in Italy, and at Rome. In Italy Milo raised Commotions, being the only exil'd Person whom Cesar did not restore; but he was suppressed and slain at Apulia, by the Arms of Servilius the Consul. At Rome M. Cecilius presumed to contradict what Cefir had ordained concerning Creditors, being displeased that he had not been made Pretor of the City formerly by him, which Office he now obtained. He raised also grievous Commotions, and at length was slain by those of Casars Party. Yet with these Men did not the Disturbances of the City receive an end; for Antony the Magister Equitum was burthensome to them, wearing the Pretexta, and having fix Lictors, when there was neither Conful nor Prator to be feen. Indeed he affembled the Senate, and thereby was represented a fort of a Commonwealth; but when they faw him girt with a Sword, and Guarded by a great number of Attendants, they began to think what fort of Person the Distator himself would prove, who though he had hitherto made no other flow, than that of Sect. 7.2 clemency, yet they thought a Man in full possession differed in humour from one who indeavoured to clear his way to his designs, by an obliging demeanour. But above all, they were plagued by the ourragious carriage of J. Freedline, and P. Gorneline Dolabella, the Thinin Elbis, the latter of which being once a Patritian, had made himself a Plebeian, to obtain the Place. By publishing Laws, and, making Slaughters to enact and constitute them, they harraded the Cinzens. Dolabella not exceed the control of the Cinzens when the designs of the control of the Cinzens and the control of the control peding pardon from Cefa. to great were insidements, and therefore not caring what he did to be remembred after his death. Till Cefar arrival in Haly they would not give over, burthen when they expected punishment, he betook himself to his wontgive over, burther when they expected punithment, he betook himself to his wonted clemency. Finding all things quiet, he not only forgate, his Rinemies, but preferred fome of them, amongst, whom Doladella himself, to the Dignity of Conflict, although he had nieve born the Preforbib.

80. Cefa might fooder have once to Reme. Il Cleopatric had not held himself in Higgpt, which hold she was forced at length to let go after, long-nine, Mosahs, and give way to a greater violence, which haved him out of her Imbracements. This proceeded from Pharmaces the Son of Milleridates, who was higg of the Dolponse Chimierius, but inflamed with an earnest desire of, recovering his lathers Dominions, laying the constitution of the Carlelland His station Wats. He leared Caladhs with having the opportunity of the Civil and Hig spring Wars, the lexical Chelbr with-out any trouble, and all Armiens in the ablence of Deiotorus, belides some Cities of Cuppadocia and Pontus, which were subject to the Jurisdiction of Bithymia. Casar having not yet felted matters in He ph, as he defired, and hoping to reduce him into order by others, had fent away (m. Domitine, Calvings against him, with command to recover Ass., and received the Forces that yeer there. Calvings joyned to thinked Detorarus and Airobarzanes, and went straing against Pharnages, who had his abode at Nicopolis, on which he had feized. Pharmaces affrighted at his coming, defired a Nicopolis, on which he had feized. Phariaces affrighted at his coming, defined a Truce, that the matter might be composed by a Melings, but Calvinus contemned, and would not hear him, but recluite to fight, was wortied in the Inagament, and Winter now drawing on, retirned into Afia. Phariaces clevated by this Success, took in the rest of the Cities of Pointss, stormed Amilias, and manying the Fathers Success. But he was stopped in his career by the revolt of Afinder, to whom having committed the charge of Bofforms, the Man being in hope to have it granted to himself, by, the Ramagn, endeavoured to curry friender with them. He purposed to go against him, but was diverted by News that Cafar himself was coming into Armenia, who, Prolomy being mow dead, and Domitius overthrown, thought it not honourable for him to make any longer stay in Rivint. Phariaces was more affirchted with his viscorous Spirit. than his Army, and At ypt. Pharnaces was more affrighted with his vigorous Spirit, than his Army, and before he drew near, fent often to him about a Peace, labouring by all means to evade the prefent danger. He pleaded that he had given no affiliance to Pompey, and hoped to pacifie Cept, who would half into Lidyand Africk, not doubting but affer his departure eafly to renew the War. Cept inflictently apprehentive of his Delign, gave good words to the Meffengers that came the first and the second time, on purpose to deceive him; but to those that were sent the third on the same errand, he objected, amongst other crimes, his ingratitude to Pompey his Benefactor. Using all expedition, on one and the same day he came and fought the Enemy, who distressed him at first with his Horse and Chariots that bore Scythes. But the Legions obtained for him the Victory, and Pharnaces flying to the Sea, and indeavouring to break into Bofforus, was repulfed and flain by Afander.

81. In this Victory, though none of the most eminent, Casar so much prided him-Prideth him- felf, as in none more, and that for the celerity of his Expedition; fo that writing to felf in his Vi- Antino at Rome he expressed his Atchievment in three words, Veni, Vidi, Vici, Leame, I faw, I overcame. He gave the Spoil, which was great, to his Soldiers, and whereas Mithridates had at this Hill Scotius overthrown Triarius, and erected a Trophy in the Place; because it was esteemed wickedness to demolish it, as consecrated to the Gods of War, he opposed against it another over Pharmacei after a certain manner to deface it. He recovered all that Pharmaces had taken from the Romans, or their Friends, and restored them to the former owners, part of Armenia excepted, which he bestowed on Ariobarzanes. He made some amends to those of Amisus, by making them free; to Mithridates of Pergamus he granted a Tetrarchy, with the Name of King, and committed to him the War against Asander, to revenge the treachery committed against his Friend; and that Mitbridates might become Lord of Bosporus. He left Domitius to take order for other matters, and went into Bithyma, thence Remmeth in into Greece, and so failed into Italy; for, such was his Expedition against Pharnaces,

Sect. 7. and his Return, as Dion Cassius hath described it. But Josephus further acquaints us, (which we must not passover) that taking Syria in his way from Egypt he restored Hyrcanus to the Priesthood in Judea, though Antigonus the Son of Aristobulus (who being let out of Prison by him, and sent home, had been poisoned by Pompey's Party) fued to him for the Government. He made also Antipater (whom Hyrcanus had fent to joyn with Mithridates of Pergamus with three thouland Horse, and who did good Service in the Alexandrian War) Governour of Judea. And he promoted his own Kinsman Sextus Cafar from a Questorship to the Government of Syria, which Scipio the Father-in-law of Pompey had enjoyed the year be-

82. Cesar, upon his return into Italy, by all means he could, raised Money, as formerly he had practifed. What had been promifed to Pompey he exacted, and impofed new Leavies upon other pretended occasions. At Tyre he took away all that was confecrated to Hercules, because they had received the Wife and Son of Pompey in their flight; and from many Princes and Kings he received Crowns of Gold, because of the Victories he had obtained. And this he did, our Writer tells us, not out of any diffunct humour, but because he was at vaft charge, and now must be at greater, for the paying of his Armies, fetting forth his Triumph, and in other matters, wherein his Magnificence was to be shown. He was intent upon raising Treasure, because, as he was wont to say, there were two things whereby Power was obtained, preserved, and increased, and these were Soldiers and Money, of which the one procured the other; for by Money Soldiers were maintained, and by Soldiers Money was raifed. Sometimes he was wont to think and speak after this manner. And when he came to Rome this was the only course he followed. He otherwise offended no Man, but fuch Gifts as wese given him in Gold, Images, or other things, he gladly received, and raifed much Money by Loans, not only from private Persons, but also from Cities, and exacted them no otherwise than as due to him, by constraint and force, though he never intended to make restitution, alledging, that he had spent his own Estate upon the Common-wealth, and now was upon necessity to be in debt. He not only herein offended Strangers, but his own Friends, who buying fuch Goods and Estates as he had published, and hoping he would not exact the price, now found they were mistaken; and he valued not their Indignation. For he pleased them again by Offices and Imployments, and the Multitude he obliged, by remitting all the Usury which had been due from the time he undertook the Expedition against Pompey, as also Rent for the hire of Houses, and other ways. That he might gratifie many Persons, he designed ten Pretors for the following year, and increased the number of such as served about their Sacred things, above what was prescribed by the Laws. The Colleges of the Pontifices, Augurs, and Quindecemviri, he increased by one added to each, though, as was decreed, he had refolved to have all Offices of Priefts in his own Hands. The Horfe-men and Centurions of his Army, and fuch as held leffer Commands, he honoured feveral ways, and some of them by bringing them into the Senate in the Places of fuch as were dead.

83. But while these things he did, he was much disturbed by his Soldiers, who though they had been rewarded as they had deferved of him, yet were not contented, and their expectations not being answered, grew mutinous. The greater pare of them lay in Campania, whence he purposed to transport them into Africk, They almost killed Sallust, who was made Prestor, that he might obtain the Senatorian Dignity, and when he fled towards Cesar to acquaint him with their disorder, they purfued, and flew two Senators out-right, or two Prators, as Plutarch names them, Cosconius and Galba. When Casar knew it, he thought first to have sent his Pratorian Troops; but fearing that they also should be drawn into the Mutiny, he staid till the Soldiers came into the Suburbs. Then he fent to know what they would have, and what the reason was of their coming. They answered, they would declare it to Cafar himself; and it being the Custom to wear their Swords in the City, he permitted them to come with them, without their other Arms. With many words they related what Labours they had undergone, what Dangers they had incurred, what Rewards they had both expected and deserved, and now they required to be dismissed, and vehemently urged it; not that they defired to return to a Private Life, being used to War and Spoil, but to terrifie him, now involved in the African War. He only replyed, Indeed Quirites you speak the truth, for you are exhausted with Labours and Wounds. Without any other Answer he remitted to them all the Military Oath, as as standing in no further need of their assistance, and promised Pay and Rewards to those that had served their full time. Herewith they were struck with great Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

Whom here- amazement, especially that he should call them Quirites, and not Soldiers, and fear- Sec duceth by calling fome ill thing was determined against them, they desponded, and earnestly befought him to receive them again, promifing all obedience; and alone by themselves to dispatch the War. They making these Intreaties, and a certain Tribune, whether at their request, or to gratifie Cafar, is unknown, interceding in their behalf, he faid he dismissed them all that were there, and moreover all others that had served their time; for he had nothing for them to do. Yet he would reward them, that they should not say he made use of them in his need, and afterwards was ingrateful, although they had refused his Service, and to dispatch the remainder of the War, when they were neither destitute of strength, nor of any other thing. 84. This he craftily spake, for he had great need of them, and to all he affigured Grounds, partly fuch as were publick, and partly his own, but in a difperfed manner. lest being in one place they might disturb their Neighbours, or attempt some sedicious things. Such Money as he had promifed for performance of fome notable Facts, he undertook to pay down, or afterward with Interest; and by such discourse made them so obnoxious, that they not only not murmured, but gave him thanks. Now, faith he, you have all I owed you, neither will I for the time to come force any of you to the War; but if any of you will affift me in what is behind, I will willingly receive him. Having heard this, they were wonderous joyful, neither was there one who did not give his Name. He selected some he knew most turbulent that were able to live by Husbandry, and received the rest, taking this course also with some other Troops. Such as were most fierce, amutinous, and fittest for mischief, he took along with him out of Italy, and exposed them to dangers in Africk, both thereby to promote his Service against the Enemy, and to rid himself of ill Men. For though he was of a most gentle humour, and defirous to gratifie his Soldiers, above all other Mortals, yet he most grievously hated all Mutineers, and most severely punished them. These things happened that year wherein he in effect again was Dictator, though Calenus and Vatinius at the latter end of the year bore the Name of Confuls.

85. In the middle of Winter he passed over into Africk, and thereby coming unexpected upon his Enemies, had the better fuccels. For in all his Affairs he used celerity, and gained much by his fudden expeditions, which indeed was the cause why he excelled all Captains of his time in the Glory of Martial Actions. Africk had for-merly been no great friend to him, and after the deflutication of Carto he eftermed it an Enemy. For Varus and Juba did there what they pleafed, and now Cato and Scipio having joyned with them, they drew in Sicily and Sardinia to their affiltance, and hearing there were stirs in Spain, sent Cn. Pompey thither, that by the power of the love that People bore to his Father, he might make it their own, and then they might return with him into Italy. Varue at first, as most experienced in Africk, contended with Scipio for the chief Command, but Cato declined it, and it was devolved upon Scipio as the greatest Person in Dignity, and one who for his very Name was acceptable in that Country, where it was thought a Scipio could not miscarry. Casar perceiving his Soldiers also to be of this humour, carried over with him one Scipio, Sirnamed Salatto, and, they not expecting him in Winter, arrived at Adrumetum, not being able to reach Utica with his Ships. At his going alhoar his feet flipped, and he fell flat upon his face, at which his Men were affrighted, as an ill Omen; but he, without any helitation, stretch'd out his Hand upon the Ground, and grasped it, as having fall'n on purpose, and, kissing it, said, I hold thee, O Africk. Attempting to take Adrumetum, he was repulsed, and driven to another Place called Raspina, where he took up his Winter Quarters, and thencemade War. For the following year heentred upon the Confulship and Dictatorship, both the third time, having Lepidus for his Colleague. This Man, as foon as he was declared Dictator by him, he fent from being Prator into the hither Spain, and granted him a Triumph at his return, though he had overcome no Man, nor so much as fought, only it was pretended he was present at the Actions of Longinus and Marcellus. Lepidus in his Triumph brought in nothing but the Money, of which he had spoiled the Provinces. But Cafar having thus requited him, now, as was faid, took him for his Colleague.

86. In Africk Fortune now feemed to change her afpect upon his Affairs. His Men going out onforraging, before they had worn off the diforder into which the Sea had brought them, were many of them cut off by Petreius and Labienus, who laying hold on the advantage, drove them to an Hill, where they might have been all taken or destroyed, but that their Enemies were discouraged by the many Wounds they had received. However, they resolved to beliege them, and perish they must,

Sect. 7. if Cafar did not relieve them, who now, as he had reafon, was very melancholick, confidering that Scipio and Juba were coming with all their Forces, that he had not strength to grapple with them all, had not necessaries wherewith to subsist, neither could he get away, his Enemies stopping him both at Sea and Land. When he was in this perplexity, he was refeued out of danger by one P. Sittiue, who being driven out of Italy, joyned many banished Persons with him, and passing into Mauritania, having obtained of King Bocchus a Band of Men, resolved to affist Casar in this War, though he never had been gratified by him, nor so much as known to him. Yet did he not think he could do him much Service, being at a great distance from him, and having but a small Force; but observing the time when Juba led his Army out of his Kingdom, he brake into Numidia, and wasted it, together with Gatulia, (part of his Kingdom) which constrained Juba to return back when he had gone half his Journey. So far was Cafar from being in condition to defend himself from both, that he was not able to grapple with Scipio, especially because his Horses would not endure the fight, and fmell of his Elephants, which caused him to send not only for Soldiers out of Italy, but for Elephants too, to make them familiar to his Horses. In the mean time the Getuli imbraced his friendship, the Example of whom some Neighbouring People followed, induced by the requital he made them, and by remembrance of Marius, to whom Cafar was akin. And now Succours came to him out of Italy, though with great difficulty and hazard, both by reason of Enemies, and tempestuous Weather.

87. He refolved now to fall upon Scipio, before Juba could come and joyn with him. He beat him from a Mount he had seized near the City Uzitta, and driving also Labienus from another Post, blocked up the Place. Scipio was fearful to ingage till the coming of Juba, whom, to draw on, he promifed all Africk that was held by the Romans. This Promife so wrought upon him, that leaving a Party to oppose Sittius, he began his March against Cafar, who in the mean time, by fair Promises, drew many, both Romans and Africans, to revolt from Scipio, but by all means he might use, he could not oblige him to fight. Scipio also attempted to draw off Casars Men, but without fucces, not promising them any Rewards, but only moving them to preserve the liberty of the Roman People. But the Arrival of Juba altered the Cafe. Now they refolved to fight Cefar, who declined all Ingagements till more Forces could arrive out of Italy, which was but by degrees, for they were raifed without haft, and Shipping was wanting for their transportation. At length, incouraged by their arrival, he drew out his Army to give Battel, and they also drew out and faced him; but yet they ingaged not, though they looked on one another feveral days, but then retired to their Camps. Cefar feeing they were not to be drawn from their Fortifications, removed to Thapfus, thereby either to fight the Enemy, if he came to relieve it, or else to take it destitute of Succours. Thapfus was situate in a kind of a Peninfula made by the Sea, and a Fen, and a narrow neck of Land gave access to it, wherein was a Lake, the Way lying narrow on each side. Casar made Fortifications in these Straits, and Scipio and Juba indeavoured to cut them off by other Works from the Continent, and where they could not at prefent do this, they placed Elephants to keep off Cafars Soldiers, being wholly intent upon the Works. But Casar fell upon Scipio's quarter, and drove the Elephants by Darts and Stones upon the Labourers, whom putting to flight, he pursued, and took the Camp. Herewith was Juba so struck, that he would neither fight, nor take care to preserve his own Camp, but fled amain into his Kingdom. There none would receive him, and the rather, because they had been defeated by Sitting. Despairing then of safety, he fought a fingle Combate with Petreius, who hoped also for no pardon, and they both died together. Cæsar, he being fled, became Master of their Fortifications, and made great flaughter of their Men, not sparing those who yielded themselves. * Then * Platarch made great laughter of their wiel, not paring those who yledged memeries. Then "blanton took he the reft of the Cities, with the Namidians, over whom he fet Sallutz, writes, Tast not to govern, but pill them as it proved. This City they perfwaded him to be Governour of, and he could not of his Enember of the Enember o have had the Place destroyed, as having taken Cæsars part. He had given place to his own Men. so great a Commander as Casar was, for which he received several taunts from him by Letters, as well as whenhe offered to pass into Italy with his Forces to draw Casar out of Africk. Cato repented then that he had made him General, because he saw he would indifcreetly profecute the War, and if he overcame, would not moderately use the Victory against his Fellow-Citizens, and he declated, that if so it happened, he would not stay at Rome, but sly from his cruelty, who even now did proudly threaten many Persons. But the news of Scipio's defeat arriving, put Cato upon other thoughts. He attempted to fortifie the City, and perswaded three hundred Roman Merchants, who lived there, to frand upon their guard; but they again, out of fear of Cafar, forfook him; fo that refolving to die, and not accept the mercy of the Platareh in Conqueror, if it should be offered, he laboured all he could to save such Senators as were with him in the City. And by his Industry he got Ships for them all, and sent them to Sea. When the three hundred Merchants told him they would fend to Cafar to crave pardon for him in an especial manner, and if they could not obtain it, they would fight for him to the last breath in their bodies; he thanked them for their good will, but answered, that they should send quickly to beg pardon for themselves, but none for him. His reason he said was, because Men that be overcome, and have offended ought to make fute and crave pardon; but for himfelf, he was never overcome in his life; had overcome others as much as he defired, and in Justice had always excelled Casar, who was indeed the only Person that was now overcome and captivated; that thing now being evident to all the World, which he had always denied to have practiced againft his Country.

89. The Person that was chosen by the three hundred to go and intercede with Cafar, was Lucius Cafar his Kiniman, who intreated Cato to help him to make the Speech he should speak in behalf of them all; but in Cato's behalf he said he would kis his Hand, fall down on his Knees, and intercede for him. He told him he should not; for if he would fave his life by Cefars favour, he could do it, if he would go to him, but he would not be obliged to a Tyrant for injustice. For he said it was injustice in him to take upon him as a Lord and Sovereign to save a Mans life, when he had no real Authority to command: But he considered with him what to say in behalf of the three hundred. When Lucius Cafar was gone, to whom he recommended his Son and his Friends, he charged his Son by no means to meddle with State-Affairs, because to deal uprightly like Cato's Son, the corruption of the Time and State would not abide it, and if he observed the time, he could not do like an honest Man. At night he imbraced him and his Friends more lovingly than he was wont to do, whereby he made them suspect as formerly what he designed. His Son at Supper took from him his Sword, which he missed not when he arose, but lying down in his Bed read Plato's Dialogue, called Phedo, concerning the Immortality of the Soul. Then, miffing his Sword, he was very angry it was taken away, and would not be quiet till it was again restored to him. When he had it, and felt it to be sharp, he faid he was now where he would be, and laying it down naked by him, took his Book again, and read it over, as was faid, twice together. Then flept he fo foundly, that his Men in the Antichamber heard him fnoar. When it grew day, and the Birds began to chirp, he took his Sword, and thrust it into his Breast; but the Wound not dispatching him quickly, by reason his Hand was swoll'n with a stroak he gave one of his Servants on the Face in his passion about his Sword, he fell down upon his Bed, and cast to the ground a little Geometrical Table; with the noise of which, his Servants Bills himself. affrighted, cried out, and his Son and Friends coming in, found him all in Blood. and most of his Bowels coming out of his Body. Then did his Physitian endeavour to put in his Bowelsagain, and to fow up his Wound; but he coming to himfelf, thrust him from him, tore them with his own hand, and inlarging the Wound, immediate-

90. His death being known, the three hundred Merchants, and all the People of Utica, to whom he had reftored all their Money in his Hands, were prefently at his Door, called him their Benefactor and Reliever, and faid, That he only was a Freeman, and had an invincible mind. This they did even when they heard that Celar was not far from Utica, and neither fear of the present danger, nor desire to flatter the Conqueror, nor any private quarrel amongst themselves, could keep them from honouring his Funerals; for fumptuoufly fetting out his Body, they paid their last respects to him by the Sea-fide, where in Plutarch's time was to be seen his Image, holding a Sword in his Hand. This done, they took the best course they could to save themselves and the City. Casar having heard that Cato staid at Utica, and sent all othersaway, knew not what to think of his meaning; but in a little time, hearing he

Sect. 7. had killed himself, it was reported he said, O Cato! I envy thee thy Death, because then hast envied me the Honour of saving thy Life. But Men doubted for all this what he would have done, and especially by reason of a Book he afterwards wrote against Cato, wherein he heaped up a number of Accusations against him. But some believed he wrote it not out of any malice to him, at least that was deadly, but rather out of civil ambition upon this occasion. Cicero had composed a Treatise in praise of this Person, and called it Cato, which Book was much esteemed, both because of the Eloquence of the Writer, and the excellent Subject which it handled. Cafar was much offended at it, thinking, that to praise him of whose death he was the cause, was to accuse himself; and therefore he took Pen in Hand, and composed another Treatise in answer to it, which he called Anti-Cato. Both these Books had favourers along time after, some defending the one for the love they bare to Cesar, and others the other for Cato's fake. But so died Cato, than whom none was more studious of Popular Government, a Man of a most firm and constant mind, who by his death obtained great Renown with his Countrey-men, especially those of his own Party, and from the Place where he died, obtained the Sirname of Uticensis, the rather to diffinguish him from his Great-Grand-father, who was called Cenforius from that Office

91. Cafar dismissed his Son unhurt, as he did many more who betook themselves unto him. Afranius and Faustus Sylla fled into Mauritania, despairing of pardon. and falling into Sittius his Hands, Cafar put them to death as Captives. Though cefar punishes L. Cesar was both his Kinsman, and came voluntarily in to him to beg his pardon, yet because he had been against him all the War, he made him be called to his Tryal, and when he feared to give Judgment of death against him himself, caused the Process to fall, but procured him to be slain privately. And it was his Custom in Fight. or fome other way, to bring about the destruction of such as he liked not, or had ill deserved of him, being not willing to punish them all openly. However, when he had taken Scipio's Cabinet, he burnt all the Letters therein contained, without reading them, and pardoned many that had borne Arms against him, either for their own fakes, or at the request of such as interceded for them, giving liberty to every of his Friends and Fellow-Soldiers to exempt one, whom they would name, from punishment. And though Plutarch writes concerning Cato, as we have feen, yet Dio thinks he ought not to doubt but he would have spared him. For he saith he had him in so great admiration, that when as afterward Cicero composed a Book in his praise, he took it not ill he had so done, though the Author had also been in the Waragainst him, but fatisfied himself in answering the Book in another Treatise, which was called Anti-Cato. Whatever they thought at Rome of these things, they of the Senate were fearful to be flow in expressing the sence they had either of his Merit, or his Power. They decreed, That for his Victory Sacrifice should be offered forty days; that in his Triumph already granted, he might use White Horses, and the Apparitors he both now had with him, and which he used in his first and second Ditt atorship. They created him Master of Manners, as if the Name of Cenfor was too mean, for three creed him by years, and Dictator for ten. They ordered he should fit in the same Seat with the Consuls in Senate, and always speak his opinion first; that in all Horse-races he should distribute the Rewards, confer Places of Magistracy, and other Honours wont to be bestowed by the People; that a Chariot should be set up to him in the Capitol over against Jupiter; that he should be placed upon a Globe of the World with this Inscription, He is a Demi-God, and that the Name of Catulus being obliterated, his should be fet upon the Capitol, as if he had finished that Temple for which he intended to call Catulus to account. Many other things they decreed, but these Dio mentions, because he approved and received them, rejecting the rest. 92. He knew fufficiently, that they were decreed more out of flattery than good will, and was sensible that they were fearful of him that he would abuse his Power, and act with fuch heat and infolence as Sylla, Marius, and Cinna had done before him. He labours to take off their jealousse. Being returned to Rome, he indeavoured to take off their jealousse he made, the one to the Senate, and the other to the People, promising to treat them he made, the one to the Senate, and the other to the People, promiting to treat them no otherwise than as an Indulgent Father is wont to do his Children, and to use his Power for their protection, and not the destruction of such as had fought against him. And as for his late Victory, he magnified it, declaring, that he had thereby laid so many Countries to the Empire of Rome, that he could furnish them yearly with two hundred thousand bushels of Wheat, and twenty hundred thousand Pound weight of Oyl. By his words they were a little eased of their fear, but they could not fully trust him, till they faw them made good by his Actions. Now Dio tells us, he triumphed four days together, and that with all possible show of Magnificence, Sect. 7. over the Galles, Egypt, Pharnaces, and Juha, though others mention only three Triumphs, omitting that over the Galles. The Spectators were well pleased at the fight, but it grieved them to fee Arlinoe, once called Queen of Ægypt, led amongst the Captives, and to behold the Spoils of the Citizens that had fall in in Africk. Yet confidering the greatness of the things performed, they had him in admiration, and he was not dipleased, but bore well the infolent liberty of the Soldiers, who jecred him for his familiarity with Cleopatra, and his having been abused by Nicomedes, and faid, That if he laid down his Power, he must perish by the strictness of the Laws; if he continued it, he must turn Tyrant. But he regarded nothing they said, but touching the matter of Nicomedes. About it he was much concerned, and offered to purge it by Oath, for which he was derided. On the first day of his Triumph his Chariot broke as he passed by the Temple of Fortune, built by Lucullus, and he was forced to make use of another. But he mounted the steps of the Capitolupon his Knees, and he would neither have Chariot placed there, nor the Infcription lately mentioned, of Demi-God. Arsinoe was dismissed, but Vercingetorix, Dio tells us, with others, was put to death.

93. He feasted the People with great Magnificence, (Plutarch faith, at two and twenty thousand Tables) adding Wheat and Oyl above the ordinary Custom; to the three hundred Nummi he had promifed them a Man, he added another hundred, and to the Soldiers he gave two Seftercia apiece. He reformed the abuse committed in giving Corn at the publick charge; for finding it to be procured in confusion, and feditioully he cut off about one half of the Expence. The last night of the Triumph, after Supper, he went with his Shooes on, and his Head bedecked with all forts of Flowers, into his Forum, whither all the People in a manner accompanied him, many Elephants bearing Torches before them. For he had built a Forum which bore his Name, more beautiful than the Roman, though the Roman had this advantage by that new one that it was called the Great. This, with a Temple to Venus, his Progenitrix, as he reported, he dedicated, he fet forth Shows, built are Amphitheatre; and in Honour of his Daughter, exhibited Huntings, and Games of Gladiators. Other forts of Sports there were, and the Sons of Patritians, accor-which is different ding to the Cultom, played the Tragedy of Troy, and other real Tragedles were acted, many Persons being killed, for which the People were angry with him, as also for the vast expence, wherewith the Soldiers were also so far moved, that angre that the Money was not bestowed on themselves, they had fall'n into a Mutiny, had not he himself laid hold on one of them, and delivered him to punishment. And Dio writes, That two other Men had their Throats cut in a way of Sacrifice by the Pontifices and the Salius in the Campus Martius, though neither Sibylla had commanded, nor any Oracle was extant concerning such a thing.

He maketh

94. Now did he make many Laws. He committed Judicature to the Senators and Equites alone, to have Justice daily administred; some Plebeians having been formerly imployed herein. Both by Laws and his own observation he repressed the profuse way of living of Rich Persons. And because the City was manifestly exhausted, by reason of multitudes quitting it, he proposed Rewards to those that had many Children. Finding that by his long Command in Gall he had had opportunity to aspire after Domination, and to establish his Power, by a Law he ordained, that no Prator should have command above a year, nor a Conful above two years, from the execution of his Office. And whereas the form of the year was much now out of order, the Months being observed according to the Revolution of the Moon, he reduced it, Dio tells us, to that state in which it stood in his time, intercalating fixty and seven days, though others fallly speak of more. This account he himself had learnt at Alexandria, although it varied so much from the form of a Year, that every Alexandrian Month confifted of thirty days, and they added five days to every year. Others have written, That in framing this Account, which after him hath been called Julian, he used the skill of Sofigenes, an excellent Mathematitian of Alexandria, for Astronomical Calculations, and of Flavius the Scribe, in rectifying the Calendar. Now those five days, and two others besides, which he took from one, he fitly added to the other Months; and that Day which ariseth out of the parts of a Day, he added to every fourth Year, three Years being omitted; so that now, saith Dio, there can be no error as to the Hours of a Year, except very small, so small, that every one thoufand four hundred and fixty one Year shall need the Intercalation but of one Day, How true this is, let them that use the Gregorian Account, if they should think it worth their while, confider.

Roman Affairs 95. Cesur, though he did all these things, yet was so wise as to do nothing on his own Head, without communicating his Deligns with the Principal of the Senate, and fometimes with the whole Order. As hereby he declined ill will, fo he procured it by relieving condemned Persons, particularly such as were found guilty of ambitious feeking for Offices, for making unworthy Men Senators, and especially for harbouring Cleopatra in his own House, who was come to Rome with her Husband; and he valued not the infamy, but entred them amongst the Kings, that were the Friends and Allies of the Romans. But the pleasure he took in such Society was disturbed by News out of Spain, where Cn. Pompeius, Son of Pompey the Great, fwayed all as he pleased, having ingratiated himself with the Soldiers by his obliging demeanour. Cafar hoping to dispatch this War by his Officers, had sent a Fleet thither from Sardinia, and after that an Army, but his Captains were discouraged, and stood at gaze, expecting and requiring his coming. And when he saw it was necellary, he was there before either they or the Enemy in the least imagined it, hoping by fisch expedition to terrify Pompey, who now had laid Siege to a Town called UMi. Cefir indeavoured to divert him by befieging Corduba, but there fell fisk, and when he came to raife the Siege, durft not abide his coming. Having recovered his Health, and received more Forces which followed him, he abode as well as he could the Incommodities of Winter, and want of Provisions, being now, though Dittator, made Conful again for the following year; for Lepidus affembled the People, being then Magister Equitum, which Title, being Conful, he affumed contrary to the practice of their Fore-fathers. 96. Cafar having no hope of taking Corduba, it was so well Manned, removed, and laid fiege to Attegna, which he heard was full of Corn; and Pompey thinking it firong enough to hold out, and not willing to expose his Soldiers to the cold, came not to relieve it; fo that the Towns-men yielded. Being Master of this, other Cities submitted themselves to him; and Pompey wandering up and down, and fearing all the rest would revolt, resolved to come to a Battel. Both Armies had Auxiliaries of Spaniards and Moors, but the Romans alone fultained the Charge; for those on Cafars fide were excited to do their utmost by hope to put an end that day to all their labours; and they with Pompey fought out of desperation, most of them ex-Paury's Sons. pecting no pardon, as having had their Lives formerly given them when they were overthrown with Afranius and Varro. And with so great animosity they sought, that had not Bogud, who stood with his Men without the Battel, turned himself to fall on the Camp of Pompey, they had either all died upon the Spot, or Night must have taken up the Controversie. But Labienus, when he perceived the Design of Bogud, leaving his Place to go to oppose him, Pompey's Men thought he fled, and let fall their courage so much, that though afterward they saw their error, yet could they not recover their former condition, but fled into the City Munda, or into their Camp. Such as got into the Camp valiantly relisted the Enemy, and were not flain till they had killed as many of the Affailants. They that got into the Town held it long out, and it was not taken till they were all destroyed by frequent Sallies. So great flaughter was made of Romans in the Battel, that at night when Cafars Soldiers were to raise a Wall to keep them in that none might escape, they made one of dead Bodies. How true foever this Story is, related by Dio, othersaffirm this the greatest Battel that was fought in this Civil War. That Casars Men were so distrelled, that he was glad to run himself into the Croud, and ask them if they were not ashamed to be beaten and taken Prisoners, and to yield themselves to the young Boys, meaning Pompey's two Sons. That with much ado, and not without all the Force he could make, he got the day, killing thirty thousand of his Enemies, and losing a thousand of his own best Soldiers. When the Fight was over, being in his Tent, he told his Friends, that he had often before fought for Victory, but now for the faving of his own Life. Some fay his Army had run, but that he fnatching a Target out of a Soldiers Hand, went and ingaged the Enemy himfelf, and had two hundred Darts thrown at him; whereat his Officers being ashamed, went on, and got the Victory

97. After this he had all the Cities of Spain given up to him, whence he raised as much Money as he could possible, not abitaining from things confecrated at Gades unto Hercules. Cn. Pompey, after a conflict with Cesennius Lento, wherein he was worsted, got into the Woods, and there perished. And so ended this Civil War, by a Battel fought on the day of the Bacchanalia, as Plutarch writes, who adds, that fome reported that it was on the fame day four years that Pompey went out of Rome to begin it. A War so destructive to the Roman People, that Cafar before his going Chap. IX. Contemporary with the Empire of the Macedonians.

into Spain, making a Census, found at the Lustrum but one hundred and fifty thou- Sect. 8. fand Polls of Citizens; whereas at that before had been found three hundred and twenty thousand. Whether the great danger he escaped made him over-joyed, and this excessive Joy transported him above his usual and common temper; but whereas after his other Victories in the Civil War he neither fent Messengers nor Letters, as rather concealing and grieving at the ruine of his Fellow-Citizens, now he did it as if he had overcome some barbarous King or Nation. More than this, he triumphed, Athisteran and yet not content with this, and giving a Dinner again to the People, as in a combiguity, he gave the Honour of Triumphing to Fabius and Pedius his Lieutengers, who had done nothing by the Triumphing to Fabius and Pedius his Lieutengers. nants, who had done nothing by their own Conduct. But the laughter they moved made some amends, for they made use not of Ivory, but Wooden Images and Vessels in their Pomp. This gave extraordinary great offence, and more than anything he had done before, when the Spectators confidered that he made all this noise for having destroyed the Sons of the greatest Man in Rome, who had been overcome by Fortune, and had plucked up his Race by the Roots. It was odious that he should triumph for the Calamities of his Country, and rejoyce at a thing for which he had but one excuse to God and Man, viz. That he was compelled to do it.

98. But now again the Senate goes to work, and confiders not what it was he deferved, but what the state of Affairs required they should do for his further Honour. And many extraordinary things they voted. Amongst others, that he should have the Name of Deliverer, and so he was entered in the Fasti, That a Temple should be erected to Liberty; And that he should have and enjoy the Title of Imperator, not only in the ancient fense, as it was common to him, with others who ob-but they conferred it on him now first of all, in that meaning as a Steward it belonged to fuch as had Sovereign Authority, and as proper to himself. To that flattery they proceeded, that they commanded his Sons and Nephews to be named Imperatores, though he had no Son, and wasold; although indeed from this Julius proceeded the Name of Imperator, as also that of Cossar, and as a peculiar Name of Sovereign Authority was derived down to all Imperatores, (Emperors, as we call them) who enjoyed them both joyned together. Other things they decreed, which made him a Sovereign Prince or King in effect. They subjected all Magistrates, even Plebeian, to his Power; made him Conful for ten years, and ordained that he alone should command the Armies, and raife Money.

SECT. VIII.

From the Absoluteness of Julius Casar, to the end of the second Triumvirate, and the Absoluteness of Octavius Casar, or Casar Octavianus.

The space of fifteen Years.

*#ES AR, before he came to the City, entred his fourth Confulthing alone. but did not bear it all the year, but after his return divefted himself of it, and created Confuls Q. Fabius and C. Trebonius, of whom it happened, that Fabius died the last day of his Magistracy, and Casar substituted C. Canivius for the remaining hours; whereupon Cicero jefted, writing in one of his Epiftles, That during this Confulfhip of Canivius no Man dined; yet no harm was committed in it, for he was wonderfully vigilant, who in his whole Confulfhip never flept. Thus bold did Cafar make with the Laws and Customs of his Country, in abdicating the Confulship of his own accord, without being commanded by an Edict fo to do, and in the matter of Canivius he seemed to play with so serious and noble a Dignity. But from this time forward it grew cheaper, and yet few held it an whole year, and fome more, fome fewer Months and Days as it happened. This Dio observes, who adds, That in his time scarcely any was Conful for an whole year, nor above two months, with a Colleague. But in other things they differed nothing from the ancient Custom, and the number of years was reckoned by their Names who were Confuls at the begin-2. So he ordered the Confulthip. Other Magistrates he pretended he would not meddle with, but leave them to the People to be named according to the ancient

Custom, but it was but a pretence; for he made them, and without any sortition they were fent into the Provinces. In other Offices the same number was observed, Fourteen Pres but fourteen Prestors and forty Questors were made. For he had no other way to gratifie those to whom he had promised great matters, and this caused him to admit many into the Senate without any distinction, whether the Man was a Soldier or a Nine hundred Libertine by original; fo that the number of Senators by this means arose to nine hundred. Many also he brought into the Ranks of Patritians, Consulares, and of those who had born other Offices; which became a Custom with those who were afterwards Emperors. Nay fome that were called to Judgment for corruption, he abfolved not without suspition of taking Money, which was increased in that he publickly fold publick Places, as well Sacred as Prophane. To his Friends he gave away much both in Money and Lands, which was pleafing to them that made their ends: Others took it very ill, and testified their resentment, as they might, by word of Mouth, or by Libeis. The management of publick Money was now translated from the Malies, and afterwards returned no more unto them, but at length was committed to Persons of Pratorian Dignity. Of these Ædiles of the Treafury two were this year created.

3. For the following year Cafar was Conful again with Antonius, and fixteen Prators were made, and so continued for many years. The Tribunal being taken out of the middle of the Forum, and put into another place, where it afterward continued, the Statues of Sylla and Pompey were reftored and placed by it, which caused Casar to be very well spoken of, as also that he granted the Glory and Inscription of the Work to Antony. He made some Laws, and extended the Pomærium, and yet in such Actions seemed only to imitate Silla; but in that he fully forgave them that had born Arms against him in the War, and granted part of their Estates to their Sons, he For what can thereby greatly taxed the cruelty of Sylla, and obtained a Name not only for Valour, but for Clemency; it being a difficult thing indeed for one and the same Man to please the People, and be commended for his carriage both in Peace and War. He was praised also by some for restoring the two ancient Cities of Corinth and Carthage, which had miscarried at the same time, by sending Roman Colonies thither, and continuing to them their old Names. While Cæsar was doing these things, the People of Rome was earneftly defirous, that the death of Crassia, and the loss of that Army should be revenged, and they had great hope to subdue the Parthians.

But that in Cesars absence the City might not be without Magistrates, nor if it chose Sect. 8. them it self, fall by that means into seditions, they resolved to name all sorts of Officers for three years; for fo long they reckoned the Expedition would hold. Of them Cestir, by vertue of a Law, was to name half, but indeed the whole. This year six Redises were made; of whom two Patritians called Cereales, and sour Plebeians; which number continued till the time of Dio. Sixteen Presors were creaters. ted, and all the Magistrates designed that were to serve the following year, and for Sixteen Prathe next the Confuls and Tribuni Plebis, but none for the third as had been intended. For these two years, Casar being still to be Dictator, named two that should be his Magistri Equitum, whereof Octavius a Youth was one, and for himself he appointed Dolabella to be Conful. Antony being Conful to the end of the present year, and Lepidus having given him the Government of Gallia Narbonensis, with the neighbouring part of Spain, he made other two Magistri Equitum in their room. For by this means he satisfied those to whom he was obliged. Therefore to the Colledge of fifteen Priests he added one, and three to that which confisted of seven

King Deiotather, and Son, who reigned together, had at that time four Ambassadors in the made an Oration for him in Cafars House, wherein he premiseth, that it was so unufual a thing for a King (a real King; for as for the Kings of Lacedemon, who were called to account by the impudent Ephori, they were indeed no Kings, having nothing but the Title, and therefore this can make nothing against this truth) to be questioned for his Life, that before that time it was never heard of. Deiotarus being acquitted by Cefar, put to death his Daughter as the had deferved, together with her Husband Castor Saccondarius, that noble Chronographer, concerning whom Gerard John Vossius is to be consulted, in his Treatise of Greek Historians. Casar in his last Confulling, to (c) gratifie Hyrcanus the High-Prist, and Ethnarcha of the Jews, as (c) Joseph Asia also the Nation, granted to him to enjoy, and govern the City of Jeruslaem as he tiquit like 14. pleased, which he might also fortilie with Walls. World by the Fury of certain Persons who envied him his Honours, and bore it ill Die lib. 44. that he was greater than themselves; and thereby out of concord raised new Seditions, and procured more Civil Wars to the Roman State. Their pretence was by cutting him off to restore the People to liberty; whereas, in the opinion of our Historian, they both wickedly destroyed him, and cast the Common-wealth again into Seditions, when it began to make use of the most proper fort of Government. the Sovereignty of the People having a specious Name and Repute, upon the account of equality, but having nothing else agreeable with the Name and Repute. On the other fide he affirms, that the Name of Monarchy might be unpleasant to the Ear, but that it is for the benefit of all to have the Government in the Hands of a fingle Person; it being an easier matter to have one good than many, and less harmful to have but one, than many had ones to command. But so matters went at this times the great ones envied Cafar, and he through their cunning drew more envy upon himself. They heaped Honours upon him to make him odious, and to appear over-big, and he was to imprudent as to receive them, when he had as much before as amounted to Sovereign and Absolute Authority, imagining that he was esteemd worthy of them, as is incident to all Persons that receive flattery. They improved

Sect. 8. this against him to the utmost, and still added more and more by the weight of them to destroy him. They voted that he should always wear even in the City a Triumphal Robe; that he should always sit in a Curule Chair, except at the celebration of Games; for then he should fit on the Bench with the Tribuni Plebis; that he should hang up Opima Spolia in the Temple of Jupiter Fereirus, as if he had killed some General of the Enemies with his own Hand; that his Lictors should use Laurel; that having finished the Latin Feria, he should from the Albanian Mount enter the City in a Chariot. Besides, they gave him the Name of Pater Patrie, stamped Money with his Image, ordered publick Sacrifices on his Birth-day, and his Statue to be fet up in all Cities, and in all Temples at Rome. At the Rolling they erected to him two Statues, whereof one was adorned with a Civick, and the other with an Observations. dional Crown, as if he had refcued his Fellow-Citizens from destruction, and delivered the City from a Siege. Moreover they raifed a Temple to new Concord, and therein commanded an Annual Feast to be kept, upon this account, that he had restored Peace unto them.

6. Cafar having accepted of these Honours, they put him upon filling up the Pontine Fenns, and digging through the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, and building a new Curia, which should be called Julia, as was one Tribe, as well as the Month on which he was born named Julius, They made him Cenfor alone for his Life; and gave him the same priviledge as the Tribuni Plebit enjoyed, that who ever injured him either by word or deed, should be esteemed guilty of Sacriledge, and of a piacular crime; and if he should have a Son he should be made Pontifex Maximus. When he had received thefe things very willingly, they added to them, that he fhould make use of a gilt Chair, and they erected to himfuch a Statue, as had been formerly raifed to the Kings. A Guard was appointed him of Equites and Senators; every year they ordained that Vows should be made publickly for his Health, that an Oath of fivearing by his Fortune should be framed; that what ever he should do should be confirmed; that every five years should Fealts be celebrated in his Honour as to an Heroe. Moreover they decreed a third fort of Colledge of Priefts, who should eclebrate the Enpercalia to be instituted and called Julia; that one of the Days of the Shows of the Gladation; should be conferenced to him, whether held at Rome, or elfewhere in Italy. These things also pleasing him, they commanded his Golden Chair and Golden Crown set with Gens (which Honour was wont to be given to their Gods) to be brought upon the Theatres by the Multitudes nay, they openly gave to him the Sirname of Jupiter, and ordained d'Temple to be built to his clemency, and made Antonius the Chief Priest in it to preside as some Flamen Dialis. While they decreed these things, they permitted a Sepulchre to be built for him within the Pomerium, and these Decrees to be written in Pillars of Silver with Golden Letters, which they placed under the feet of Jupiter Capitalinus, by which they fufficiently admonifhed him, and that openly, to think himself but a Man. At first they decreed him Honint, and that openly, to think minch out a want of that they found nours, which they thought he would bear with modelly? I but after that they found he rejoyced in them; though he refuted fome, they headed them one upon another, fome out of defire to flatter him, filld others oile of defign that they might export him to cenfures. For there were found fach as would have it permitted to him to be with what Women he would, for he made use of many, though now he was above fifty years of Age. But the greater partial it upon delign that being brought into greater envy and reprehension, they might the more easily work his destruction, which the event did manifest. And yet was he altogether score, nor magning they meant him any harm, and therefore he accepted not of the Guard of Equiter and Senators, but removed the Armed Arrendants upon his Person.

7. But having incurred odium by accepting of these Honours, another thing hap pened, either through his unadvicedness, or by accident, which made the Load in supportable. On a certain day when in the Senate many other, and the greatest Honours were decreed to him, and that by confent of all, except Caffits and his Party (the ill will of whom rowards him was fufficiently known; and yet his clemency was such, that he bore with them) the Senators came in their Body to him, to rell him what they had decreed, as he fate in the Porch of the Temple of Venue, (for they voted in his abferice, that it might appear that they were not compelled) and he role not up, but fate ftill when the Senare preferried it felf. "Do cells us, That this he did, either through fome fatal error, or not minding what he did for joy, or how it's uncertain; but it tailed exceeding great prejudice and indigination against him, not only in the Senators, but the rest of the People also, and gave the most ground for excuse to those that murdered him. For as for that Excuse, which and durst not rise for fear it should come upon him, it was not believed, because afterward he went to his House on foot; but they concluded he so demeaned him? felf out of pride, and they hated him upon that account, when they themselves had made him proud by heaping fo many extravagant Honours upon him. There was another thing still which increased that suspition they had of him, which was, that he suffered himself to be created Perpetual Dictator; and this added so much to the fury of his Enemies, that now they conspired against him. To push him further on, and to turn his very Friends against him, amongst other devices, they gave him the Title of King, and so published him. This he indeed refused, and rebuked such as saluted him by it; but for all that, doing nothing whereby he shewed that he took it ill, they privily put a Diadem upon his Image that stood by the Rostra. This was removed from it by C. Epidius and L. Cestius Flaceus the Tribuni Plebis; and for that he was so far moved in choler against them, that though they faid nothing to his disparagement, but praised him to the People as not desiring such Honours, he hardly contained himself from doing them mischies But when afterward, as he returned on Horfe-back, (in Ovation on the Latin Ferie) some saluted him and called him King, and to which he said, That he was not King, but Cæsar, and these same Tribum Plebis setting the Man that first gave him the Title, a Day to answer it; he was greatly inraged against them, as deligning fomething against his Person, but yet he deferred the revenge. At length these same Persons, by a publick Writing, complained that they were not suffered, neither was it safe for them to act freely in behalf of the Common-wealth. For this, in the greatest displeasure imaginable, he brought them into the Senate, accused them, and demanded Sentence against them, and there were not wanting who moved it should be Capital; yet he spared their Lives, but by the assistance of Helvius Cinna their Collegue, deprived them of their Tribunelhip, and turned them out of the Senate. Of which they pretended to be glad; for now being eafed of the danger and burthen of their Office, they could in fafety be lookers

8. This opened the Mouths of his Enemies wider than ever; that whereas he ought to have punished them who called him King, he fell upon the Tribuni Plebis. And the suspirion of his affecting the Title was confirmed by another thing which shortly after happened. In the Solemnity of the Lupercalia, as he sate at the Rostra in his Golden Chair, adorned with a Royal Robe, and a Royal Crown, Amony with his Collegues the Priests, came and faluting him King, set a Diadem on his Head, and told him that the People by him presented him with it. Casar only answered, That Jupiter alone was King of the Romans, and sending the Diadem into the Capitol, did not blame them for fo doing, but caused it to be regestred in the publick Acts, that he had refused the Kingdom offered him from the People by their Consul. This caused a Belief, that the thing was done by agreement, and that Cafar defired the Title, but would be compelled to receive it. Such is the Ac-The main that Cafor defired the Title, but would be compelled to receive it. Such is the Account of his being mortal courf given us by: Dion: Cafor concerning the hatred which he incurred, and those things which procured his sudden death, with whom other Writers agree. Platareh attributes the main cause of his being mortally hated to his earnest defire after the Title of King, and thence, he faith, his Enemies took the Advantage, though it was pretended by some of his Friends, that it was written in the Sibelline Books how the Romans might overcome the Parthians, if they made War against them under a Kings Conduct, otherwise they were unconquerable. He adds. That when his Flatterers faluted him with that Title, as he returned from Alba.

the People was offended, and he was angry, faying he was not King, but Cafar, and every one keeping shence, he went home very forrowful. That many Honours being decreed to him in Senate, the Confuls and Pretors, accompanied with the whole Body, went to him into the Forum, where he fate at the Rollra, to tell him what they had done, but he disdained to rise up to them, as if they had been private Men; faying, that his Honours had more need to be cut off than inlarged. That this did not only offend the Senate, but the People allo, to fee him flight the Mightracy of the Commonwealth; fo that all that might depart went away very forrowfully. Thereupon he arose and went home to his House, and teating open his Bolome, made his Neck bare, and cried to his Friends, that he was ready to offer his Throat to any that would come and cut it. It was reported, that alterwards to excuse his folly, he imputed it to his Disease, saying, That Scct. 8. fuch as had the Falling-fickness were not themselves, when standing on their Feet they spake to the People, but were seized with a trembling of the Body, giddiness, and a sudden dimness of fight. But this was not true; for he would have risen up to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus, one of his Flattering Friends, would not let him, bidding him remember he was Cefar, and let them reverence him, and do their Duties.

9. Concerning the Lupercalia, Plutarch premiseth, that in old time this Feast was faid to be the Feast of Shepherds or Herds-men, and that it was much like to that of the Lyciaans in Arcadia; That at this time in Rome it was celebrated by feveral young Noble-men, and fome Magistrates that governed them, who ran naked through the City, striking in sport them they found in their passage, with Leathern Thongs, Hair and all on, to make them give way; That many Noble-women, as well as others, went on purpose to stand in their way, and put forth their Hands to be strucken, perswading themselves, that being with Child, they should have good Labour, or being barren, that it would cause them speedily to conceive. Casar fitting at the Rostra to behold the sport in a Golden Chair, and Triumphal Robes, Antony now Conful being one of them that ran the Course, the People making him a Lane, came to Cesar, and presented him with a Diadem wreathed about with Laurel. Hereupon there arose a Cry of rejoycing, not very great, made only by a few appointed for the purpose. But Cesar refusing the Diadem, all the People shouted for Joy. Then did Antony offer it him again the second time, and there was a second shout of Joy; but still by a few; but when he refused it again the second time then all the whole People shouted. Cesar having made this Experiment, found that the People did not like of it, and thereupon rifing, commanded the Diadem to be carried into the Capitol. Plutarch adds further, That when the Tribunes had pulled the Diadems from his Statues, and fent to Prison those who first called him King, the People followed them, rejoycing at it, and called them Bruti, in memory of Bruius, who expelled Tarquinius. That Cafar was herewith so offended, that he deprived them of their Tribuneships, and accusing them, spake also against the People, calling them Bruti and Cumani; whereupon they betook themselves to M. Brutwo, who was descended from the former Brutwo, was of as Noble a Family as any in Rome, and Son-in-law of M. Cato. Dion Cassius writes, That he was not descended from that ancient Brutus the Enemy of Tarquin, who had no Children but the two Sons, Youths, whom he flew. Plutarch confesseth there was such a Report; and it was faid that this M. Brutus was descended of a mean Family. But he cites the Authority of Posidonius the Philosopher, who wrote, that Junius Brittus flew indeed two of his Sons, who were Men grown, but that there was a third Son, but a little Child at that time, from whom the Family was derived; as also, that of this Family there were certain Famous Men in his time, who in Stature and Countenance much refembled the Image of Junius Bru-

10. However, the Enemies of Casar made use of the descent, as serving their purpose to excite him to an Act which might be suitable to that Original. To this purpose they wrote frequent Letters, sometimes called him by Name, and said they wanted another Brutus. Under the Statue of the ancient Brutus they wrote, That they wished he lived; and upon the Tribunal of Marcus, where he exercised the Office of Prator, Brutus thou fleepest, and art not Brutus. Cafar had been kind unto him as well as merciful, having not only pardoned him after the Battel of Pharsalum, but preferred him to the Pretorship, and designed him Consul the fourth year after, being confident that he would not be transported by ambition, or any other passion, to do any thing ingrateful or dishonourable. But these Papers and Speeches having moved him, Caffins, who had married his Sifter, took the advantage to perswade him against the Tyrant, as he termed him; not only being an Enemy to the Power of Capar, but also his Person. For he contended before him with Brutus for the Pretorship, and having heard them both, Casar confessed that Cassius had the juster Cause, but said that Brutus should have the Place. He hated him for denying him the first Place, and would not thank him for the second, though he made him the second Prator. And it begat also a quarrel betwixt him and Brutus, though upon this occasion, knowing how fit a Person one of his Reputation would be to patronize the Fact, he reconciled himself unto him; his Friends agreeing to the Conspiracy, so as Brutus would become the chief. Brutus his thoughtfulness about this Affair did so disturb him in the night, though he carried it wonderful cunningly in the day, and did so distract him, that Porcia his Wife perceiving it was some ex- Sect. 8. traordinary matter, and that he would not reveal it, because he thought her not able to bear Tortures, if it should come to it, gave her self a Wound in the Thigh, and convincing him that the could endure pain, got it out of him, and confirmed him in his resolution, as the Daughter of Cato. Many of the Conspirators, if not most, had been some way or other obliged by Casar. They And Detimus were above fixty in number, and generally of Pompey's Party; but Decimius Britan one Britan, one of his own Party, was drawn in, who had received from him extraordinary Kindnesses, and should have been Consul the second year sollow-

11. The matter was in great danger of coming out, though the constancy of the Conspirators was very wonderful, and Casar himself was so secure, that he would believe nothing, but punished such as went about to tell him any such thing. They distrusted the Success, and the greatness of the Enterprize caused them to defer it till they perceived that the Qindecimviri, who faid it was predicted in the Books of Sibylla, that a King was to subdue the Parthians, would make the report to the Senate, and require a Sentence which might be agreeable to the Prediction. This startled them, especially Brutus and Cassius, and others who being Magistrates were to be for it, without either contradiction or filence, and caused them to put their De fign in execution. It was resolved it should be done at an Assembly of the Senate, for thither Cefar would not fail to come, and there they might allo meet him with-out suspition, all the Noblest and chiefest Persons of the City being present. The Place was to be a Porticus joyning to the Theatre of Pompey, in which were Seats to fit on, and wherein the City had dedicated the Statue of Pompey for his care and charge. The Time should be on the Ides, or fifteenth of March, for luckily had the meeting of the Senate been on that day appointed; fo that it feemed to be refolved above, that Cafar then should die in revenge of Pompey's death. When the Day was come the Conspirators met at the House of Cassius, to bring his Son into the Forum, who that Day was to put on his Toga Virilia, and thence they came in a Troop to the Place, and expected the coming of Cafar. But fuch had been the Dreams of himself and his Wife Calpurnia, and such Omens had happened with ill Prefages in Sacrifices, and the Gestures of the Birds, that he thought not to go out of his House, being also indisposed, but to send Antony to adjourn the Senate. The Conspirators fearing the Consequence of this delay, sent away to him Decimus Brutus his great Friend, as he was accounted, (and so great a Friend by Casar himfelf, that in his last Will and Testament he had appointed him to be his next Heir) to draw him into the Snare. He laughed the Sooth-fayers to fcorn, and told Cefar he would affront the Senate, or make them believe he did so, considering that by his commandment they were affembled, ready to grant him all things, and to declare him King of all the Provinces out of Italy, in which he fhould wear his Diadem in all Places both by Sea and Land. He asked him what the World would say, if the Senators should be told, that they must depart, and come again when Calpurnia should have better Dreams? He urged, that they would think and speak of him as a Tyrant; and if he could not be reconciled to the Day, that he would go himself in Person, and dismis the Senate. With this he took him by the Hand, and treacheroufly brought him out of his Houfe.

12. In his way some that met him indeavoured to reveal the Conspiracy, and a mongst the rest one put a Bill into his Hand, containing the whole Matter, which he had learnt being familiar with Brutus his Confederates. Perceiving him to give all the Petitions that were presented him to his Men about him, he prayed him to read it himself, and that speedily, for it contained things of weight, which concerned him nearly. He took it of him with much ado, (for he got near to him, notwithstanding the Croud, which others could not) but could never read it for the Multitude of Persons that saluted him, but held it still in his Hand, till he came to the Place of the Affembly. However this happened, whether by reafon of the diversion he had by the Croud, or his own neglect; so secure and careless he was, that seeing one who had bid him beware of this Day, he jested at him, and asking him what was become of his Predictions, faid the Day was come, and he was fafe; to which the Man replied, That indeed it was come, but not ended. Some of the Conspirators would have had Antony and Lepidus also slain; but for Antony, Brutus, who indeed most generous of any of them, interceded, hoping, he said, he would become a better Man, and joyn with them for Liberty, when he should see Casar

Sect. 8. taken away. And it was agreed, that left by killing many they should give occasion to say, that what they did was not out of love to the publick Liberty, but for Rule and Domination, that they should not be killed, and they pretended they would be fatisfied with Cafars Death. Now Lepidus was with the Army in the adjoyning Country, but Antony was in Town, and they refolved that he was by no means to be fuffered to be present. Therefore when Cefar went into the House, Decimus Brutus (Dio saith Trebonius) took him afide, and diverted him from going in with a long Story. 13. Cafar coming in, all the Senators stood up to do him reverence. Being fate, they came about his Chair, and Cimber Tullius first applied himself to him, pretending to petition him to call home his Brother from banishment. He denying his Suit, and putting him off till another time, they all came about him, and began to move him, but he rejecting them, and in displeasure putting them away from him, Cimber took his Gown and pulled it from his Shoulders, which was the Sign given to his Companions. Cafar cried out, that this was violence, and then Casea standing behind him, struck him on the Neck with his Sword, but the Wound was not great nor mortal. Cafar turning straight, catcht hold of his Sword, and, some say, struck him in the Arm with his Writing Instrument, and both cried out, Casar in Latin, O vile Casca, what dost thou, and Casca in Greek to his Brother, Brother help me. Then did Cafar indeavour to break from them, but was hindered by one stroak after another, for they compassed him in on every fide, and he could turn him no where but he was strucken at by fome, and ftill had naked Swords in his Face, and was hacked and mangled among them, as a Wild Beast taken by Hunters. Seeing this, and that Brutus amongst the rest made at him, who gave him a Wound under his Belly, he strugled no more, but covered his Head with his Gown, and with his Left Hand drew his Skirts down to his Knees, that he might fall decently; and down he fell at the Base whereon Pompey's Image stood, which all ran of gore Blood, till he was flain. The Report was, that he had three and twenty Wounds upon his Body, though none mortal but the second on his Breast; for it was agreed amongst them, that every one should give him a Wound, because all their Hands should be in the Murder, and divers of the Conspirators were hurt, fo many striking at one Body. But to so violent and bloody a Death came this great Man, one of the greatest Spirit and Presence of Mind that we can read of, and yet of a courteous and merciful Disposition, in the fifty fixth Year of his Age. He who had fought fifty Battels, and procured the Death of a Million and one hundred ninety two thousand Persons, as Pliny reckoneth, in that Senate which he himself for the most part had chosen, in Liv. 7. 0.15. the Court of Pompey, and at the Feet of Pompey's Statue, so many of his Officers looking on, but not fitrring, with fuch confusion were they struck at the fight, by the hands of most Noble Citizens, many of whom he had to his utmost gratified; and so lay he, the Tumult and Confusion being so great, that hanging out. 14. So great a Man he was, that Plutarch * being judge, there was none of * In Cafare. the greatest, and most admired Captains, to whom the Gallick War alone did not demonstrate him equal in Commendations, both as General, and as a Soldier. For, whether we consider the Fabii, Scipioes, Metelli, his Contemporaries, or those that went before him, as, Sylla, Marius, and both the Luculli, and even him whose Glory for all Warlike Abilities reacheth to the Skies, Pompey himself, the Actions of Casar excel all their Exploits. For, sometimes he obtained greater Glory, for the inconvenience of the Places wherein he made War, fometimes for the greatness of the Countries which he subdued, sometimes for the multitude and ftrength of his Enemies overthrown, fometimes for the perfidiousness and barbarism of the Nations subdued, sometimes for clemency shewed to the Conquered, or other-whiles for his Liberality towards his Fellow-Soldiers; but always in respect of the number of Battels, and of those that were flain. For having carried on the War in Gall not fully ten years, he took above eight hundred Cities, subdued three hundred several forts of People, and having ingaged at feveral times with three Millions of Men, killed the third part, and took the other alive. So great was the affection of his Sol-nothing better than others, yet being invincible for his credit, they would not refuse any danger. This disposition in them he first bred, and then maintained, by conferring Honours and Rewards upon them, wherein he spared nothing; then by undertaking all dangers with them, and refuling no labour. His boldness indeed, and courage, considering that it proceeded from incredible desire of Glory, they admired not so much; but his labour and toil which he indured above his strength did astonish them. For, he was of a thin habit of Body, pale and tender, had a fickly Head, and was subject to the Falling-fickness, or Epilepsie, which first took him at Corduba. But he took not an occasion of laziness from his want of health, but by Expeditions, most difficult Journeys. flenderness of Diet, and by continuing abroad in the open Air, fought to drive away his Difeafe, and keep his Body healthful. Most commonly he flept as he was carried in his Chariot or Litter, fo that his fleep was not idle. On the day time he was carried about the Forts, Cities and Camps, with a Boy fitting by him, who wrote down what he dictated, and a Soldier with a Sword standing at his Back. He made fo great Journeys, that in his first Expedition from Rome, in eight Incampings he came to the River Rhodanus. From his Childhood he had learn'd and practified riding, so that putting his Hands behind him upon his Back, he would sit an Horse in his full speed, which was very much for one that had his Difease. Moreover, in that Expedition he exercised himself so, that riding, he would dictate several Letters to two Secretaries or more. He was a Man ambitious of Power, and unfatisfied with any thing on this fide Sovereignty, but Victory pleased him, not revenge nor cruelty, in which respect Cicero, to note his ambition, and yet acknowledge his goodness of Nature, com-

Offavius he adopted into his Name and Family, and most of those that killed him he named amongst the Guardians of his Son, if one should be born to him. As second Heirs, if the former should not policis the Inheritance, he named Decimus Brutus and M. Antonius. He also in his Will gave no small matter to the Romans, to be divided Man by Man, as Plutarch writeth. This moved the People out of measure to indignation against the Conspirators, Antonius the Consul vehemently stirring up the multitude in his Funeral Oration. They were driven to that rage, that after the burning of the Corps they were hardly diffwaded from firing their Houses, and they tore in pieces one Cinna, whom they miltook for another of that Name that was one of them. 16. Now the series of Affairs bringeth us to Cafar Offavianus, the adopted

His Mother and Father-in-law Marcius Philippus, were unwilling he should take the Name of Casar, as subject to much envy; but after some pause he resolved to the contrary, and affuming the Name of Cafar Ottavianus, made use of the good affections of his Uncles Friends in Greece, who accompanying him to the City, he was met by a vast number of others from Rome. Here, after he had accepted of the Adoption, and confirmed it by the Authority of the Prator as the Cufrom was, he went to Antony, whom he expected to have his Friend and Affiftant in profecuting his Uncles Enemies. But after fome waiting, he entertained him with great contempt, and though he had got a great quantity of Cafar's Money, yet he denied to let him have any, fearing he should grow into too much efteem. Cafar hereupon fold his own Inheritance to pay the Legacy given to the People, which procured him much love, his Uncles (or Fathers, as now he must be called) old Soldiers flocked to him, whom he accepted of out of fear of Antony, who now every day became more odious, both to him, to

to be considered Sextus Pompey, who yet remained of the Sons of Pompey the own advance- Great, (that beloved Man) that in requital for his Fathers Estate confiscated, he might have an allowance out of the Publick, and command of the Seas, with that Navy he formerly had. This being received with great applause, was enacted; and so Pompey was called back into Sicily, where he afterwards waged a great War against Casar. Antony perswaded Dolabella his Collegue, (a young Man whom Casar having ordained to be Consul after his departure out of the City, when he was dead, took the Office, and inveighing against his Benefactor, would have had the day of his death stiled the Birth-day of the City) though he loved him not, to ask Syria, not of the Senate, but the People, hoping that after him he should not be denied such a request. The difference increasing betwixt him and Cesar, he desired to have the fix Legions which lay in Macedonia, and obtained them, deceiving the Senate by a falle rumour, that the Getes hearing of Casar's death, had invaded that Province. He baited them, by preferring a Law against any one's being Dictator. It was his design to bring these Legions over into Italy to awe and command all, and that he might effect this, he preferred by force a Law for changing of Provinces, and thereby procured to his Brother C. Antonius Macedonia, which formerly had been affigned to M. Brutus, and to himself the nearer Gall, (or Gallia Cisalpina) which before was given to Decimus Brutus.

18. The Senate would in no wife grant this, whereupon he betook himself to the People. When he had brought over his Legions, part of them revolted to Cafar, who now out of fear went up and down Italy, gathering Soldiers out of the Colonies his Father had planted. With a confiderable Army at length Antony marched into Gall, whence he commanded Brutus to be gone, who gave way to him then, but departed to Mutina, resolving there to stay and endure a Siege, for that he had some considerable strength, and expected Affiltance. Here Antony straightly besieged him, which the Senate hearing of by Cicero's working especially, (who now began to speak and write his fourteen Orations, in imitation of those of Demosthenes, called Philipicks) declared him an Enemy to the State, which proved a means for the bringing in The hatred of and preferring of Cafar Octavianus. out of malice, and some for their convenient Houses and Gardens. Amongst those of greatest note was Varro, who now living to see and feel a second Tricipitina, yet escaped with his Life. Cicero the Man most aimed at by Antony for opposing him so vehemently in the Senate, upon the Triumvirs their coming went to Sea; but the Winds being contrary, and because he could not endure the shaking of the Ship, he returned, saying, He would die in his Country offen preserved by him. Being weary both of his Flight and Life, he came to a Vil-Platatch is colage a little more than a Mile distant from the Sea. Here his Servants, terrifi- cerest. ed by feveral Prodigies, partly by perswasion, and partly by Force, put him again in his Litter, and were carrying him back to the Sea, when hearing of those that came to feek for him, he caused the Litter to be set down, and quietly stretched out his Neck to Popilius Lanas, whom formerly by his Oratory he had faved from Condemnation. He ill-favouredly enough cut off his Head and Hands, which he presented to Antony, and for so doing received a great Reward.

After the Head had been sufficiently gazed on by him and his Wife Fulvia, (who fet on her Knees, pulled out the Tongue, and pricking it with Needles, otherwife shamefully shewed her spite) it was to the grief of all Men set up in the Pleading Place, or Rostra. To such an end came this most Famous Man, the Father of Roman Eloquence. He was born at Arpinum, on the third of the Nones of January, in the 648 year of the City, C. Atilius Serranus, and Q. Servilius Capio, being Confuls, the same wherein Pompey the Great was born, on the Calends of October. His Father was of Equestrian Rank, and issued, as some faid, from Tullius Attius, a Noble King of the Volsci. He first deserved the Triumph of the Gown, and the Laurel of the Tongue. And as Cesar the Dicta- Patreslus Lai tor wrote of him, he obtained a Laurel greater than all Triumphs, (though he cap. 66. had one decreed to him for his good Service in the Field) by how much the Plinia til. 71 more its a greater and more excellent thing to inlarge the Bounds of Roman Wit, than of Empire. He died on the seventh of December, when he had lived fixty three years, eleven months, and five days. The ordinary rate of Idea. one Head brought to the Triumvirs, if by a Free-man, was one hundred thoufand Sesterces; if by a Slave, half so much, with the Liberty of the City. This corrupted many, so as forgetting both Duty and Natural Affection, they betrayed those for whose preservation they ought to have laboured. Yet now many rare, and admirable Examples, of the Love of Wives to their Husbands, and of Slaves to their Masters, appeared; fewest of Children towards their Parents. Yet Oppius his Act seemeth to stand for many, who, Eneas like, carried out his old and decrepit Father, and conveyed him to the Sea, fometimes leading, and fometimes carrying him on his Back, till they both escaped into Sicily, whence afterwards returning, the People, out of a fense of his Piety, made him Ædilie, and for that he wanted Money to fet out the usual Games, the Artificers willingly wrought for him without Wages, and the Spectators by a Contribution made him rich. Of such proscribed Persons as escaped, some fled to Brutus and Cassius, who received them kindly; but most of them to Sextus Pompey now in Sicily,

23. Cassius, after he had got Syria into his Power, thought of making an Iden. Fulvia, the Wife of Antony, and Lucius his Brother, now Conful, envied Cafar this popularity with the Soldiers, and contended earnestly that they ought to settle the Soldiers of Antony, which was granted. But herewith not contented, they resolved to prosecute him with War. She, for that she desired her Husband might be recalled thereby from Cleopatra, concerning whom the had too much cause to be jealous of him; and he, out of desire to innovate, pretending an indeavour to suppress the Triumvirate, and to reduce the ancient form of Go-

Possessions of the Grounds flocked to Lucius, and the new ones to Casar, to whom Salvidienus coming out of Gall with great strength, Lucius went to op-applan pose him, but was diverted by Agrippa, and reduced to such straights betwixt them two, (though Ventidius and Asinius, two of Antonie's Captains, were not far off) that glad he was to betake himself for security to Perusia a strong Town, where he was closely belieged by Casar and his Party. He stood out very courageously, till forced by famine to yield to mercy; then coming out first, and casting himself into Casar's Hands, he interceded for his Soldiers, and defired all the blame might be upon himself: He was received honourably, and his Soldiers were pardoned at the defire of their Enemies. But having no Shipping, he was at a loss as to Sea-matters, and therefore married Scribonia the Sifter of Libo, Father-in-law to Sextus Pompey, from whom he hoped by this alliance if need were to obtain Peace. Antony this Spring moved from Alexandria, where he had lived all Winter very loofely with Cleopatra, as against the Parthians, who now under conduct of Labienus had over-run Syria as far as Tyre. Though this Town was fet upon by them, and he pretended he would relieve it, yet he did not, alledging a necessity of going to the War against Pompey, who now hindred all Provisions from coming to the City, and thereby caused a great dearth: And he again excused himself why he came no sooner to that against Pompey, because he was retained by the Parthian War. Cafar came to Brundusium, Appian. where the old Soldiers being unwilling to fight against Antony, the Army laboured to reconcile the Triumvirs, which Cocceius, friend to both, at length effected with much labour; Pollio on Antonie's side, and Macenas on Casar's, as Delegates making up the breach. All offences were mutually to be forgiven, and for that Marcellus, Husband to Ottavia Cafar's Sifter, was now dead, and also

Fulvia Antonie's Wife, for grief that he neglected her, Antony married Octavia. Then was the Roman Empire divided betwixt them, the Bounds of their Dominions being Codropolis, a Town of Illyricum, all from it Westward being to obey Cesar, and all Eastward Antony. Africk was lest to Lepidus, who now was even no body, and having offended Cesar, had been confined by him to that Province. The War against the Parthians was judged to Antony, and that against Pompey (who must needs now be suppressed unto Casar. Antony sent Ventidius into Asia to restrain the Parthians, who now had made an incursion as far as Ionia. But out of Sardinia did Menodorus Pompey's Admiral the second time eject Helenus Cafar's Captain, whereupon Cafar refused to hearken to Antony, when he moved him to be reconciled unto Pompey. Both the Triumvirs (or rather now the Duumvirs) being come to the City, were received with most lamentable complaints of Poor People, ready to starve for want of Provisions, which Pompey hindered from coming, from the East by Sicily, from the West by Sardinia and Confica, which he had in his Power, and from Africk by his Navy also, which then was most powerful at Sea. Cafar could not be drawn to make Peace with him, notwithstanding the loud Cries and Prayers of the Multitude, which obstinacy drew him, and Antony (rescuing him) into such danger, as both of them were near froning. At length being forced to it, and Pompey being perivaded, they met, but Pompey expecting to be admitted into the Power and Place of Lepidus, the Treaty came to nothing. Yet the prefure

But Pompey liked not of any fuch condition, and therefore rigged a new Fleet, and provided himself of Forces, perhaps giving credit to Metrodorus, who would tell him, that the present state of Affairs was no true Peace, but rather a ceffation of Arms. He then renewed his Piracy, which renewed the former grievances, and made the People cry out, that the matter was only altered from three Tyrants to four. But Metrodorus revolted to Cesar, bringing in with him Corsica, Sardinia, and three Legions, and then Antony was called to Brundussum to consult about the War. Thither he came at the day appointed, but Cafar keeping not his Word, he stayed not for him, either not liking the breach of the Peace, or for that he envied Cesar all that Power he saw him have; for still they suspected and grudged each other. 31. Cafar fortified the Coasts of Italy, for fear lest Pompey should make an in-thing valion, which he, not knowing how to improve a Victory, was never wont to attempt. Then wanting all manner of Provisions for the War, he sent Mecenos to Antony, who refusing not to joyn with him, this cheared him, together with a Victory got by Agrippa in Aquitaine; many Cities, and private Persons also promising aid. Antony came to Tarentum with three hundred ships, but when ther there was something else betwixt them, or for that he was now furnished, he flighted his help, Casar excused himself that he met him not, which the other took in ill part, yet sent for him again. For having laid out much upon the Fleet, he intended to exchange it for some Italian Legions, to be used in the Parthian War, it being difficult for him to raise Men in Italy, which was subject to Cafar, though by their last agreement both were left free there to make their Levies. Octavia coming over to her Brother, agreed them, who then made the exchange, and because the time of the Triumvirate set by the Senate was almost ment, and pro- out, prorogued their Power for five years longer, without any confideration had of the suffrages of the People. So Antony departed into Syria, Casar deferring

32. He determined to invade Sicily from three several Quarters: Lepidus, who identify now joyned with him, was to invade it from Africk, Taurus from Tarentum, and he himself from Puteoli. Pompey resolved to oppose him so many several ways but at this time it needed not; for Cafar's Navy was the fecond time wracked by a Tempest, which so puffed up Pompey, that he stilled himself Neptune's Son. But Casar gave not over the Enterprize; for the same Summer having recruited his Forces, and mended his Ships, he put forth to Sea, and then, though on Lepidus his part were lost two Legions, overthrew Pompey's Fleet, but was again worsted, and yet landed twenty one Legions, and two thousand Horse, besides five thousand lightly Armed. No great or memorable Battel was there on Lands, but Pompey fent to his Enemy, to know if he would fight by Sea, fearing his Land-Forces. He accepted of his offer, and then finally defeated him, having funk twenty eight of his Vessels. The rest were either taken or broken, seven teen only escaped, and at the fight of his overthrow this Land-Forces yielded ve. 718. to Cafar, so that with his seventeen Vessels he sted to Antony, from whom he expected protection, having reftored formerly his Mother fafe to him, when in fuch a condition. Messara still stood out, but the Garrison at length yielded to Lepidus, who granted to the Soldiers, to draw them to his Party, the Plunder of the Town equal with his own. Having now by the addition of those Forces twenty two Legions, and a strong Body of Horse under his Command, he pleased himself with thoughts of getting all Sicily into his Hands, to which he pretended a right, as first invaded by him; and he sought to hinder Cesar all he could from the possession of it.

33. Cafar expostulated with him for his ingratitude 3 but to no purpose. There found he means to draw away all his Army from him, which now was fome. Appian at fathing averse to Civil Wars, and satisfied of the greater worth of Cafar, being pramoreover incensed against their General, for making Pompey's Soldiers particlers nationally with them in the plunder of Messana. Yet though his Soldiers would have kil-Dislik-49-led him, did he save them alive, but outed him of all Power, and banished him.

He burnt all Letters written in time of War. promiting he would reftore the Common-wealth as foon as Antony should return. who, he knew, would also lay down the Magistracy, all Civil Wars being ended. He was therefore received with lucky acclamations, and had a Perpetual Tribineflip bestowed on him, as invited by this Honour to lay down his other Power, Concerning this he wrote privately to Antony, who, whilst Cafar was thus line ployed about Pompey, had called Cleopatra into Syria, and there given her Physnicia, Calefyria, Csprus, a great part of Cilicia, with part of Arabia Nabathaa, and fo much of Judge as brought Balfamum. Then fending her home, he marched eth on cliopa- into Armenia, where yet he could do nothing (for delire of her) like himfelf; but ever thought of returning to her, which shortly after he did; but was much troubled in his Passage by the Parthians, to whom his Army had revolted, but that they killed fuch as first passed over to them.

34. The Year following, and that wherein Pompey was flain, he was folicited Plateral by the King of Media in conjunction with him to make War upon the Paythian; but was hindered by ftirs which happened betwixt Cleopatra and Offavia his Wife, who now returning to him out of Italy, met with Letters at Athens to stop her there, he pretending necessary avocations by War. Casar then would have had her come to his House, but she would go to her Husbands, where she educated both his Children and her own, as became her. Then did Antony return into Armenia, where he caught the King by a wile, and brought him in Triumph into Ægspt. Now would be be called Father Bacchus, as Cleopatra Ist., who now was filled by him Queen of Hegypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Celofyria, Cefario, whom the had by Julius Cefar, being her Partner in the Principalities. These things, together with the disgrace of his Sister, provoked Cesar, who made report of them to the Senate and People. Hereby he incented Men's minds against Antony, who shortly after went into Media, and entered into League with the King thereof. Cafar at the same time fought against several People of Illyricum, and the next year both provided for the Civil War betwixt them-35. fides the Triumvirate, and taking his Soldiers, as those of Pompey, to himself, which ought to have been equally free for both; and he challenged his part of the Soldiers raised in Italy. For, Cesar, besides what we formerly mentioned, accused him of taking Ægypt as his Province, killing Pompey, abusing Artavascles Die lie, soi the Armenian King, to the great infamy of the Roman State; but above all, up-Floras 14.015 braided him with Cleopatra, and what he had affigned to their Children, as also for that he owned Cafario as begotten by Cafar, though to the Senate he had acknowledged him for his own Son. Antony, bewitched by Cleopatra fo far as not to be able to rule himself, wrote to the Senate to have those things confirmed, which he had fetled upon her and her Children. The two Confuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Sosius, being much for him, were forced to leave the City, and get over to him, who now also having raised great Forces, sent to Rome, to drive Odavia out of his House, and if taking his opportunity he had this Summer invaded Italy, he might in all probability have put an end to the Quarrel. For, Cesar was not yet provided, wanting Money exceedingly, which he now exacted throughout Italy. But this delay herein helped him, that Men's minds were more and more bent against Antony, especially after Casar had published his Testament, wherein he disposed as formerly, to his and Cleopatra's Children, and A. M. 3973. ordained, that though he should die at Rome, his Body should be sent to her of 187. 30. 1. at Alexandria: It was also reported, that he meant, if his matters prospered, to V.c. 222.

Hereupon the War was decreed against her, and he was devested of his Triumvirate, but not declared an Enemy, for fear of those with him. For then must they necessarie with super su ly have been included in the fame capacity, and so driven upon desperate Councils: To them therefore Rewards were promifed, if they would forfake him; and hereby was he thought rendred more inexcusable, in that being unhurt he should make War for an Ægyptian woman against his Country. Then did the one draw all the East, and the other the West to his Party. Casar had ready two hundred and fifty Ships of War, eighty thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse. Antony had five hundred fuch like Ships, very big and stately, with one hundred thousand Foot, and also twelve thousand Horse. The King of the Medes also sent him Aid, which being not sent back, and Antony also re-calling his Forces he had left with him for the protection of that Country, the Parthian became Master of that Kingdom, and Armenia also was lost.

36. The following Year Agrippa, being sent before by Cafar, took divers Ships 1dem. Antony worst coming to Antony with Provisions, and molested him exceedingly upon the Sea, Antonio. wherewith Cafar incouraged, passed from Brundusium into Epirus, to a Promontory whereof, that lieth near the Bay of Ambracia fending his Forces, he took in Corcyra; fo did Agrippa the Island Leucas near to Actium, with Patra and Corinth; Titius also and Taurus routed Antony's Horse. Then several Persons of note fell off from Antony. Sofius was beaten, and lost his Life at Sea, and Antony himself was also worsted by a Guard of Casar's. Being much troubled hereat, Canidius would have perswaded him to send away Cleopatra, and decide the Quarrel either in Thrace or Macedonia, for that he was stronger in Land-Forces. But though his Navy had been twice worsted, and he had lost many Ships, yet she obtained of him to fight at Sea, providing withal all things as for flight. For four days the Sea was to rough with Winds, that it hindered them from fighting; but on the fifth they joyned, and then Cafar's Ships being light could eafily tack about and invade Antony's, which were unwieldy, and of little use. Cleopatra wearied with long expectation, 'ere it could certainly be known how things would go, with her gilded Deck, Purple Sails, and fixty light Ægyptian Gallies, fled away, which Antony feeing, prefently followed, forfaking his A. His Land-forces could scarcely believe his flight, having such an Army left Plutareb in to him intire, and for seven days were so constant to him, that though the thing Antonio. was clearly known, they rejected Cafar's Messages, but being now overtaken by him, and forfaken of their Leader Canidius, who had posted away after Antony, Patercul. lib.2. His Land-for- they yielded, and were taken into Cafar's Army. Then did Cafar go to Athens, cap 87 where he put to death Calfius Parmensis, one of those that slew his Uncle, and Dis lib 51. fetling the Affairs both of Greece and Afia, determined to Winter in Samus; but was called into Italy by Agrippa to quiet his Soldiers who now mutinied. He failed then to Brundusium, but the Senate meeting him there, he went no further, and having dispatched his Business within thirty days returned into Asia.

Antony for some time lived disconsolately by himsels. Cleopatra conveyed Ships over into the Red-Sea, intending there to feek her Fortune, she had thought alfo of flying into Spain. They both sent to Cafar, she that her Children might have Ægypt granted them, and he that he might be permitted to live privately at Athens. She sent him a Golden Crown and Scepter, with a Royal Seat, privily to curry favour, and he, though openly he threatned her, fecretly promifed him Turullius a Senator, and one of the Murderers of Julius Cafar. He putting the Man to death returned no answer, neither the second time, when he fent Antyllus his Son to him with much Gold, which he received. But with Die lib. 5. her he fill dealt, fending Thypus his Freed-man to her to make her believe Association that he was in love with her, hoping the might kill Antony, and preferve her Treasures, which she threatned to burn if she came into any danger. Now going down into Agypt, he fent Cornelius Gallus before him, who seized on Paretonium the chief City on that part near Africk; and Pelusium the other strongest Town towards Syria did Cleopatra betray to him, secretly forbidding the Alexandrians to go out against him. Antony once fought prosperously as gainst his Horse, and the second time was beaten; then he sent him a Challenge, which Cafar refused, saying, That if Antony so pleased there were a thousand ways lying open for his destruction. Wherefore bethinking himself that he could not die with more credit than in Battel, he resolved to oppose Casar both by Sea and Land; but Cleopatra procured, that both his Navy, and Horse revolted, Hereupon he returned into the City, crying out, That he was betrayed by her for whose sake he had taken up Arms. She being afraid of him, departed to her Monument, and sent some to tell him she was dead, pretending sear of Cafar. Upon which Message, he resolving to follow her, wounded himself in the Belly. The Wound not quickly dispatching him, she sent for him up into her Monument, whither he was pulled up by her felf, and two Women, being willing to live now that the was alive, and hoping he might possibly re-Anney killeth cover. But he shortly after died, willing her as well as she could to provide for her self, and not grieve for him, but rather rejoyce, in that he had been the most famous of Men, as also most powerful, and now being a Roman, was not through laziness overcome by a Roman. Such was the end of this Man, who through defire of Fame became the Author of fad Tragedies to his Country, who in the use of his Power greatly abused it, and was not only overcome by a Roman, but also by a Woman, and then so behaved himself. that he could not be excused from laziness, effeminateness, and luxury, all which things checked that goodness of disposition supposed once to be in him, and 39, Cafar endeavoured to get Cleopatra into his Hands, that he might lead her in Triumph. He easily obtained Alexandria, the Inhabitants whereof he par-Sutton in doned, but put to death Antyllus the Son of Antony, and some others. He offerie viewed the Body of Alexander the Great, and out of Honour to his me-Platarch it mory set on it a Golden Crown, and strewed it with Flowers; but touch oraque lib. 6. ing it, he broke off a little piece of the Nose, and refused to see the Bodies Patricul 12. of the Ptolomies, though the Alexandrians much defired it, saying, He had a c. 87. mind to see the King, and not dead Men. The Roman Empire.

CHAP. I.

The Grandeur of the Roman

HE Roman Empire had now swallowed up the Macedonian, with such Kingdoms and States as were at all considerable, and Contemporary with it (whereof though fome might retain a finew of Liberty, yet were they but in a condition of Vaffalage) except the Parthian Kingdom, which as yet acknowledged no fubjection, and when it did, being forced thereto for the most part by Intelline Divisions, not long continued in that acknowledgment:

2. This Empire now laboured under its own weight, and, like to fome unwieldy thing, ftaggered, by reason of the turgency of its inward burthen, without any extraneous violence: It was grown up to an Athletick habit, and had already sufficiently manifested the Danger of this Constitution. For, being all Head and no Body, it wanted those Limbs, which by direction from a specific inder in some void of that influence which effected an orderly motion, and is necessary for the substitution of continued in that acknowledgment.

cured their rile, most commonly some Capitulations, and otherwhiles Money distributed to the R. bole, when the step was great. For after that the Romans passed the Scas, more luxury, avarice, and corruption, than of Victory was brought home. When they came abroad, notwithstanding the repute of their abitinence, they found the same temptations as other men, and made themselves Musters of the manners, as well as the possessions of the conquered. All things werenow bought and fold, from the meanest Office to the Consulship, and the lowest privilege to the right of Suffrages. 3. The daily fight of these things corrupted such, as else might have proved just. It feemed a prudent Principle, rather to command than to be commanded; rather to buy than to be fold, and to get something, rather than suffer all things to be loft. The body of the People was now grown large, the Italians being received to the freedom of the City, and liberty of Suffrages. Hence ambitious men had advantage enough to make parties, and to carry things in the Comitia or Allembins, having once by indirect practices ingratiated themselves. Having obtained commands afar off, they had opportunity to increase their power, through the diffance of place, the credit of their conquefts, and the affections of their Armies. Power once obtained, is difficultly laid down, both by reason that man's nature is averieto diminution, and for that fomething may be committed in height of passion, or through convenience, or otherwise, whereof it might not be fate to give an account, as neither to lye open and naked to the malice of revengeful Enemies. The Empire being now vaft, feveral men at the fame time might be found in these capacities, so that jealousies and emulations must thence be heightned, and one frive to reduce the other into order. Further, the largeness of Empire afforded multiplicity of places, always of feveral, and fometimes of contrary interests or humours, which would espouse quarrels accordingly, whence never would be wanting sufficient and convenient matter

4. Such wes the present State of Roman affairs, and such had been their conflitution before the present j acture, which loudly, in the understanding of all prudent men, called for the help of some fingle Person duly qualified, whose Monarchy could only put an end to the civil diffentions, by removing the loofe liberty of the multitude, which gave occasion to those diffempers, by preventing ambitious indeavours of private persons after Soveraignty, which somented them, and by checking all exortinant power of particular men, which effectually procured them. Cafar on the one fide confidering these things, as also being sensible of the power he already enjoyed, and of the danger he might incur by removing himself to a private life, and on the other, weighing the envy and odium he should contract by the establishment of himself, after he had conquered Antony and Cleopatra, and Chaving entered his fourth Confulfhip in the life Samus) returned to Rome, he asked the advice of his two most inward Counsellors and bosom friends, Agrippa and Mecanas. Vipsanius Agrippa, a man of mean Parentage (which Pipfanius manifesting, he changed into Marcus) and no great endowments, except in what concerned War, though of a wellmeaning mind, and a great lover of Cefar, answered him first, and earnestly advised him to lay down his power, and remit the Government into the hands of the Vid. Dianss. Multitude. 'His arguments for the most part respected the danger of Cafar's Loga distributed. person, being drawn from the aversness of the Romans to Monarchy, and inforced by examples of others, who had attempted to establish themselves. Against Monarchy it islf he could produce little of moment. He would prove that Popular Government was better for the Greeks, who, he faid, did nothing that gibu. Horat. was notable, till they put themselves into that way. He said, there were others is a cal Mare also, the condition of whom pleaded for this Government, wet named none dean pair, 'also, the condition of whom pleaded for this Government, yet named none. wealth, and of the most robust and poor serve in them. Hereby every one minding his own busi-'ness, and one affording help to another, none would find any defect, and the true power of the People with liberty and fafety would be preserved. For, the power of the multitude, he faid, being indeed the flavery of every worthy man, was most grievous, and brought common destruction unto all: but this, wherein modesty should ever be preferred, and mens deserts considered, would make all alike to be happy. 'He would have him therefore affifted and advited by worthy persons, to order ' all things needful, to make War, create Magistrates, reward, punish, and make Laws; 'all others being obidient ; fo that Wars might be made with fecrecy, and upon occa-'sion, such as were preferred might be chisen, not by lot, or through the prevalence of their ambition, but for their worth. Thus good men might be honoured, and bad 'punished without disturbance; and so at length things would be rightly car-'ried, when nothing should be referred to the Vulgar, nor openly be consul-'ted of, nor be committed to intruders, nor come into danger through their 'ambition. In tum, all would enjoy their own, no dangerous Wars nor wicked 'Seditions being made.

Chap. I.

6. 'But these evils he proved to be common in a Popular Government, wherein. the great ones afpiring to the top, and with money or otherwise purchasing the help of 'the ordinary fort, diffurbed all things. He faid, they had now had large experience of these things, and that by no other means could they be ended, than by that whereof he spake; whereof this was an evident sign, that for a long time they, The infuffera. had been vexed with Wars and Seditions, by reason of the multitude of men, and ble inconveniegreatness of affairs; for that men were so various in Nature and Nations, and inencies of Podued with such diversity of affections and desires: and because things bereby were pulse Govern pular Govern- brought to that pass, that with difficulty could they be managed. Now that he spake 'true, he said, the deeds themselves bore mention; for, as long as the multitude of the Roman People was not great, nor much more considerable than their neighboars, the State was in a good condition, and almost all Italy was subdued by them. But after that passing out of Italy, they went abroad into all Countreys and Islands, and filled all Seas and Lands with their name and power, no good got they by it : but first of all, at home and within the walls, riots being made, they shook the Commonwealth, and afterwards propagated the same mischief into their Armies. Therefore stheir City, like to some great ship of burthen , filled with a various multitude . and destitute of a Pilot, having been for many ages beaten and tossed with grievous waves, now floted, and having no stay, was toffed here and there. He defired him therefore, that he would not still neglect her thus conflicting with Tempests '(for he saw how much water she had already taken in) nor suffer the stay to be 'quite broken off (for the was now battered, and could not long sublist) but see-'ing that the gods had presented him as an Overseer and Governour to his Countrey, not to caft her off; but as by his means she had a little recovered her spirits, so, for the ages to come, she might remain in safety by the same means. 'Having used these arguments drawn from the Thing, he took others from the "Man, and shewed him his imminent danger, in case he laid down his power in the ' several cases of Pompey, Marius and Sylla. Pompey, he said, having devested him-'felf of his power, was contemned, and being laid at by his Enemies perished, because he could not recover it. He told him, That his Father (meaning Julius Ce-'s far) going about the same miscarried. The same had hapned to Marine and Sylla, but that they were prevented by death, though some said also that Sylla killed 'himself to prevent his Enemies: 'tis certain, that many of his Laws began to be repealed whilft he yet lived. In conclusion, he told him, He must expect many ' fuch as Lepidus, Sertorius, Brutus, and Caffius. This is the fum of Mecanas his speech 'in behalf of Monarchy, whereof the beginning is loft, as also the conclusion of that of Agrippa.

7. Their things sufficiently evidence, that it was impossible in an humane way for the Empire to sublist in a Commonwealth so called; and not only that, Democratical but any one considerable Nation, or more (not to speak of one, or a few Cities, or places at present) which must necessarily consist of multitudes of people, diversity impracticable qualified, variously inclined, and very unequally possessed of wealth and honours. noncer more Such having the Supream power in their own hands must needs foment several facerable for humours. The rich, and honourable, must either not medle, and so out of difcontent watch for an advantage to alter things, or if they do, they will not be content with equal imployments. When any extraordinary power is obtained, fuch inforcements as were formerly mentioned will happen, which being driven on by that ambition which is but natural to all mankind, will drive either fear, or desire, into Monarchy. A civil War especially produceth this, and more especially when the quarrel is betwixt fingle persons; and yet more especially is it inforced by a religious pretence, under which Vizard the greatest deceit hath triumphed, accompanied, or ushered in by a facrilegious afferting of approving Providence, whereby inviolable Majesty, Order, Propriety, and all things excellent have been contaminated, overturned, and trampled on, and yet a structure erected at length out of the materials of those very things, which formerly were only by the intruders accounted bad, because they stood upon another ground. But not only in a Democratical way is it impossible for one, or more considerable Nations to be governed, but in an Arisocratical also. For if the wealth and propriety of a Nation be diffused, and not limited in the possessions of a few of the chiefest persons, such would find a continual repugnancy in their subjects, others thinking themselves as capable of power as they. Hence quarrels and implacable enmities must arise, and he who shall be best able will at length command the rest, though he ought to have been their fellow subject, and demonstrate a necessity of Monarchical Government. 8. The affairs of the Gracians urged by Agrippa to make against Monarchy do much plead for it, and evince the necessity of it. For after that the multitude in the several Cities had rebelliously withdrawn themselves from that obe-Aprippa's Ar- dience, which both the Law of God, and just title of succession challenged as gainent drawn due to their Kings (who as Thueydides acknowledgeth, governed them with found the Justice and Moderation) how miterably were they inflaved by their fellow Citizens (called by them Tyranni or Tyrants) and forced to submit to Usurpers, who punished them for their disobedience towards their rightful Soveraigns. Never were there fuch Tumults, Seditions, Civil Wars, Maffacres, and Defolations, as in, and amongst those Cities which called themselves Commonwealths. Such were the extravagancies of the multitude, that the best men were rejected. and bold, impudent, and fawcy fellows domineered, who being corrupted with Money, bought and fold all that was of consequence, and by their cunning speeches turned, and led the Rabble which way so ever they pleased. As for what Agrippa urged, that they only did things of moment after that the power came into the people's hands those things of moment were among st themselves, and such as made them miserable, they tearing one another in pieces in the Peloponnesian, and other Wars, breathing nothing but rage, malice, and revenge against one another. Nothing of consequence did, or could they do against the Barbarians, as they accounted all besides themselves, till reduced under the Monarchy of Alexander they became instruments in his hands. Common danger ingaged them against Xerxes, whose multitudes destroyed themselves; but had it not been for the meer wisdom of Themistocles, want of Order, of Government, and Discretion, had ruined them all in departing into Peloponnesus, and foolishly applying themselves to the fortifying of the Ishmus. Though they several times affisted the Ionians in their Rebellion, yet still at length were their endeavours defeated. Cimon indeed got several Victories, and did notable exploits in a Piratical way, but what effects produced they? The most that was effected at Land was by Agefilans, but he having not done much, was recalled, for that many Cities having been allured with Persian Gold (which never failed to corrupt the Councils, overthrow the projects, and difturb the affairs of these petty States, by taking off the great Leaders of the Rabble) had conspired against Sparta. But what great matters they could do against Monarchy appeared; in that, first Philip, then Alexander his Son, and their Successors, easily subdued, and kept them under. As for their Colonies, each one usually followed the fortune of its Metropolis, little but Tumults, Banishments, and Massacres do we hear of, or of private mens getting the power over them, for that wanting rightful, and successive Princes, they lay open to the cheats of their fellow Citizens. The particular cases of Coreyra, Samus Syracuse, and others demonstrate this, and therewith the danger, and infirmity of Antimonarchical Government.

9. But in particular, fuch were the feveral conflitutions of these Cities, that Ariflotle himself liked none of them, as appeareth in his Books of Politicks. The Cretian Commonwealth had its extravagancies, and if a Government may tions of their be judged from the carriage, and disposition of the people, in the opinion of Epimenides one of their own Poets, it was most naught. Lycurgus by taking away the just, and Hereditary power of the Kings of Sparta, and contrary both to Nature and Loyalty, disfolving the Government of his Forefathers, made but way for many inconveniences in the too great power of the Senate, and otherwife; but especially for the tyranny of the Ephori, five fellows chosen yearly out of the Rabble, who domineer'd with unparalleld infolence over all. Solon's constitution, after so many changes and alterations wherein no rest could be procured from the time they forfook Kingly Government, gave no fuch fettlement, but that Pififratus presently after cheating the Rabble over and over, very easily made himself Master of Athens. Their Oftracism frighted all able perfons from medling with the Commonwealth, as also did the Petalism of Syracuse; whereupon their affairs went down the wind, till they were forced to recall the banished, and change still from one constitution to another, never being at quiet, for that the multitude tyrannized in their Assemblies. As for the learning of the Greeks, whereof they so much boasted, they had it either from the Egyptians or Caldeans, who were subject to, and from the beginning slourished under Monarchy: and Pissstratus who was a Monarch (though of his own making) made the first Collection of Books, and thereby brought Learning into Athens and Greece. Finally, the Greeks in their Wars were forced to make use of single persons; and at home in their greatest necessities did they sly to them, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus mentioneth the Harmostes of Lacedamon, the Archus of the Thessalians, and the Esymnetes of the Mityleneans, whom he compareth with the Dictator of the Romans.

10. For the Romans, 'tis a meer mistake of Agrippa. Their affairs never more prospered than under Monarchy, if we consider the small beginnings of the City. Romulus did exceeding much for his time, and fo did his Succeffors in their feveral ways, with fo small a power as such a Colony could produce, infomuch as revengeful and furious Brutus acknowledged, that no better way of Government could be found out than what they had chalked out to them. The faults in it feem to have been his fomething too much indulging at his first constitutions a popular humour which might bring him to his end afterwards. Then Servius to curry favour with the Rabble, that they might maintain him in his illegally procured power, diminished the Regal authority, and that of the Senate, which gave the multitude such a scope, as after could they not be reduced into any order. After him Tarquinius the Heir of Priscus might go about to recover this power (for, a little charity may be allowed us, for one who lived in so dark and remote times, and whose Actions were only recorded by his Enemies, feeing we have formerly related his Story as we find it) and thereby might incur that prejudice which, together with the fault of his Son, and the implacable malice of Brutus, procured his Banishment. This may be added as an ill accident, that Romulus dying childless, the Kingdom came to be Elective, which thing must at length bring great inconveniences; so that Experience now hath taught such Kingdoms to continue the Government to particular Families. But Brittus his giving to his Confuls full regal power (though they were two, and Annual) and putting the Sword fully into their hands, together with his acknowledgment of the good Government of all the former Kings, do more than make us suspect his spleen to have acted him most in the change of the power, especially the consequences considered. For, the power of the Consuls being shortly after diminished, or rather enervated by Valerius (who by flattering of the multitude got the name of Poplicola) the common fort got head, and confounded all things, nothing but changes, and re-changes happening, till at length they quite outed the Patricians of their power, giving them leifure to repent their joyning with Brutus, and brought things to that ruin and disorder formerly mentioned, as compelled them to turn about, and by their Lex Regia (hereafter to be spoken of) to devolve all their power upon a single Person.

11. Such and so many were these Seditions and Tumults, that thrice the common fort departed from the Patricians out of the City. And no fooner was the War against their King ended, but the stirs begun; and these very stirs The Diforders have we proved from Dionysius, to have procured immediately the fetting up and Tomals and Tomals of another King in effect, for half a year's continuance, viz. the Diffator, to affing round which Officer they were forced to fly in all difficulties. Now it fufficiently appeared, that the want of a King hindred the promotion of their affairs, for, ever when any work was to be done abroad, nay when the Enemy was even at the gates, would the multitude mutiny, and with fo much a-do at length could be drawn out, that business was retarded, and thereby their affairs not a little not from the tyranny of the Ephori, and when but the use of Gold, Silver, and other things, very lawful in themselves, came up, the Lacedemonians were sen-

impaired, the Monarch being wanting, who should have kept both orders in fungection and awe. The weight of Ulury and Oppression was the first pretended cause of these stirs, but from it the multitude passed on from one thing to another, never refting till it had got all Offices of dignity, power, and profit, into its own hands, as hath been at large made out. To effect this, they would one while have Confuls, and another while Tribunes Military, having formerly made Decemviri for the making of new Laws; fo that within the space of 134 37 Changes of years, they had 37 changes in the Government, whereof (to make it clear) fif-Government teen were from Confuls to Tribunes Military, and from Tribunes to Confuls, the two grand ones from Kings to Confuls, and from Confuls to Decemviri, and twenty Dictator hips, besides Interregnums many an one, whereby for five days the chief power was in the hands of their Interreges. Thus was the Government toffed to and fro by the multitude, and little was done abroad, by reason of these confusions, nay the City was taken by the Gauls, and razed, all but the Capitol, through the cowardise of their Tribanes, who also being in number three or more, by their feveral opinions confounded their Armies, and shewed the truthof that speech of Agamemnon in Homer. And this is worthy observation, that Oux 23ator when the contention arote about the Confullbip, which the Commons would managed in have equally with the Patritians, so incredible were those confusions, that for

abroad had alone the command of Armies. And so far was this present kind of Government from being instrumental to them, that it manifestly hindred and obstructed all good proceedings. For, when a Conful's year was out, then must he be recalled, and a Successor sent him, though he was in never so fair a made by fingle Persons, way for the conquering of any Nation, which at length began to be understood, and then was their command continued to them, under the name of Proconfuls, after which time it was, that the great matters were performed; before this the Generals being glad to shuffle up a Peace, lest they should be defrauded of the credit of ending the Wars by their Successors. The main cause of the growth of their Empire (under the all disposing Providence of God) was the valour and virtue of their Captains and Senators, at that time when Pyrrhus let upon them; the courage also of the Soldiers was extraordinary, so that (as Pyrrhus spoke of himseli) a King, whose command and conduct would have been constant and uncontroled, might have done greater wonders with such men. But as for the Government, so far was it from contributing to justice or virtue, that, even in these times, which their Writers so celebrate for these things, the multitude having by the Hortensian Law wrested this power from the Senate, to oblige all whatloever by their Plebiscita, decreed aid to be sent to the Mamertines, though against all equity and conscience, the Senate having utterly resuled to affist those thieves, murderers, intruders. But the multitude was told of great profit which would accrue to all men in particular, and therefore profit must bear down right, and forces must be sent into Sicily to get footing there, to inrich these vertuous & temperate men : and hence is to be setched the rise of the Carthaginian Wars (which with what injustice they were managed on the Roman part, hath been feen) and indeed this was the original of all their conquests. The main things performed were done by fuch, as rather awed the people, than were awed by it, though to obtain their commands, they corrupted the multitude with Money. Marius, Sylla, Pompey, and Cafar, after they had successively ingroffed the power, made the greatest conquests. After the overthrow of Carthage especially, scarcely any great command was obtained, but by some great promises under-hand, some new attempts of innovation, or Money distributed to the Tribes. So weak, imperfect, and vitious was the Government.

Hence appear 13. These things evidence the excellency of Monarchical Government above of the excellency of the excellency of Monarchical Government above the excellence of the excellency of the excellency of Monarchical Government above the excellency of the excel leney and new high extend the freedom of Suffrages to their Subjects or Affociates, and are ceffing of No and department of the control of th confiderable, for number, power and interest. Single Cities have for some time subsisted otherwise; but if we view those that have been mentioned in this Work, some of them we shall find to have been kept in that way by such strange discipline, and principles of equality and levelling, as are even repugnant to Nature, and destroy that lawful use of such things as were ordained for man's comfort and delight. Such was the constitution of that of Sparta, which yet secured it fible of their flavery to fuch harsh constitutions, and the Government tottered. Again, in others that were left more to their liberty, we see how impossible it was for the People to use it, but for their own destruction, so that for any one place to subsist without such miseries and disasters, is near to a miracle. Monarchy, though it may have its defects (as all things managed by meer men) yet in it self includes more order, certainty, and security, its force being commonly turned outward.lt's that which is most agreable with primitive prudence, when men were not arrived at that ambition and wickedness, which later times have produced. All Nations at first had their Kings from the very first foundation, as is clear in the case of the Greeks, and others; to that they voluntarily submitted to them, at the first leading out of Colonies from the East, being their Captains, and thence we may see that the Government is natural, flowing from paternal rule, and proceeding from that Superiority, which Masters of Families, and Heads of Kindreds might well challenge over others. It's most suitable to the Government of the Universe, which is in God alone, who therefore acknow-And Authori- ledgeth Kings for his Vicegerents, and calleth them gods, promising they should be nursing Fathers to his Church, and taking no notice herein of other Governments. Hence our Kings owe account to him alone, are Sacrofantt (which term the Romans gaveto their very Tribunes, who were inviolable, it being death to injure them in the leaft, and therefore we may well apply it to Kings) and that perpetually, and are intrufted by him with a Prerogative, which is necessary for the good of their Subjects. For all power flowing from them, it's contradictory for authority to challenge it felf, as unnatural and violent, for a derived ftream, to oppose the current of the Fountain. 14. But (to return from this requifite digression, whereby an answer is given

ral ule of History) after that Mecanas had pressed Casar with these urgent reaadvice to 6c fons, to take the Government upon him, he gave him directions to take the Government upon him, he gave him directions for the manager of the first the grant flips of the first the dutied him correspondent to Sanate plants. dering of his ment of his affairs. First, he advised him to regulate the Senate, placing and L 1244-16.5. Silins affairs. 'displacing according to the worth of persons; and to have a special regard to 'Nobility and Gentry, to gratifie them with imployments. To admit none into the Equestrian rank before eighteen years of age, and none into the Senate 'till 25; before which time the Romans were never accounted of full age. When 'theie had born the Offices of Questor, Adilu, and Tribunus plebis, then being thirty years old, he would have them made Prators, all which at first were to be Romans alone, left he should feem suddenly to change the customs of his Country. All these Magistrates he would have of Cesar's making, and not this power to be left in any case to the Senate, or People. He counselled him and alteration, but leave them their whole honour and dignity. The way to 'this was to make them execute their Offices in the City, and not suffer them 'then, nor presently after, to have any Military command, but for some time to live privately. He would have these Magistrates, to celebrate games, and exercise 'judicial power in all cases, except that of Murther; for some Judges were to be chosen from amongst the rest of the Senators, but the chief power to remain in these. Then he said, a certain Governour or Mayor of the City was to be 'made out of the most principal men, who had born these Offices, to joyn with 'the rest in governing the City, to receive Appeals, and judge capital Causes, 'except some afterwards to be spoken of, both in the City, and 81 miles round 'about. Another of the same rank was to be chosen, who should make inspe-' Ction into the Stock, Estates and Manners of Senators, and Knights or Equites, both those of under age and others, and as well of women as the other Sex, to 'correct fuch things, as being not worthy of punishment, yet being neglected 'might occasion great inconveniences; and refer the greater matters to Cafar 'himself, who was to bear the name of Cenfor, and the other being a Patrician, and the next in dignity to the Mayor, but that of Subcenfor. These two Officers might be, for life, except they committed some fault, or by old Age or Sickness were rendred unserviceable; for no dammage could thence arise, the one having no Soldiers, and the other but a few, and who should execute his Office before Cafar's eyes, for the most part. The other Magistrates, would 'fear to do any unjust thing, being presently to be reduced into a private condition,

'dition, and others to succeed them in their power. He added, that the Provin-'ces were only to be committed to men of Pratorian rank; the rest being Proprators in order once and again, should arrive at the Confulbip, (if they well exer-'cited their former Offices) and then be preferred to greater commands.

15. He further advised him to divide Italy, for 94 miles round about the City, and all the rest of the conquered Countries after such a manner, according to 'People, Nations, and Cities, as if they were to be governed by fingle men with absolute power. In each of these Soldiers were to be placed, over whom was to be fet one person of Consular dignity, and two more of Pratorian rank, from those there lying appeal to the other, in all cases, except when Officers of the Army were to be animadverted on, who were to be punished by none but 'Cefar himself, lest they should thereby be brought by fearing some one more, to 'attempt fomething against the Prince. All those who had any command out 'of the City, were to have their Salaries fet as was fuitable to the Imployment, ' for that they could not live of their own, and it was not convenient they should 'spend what they lift, as they did at present. They were not to hold their im-'ployments under the term of three years, nor longer than five, for in so short a space they could but learn the interests of places, and how to behave them-'selves, and longer commands made men but proud, and provoked them to attempt new matters. And one great command he faid, was not to be given them epresently after another, for this would amount to as much, as if they had one continued to them; but after they had been reduced to a private condition, and therein lived at home. Thus much for Senators.

16. 'From amongst the Equites, he would have him chuse out two of the most of Fazifician 'excellent, and make them Captains of his Guard. For to commit that trust 'to one would not be fafe, and to more than two, would not want trouble. Being two in number, if one should be treacherous, the other would preserve 'him. They were to be such as had been trained up in the Wars, and much ex-'ercifed in Offices, and to have the command not only of his Guard, but of all 'Soldiers in Italy, so as to punish and reward them, except Centurions, and 'fuch as belonged to Senatorian Magistrates. These Captains of the Guard ought to have their Deputies, and hold their places for their lives, as also the Mayor 'of the City, and the Subcenfor. Besides, out of the next rank of Equites, one 'should be chosen for Captain of the Watch, and another to take care for provi-'fion of Corn, but these for a limited time. The care of the Treasury, Exchequer, and other matters, as well at Rome as throughout Italy, was to be com-'mitted to those of Equestrian rank, who were to have Salaries suitable to their condition, being poorer than Senators. He told him the reason why he would 'have thele Offices committed to them, was, for that it was inconvenient to 'have both the Sword and Money in the same hands, and better that publick business should be managed by many, both that more might reap benefit from it, and learn experience; and hereby his Subjects would love him more, and 'he would have a sufficient number sit for employment. One Eques would be fufficient at Rome for gathering Money, and one in each Province, who might ' have affiftants out of the Equites, and Cafar's Liberti or Freed-men. For he told 'him it was convenient to joyn those with them, that his Servants might get fomething, and he receive certain intelligence how matters should go. Now 'if any Eques (or Knight, if we may so call him) should grow so famous by bufiness, as to be thought worthy to be received into the Senatorian rank, his age ought not to be any obstacle : and sometimes some Officers of the Army were to be received into the Senate, provided they had never been ordinary Soldiers, and Equites.

17. 'He further advited him to educate all of Senatorian and Equestrian rank,' 'whilst they were boys, at School in humanity, and when grown up, in Fencing 'and Riding, by Mafters hired publickly in both places. Forasmuch as it is the part of an excellent Prince, not only that he do well himself, but to take care 'that all else do so. This would be effected, not by permitting them to do ill, and then correcting them, but teaching them beforehand fuch things. And 'he added, That he needed not to fear, that fuch as were fo excellently educated, would attempt innovation; forafmuch as fuch as were not cultivated 'by any discipline, but dissolute in breeding and carriage, were hereof to be suspeceed, who easily would commit the most wicked and abominable things, both 'against themselves and others.

but from the beginning Centurions at the leaft.

The Roman Empire.

Augustus.

The Militia

18. 'Foralmuch as by reason of the largeness of the Empire, and nearness of Enemies, it was necessary to have a standing Army, he would have levies 'made out of the poorest and lustiest young men, tho being continually exer-'cifed and trained up in Military Difcipline, all others were to be forbidden 'the use of Arms. Then for Money , which he shewed to be necessary for car-'rying on of Affairs, in all Governments, as well as under Monarchy, he advised 'him to make it of all publick Things gotten in War, and let it out upon 'moderate interest: to look well to the Mines, and impose Tribute upon all Sub-'jects, it being reasonable that all should contribute to the expence of that, 'which tended to the protection and good of all. But there was no danger 'he faid, but men would be willing to pay, feeing most of them should receive 'it back with advantage; either, by bearing Offices of Magistracy or Govern-'ment, or serving in the War, especially when they understood that Cæsar him-'felf lived foberly and frugally, not improving the publick expense to any pri-'vate excefs.

Rome to be adorned.

19. 'For the reft, he would have him adorn Rome with all Magnificence, and 'fet it out with all forts of Solemnities, to make it in great reverence and effeem 'abroad. No Nation was to have any power in its own hands, nor meet in any publick Assemblies of Debate, for that would procure Disturbance; for which 'reason neither was the Roman People, he said, to be permitted either to come

The Provinces 'together for paffing of Judgment, to the Comitia, or any other Council, for the 'enacting of any thing. No City or People was to be fuffered to use any excess 'in Euildungs or in Games: none to use any peculiar Coin, Weight, or Measure. 'None were to fend any peculiar message to him, except the matter required his 'inspection, but have recourse to the Governor of the place, who was therewith to acquaint Cafar. Ambassadors either from Enemies or confederate Kings or 'States, were to have Audience from the Senate, that the power feeming to be 'in the Senate, they might fee how many Enemies they should have if the case so 'required, and Matters being dispatched by consent of the Fathers, the Majesty 'of the Empire would be the more established. All of Senatorian rank he would ' have impeached before, and judged by the Senate, that Cæsar might escape the 'envy of Condemnation, and others by fo formal proceedings, might be kept in 'awe. As for any scandalous words against himself, he told him, he should nei-'ther hear any acculation, nor punish them. For it was not good, he faid, that lous words to 'he should believe, that any one would injure him, who hurt no body, but did be thought of.

'good to all; for, faith he, bad Princes only do this, whom their guilty Confciences make credulous. Neither is it fitting to take those things ill, which if true, ought not to have been done, and if talk, should be neglected and dissem-'bled: for that many by punishing them, minister greater occasion of worse dif-'course. His sence therefore of scandalous words was this: that he ought to be 'higher than all injury, and neither himself to fancy, nor make others believe, 'that any one durft be so sawcy, but that the same opinion of veneration was had How Traitors 'of him, as of the eternal Gods. If any plotted his destruction, he would nei-'ther have him himself to judge, nor sentence him, but refer him to the Senate, ' and if he were convicted, to punish him as lightly as might be, that his Crime 'might gain belief. But he here excepted fuch, as having command of Ar-'mies, made open Infurrections, who were not to be formally Arraigned, but 'punished as Enemies.

20. 'These things, and most of the rest which concerned the Common-wealth. he madeule of he would have him propound to the Senate, wherein all the Members should have equal power of Voting, except any of them were accused. If the party 'indeed were not as yet a Senator, or but of the rank of a Questor, all might 'have voices; but it was against reason that he, who never had been a Tribune of the People, or Ædilis, should pass Sentence upon him that had born these 'Offices, or that those should do it upon one of Prætorian rank, or such an one 'upon a Consular person: but it was fitting enough that those of Consular Dig-'nity might judge all the several forts, and the rest their Equals or Inseriors: 'Casfar himself was to be Judge in all Appeals, made from the greater forts of 'Magistrates, his Procurators, the Governor of the City, Subcenfor, Prafetti Prato-'rio, Overseers of Provisions or Proveditors, and Masters of the Watches: for 'none ought to have so absolute a power, but that appeal ought to lie from him. 'Of thele he ought to take Cognizance, as also of the causes of Equites, Centu-'rions, or prime Officers, when the Controversie was about Lifeor Reputation.

'a Kingdom without the envied name thereof.

Book IV

In what Cases 'For these Cases ought to be referred to him alone, and for the fore-mentioned Appeals ought, causes none other ought to judge them. Yet to the hearing of them he might to lye to test of the principal men of Senatorian or Equestran rank, or of Conference of the principal men of Senatorian or Equestran rank, or of Conference or the principal men of Senatorian or Equestran rank, or of Conference or the principal men of Senatorian or Equestran rank, or of Conference or the principal men of Senatorian or Equestran rank, or of Conference or the principal men of Senatorian or Equestran ranks. 'fular, or Prætorian Dignity, that he and they having had hereby experience one of another, he might imploy them in other matters abroad. In the Cases of 'greatest consequence he would not have him ask their opinions openly, lest 'iayouring their friends they might not speak freely their minds; but their opi-'nions were to be written down, and then presently blotted out, which secrecy 'would procure them to use all freedom. He advised him in his affairs of Cau-'ses, Letters, business of Cities, and Petitions of private men, and in other things 'of Government, to use the affishance of the Equites. To refuse to hear no man's 'advice, and to look at the Will, and not at the Success, both of Councellors and 'Soldiers; as, neither, to envy the glory of Military Men. For, many fearing 'the envy of Princes and States, have rather chosen to lose than gain in the 'Wars, to provide for their own fafety. Wherefore he would not have him (whom 'especially the event, either as to profit or disprosit would concern) in word 'others, and in deed, to envy himself.

2.1. 'He defired him to ipeak and do fuch things, as he would have his Officers to think and practice, for this would more easily teach them their duty, Men being led more by Example than Precept, and the Actions of Princes being espe-'cially pried into, and more imitated than their threatnings feared. The lives of others he should look into, but not greatly enquire: what Crimes by others were detected he ought to punish, but diffemble such as had no accuser, and before tather rous Proceedings. Then as for Rewards, he told him, he was to require deterto be reward. Ving persons rather above than below their merits; for this was the way to win ed above than upon them, and to make them virtuous. He then advised him not to admit below their of any extraordinary Honours from Senate or others: for this would be need-'less, chargeable, and dangerous. He bade him by virtue seek for immortality. not by Temples built unto his name. The gods he told him he was ever, and 'all over to worship, according to the custom of his Countrey, and compel others so to do: and to punish Authors of strange Religions, not only for re-'verence to his gods, but also because such things draw men to the use of so-'reign Customs, whence Conspiracies, and Bandyings arise, which are no whit 'agreeable with the Government of a fingle person. Neither was he to suffer any Magicians; and to have a care of Philisophers also, who by their forest-lings often raised Seditions. He was to be studious of peace, content with 'preient enjoyments, and yet to be ready for War upon all occasions. Though 'he must use intelligencers and Spies; yet he ought not to be too credulous, and 'not indulge his Servants or Dependents too much; for all their failings would 'be imputed to him. He was to right inferior and private men, incourage Arts, 'and profitable Occupations, as to punish idle, and vitious persons; not to suffer 'contentions, or animolities to grow, nor peculiar names to be assumed, nor any other thing whence discord might arise. He was to keep an equality in his 'granting requests as much as could be; and therefore not to suffer any to ask 'him what he should not grant; but to indeavour that none should petition for 'any thing forbidden. In fum, he advised him never to abuse his Power, and 'not to think this a Diminution of it, if he did not do all that he might: but by how much the more he could do what he would, by fo much to take care to will all things that became him. He bade him always confider whether he 'did well or ill: whether by fuch an action he procured love or ill will, that he 'might do and forbear accordingly. He told him, That though he heard no 'body blame him, yet ought he not to conclude, that therefore he did well; 'nor to expect that any should be so mad as openly to upbraid him. This no 'man would do, though most extremely injured. Nay, many, faith he, are constrained openly to commend those by whom they have been wronged, lest 'they should be thought to blame them. But 'tis the duty of a Prince not to 'guess at the affections of others from their words; but from those things which 'tis most probable that they think of.

22. 'Thefe, and other like things he would have him do; for many things 'he faid he passed over, because all could not be spoken at the same time. One thing he would fay, which was the fum of all, either faid or to be faid. If he 'would do all those things, which if he were a subject he would have his Prince do The fum of all to him, he should in nothing offend, prosper in all things, and lead both a safe, 'and most happy life, For how could not all but look upon him, and love him as 'a Father, and Preserver, when they should see him modest, of unblameable life. 'and excellent both in Peace and War; when he should neither differace nor in-'jure any one, but carry himself humbly: not exact Money from others, whilst 'he himfelf flowed with wealth; not afflicting others whilft he was luxurious; 'not punishing others whilft he himself was loose and licentious; but in all things 'as it were tharing with them? Therefore relying on that defence which would 'be great in thy felf if thou hurtest no man; Believe me, faith he, thou wilt have 'no body, either hate thee, or devise any thing against thee, which being so, thou must needs lead a pleasant life. For, what can be more sweet, what more 'happy, than for one with virtue to enjoy all humane good things, and to be able 'to confer them upon others? In conclusion, those, and other things heretofore 'fooken being confidered, he bade him yield to him, and not contemn Fortune, 'which had preferred him, picked out from amongst all others, to be chief. Now, 'if taking in reality to himself alone the Soveraign power, he feared the Name of a Kingdom as odious, he might omit that, and order his matters under the

23. Mecanas concluded with these words, whose advice Casar followed, though

speech : yet he did not presently set upon all those things which he offered, lest if on a sudden he should attempt to change the constitution of the State, he might fail in his indeavours: therefore some things he changed out of hand, others afterwards: and fome things he left to be perfected by his Succeffors, which he thought might be better fetled through the advantage of time and opportunity. He used also the industry of Agrippa in the prosecution of these designs no less than if he title of Impera- had advised him to this course. In this same year, and his sisth Consulship, he dereth feveral took the name of Imperator; not in that sence wherein anciently it was wont to be given for Victories obtained (for fo he had it given him often both before this and after;) but in respect of chief Command, or Authority, as it had been decreed to his Father Julius, and his Sons and Posterity. Then was he made Cenfor with Agrippa, and amongst other things belonging to that Office, purged the Senate, into which many Equites and unworthy Plebeians had crept during the Civil Wars; and increased it to the number of a thousand. Two persons, viz. C. Cluilius and C. Furnius he put into the rank of Confulares; because being defigned Confuls they had been prevented by others. He also ranked certain Families amongst the Patricians; because most of those had perished in the Wars. He commanded that no Senator without his leave should pass beyond Italy, which is at this day observed, faith Dio, It being unlawful for any of that rank to travel, except into Sicily, or Gallia Narbonensis, whither any that had Estates in those Provinces might go without leave; because those Countries were in quiet, and destitute of Arms. Cafar also considering that many Senators and others trusted him not; left they should attempt new matters, he gave out that he had burned all the Letters found in Antony his Cossers: and indeed some of them were loft, but most of them he very carefully kept, and afterwards made use of them as he had occasion. He fent for Antiochus Commagenus, who had treacherously killed his Brother, fent on an Embaffy to Rome, and put him to Death, being condemned by the Senate. 24. Casar in his fixth Consulship, together with M. Agrippa his Collegue made Maketh a Lu- a Lustrum 41 years after the last Celebration of one (by Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius) and herein were ceffed 4063000 Polls of Roman Citizens. He celebrated Games also, which had been decreed in memory of his Victory at Astium, and it was ordered they should be renewed every fifth year, four Colleges of Priests taking care of them, viz. the Pontifices, Augurs, Septembiri, and Quindecimviri by courses. He caused other sorts of Games and Exercises to be made at his own cost, borrowing Money; ordered that two persons of Prætorian rank should yearly overfee the Treasury, gave to the people four times as much Corn as they were wont to have, to fome Senators he gave Money, fome of this rank being fo poor, that they could not bear Offices belonging to them. All Ingagements and Debts to the Exchequer he made void that flood good before the Battel at Allium.

except what concerned Buildings. He fuffered no Sacrifice to be offered to Egyptian gods within the Pomærium, took also care for repairing of Temples. And because many unjust things had been ordained during the late Seditions and Civil Wars, especially in the Triumvirate, he made them all void by one Edict and caused them to cease from his fixth Consulfhip. Being in the eyes and mouths of all for these things, he considered how he might increase his reputation, and confirm his fingle power by the confent, and without the conftraint of the people. Being then Conful the feventh time, when he had prepared every Senator before-hand, whom he knew to be well affected towards him, he came to the Senate house, and there read a fet Speech which he had written down fitly for this purpofe.

Precending in 25. 'Herein he first exceedingly magnified with much affected Art, the things afer Speech to 'he was about to do, and then fignified, That though he had such opportunity to 'establish himself as no man ever had more, yet did he now devest himself of all power, and restore all unto them, Arms, Laws, and Provinces: and not only such things as he had been intrusted with, but he gave them besides what he himself had further acquired. This then his gift he much illustrated by his felf-denial. shewn as well formerly as at prefent, being very forry that ever there had been occasion 'for the Commonwealth to use him. He spake of the Justice and Prudence of 'this Refignation, and boafted of the glory of it, which he avowed to exceed 'the Conquests of Gall, Mysia, Egypt, or Pannonia, the Victories over Pharnaces, 'Juba, or Phraates, the expedition into Britain or the passage of the Rhine, and 'all the difficulties of the Civil Wars. He demanded if any could be found that 'excelled him in greatness of mind, who had so many Cities, Nations, and Sol-'diers at his back, and whom none durst oppose? Horatius, Mucius, Curtius, Re-'gulus, and the Decii, who ventured their lives for glory, were not comparable to him, for as much as by this Refignation he exceeded both them, and all others 'in glory. And shewed hence that the gallantry of Spirit found in the ancient 'Romans' was not extinct. Having discourfed much in this vein, he concluded with his advice to the Senate how to manage Publick Affairs, telling them, 'That if they followed it, they would be happy and thankful to him, who rescu-'ing them from Seditions, had brought them into that estate: but if they did not 'punctually observe it, they would make him repent of what he had done, and 'cast themselves again into manifold Wars, and great Dangers.

26. Cæsar having read his writing, the Minds of the Senators were marvelously affected. Some there were who knew his defign, and therefore agreed with him; the rest either suspected his intent, or believed him. Of these some admired his craft in concealing his purposes; others were troubled at his defign: some at his cunning; and others at his refufal of the Government. For there were fome who hated the Popular form as turbulent, and approving of the change, were well pleased with Casia's administration. Yet the product of these several affections was the same; for neither they that believed he spake as he thought, could rejoyce; those that wished he were reduced to a private condition, being yet fearful how things would go; and they that defired he might keep his power, being sorry for the loss of their hopes. Neither could they that believed him not reprehend him, because to some will, and to others courage was wanting. No man yet, whether he believed him, or believed him not, durst commend his Speech, for that some liked it not, and others feared to do it. Wherefore having often interrupted him whilst speaking, when he had done, they all befought him with many words, that he would alone undertake the Government, and by many Arguments Thereby con. compelled him at length to accept of the Soveraignty. Then that his Person might be preserved, they presently decreed the pay of his Guard to be double to that of other Soldiers.

27. Cæsar by this Artifice pretending that he would lay down his Power, effected that it was confirmed to him, by Senate and People. Yet that he might frem to be Popular, he faid, He would not govern all the Provinces, nor obtain perpetual Power over fuch as he should take care of; therefore the weaker, because they were more quiet, he left to others: the most powerful which had appearance of most danger (having an Enemy near at hand, or likely to be turbulent) he kept himself, under pretence that the Fathers might enjoy their Power safely, and he himself undergo labour and dangers; but by this device he rendred the Senate re-Provinces be- ally helpless, and weak, and engrossed to himself the Militia. To the Senate and twist the Se-People was left Africk, Numidia, Afra, Greece, with Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicily, Crete, Libya called Cyrenaica, Bithynia, with the neighbouring Pontus, Sardinia, and that part of Spain called Hispania Batica. Casar kept the rest of Spain, all Gall and Germany, as also Cælesyria, Phænicia, Cyprus, and Ægypt. Over these Provinces he assumed the Government but for ten years, within which time he undertook to reduce them into order, adding with a certain juvenile kind of boasting, that as foon as ever he could quiet them, he would quit his Power. Then did he let over the Provinces of both forts, men of Patrician Dignity, but over Ægypt one of Equestrian rank only, for the causes above rehearsed. To Senators he allotted by themselves Africk and Afra, and the rest of the Provinces to Pratorians. He forbad either to take this employment within five years after they had born Offices in the City, They held their Governments but for a year. And as foon as Succeffors were fent them, they were prefently to depart the Provinces, and not loiter in their return, but come to Rome within three months. The distribution of the Provinces was made on the Ides of January, as may be gathered from Ovid, who thought also that Casar Ollavianus had the Sirname of Augustus given him the fame day, which indeed was the fourth day after, as appeareth

28. For, the Provinces being divided, and all things fetled, it was debated in the Senate, whether he ought not to be called Romulus, because he had founded the Empire; but the other more venerable name of Augustus, propounded by Munacius Plancus, at length seemed best; for, Sacred Places and Temples consecrated by Augurs, the Romans termed Augusta. Cæsar though he much desired that of Romalus (saith Dio) yet perceiving he should be suspected of affecting the Kingdom, omitted it, and was firnamed Augustus, as greater than the Nature of Man could make him. For those things are called Augusta, which are most worthy of Honour, and most Sacred; wherefore the Greeks express it by Zibar ., as if thou shouldest say Venerable. Thus Cæsar alone got the whole Power into his hands, having both Money (for though he had his own separate from the Treafury, yet did he use this at his pleasure) and the Militia in his own hands. When his ten years were out other five, and when they were expired five more, and these ended, ten more, and ten more after them were added; so that he had his Authority still continued for his life; for which cause his Successors, though they had the Power fetled on them for life, yet at the end of every ten years folemnized as it were the renewing of it. As foon as Cæsar had but made his Oration about refigning his Command, and diffributing the Provinces, many Honours were conterred on him, as that Laurel hould be planted before his Gates in the Palatium, and upon those trees Oaken Garlands hung, as for him who was a perpetual Conqueror of Enemies, and Preserver of Citizens. The House of the Emperor also was wont afterwards to be called the Palatium or Palace; not for that it was ever so decreed; but because Cæsar lived in the Palatium or Palatine hill, and there was his Pratorium; his House also received some Dignity from the Mount it felf, because Romulus there lived: therefore though the Emperor, faith the Historian, live elsewhere, yet is his House called the Palatium or Palace. But after he had done those things which he promised, then was he called Augustus by the Senate and People. From this day forward began the foveraign Power and Authority to be in the hands of one man, which the Greeks called Monarchy. Yet the Romans derived the Epoche of their Augusti from the Kalends of January of this year, as Conforinus writeth, who compareth with the 265 year of this Æra, the 283 of the Julian ordination. This seventh Consulship of Augustus Casar, and the beginning of his Monarchy, fell out in the 727 year of the City, the second of the 188 Olympiad, the thirteenth of Herod the Great, 25 before the Birth of Christ, A.M. 3978, he himself, as it's said, the seventh, and M. Vipsanius Agrippa the third time 29. On this manner all the power of the People and Senate was transferred upon Lib. 55. 9.517

For this notable translation and change in the Govern of the ment there was a Law made, which is famous by the name of Lew Regia, after v. c. 727. which it's convenient to make a little enquiry, for the better information of Stu-Herodic 13. dents in this great affair. A Law may be fo (and is fo) called, either for that a King made, or preferred it, or because it was made and enacted concerning a King or Kingly power. In the first sence, such Laws as were made by Romulus and his Succeffors the ancient Kings of Rome, are by Lawyers called Leges Regiae, whereof Dionysius Halicarnasseus hath recorded many, and of which several have been already mentioned in their due places; and in the (a) Code is yet extant a Law (a) Tit.demorready mentioned in their due places; and in the (a) code is yet extain a law infured called Lex Regia, concerning the Burial of a woman with Child, fo called, because the infured is

The Law it self is not now extant in terms, nor exemplified orner roughil request in Law at tents not row status in tents, not exemplified in any Author full remaining, yet it is mentioned by full intain in his [b] Inditine (b) the vitations of Law, who there writeth (fpeaking of feveral forts of Law) that what was the same of t pleaseth the Prince, hath the vigour of a Law; forasmuch as by the Lex Regia, which was made concerning his Power, the People granted to him all its Command and Authority. Imperii, and Augustum privilegium. As for Commentators upon both Institutions re Ennellando. and Pandeits, with other parts of the Civil Law, nothing is more acknowledged by them all, as they have occasion. 30. But as for the interpretation of this Law, some difference there hath been amongst Expositors, who lived fince the Civil Law was restored in the West. For fome there have been ever fince that time, who rightly understood all manner of manner of ex- Power and Authority, to be so by the Roman People transferred upon the Prince by that Law, that they affirmed the People thereby deprived and made destitute of all Power and Authority. Others thought Power and Authority indeed was given to the Prince to make Laws, but so that by this concession the power of the People was in no fort diminished, and the force of Plebiscitum's and Senatusconfultum's, as well future as past, was the same as formerly; so that Prince, People, Senate, and Commons, had equal Authority in this Matter: both these Opinions being held, as appeareth from Accurfus, Hostiensis, and others. But the later of them feemeth thence to have rifen, that they miftook this Lex Regia (called also corruptly Lex Remnia) for the Hortensian Law, or rather thence, as a late

(a) learned Man judgeth, that the Profeffors and Students of the Civil Law, which (4) Job Students as newly reflored, were fearful, left by afferting the true Power of the Emperation rors, they should give offence to such People and Cities, as then lived in a course left. contrary to such a Prerogative, and thereby injure their newly restored Profession. And hence might that most known Controversie arise, concerning the Power of the Prince, from this Law, betwixt the Martinians and Bulgarians. But as for that conceit about the Hortenfian Law, it was enacted by Q. Hortenfius the Dillator, in the 468 year of the City (not the 422, as that same learned Man hath it) and the 284 (not the 330) before the Birth of Christ, upon the third separation of the Commons, and 259 before the enacting of the Regal Law. The purport of it was, that all Quirites or Romans should be bound by the Plebiscita, or the Decrees of the People. Hence, as we formerly observed out of Pomponius, concerning the Original of the Roman Laws, the Authority of making Laws was the fame, though the fashions differed, although the fame thing in effect, was done long before the Hortensian Law, viz. by L. Valerius and * M. Horatius the * V.C. 305. Confuls, who got it enacted by a Law in the Centuriata Comitia, that what the Commons refolved on in their Tribes, or Tributa Comitia, faith Livy, but in their Curiæ or Curiata Comitia, faith Dionysius, should bind the whole People; which thing we having formerly omitted in its own place, here supply, having yet *observed, that a Law was also preferred by Q. Pablius Philo the Distator, *Lik. 2, C4. 111 years after the other, to the same purpose, and 211 before the Lex Regia. 31. Now strange it is, that Accursius and others, should wrest any thing of the Hortensian Law, and apply it to the Lex Regia, or rather make them all one, as he doth, expounding the Regia thus; scil. lata ab Hortensto mirabili Oratore, although he acknowledgeth, as necessarily he must, that the Hortensian Law made only express mention of the Power of Senate and Commons. It's not easie to guess what he meant by so strange a conceit; but this interpretation is made of it by *one as able to judge as any, that as the Hortensian Law concerning form.

Law firangely and Senate (of which two orders or effates then the Roman Body politick con-wrefled by (fifted) equal Power and Authority (o when the Prince came to be joyzned as a fifted) equal Power and Authority; fo when the Prince came to be joyned as a third party, in like manner an equal Power should be granted to him, as to the other two, and that from the sence of the same Law. And those of this opinion interpret Justinian (who faith concerning the Plebiscita, that from the Hortensian Law they began to be of no less value than-Laws, and also the same of the Senatusconsulta, that because the People was so increased, that it could not easily meet together for making of Laws, that therefore the Senate was consulted) as thoughthe fame Power remained to Senate and People still under the Emperors as before, They strangely disputed also, whether the Power so granted by the People to the Emperor, might not be revoked, as that which is given to Delegates from the Delegators. And this is all that can be imagined, as meant by those Men concerning the Hortenfian Law, as to the subject in hand, though it be strangely wrested to their design, and maketh nothing for their purpose.

32. For nothing is more certain than the former opinion, viz. that the people by the Lex Regiawere wholly deprived of all Power and Authority in making Laws. This is clear from the words of Justinian formerly cited, which clearly fignific that the whole Power and Authority of People and Senate was transferred upon, and yielded or granted to the Emperors by this Law. And he (a) elfewhere declareth, (a) L 12. c. that his sentence standeth for Law, and bindeth all under his command, which in- tit. de Legibus, deed the very composing of the body of Law, as from him it is transmitted to us, or fufficiently demonstrateth, wherein he by his fole Authority repealeth what he pleafeth, and enacteth anew what feemeth good to him, without interpolition of any other Authority; which he could not have done (nor his Predecessors) as to the Plebiscita and Senatusconsulta, though he might as to the Principales Constitutiones, except he had had that Power which formerly belonged to People and

In the Lateran Pa- obj. 1. 1. 6.1. as having any thing to do in this matter of the same, or the Capitol, is extant (d) a Table of Brass, wherein is to be seen (d) inscript. a fragment of this Law renewed, as to Vefpafian, confirming many things of Grating New Soveraign, and sole Authority, as descending upon him from his Predecessors, and the at Lett. enacting, that what he had done, decreed, or commanded, before this ratification, confutu. should be held and taken for as good Law, as if the People it self had done, decreed, or commanded it. For, though he might make use of this Ratification, yet his right was as strong before; there being no such custom as some have thought, that particular Princes had particular and feveral Laws made for their Authority, that one for Augustus respecting himself, and Successors, as is clear from Justinian, who never mentioneth any other, nor speaketh in the plural number.

33. If we fetch an explanation of the Lex Regia from Historians, we shall find that though they mention it not in words, yet they give that Supream and abfolute Power to Augustus, which devesteth the Senate and People of all Legislative Authority, and sheweth that his command (and that of his Successors) was as large as could be transferred upon a Prince that was to govern persons of free condition without Tyranny. And that the Emperors may appear to have so great Power, saith he, not as they by force but from the Laws; all things which under the Popular Government were resonantion of greatest force (and that by Universal consent) together with the names, they take upon them, except Dictatorship. For they are often Consuls, and when without the Pomærium, are called Proconfuls; and they bear the name of Imperator, (not only such as have obtained victories, but all of them) to fignific their plenary and absolute power; in the room of King and Dictator, which being taken away they never assume, but confirm the force and matter of them by the title of Emperor. Accordingly they have the power of raifing Men and Money, making War and Peace, com-manding all things effectually, both at home and abroad, putting to death Equites and Senators, even within the Pomærium, and doing all other things, which a Consul and other Magistrates, who had absolute power, might do. As Censors also they have Authority to inquire into our life and Manners, to make the Cenfus, admit persons into the Equestrian or Senatorian rank, and remove thence according to their pleasure. And in as much as they are inaugurate in all Priesthoods, admit Priests into the Colleges, and ever one of them (if there be two or three Emperors at one time) is Chief Priest, it is that they may have all religious things and sacred in their own hands. As for the Tribunitial power, which every eminent Emperor was wont to have, it inableth them to interpose against any thing that may be done contrary to their pleasure, and they are thereby Sacrosanct, or Inviolable, so that if any one injure them by the least, not only deed, but word, they may put him to death without process as Piacularly Criminal. The Emperors count it unlawful to be Tribunes, because they are Patricians, but they receive Tribunitial power as large as ever any enjoyed; and as renewing it yearly with the annual Tribunes, the years of their reign or power, are counted accordingly. These things, as they were established in the Popular Government, do the Emperors, together with the names, take unto them, that they may appear to have nothing but what was freely conferred

34. But they have another privilege (so Dio proceedeth) which never was univerfally granted to any Roman. For the Emperors are loofed from the Laws; by which thing alone, liberty is given them to do those which we have related, and all other things. After this manner, with these names which were used in the Popular State, they receive all the power of the whole Commonwealth, and the Kingly also, shunning only the name. For, the titles of Casar and Augustus add nothing of peculiar power unto them: but the one fignifieth the succession, and the other the splendor of their Dignity. As for the name of Fathers, though it giveth them fuch right over their subjects, as Parents have over Children; yet at first it was given only for ho-nour, and to admonish them to hold their Subjects as dear as Children, and these them as Parents. These are the titles which the Emperors according to the Laws and Customs use even in our days and in our age, all these are at the same time given to them, except that of Censor; but in times past they were severally according to the Laws decreed to them. The name also of Censor, some of them according to the ancient custom have received, and Domitian bore it all his life; but now it is not so. For, the Emperors of our time having the thing it felf, are neither chosen to the For, the Emperors of our time bawing too trong it jet, are netwer coughn to the Conforthio, nor bear the name of the Office, except during the Cenfus. But thui the Commonwealth was changed into a better form and order; for it was utterly im—and office in flowlid fulfill under the power of the people. Thus far Dio, excellently, ac rightness cording to his culton of relating the principal matters of State. It clearly as meeting the principal matters of State. It clearly as meeting peareth from him, how absolute the Power of the Emperors was, and how with the conference of the Emperors was, and how with the conference of the Emperor of the E out any co-ordinate Power of People or Senate in any respect. The main of 3 yet and the which two, (nay the former of them) make good our Exposition of the Lex Residual yet, and to prevent the other titles which they might take upon them for popularity, and to prevent the pretences of others, though their Authority was large, and ftrong enough without them. Our Author concludeth this discourse with an Attellation to that Truth we formerly afferted against Agrippa.

35. The same night that Cæsar received the firname of Augustus, a consideration piessis, 53. ble sign (as it was accounted) of his confirmation happed. For Tiber so over 1985 5100 flowed, that all the lower parts of Rome were Navigable, which the Fortunetellers interpreted to fignifie his great advancement, and that he should have the whole City in his power. Now many fought to flatter him, but the indeavours of Sextus Pacuvius (or Apudius) exceeded all, who being Tribune of the People, after the custom of the Spaniards, confecrated himself to him, and caused others to do fo. Having now obtained the Government by confent of the People, he set himself more effectually to look after it, and made several Laws. Yet did he not all on his own head, but propounded many things to be debated in publick, that if any were displeased he might amend them: he defired all, freely, and openly, to deliver their opinions; and being moved by their reasons changed fomething: but he especially defired to be advised by the Consuls, or his Collegue, if he himself bore that Office. Of the other Magistrates he made choice of one out of each fort, and out of the Senate fifteen choien by lot, who were for fix Months to be his Counfellors; that hereby he might feem to communicate his defigns to the reft. Some things hebrought down to the whole Senate; but he thought it fitter to confult with a few persons at leisure about the greatest affairs. He called also these men sometimes to decide causes: although the Senate still heard certain matters, and gave answer to the Ambassadors of Kings and States as formerly. Although the Comitia, or Assemblies of the People were sometimes held, yet nothing was done but according to the pleasure of Augustus. He partly named Magistrates, and left others to be created by the People; only taking care that no unworthy persons by indirect practices advanced themselves. This was

he lest the rest to be repaired by certain Senators at their own charge, and he Agestive the himself took care of Flaminia; because upon it he was to draw forth his Armies. Via Flaminia. And it was presently repaired, and for that work performed, Statues were erected to him on the Bridge of Tiber, and at Ariminum. The rest indeed were mended afterwards, but the Senators were not hafty to do it at their own cost, and whether the Expence was defrayed by Augustus himself, or the Publick Treasury, our Author cannot well tell; for he and his Succeffors feemed to have had the fame Treasury with the State it felf; and therefore it could not easily be discerned; but formetimes the one happened, and formetimes the other. Also Debts and Donations feemed common to him and the People. These things dispatched, he led away his Army from the City, with purpole to transfer the War hither into Britain; but coming into Gall, there he was stopped by the fair words of the British Ambassadors, and the Disorders he found in that Country, which were wont to be followed by Civil Wars. He made a Cenjus of the Inhabitants, took order for Matters of Publick concernment, and for reformation of Manners: And thence he passed into Spain, and setled that Province. 37. Statilius Taurus. Agrippa by feveral publick Works got himself Reputation, and Statilio Tauro the love of the People; while Cornelius Gallus by a contrary course of Actions incurred Odium, and procured his own Destruction. He was so ingrateful to Augustus, that many things he tatled against him, and many horrid things he did; and yet he caused Statues to be erected to himself, almost through Ægypt, and his Acts to be inscribed upon the Pyramids. Of these things being accused by Largus, who had been his Companion, he was noted with Iniamy by Augustus, and prohibited to inhabit in his Provinces. After this, others also fell upon him, and laid fuch Crimes to his charge, that the Senate condemned him to Banishment, his Estate to be forfeited to the Emperor, and for this, Sacrifice was offered by the Fathers; but he overcome with Sorrow, prevented the Condemnation by a voluntary Death: Such end had Gallus by his Folly, whom when those that were formerly his Acquaintance and Flatterers faw falling, they contributed to his Ruin with all their might. As for Largus, Dio tells a Story how one Proculeius meeting him, stopped his Nose and Mouth with his hand, thereby fignifying to the bystanders, that it was unsafe to breath in his presence. Another went to him and took Witneffes that he was utterly unknown to him, which Largus confeffing, he caused it to be written down, as now secure, that being unknown to a Knave, he could not load him with any Calumnies. However the Example of Gallus gave not fuch warning as to cause all men to abstain from intemperate Speeches. 38. This fame year, Polemo King of Pontus was received amongst the Allies and Confederates of the Roman People, and Senators had the first Seats in the Theatres alotted to them throughout his Kingdom. For all the good words lately given Augustus by the British Ambassadors, there was nothing yet agreed on, and therefore he now thought of an Expedition hither, but was fropped by the Rebellion of the Salafi, Cantabri and Aflures, whereof the former lived under the Alps, and the other two Nations inhabited the Champian of Spain, as far as the Pyreneam, the most fortified places of which they held.

Angultus now having entered his Ninth Confulship with M. Silanus, sent Terentius Varro against the Salassi, who easily overcame and forced them to receive Conditions. He required of them a certain Sum of Money, and pretended to nothing elfe, but fending his Soldiers all over to Collect it, he feized by that means upon all the youth, and fold them on these terms, that they should none of them be free before the twentieth year. The best part of their Land was bestowed on the Prætorian Cohorts, and a City new built, on which was imposed the Name of Augusta Prætorianorum. The War against the Assures and Cantabri, Augustus himself undertook, and they being inferior in Number and strength, plaid least in fight, and took their Advantages upon the Mountains, which io perplexed him, that he fell fick upon it, and giving over the Profecution of the War to C. Antifius betook himself to Tarracon. And Antifius well behaved himself, and brought the War to an issue, not for that he was himself a more able Soldier than Augustus; but because they despised him, gave him Battel, and prefented him with Opportunities to overcome them. The War being ended, he difmiffed the Emerit Soldiers, and Commanded them to found a City in Lustrania, by the Name of Augusta Emerita. And this we

of Bocchus and Bogudes. Amyntas being dead, he did not deliver over his Kingdom to his Sons, but made it a Province, and thenceforth Galatia, together with Galatia hath a Lycaonia, began to have a Roman Præfect; and the Towns of Pamphilia formerly subject to Amyntas, were restored to their liberty. About this time M. Vinicius by Defeating and Punishing some Germans who had killed certain Romans that came into their Country to Traffick, obtained also for Augustus the Title of Imperator; and for this and other Atchievments, Triumphs were decreed to him, which he refused. Yet upon the Alps was erected a Triumphal Arch, and Power was given to all to wear Garlands, and the Triumphal Garments. Having finished these Wars after this manner, he shut again the Temple of Janus, which had been opened upon account of them. Agrippa at the fametime adorned the City with feveral Works at his own proper charge, and amongst the rest he perfected the Pantheon. Die tells us, that perhaps it was fo called because it received the Images of many gods in those of Mars and Venus; but he rather thinks it took that Name from its arched Roof, whereby it resembled Heaven. Agrippa would have placed in it the Statue of Augustus, and put his Name to the Work; but he refusing as well the one as the other, he put that of Casar deceased within the Pantheon, and those of Augustus and himself in the Porch or Entry. All this proceeding from kindness to him, and love to his Country, Augustus took well, and honored him upon occasion for it. Being sick, and not in a condition to celebrate the Marriage of his Daughter Julia with Marcellus his Sifter's Son, he procured him to do it at Rome in his Absence. And the House upon the Palatine Hill being burnt which formerly had belonged to Antonius; but fince had been granted to Meffala and Agrippa; he bestowed Money on Meffala, but received Agrippa into his own House

> January, the Senate by Oath approved his Acts; and now being on his way to Norbano Cossthe City, whence he had been deteined long by Sickness, and having promised a Donative of an hundred Denarii to every man, but denied to pay it till the Senate should consent, and the Fathers freed him from the necessity of Laws, so as being of full Power, he might do all things according to his own will. After his return other things were done to honor him. It was decreed that Marcellus should have place in the Senate amongst those of Pratorian Rank, and might stand for the Consulship ten years sooner than it was permitted by the Laws. And in favour of Tiberius, it was ordained that he might stand for any Office of Magistracy five years before the time; and shortly after the one was made Quastor, and the other Ædilis. Now for these two Persons thus honoured, we have seen who this Marcellus was, and must inquire after Tiberius. We must know then that the first Wife of Augustus was Scribonia, which had been Married to two Perfons of Confular Dignity, and by one was a Mother; for as for the Daughter of Ser-vilius Isauricus, he was only contracted to her when young; and Claudia the vio.C. 6.6363.

Arabia invaded by Ælins

41. The Cantabri and Aftures presently after the departure of Augustus, rebelled, and were presently after reduced to obedience to their Cost. And Arabia the Happy was invaded by Ælius Gallus, having then Sabos for its King, by order from Augustus, that if the Arabians let him pass, he should agree with them, but make War upon them if they used any force or violence. At first, none appeared to make any opposition; but it proved a very tedious and troublesom Journey, by the Treachery of Syllaus the chief Minister of Obodes, King of the Nabatheans, who had taken upon him to Conduct Gallus. Befides, the Defert, the heat of the Sun, and the badness of the Water, so afflicted the Soldiers, that the greatest part of the Army miscarried. This Disease being like to none of those that were then known, lay in the Head; and, as Dio describes it, that part being dried, destroyed many out of hand; and in fuch as escaped Death, it ran through the whole Body into A grievous the Feet, and there so held them, that no naturely would go the Line with anointed themselves, the Army. ing brought along by the Romans. By the Affiftance of this Difease, the Barbarians recovered such Towns as had been taken from them, and expelled such as remained alive out of the Country. However in the Opinion of some, he did extraordinarily well, and had well fucceded, but that he was betrayed by Syllaus. But Dio tells us, that these were the first, and he thinks the last of the Romans that proceeded fo far in Arabia in an hostile manner, peircing as far as Athlula (or Athrula) a famous City.

Calling to him the Magistrates, and the chief of Scnators and Equites, he named no man his Successor, though all imagined it would have been Marcellus; but having spoken his Mind concerning some points, he delivered to Pifea Book, wherein he had made a Catalogue of the Armies, and Publick Revenues; and his Ring to Agrippa. But when nothing he could use Augustic reco-would relieve him, Antonius Muja, by cooling Bathsand Potions; restored him to Health; for which he had much Money given him, both by Augustus, and the Senate, as also the use of a Gold Ring (for he was but a Libertus or Freedman) and

Immunity was granted not only to him, but to all of his Profession for the time to come. But that it might appear that this Musa arrogated to himself what was the work of fate and fortune, it happened not long after that Marcellus falling

Sick, and ordered by him after the fame manner, died under his hands, and had a publick Funeral, with other Honours. But Cafar being recovered, brought the

that he had defigned no Successor; but the whole Assembly was against the reading of it. However, it caused great wonder in all men, that he should not named no suc- name Marcellus his Nephew, and Son-in-law, whom he fo tenderly loved, and honored, especially in the discharge of his Office of Ædilis; but that before him he thould rather prefer Agrippa. But he could not trust to the young years of Marcellus; and he had a mind either that the People should recover its liberty, or to prefer Agrippa to the Supreme Power, whom, though he knew to be extraordinarily beloved; yet he himself would not advance him. Being recovered, he found that Marcellus was displeased with Agrippa, and therefore to prevent all quarrels and contentions betwixt them, he fent away Agrippa for Syria. Yet he went not into Syria himself, but still using more Moderation, sent thither his Legates and staid at Lesbos. Thus writes Dio of his Moderation; whereas Suetonius accuseth him of Passion, and commends Augustus for bearing with him, in that being moved with a light suspicion of Rigour, and because Marcellus was preferred before him, he left all, and went to Mitylene, in the Isle of Lesbos. By this it appears that the diffatisfaction of these two Persons was mutual, and that Augustus had much ado to please them both.

43. Now he made only ten Prætors, because he had no need of more, and these to hold for several years. Then did he retire, and resigned the Consulship; for both he and others, having since the settlement of the State, held that Dignity an whole year, he would have the course altered, that many might injoy it; and therefore he went out of the City, that he might not be hindered from laying it down. This was very much commended in him, as also that he subrogated in his place L. Seftius, a Person that had always favoured the cause of Brutus, had affifted him throughout the War, still reverenced his Memory, kept his Images, and was fo bold as to commend him; but Augustus not only not hated, but honoured him for his Friendship and Fidelity. The Senate affected with these his Actions, in way of acknowledgment, decreed that he should be Tribunus Plebis for life; that as often as the Senate met, he might report matters, though he lay it down when he came into the City, or have any need to renew it; nay, More Honours that he should have greater Power in the Provinces, than the Governors themfelves. Thence came it to pass that he and his Successors, as by a certain Law, injoyed the Tribunitial, and the other Powers. For as to the Name it felf, neither Augustus, nor any other bore that of Tribunus Plebis. And Dio verily believed that the Fathers did not do this out of Flattery, but in Sincerity; for he dealt with them in all respects as free persons. So when Tiridates himself, and Ambassadors, came from Phraates for composing their Differences, he introduced them into the Senate, and the hearing of the Cause being committed to him, he would not deliver up Tiridates to Phraates; yet the Son of Phraates whom he had formerly received, he fent back, that in exchange he might have the Captives and Military Enfigns returned, which were taken in the Overthrowsof Craffus and Antony. This fame year, a certain Ædilis Plebis dying, C. Calpurnius succeeded him, who had been Ædilis Curulis; such a thing as never before had been heard of. In the Feria, there were every day two Prafects of the City, where of one had not attained to ripeness of Age. The death of Marcellus by some was imputed to Livia, who could not endure he should be preferred before her own Sons; yet the Sickliness of the year rendred it doubtful, by which a great multitude was fwept away. This our Author thinks was betokened by a Wolf found in the City, by Fire, and Tempest, and the overflowing of Tiber to such an height that the Bridge called Pons Sublicius was born down, and Rome continued Navigable for three days.

The Roman Empire.

44. The next year, had for Confuls M. Marcellus, and L. Aruntius, accompanicd with fo many diffeouraging Accidents, and so great a Plague, that the Grounds in Italy were left untilled. The Romans grieved with both Plague and Famine, imagined they proceeded from no other cause, than that they had not this year also Augustus for Conful. Therefore they required that he should be made Dictator, and kept the Senate fo long in the Court, till they decreed it; threatning essential of the fire. They repaired to Augustus; with sour and twenty Fisses, befeeching him to accept the Distantible, and to suffer himself to be made Procurator of Provisions, as sormerly Pompey had been. Though unwilling, he acceptator of provisions as formerly Pompey had been. cepted of the last Imployment, and caused for every year two Persons to be chosen, who had five years before discharged the Prætorsbip, to distribute the Corn. But he would by no means admit of the Dittatorship, and when he could no other way restrain the People, he tore his Robe, being so wise as to decline the Odium He fill refu- and Envy, when he had already both the Honour and Power that was larger than that which they offered to him. He made the fame refusal when they would needs create him perpetual Cenfor; for he would neither accept of that Honour, The last cor- faith, was predicted to them. For, their Tribunal the first day they entred their

but named two Cenfors, which were Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Munatius Plancus. And these were the last Censors of private men, which now also Dio fors of private Office, fell down, and was broken; and thenceforth were no Cenfors created like unto them. And though they bore the Office, yet did Augustus do many things belonging to it. Some Meetings he took quite away, and others he Reformed. He required the Prators to take care of the Celebration of all Games; yet fo that fointhing should be allowed them by the People. But by an Edict ordained that none should in particular bestow more upon them than others did; as also that without Command of the Senate, none should exhibit the show of Gladiaters; nor oftner than twice in one year, nor more Gladiators than one hun-

45. To the Ædiles Curules he committed the charge of Extinguishing Fires, allowing them fix hundred Slaves for that Service. And because that Equites, and many Illustrious Women danced in the Orchestra, he forbad not only that the Children of Senators, which already had been Prohibited, but their Grandchildren, and those of the Equestrian Order, should do it for the suture. In these matters he carried himself like a Legislator, and an Emperor; but in other things he fo far humbled himfelf, as even to plead for some of his Friends that were called to answer. So it happened, that a Day was assigned to one M. Primus to give an Accompt, who being Governor of Macedonia, had made War upon the Odryli: He pleading fomtimes that he did it by order from Augustus, and otherwhiles from Marcellus; Augustus, without sending for, came into Court, and being asked by the Prætor, whether he had ordered him to make War, denyed it. Hereupon did Licinius Murena, who undertook the defence of Primus, revile him, and demanded of him what he did there, and who called him thither; to which he answered, That it was the Commonwealth. This took so with those of founder Judgments, that they commended him for it, and gave him leave to affemble the Senate as often as he pleafed; but others had ill thoughts of him. and some there were who not only acquitted Primus, but conspired against Augustus. The Ringleader of them was Fannius Capio, and Murena was, whether truly or falfly, accounted Guilty, who had indeed a very intemperate Tongue, and would use it against any one, even to the uneafiness of the Hearers. These abfenting themselves were Banished, and a little after put to Death, Murena receiving no relief from Proculius his Brother, nor from Mecænas the Husband of his Sifter, though in great esteem with Augustus. However, these Conspirators were absolved by the Votes of some of the Judges, which caused him to make a Law, that none should secretly give Sentence in behalf of those Criminals that did not appear, but that all fuch should be Condemned without hearing. And he shewed that he did it for the publick good, and not thereunto incited by Passion. The Father of Capio manumitted one of those Slaves, who fled away with his Son, because he affifted him to his power when he was feized; and another for that he betrayed his Master, he caused to be led through the Town, with a Writing which expressed the cause of his Punishment, and to be nailed to a Cross. This Augustus did not take in any evil part.

46. At this fame time he restored to the People Cyprus, and Gallia Narbonensis, as not needing the Protection of his Arms, and thenceforth Proconfuls began to be sent into those Provinces. Now also did he Dedicate a Temple to Jupiter the Thunderer; and the Cantabri and Aftures about this time Rebelled, the latter being provoked by the Infolence and Cruelty of Carifius, and the former by their Example. They were quickly reduced, the greatest part of the Cantabri killing themielves, as not enduring to outlive their Liberty. At the same time the Æthio-pians that inhabited about Ægypt, under Conduct of their Queen Candace, wasted all Regions as far as the City Elephantina, where when they heard that C. Petronius the Governor of Ægypt was coming against them, they indeavoured to make Petronius peir a Retreat, but were found out and Defeated by him; and upon this occasion he ceth into & was drawn into their Country. There did he order his Affairs very well, taking, amongst others, the Royal City Tanape, which having Demolished, and a Garrifon lett in another place, he retreated with the greatest part of his Army; being not able to proceed for the heat and fand, nor having convenience there to flay with all his Forces: yet hearing that the Æthiopians, whom he had left in Garrifon, were Attacqued, he returned and relieved them, and constrained Candace to receive terms of an Accomodation. While these things passed, Augustus went into Sicily, to fettle Affairs there; and thence to pass into all Provinces, as far as Syria, and do the like.

Agrippa is made Gover-

47. He being absent, the People of Rome fell into Tumult, upon Creation of The People of the new Confuls, and thereby showed that the Commonwealth could not continue under Popular Government. One place of the Confulship was referved for Augustus, and M. Lulius bore alone the title at the beginning of the year. When he had declared his refusal, Q. Lepidus, and L. Silanus became Candidates, and used such means to compass their Ends, that wife men defired that the Emperor would return to Rome. Yet did he not return, but fending for the Candidates. rebuked them for their Extravagant feeking of Voices, and Commanded them both to be absent from the Election. But this did little good, it procured not more orderly or quiet proceedings, so that very difficultly, at last was Lepidus created Conful. Hereat Augustus was much disturbed, and it not being possible that he should always be at the City, he found a Necessity of making a Governor to prevent these Disorders. Agrippa he thought the fittest man, and to gain him more awe and Authority, he caused him to Divorce his Wise, though she was his Sifter's Daughter, and to Marry Julia, and he sent him presently thither to consummate the Marriage, and take the Government. Amongst other Arguments which fuggested to him this course, the saying of Mecanas, moved him, who being confulted about this Affair, gave this Answer, That he had already made Agrippa so great, that there was necessity he should be his Son in Law, or be taken away by Death. Agripps composed the Disorders in the City, and banished out of it the Ægyptian Rites and Ceremonies, which again had crept into it, forbidding by an Edict, that they should be celebrated within half a Mile. But he could not appeale the Tumult about making a Præfett of the place for the Festivals; and so the year pass'd over without that Officer.

48. Augustus having settled Matters in Sicily, where he made Syracuse and other Cities, Roman Colonies, paffed over into Greece. There he bestowed Citheræ on the Lacedæmonians, and honoured them with his Company, because they had harboured Livia with her Husband and Son when they fled out of Italy. Some reported, that he took Ægina and Eretria from the Atlenians, because they had favoured the Cause of Antony, and Commanded them to admit of none to be Citizens for Money. From Greece he failed to Samus, and there wintered. In Spring, when M. Apuleius and P. Silius were Consuls, he passed over into Asia, and fetled Matters in Bithynia, and other Provinces he passed through, with no less care, than if they had belonged to himself, and not to the People. Remarkable it is, that he condemned those of Cyzicus to flavery, because they had Whipped, and put to Death some Roman Citizens, and in Syria he inflicted the His Ads while same Punishment upon the Tyrians, and Sidonians for their Faction. In the mean time, Phraates having performed nothing of what he was obliged to by Agreement, now fearing that Augustus would be upon him, sent to him the Military Enfigns, and all Captives, some few excepted, who out of shame killed themselves, or lurked about in Parthia, and he received them with the same apprehensions, as if he had overthrown the Parthians in War, Having recovered these things without bloodshed, upon that account he both caused Sacrifices to be offered, and Commanded that a Temple should be decreed in the Capitol to Mars the Avenger (in imitation of that of Jupiter Feretrius) in which, Military Enfigns might be hung up. This he afterward finished, and rode on Horseback in way of Triumph into the City, and was honoured with a Triumphal Arch; Being constituted Curator of the ways about Rome, he caused to be made the Milliarium Aureum, and appointed Persons of Prætorian Rank, Overseers of the ways, who were attended with two Littors apiece. At the same time Julia brought Agrippa a Son named Caius, on whose Birth-day a perpetual Sacrifice was decreed to be made with fome other things: and privately the Ædiles added Games on Horseback, and Hunting to the Birth day Solemnities of Augustus. 49. While these things were doing at Rome, he setled the Affairs of the Provinces according to the Prescript of the Roman Laws. He permitted the Confe He thinks the derates to use their own Customs, neither determined he to take any thing from Empire large them, or get more by War, being content with what already was gotten, and accordingly he wrote to the Senate, and at that time he undertook no War at all. Yet fome Alterations as to Governors he made in fome Countries, and the People of Armenia the Greater accusing Artabazes, and desiring to have his Brother Tigranes then at Rome; he fent Tiberius to drive away the former, and bring the latter to be King amongst them. Before Tiberius arrived, Artabazes was killed by Performances, the Armenians, and then did he perform nothing answerable to the preparation that had been made; yet he boafted of this matter, as having fomthing notably performed, especially Sacrifices being upon this account decreed and now began he to have Imaginations in his Head that he should be Emperor, because coming to Philippi noises were heard in that place where the Battel had been fought, as out of a Camp, and Fire was feen to break out from an Altar built formerly by Antony, where he was incamped. Augustus being returned into Samus, gave liberty to the Inhabitants, as a reward of his Entertainment, and dispatched many other Affairs. Many Ambassadors came to him; and now the Indians confirmed by a League, that Peace which formerly they had defired. Ambaffadors to sugarfus out Amongst other Presents, Tigers were sent by them; which sort of Beast, in the Opinion of Dio, was then first feen, both by Greeks and Romans. There was also a Man without Arms, who did all feats with his Feet and Toes, as if they had been Hands and Fingers. One of the Messengers, Zarmar by name, either weary of his life, or out of vain glory, mounted voluntarily the Funeral Pile, and there-

50. For the following year, C. Sentius was Conful, and Augustus once more refused the referved Place. Thereupon again happened Tumults, and the flaughter of feveral Persons at Rome, insomuch that the Senate gave Sentius charge of the City. He being not willing to undertake it, they sent Messengers to Augustus with two Litters, who seeing that there would be no end of these mischiefs, if he observed former Rules, defigned Conful Q. Lucretius, one of the Messengers, who had been a proscribed Person, and then went for Rome: At his return, various things were voted by the Senate to honour him, of which he accepted nothing, faving that he permitted an Altar to be Erected to Fortuna Redux, and the Day of his Return to be put amongst the Festivals, and called Augustalia. The Magistrates and People however being resolute to go out and receive him, he Entered by Night. Norwithstanding, they decreed that he should be Magister Morum for Five years, and for that term have the Dignity of Cenfor, but that of Conful for his life; that twelve Fasces should ever be born before him, and that he should sit in a Curule chair betwixt the Confuls. They earneftly defired him to make Laws, and amend all things as he should think convenient, offering to swear to obey them. And this he did, but refused their Oath, knowing, that what was pleasing to them, they would do without fwearing, but nothing elfe, though obliged by never fo many Oaths. Agrippa, now from the Government of the City, went into Gall. Performances where the Invafion of the Germans and other things caused a Disturbance; which having quieted, he passed over into Spain, where was great need of his presence. For, the Cantabri that there had been taken in War and fold for Slaves, cut the Throats of their Masters, and getting together, fortified several Places, and set upon the Roman Garrisons. Against them Agrippa marched, but e're he attaqued them, had a Contention with his own Army, wherein some Veteran Souldier's being haraffed with Wars, and standing in fear of that Martial Nation, refused to obey him. Attempting it by feveral means, he brought them again to obedience; which having done, he had a fharp Contest with Men who had served the Romans, and learnt their Skill, and despaired of Pardon if they came once more into their power. He suffered great Inconveniences; but at length having lost many of his Soldiers, and fixed Ignominy upon many others of them for their ill demeanour, particularly forbidding the whole Legion called Augusta, to use that Name, he destroyed almost all the Cantabri that were of Military Age; the rest he disarmed, and brought them down from the Mountainous places into the Champian. Yet of these things he neither gave account to the Senate; nor accepted of the Triumph decreed him by Augustus, governing himself by the wonted moderation of his Mind. Augustus took it in very good part, as also his bringing the Water formerly called Virginalis, into the City at his own proper Charge, to which he gave the name of Augusta. On a time when there was icarcity of Wine, and the People thereof complained, the Emperor faid that Agrippa had fufficiently provided that they should not die of Thirst.

His Modera-

51. So modeftly did Agrippa behave himfelf, when in the mean time certain other Persons were of a quite contrary behaviour. For some there were who were fo confident as to defire a Triumph, though their Atchievements were no greater than the cutting off of some Robbers abroad, or suppressing some Seditions in the City, and they obtained what they fued for, and therein prided themselves; fo facile was Augustus herein at the beginning of his Administration, as also in granting the honour of publick Sepulchre. But as for Agrippa, in a manner he promoted him to the Empire. For perceiving the Common-wealth in fuch a condition as to require great Care and Vigilancy, and fearing Defigns against his own Person, as there was some reason he should, and against which, as he said himself, there was little defence in that Breast-plate he wore when he went into the Senate; and frequently at other times, he prorogued his own Authority for five years more, his Tenth now drawing to a Conclusion, in the Consulship Angular proof the two Lenuli, Publius and Gneus. Moreover, he conferred on Agrippa rogues his own own appropriate that of a Tribune for five Authority and power almost equal to his own, in other respects, and that of a Tribune for five that of Agrip- years. For fo many years he faid were fufficient for them; and yet long after he took more, that his Imperial Authority might Continue the other ten. These things done, he began a scrutiny into the Senate, and to avoid the Odium of chufing all the Members thereof himself, he selected certain Persons who should name five apiece, out of which number he elected one; and into the Places of fuch as were abroad, he caused others to succeed by lot. But finding some deceit to be used in this way of Sortion, he would no further use that course, but made choice of the rest himself, to the number of Six hundred. At first he had determined to have but Three hundred Senators according to the antient Cufrom, being glad to find fo many Persons that deserved that Dignity: but all of that Rank were displeased at it; for by this means it would come to pass, that more would be removed than should continue in the Senate, and thereupon every his own Son, and others he thought far more unworthy, were put in, that in open Senate he tore his Clothes, made himself naked, and reckoning up the Services he He takes pains had performed, showed the Skars of the Wounds he had received. One Articuin modelling leius Petus being chosen in, and his Father put out, made it his request that he might furrender his Place to him. Augustus moved with these and other Circumstances, made another Scrutiny; but neither did this remove Complaints, but feveral found themselves still aggrieved and unjustly dealt with: To them then he gave this Promife, That amongst Senators they should fit at Feasts, and behold the Spettacula in the fame Habit; and have liberty to fue for Places of Magistracy; and most of them were afterward taken into the Senate again, only a lew remained in a middle flate and condition betwixt the Senate and the People. After this he punished certain Persons for Conspiring against himself and Agrippa. He hated Lepidus for other reasons as well as for that his Son had conspired against his life, and had received punishment for it. Yet would he not put him to death, but put feveral difgraces upon him. He caused him to come out of the Country into the City and be present at Assemblies, to expose him as a laughing flock to the People, confidering what Power he had formerly enjoyed; and he appointed him the lowest place amongst all the Confulares. Antistius Labeo, to whom Augustus had given power of Chusing the Senate, having taken him into that Order, he charged him with Perjury for so doing, and threatned to punish him. But Labeo answered, That he thought he had done no unsitting thing to retain him in the Senate, whom he suffered still to injoy the Dignity of Pontifiex Maximus: At which answer the Emperor remitted his Choler, having both privately and publickly made a show of desiring that Place, and yet he thought it was not to be invaded in the life-time of Lepidus. So feafonable was the Reply of Labeo, as also was his Answer another time in the Senate, when it was moved as a fitting thing that Each of them should attend Augustus in his turn to protect his Person. Not daring to contradict it, nor deigning to approve it, he faid He was fleepy and fnored, and was not fit to watch at his Chamber. 53. About this time he enacted feveral things in order to a Reformation of

Sexes as would not marry, and proposed greater Encouragements for Procreation of legitimate Children. And because the Males of the Patrician Rank excccdcd far in number the Females of that Order, he gave leave to any, provided they were not Senators, to marty Libertæ or Freed Women, and made fuch conjunctions legal. But great Complaint was now made to him of the Immodest Manners both of Young Men and Women, as the greatest hindrance of Matrimony; and they Earnestly defired that he would also consider how to redress this dilorder, thereby twitting tacitely himself for having to do with many Women. At first he answered, That he had taken care for things most necessary and that other matters could not be so easily provided for; and some way or other he was brought to fay, That they ought to Command their Wives, and use such Admonitions as he did to his Livia. Then were the Senators much more importunate, and defired to know what Admonitions they were. To whom replying very unwillingly, he inflanced in some particulars concerning Clothes and other Ornaments of Women, about going to publick Meetings, and the Modesty of himfelf and his Wife, little caring how ill his Actions fuited with his Words. It was become a practice for Perfons to betroth to themselves such as were but Children, and after that to take the profits of their Estates though no Marriage followed thereupon. He Commanded, That No Sponfalia or Contracts should be good, which were not Confummated by a Marriage within Two years; that is, That fuch as would receive the Profits of a Virgin's Effate, should betroth her at Ten years of Age at least, that of Twelve being the legitimate time of Marriage for Women, as then judged of Maturity. He further Ordained, That for Celebration of Games, but one Præfelt of the City should be made. And because now the Sibylline Books were worn and decayed with Age, he imployed the Pontifices in Copying them out with their own Hands, that no others might have the opportunity of reading them. To all that were worth ten Myriads, and to whom it was lawful to stand for Offices, he gave liberty so to do. That was the first value he made of the Estates of Senators, which afterwards he inlarged to Five and twenty Myriads; and to some Persons that lived well and wanted these sums, he gave money to make them up. And he permitted Prators to take the treble of what was allowed them for Games out of the Treasury. This procured that although there were not some wanting who were displeased at the Rigor of his Laws; yet all In-Yet he pleaf-dignation ceased, because he had done this, and recalled Pylades a Stage-Player, eth generally, who had been driven away by the Factions in the City. This Pylades being chidden by Augustus, for brawling and contending with Bathyllus, of the same Profession, and one that was familiar with Mecænas, is said to have given him. this wife Answer, It conduceth to thine Interest, O Caesar, that the People be diverted by being intent upon us.

54. In the following year, being the DCCXXXVII of the City, C. Furnius, and C. Silanus were Confuls, and a Son was born to Agrippa, and called Lucius, whom together with his Brother Caius, Augustus adopted before they came to Man's estate, that he might be more safe from Conspiracies. Such as triumphed, he commanded that in memory of what they had done, they should cause some work to be made of the spoils taken in War. He celebrated now the Secular Games the fifth time. He commanded that Orators should receive no Reward for Pleading Causes, under pain of forfeiting fourfold of what they received. Such Judges as were yearly choicn by lot, he Prohibited in the year of their Admimistration to enter the Houses of those that had Causes depending before them. And because Senators were negligent in coming to the Senate, on such as were guilty of this neglect, without any reasonable cause, he imposed a greater Mulct than formerly had been usual. Having ordained these things, and finding his presence in the City troublesom both to himself and others, while he sometimes executed and fortimes neglected his own Laws, he refolved, as Solon formerly had done to Travel, and the next year when L. Domitius, and P. Scipio,

Wars. Some there were who fulfected that he went away, that without noife he might enjoy the Company of Terentia, the Wife of Mecanas, which Woman he so loved, that on a time he made her contend with Livia for handsomness. Before his departure, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which had been reedified, having adorned it with Seventy fix Pillars, fo many years as he lived, to that some believed he wittingly designed the number: The Government of Rome and Italy, he committed to Taurus; for he had fent Agrippa into Syria, and Mecanas now was not so acceptable to him because of his Wife. 55. About the fame time Commotions were raifed by fome Nations inhabiting the Alps, by the Pannonians, and those of Noricum, all which were without much trouble composed, as others in Dalmatia, and Macedonia, and Spain. In Thrace M. Lollius giving affiftance to Rhymetalces, the Uncle and Tutor of the Sons of Several Wars Cotys, overcame the Bess, and after him C. Lucius upon the same account, making War against the Sauromatie, overthrew them, and drove them beyond Ister. But that War was of greatest Consequence, which drew Augustus from the City against the Germans; for the Sicambri, Ufipetæ, and Tenchteri having first nailed to Crosses fome Roman Citizens, then wasted Gall, circumvented a Party of Horse sent against them, and overthrew Lollius the Governor, upon whom they were drawn by those that fled. Yet upon report of Lollius his further Preparations, and of the coming of Augustus, they returned home, and gave Hostages for their peaceable demeanor. Yet though he had no War to raife, did he fpend the remaining of this year and the following, wherein M. Drusus Libo, and L. Calpurnius Piso were Confuls, in fetling the Affairs of these Countries. For besides the stirs raised by the Germans, great complaints were made against the Administration of Licinnius, who being a Gall by Original, and taken by the Romans, had become the Slave of Julius Cafar, and being manumitted by him, been preferred by Augustus, to the oversight of that Country. He managed the Roman Dignity with Barbarick Avarice, and confounded all things, to make them subservient to his humour. To that height of Impudence he arrived, that the Galls being to make Payments every Month, he would needs reckon fourteen Months to the year, affirming, that December according to its name, was really the tenth, and that there were two that followed called Augusti, viz. an eleventh and twelfth, wherein Money must also be collected by the Galls. Augustus knew not how to carry himself, but fometimes accused, and otherwhiles excused him, being ashamed he had made choice of fuch a Governor. But Licinnius by a Trick he used, came off, and deluded the Galls. Perceiving Augustus to be incensed against him, and that he should be punished for his Villanies, he brought him to his House, and there showing him great Treasure, called him Lord, and told him, That upon design he had gathered it for the use of him, and the Romans, lest the Galls surnished with it, should have revolted; and having kept it for him, he now delivered it into his hands. 56. At the same time Drusus and Tiberius, with good Success managed several

Wars against such as Rebelled against the Empire; These were the Rheeti, who inhabiting the Country betwixt Noricum and Gall, at the Tridentine Alps, both intested the adjacent Territories of Gall, made Incursions into Italy, and offered violence to fuch Romans as passed through their Coasts. Nay, such was their Custom, that they put to Death all Males they took for Captives, not only those they found in view, but fuch as were in their Mothers Bellies, whom they pretended they could discover by a certain Art they had of Divination. Drusus with no great difficulty, defeated them near Trent, and obtained Pratorian honours; but for all that they were fo bold as to invade Gall, and thither Tiberius was fent against them. Now both Brothers set on them at once, and broke into Rhatia, partly by the indeavours of their Legates, and their own Presence; Tiberius passing the Lake by Boats, destroyed such Forces as they had abroad, constrained them to submit, and because the Nation was populous, they carried away the greatest part thereof that was fit for War, and left the rest to Till the Land. Now it will not be amis to follow the Example of Dio, and from him to relate that in this year died Vedius Pollio, a man famous for nothing performed, being a Libertinus by Original, and of the Equestrian Order, but remarkable for his Wealth, and his Cruelty. He kept that fort of Fish called Mullets in a Pond, and when his Slaves offended him, fuch as he Condemned to Death, he was wont to cast into the Pond to fat these Fishes, being learnt to feed upon that fort of tood. On a time he invited Augustus to a Feast, and it happened that one of his Slaves who waited at the Side board, brake a Crystal Glass, for which Ofience he Condemned him to the Mullets; not at all moved by the prefence of him he entertained. The Boy cast himself at the Feet of Augustus, who interceded for him; and when Vedius would not yeild, defired that he might fee all his other Glasses which were of so great a value, which when brought, he caused them all to be broken. He left to Augustus a good part of his Estate, particularly a Village called Panfilypas, betwixt Naples and Puteoli. He required that some Publick Work might be erected for the use of the People, and upon this pretence, Augustus caused his House to be pulled down, with design indeed, that no Monument of him might be left in the City. There he built a Porticus, but upon it fet not the Name of Vedius, but of Livia; which was done afterward. Now did Augustus send many Colonies into Gall and Spain; restored the Inhabitants of Cyzicus to Liberty; was bountiful to them of Paphus, who had been forely distressed by an Earthquake, and permitted them to call their City by the Name of Augusta. This indeed was ordinarily performed by Augustus, and the Senate; and the Senate itself was wont in way of Honours, to give Sirnames to Cities; though afterwards they themselves made choice of what, and as many, as they pleased.

tree condition, were reduced into Slavery, and Matters were fetled in the Cim-The Example merian Bofphorus, which tended to Defection. This was effected by the Conduct of Agrippa fol- of Agrippa, in whose Name a Supplication was decreed; but though a Triumph lowed. was decreed him, he refused the Honour; neither at the beginning did he write any thing of it to the Senate. And in the Opinion of Dio, this Example of his was afterward taken, and observed as a Law, for, those that came after did not by Letters certifie the Senate of what was done, neither did they Triumph, as formerly; no Triumph being indeed decreed to them, being only graced with Triumphal Honours. As for Augustus, he had by this time dispatched the Affairs of Gall, Germany, and Spain. Much Money he had expended, and much he had received: Liberty and Freedom of the City from some he took, and to others gave Anguilus Re- it; and having left Drusus in Germany, he returned to Rome, when Tiberius and Quintilius Varus were Consuls. The Senate having met, had ordered an Altar to be Confecrated in the Court it felf for his return, and Voted that fuch as became Supplicants to him, when he was within the Pomærium, should obtain Impunity. Neither of these Honours would he receive, neither would he permit the People to comeout and meet him, but entred the City by Night, as he was wont to do most commonly, that he might not be troublesom. The day after his Return, he saluted the People in the Palace; ascending the Capitol, he took the Laurel from about the Fasces, and laid it at the Knees of Jupiter; and on the same Day, he gave to the People gratis the use of Baths, and Barbers. After this , he caused the Senate to be Assembled, but having got a Cold, he spake nothing, but gave a Paper to the Quaftor to be read, wherein was related what he had performed; the Term of the Militia was determined (or how many years Soldiers were to ferve before difiniffion) and what Moneys they should receive, when Emeriti for the Grounds they so earnestly defired. This he did to keep them from Mutining. The Pratorian Colorts were to serve Twelve years; the rest Sixteen; and more Pay was received by the former, than by the latter. At present by this course he took, the Soldiers were neither fully contented, nor yet moved by any Indignation, as not despairing of their Fortunes.

58. We have feen how careful Augustus was for Modelling and Reforming the Senate, but his indeavours therein did not answer Expectation. He thought he did well to raise the value of a Senator, and this had such operation, that it so far kept out meanand infolvent Persons, that few could now be found that were able, at least willing, to undertake the Imployment; and many fwore themselves off from it. There was now a want of Persons to discharge the Offices of Judicature, and other Duties; and therefore the Fathers in his Absence made a Senatusconsultum, that twenty Persons should be chosen out of the Body of the Equites, and not to be thereupon made Senators, except some Office afterwards discharged New Officers should make them capable of that Dignity. That these twenty should succeed into the room of the former twenty fix; of them three should judg in Capital Matters; other three look to the Coining of Money; four should Oversee the Ways of the City; and ten more be imployed in fuch Judicial Proceedings as formerly were devolved by lot upon the Centumviri; as for those who took care of the Highways without the City, and four that were fent into Campania, they were now abrogated. Besides this Senatusconsultum, they decreed that because none would lightly sue for the Tribuneship of the People, some should be chosen by lot out of them that had been Quaftors, and had not yet attained forty years of Age. Augustus now surveyed the whole Senatorian Order, and omitting fuch as had passed their five and thirtieth year, compelled all the rest that had Estates of value to receive the Dignity, if they were not maimed in their Bodies: which he himfelf viewed. 59. For the value of Estates, he took the Oaths of the Parties; as also of such as bore Testimony on their behalf, and required an account both of their Poverty, and of their Lives. As for private Matters, he rebuked Tiberius for placing Caius in a Seat next to himself, at the Votive Games he made for his safe Return, and chid the People for applauding him for fo doing. Lepidus being now dead, he took the Office of Pontifex Maximus, and upon occasion hereof, when the Postifix Maxi- Senate was about to decree certain things in honour of him, he professed he would receive none of them, and when they were importunate, he rose and went out of the Court. Neither were their Decrees approved, neither did he receive a Publick Dwelling; but because it was requisite that the Habitation of the Pontifex Maximus should be publick, he Commanded part of his own House to be so accounted; and gave the House of the Rex Sacrorum to the Vestal Virgins, it being near their Dwellings. One Cornelius Sesentius being blamed for the evil Conversation of his Wife, said in open Senate, that he had Married her, Augustus both knowing and advising him to it. Hereat he was moved with very great Passion, but without any more to do, hasted out of the Court, and fhortly after again returned; and this he told his Friends he did it, left if he had staid he should have been provoked to some act that might have been inconvenient and fevere.

60. Agrippa was returned out of Syria, and honoured with a Continuation of Tribunitial Power for other five years. Thus rewarded he fent him into Pannonia, where now a War grew hot, with greater Power than any other employed out of Italy. He undertook the Expedition when Winter now came on, wherein were Consuls M. Valerius Messala Barbatus, and P. Sulpicius Quirinius, and so affrighted the Pannonians with the very noise of his March, that they ceased to rebel. Hereby prevented as to Action he returned, and in his way fell fick in Campania. Augustus as soon as he heard it, made what haste he could to come to him, but found him dead. He brought his Body into the City, and placing it in the Forum, commended him by a Funeral Oration, a Curtain being drawn betwixt him and the Beire: What the meaning of this should be, our Author cannot tell us. Some thought it was, because Augustus was Pontifex Maximus; and others, other fort to have erred therein; for neither was the Pontifex Maximus forbidden to look upon dead Bodies, nor the Cenfor any time, but when he made a Lustrum, or concluded his Office: then indeed if he beheld the Body of a dead-man before the Solemnities of the Lustrum were performed, all he had formerly done were rescinded. Then did Augustus carry him out into the place whither he himself was afterward conveyed, and buried him in his own Sepulchre; although Agrippa had a Monument of his own granted him in the Campus Martius. But fuch was the End of this Person, the best Man without Controversie of his Age in the Opi-His Commen-nion of Dio; the Friend of Augustus, and that to the great advantage both of Emperor and Empire. As he used his utmost Indeavour to serve him; so the Honours and Advantages he received as Rewards, he imployed in well deserving of other men. Hereby it came to pass, that he was neither troublesome to Augultus, nor obnoxious to the Envy of others; fo Confirming his Authority and Domination, as if he feemed chiefly to defire that form of Government; and yet fo obliging the People that he was esteemed as most Popular of all others. At his Death he bequeathed them his Gardens and a Bath, which was called by his Name, giving certain Grounds to Augustus for this use. And he not only gave to the People these Grounds, but distributed to them Money man by man, as if Agrippa had left it to them. Indeed by his death a great Estate came to Augustus, and amongst other things the Chersonesus at the Hellespont, our Author wondering how Agrippa came by it. However, Augustus could not forget him of a long time, but honoured him amongst the People, and caused his Son born after his death, after him to be called by the name of Agrippa. This Name, Pliny faith, was first given to them that were born with the Feet forward, as one should say, Born hardly, or with much ado. And in this manner (he writes) as they fay, M. Agrippa came forth of his Mother's Womb, the only Man, almost, known to have brought any good Fortune with him of all that were after that fort born. Yet he was much pained with the Gout, and paffed all his Youth and many a day after in Bloody Wars, and in danger of a thousand deaths. He was unfortunate in his Children, and especially in his two Daughters, the Agrippinæ, who brought forth two Sons pernicious to the whole Earth, namely, C. Caligula, and Domitius Nero, Emperors. He died in the One and fiftieth year of his Age, tormented with the Adulterie of his Wife, and oppreffed with the Intolerable Servitude, in which he lived under her Father.

61. Augustus mourned much for the death of Agrippa, yet would he not suffer any thing inftituted by the Antients to be omitted; and though none of the Nobility would be present at Games, Yet he himself solemnized those of the Gladiators, which were also often celebrated in his Absence. Being now made the Corrector of Manners for other five years, (for this Office he also took, as the Imperial Power it felf, to a limited time) he commanded that Senators should when they came to the Court, or to his presence, burn Incense; both that they might carry themselves religiously, and come together with less trouble, such a Ceremony, as a Token of their Meetings, being used. The Province of Asia standing now in need of help, being much diffressed with Earthquakes, he paid the Annual Tribute due from it, out of his own money, and affigned it a Prefident, not chosen by Suf. frages, but by Lot, for two years. It happened that Apuleius and Mecœnas being blamed in a Court of Judicature, in a Case of Adultery, not that they were guilty of it themselves, but because they undertook the Desence of an accused Person, he came into the Court, and fitting down on the Bench, only gave warning to the Accuser, That he should not traduce his Kindred, and his Friends, and then Other Honours arose and departed. For these and Other things they gathered Money amongst themselves and honoured him with Statues, and permitted what never formerly had been lawful to any, That upon his Birth-day unmarried persons, of both Sexes, might amongst the rest come to see, and be present at the Feast- Now Agrippa was dead, whom Augustus had loved for his Virtue, not any Relation he had to him, and it was necessary he should have some one to affift him in the Government, Superior to all others in Power and Dignity, the better to avoid Conspiracies: He was forced to make choice of Tiberius, his own Grandsons not being yet grown up. He caufed him to quit his Wife, being the Daughter He Marries his of Agrippa, by a former Marriage, though the had a Child living by him, and He Marries his Daughter Ju- another in her Belly, and to Marry Julia; which done, he fent him against the lia to Tiberias. Pannonians, who after the death of Agrippa, delivered of their fear, returned to their wonted Rebellious humour. He made use of the Scordisci their Neighbors, who observed thesame way of Fighting, and after much mischief done both to Country and Inhabitant, fubdued them, took away their Arms, and led away the younger fort into other Regions. For these Performances, the Senate decreed him a Triumph, but Casar would not suffer him to make use of the Decree, but in room thereof conferred on him Triumphal Honours.

Chap. I.

The Success of 62. The same thing that befell him, happened to his Brother Drusus. The the two Bro- Sicambri, and their Affociates, incouraging themselves upon the Absence of Augustus, and for that the Galls bore the yoak of Servitude very unwillingly, had begun another War. Drusus under pretence of a Festival celebrated at Lugdunum, at the Altar of Augustus, secured the chiefest of the Galls, and thereby prevented the great mischief that would have followed upon their Conjunction with the rest. Then being intent upon the Germans, when they should pass the Rhine, he repulsed them, and invaded the Territories of the There, near the Island of the Batavi, as also the Country of the Sicambri, and wasted them to a great extent. After this, passing down the Rhine into the Ocean, he subdued the Frisi, and by a Lake passed the Borders of the Chauci. Here he was in Danger, by reason that upon fall of the Tide, his Vessels were left upon dry ground, but by the Industry of the Frisi , who supplied him with foot, he escaped, and Winter approaching came to Rome, where he was made Prator of the City, though he had already obtained Pratorian Honours, in the Confulfhip of Q. Elius Tubero, and Paulus Fabius Maximus. In the beginning of Spring he returned, passed the Rhine, subdued the Uspeta, and thence by a Bridge crossing the River Lupia, invaded the Sicambri; and through their Country peirced into that of the Cherusci, and as far as the River Visurgis, which he might better do; because the Sicambri had with all their force at this time fallen upon the Chatti, who of all their Neighbors had alone denied them aid. And he had also passed the Visurgis, but that want of Provisions, the approach of Winter, and a swarm of Bees seen in in the Camp, deterred him. Returning into the Country of his Friends, he was near destruction by the Circumvention of his Enemies, who having done him much Damage, thut up him and his whole Army in a strait and hollow place; and he was only delivered by their temerity, who contemning the Romans as already vanquished, rushed upon them without any care or orders, and gave them advantage to Charge, and put them to Flight. After this they durft not approach, and Drujus then contemning them, built a Castle to restrain them at the confluence of Lupia, and Alifo; and another in the Country of the Chatti upon the Rhine. For these Atchievements it was decreed that he should have Triumphal Honours, enter the City on Horse-back, and his Pratorship ended, obtain Proconfular Power. He had been faluted by his Soldiers, as also his Brother Tiberius, with the title of Imperator, but it was not given them by Augustus. However the Games which Drusus exhibited as Prator, were discharged with great Expence, and the Birth day of Augustus was celebrated in the Cirque, and other places of the City with Huntings; for which, though there was no Decree, yet was it yearly done by the Prator. But those Solemnities called Augustalia were then first celebrated by virtue of a Senatusconsultum, and continued till the time of Dio. 63. But as if there had been an Emulation betwixt the two Brothers, who should do best, Tiberius now brought under, and forced to submit the Dalmatians and Pannonians, who encouraged at his Absence, had again Rebelled, invading them both together, and removing the War as occasion offered. For this the same Honours were decreed to him as to Drusus, and thenceforth Dalmatia, as requiring careful Watch, and the Defence of Arms, both in respect of it self, and the Neighbouring Pannania, was committed to the charge of Augustus. Much about the same time Vologæsus a Thracian, of the Nation of the Bessi, the Priest of Bacchus, who was worthipped by them, by a vain shew of Religion, associated many to himself, by their help raised a Rebellion, and killed Rhasciporis, the Son of Cotys. Still using a Pretext of his Religion, without Battle, he deprived Rhymetalces of his Army, pursued him, brake into the Cherronesus, and there did much The Success of mischief; about the time that the Sialeta also insested Macedonia. L. Piso, who now governed Pamphilia, was commanded to make head against them, who first received los from the Best, but ingaging with them again, obtained so confiderable a Victory, that wasting the Country far and wide, most of all these Nations submitted, and others that stood out by force of Arms, he constrained to undergo the yoak. For these things performed, a Supplication was decreed, and that he should have Triumphal Honours. While Matters thus succeed in the East, Augustus imployed himself in making an Inventory of his whole Estate, as if he had been a private man. Again, he surveyed the Senate, and perceiving that the Members thereof were flow to meet, he ordained that for the future a Senatusconsultum might be made, by fewer than Four hundred; which Number formerly was required to be prefent. 6.4. Now again both Senate and People contributed Money for making of Statues; but none he would permit to be erected, but only to Publick Safety, Concord, and Peace. Yet still would they go about it upon all occasions, and at length on the First of January, they repaired to Augustus himself, and every one gave him more or less, which he restored to them with advantage; not only to Patricians, but others also. Here Dion Cassius tells an odd Story; How he had Diss Caffins Patricians, but others and fine Oracle or Dream, every year on a certain Day, his old Story heard that being moved by fome Oracle or Dream, every year on a certain Day, he received some Silver by way of Begging from such as he met with; he adds, That whether we will believe it or no, fo it was reported. This same year, to be fure, he Married Julia his Daughter to Tiberius, and his Sister Ottavia being dead, he caused her Body to be laid publickly in State, in the Sacrary of Julius, where he made a Funeral Oration, a Curtain being drawn, as formerly. Drufus publickly changed his Senatorian Robe for a Mourning Gown, and then her Sons in Law carried ner away; yet would not Augustus admit all things that were decreed in her Honour. Now first after Merula, the Flamen Dialis, or Priest of Jupiter was ordained. And for as much as the Tribuni Plebs, and Ædiles, who were to look to the keeping of the Senatusconsulta, were wont to trust their Apparitors, and thence much Error and Confusion happened, they were delivered into the Custody of the Quastors. It was also decreed, that the Temple of Janus should now be thut; but this was hindred by the Daci, who when Ifter was frozen, passed over the Ice, and made Depredations in Pannonia; besides this, the Dalmatians not enduring the Exaction of Tribute, cast off the yoak. These Motions were quieted by Tiberius, who was gone with Augustus into Gall. And the Germans, and amongst those the Chatti, who not content with the Territories affigned them by the Romans, had joyned themselves with the Sicambri, Drusus either infefted or reduced to Obedience. Both the Brothers now returned with Augustus, who had spent most of his time in Gallia Lugdunensis, to Rome; these things being performed in the Consulship of Julius, and Fabius Maximus. 65. In the following year, wherein Drusus and T. Quintius Crispinus were Con- Die lib. 55. fuls, Drusus having invaded the Territories of the Chatti, wasted them as he paffed; and having defeated them in Battel, proceeded into the Country of the Suevi, and thence turning to the Cherusci, crossed Visurgis, and wasted all as far as the River Albis, which falling from the Vandalick Mountains, flows in a great Stream into the Northern Ocean. Having in vain attempted to pass this River, he erected Trophies, and retreated; For, a Woman (our Historian tells us) of greater Dimensions than Humane, met him in the way, and calling him by Name, demanded of him, Whither his boundless Ambition would carry him; She told him, the Fates did not permit that he should see all Quarters; and bade him be gone; for the Period both of his Life and Actions approached. The death of Drusus he will have usher'd in by this and other Prodigies, which according to his Custom, he particularly relates; for he died in his Return, before he reached the Rhine. Livy, who extended his History just so far, wrote that he died of a full from his Horse. It seems he lay Sick so long, that Augustus, who was at no great distance from him, as Dio writes, sent with all speed for his Brother Tiberius, who at his coming found him alive, though drawing on: He conveyed his Body to Rome, Centurions and Tribunes carrying it at the beginning, and afterwards the chiefest of the Cities. It being placed in the Forum, there he was commended by Tiberius in a Funeral Oration, and again by Augustus in the Flaminian Cirque; because it was not lawful for such as had led forth Armies to enter the Pomærium of the City, before they had used such Ceremonies as were required by virtue of the ancient Custom. He was by the most considerable Equites, and others of Senatorian Rank, carried into the Campus Martius, where being Burnt, the Ashes were laid up in the Sepulchre of Augustus. The Sirname of Germanicus was given to him and his Sons, befides the Honours of Statues and Triumphal Arches, and of a Monument upon the River Rhine. 66. Tiberius also for having in the life-time of Drusus suppressed the Dalmatians and Pannonians, who had made some small offers to stir, entred the City on Horfe-back,

Horse-back, in a fort of Triumph, and gave a Collation to the People, in the Capitol and other places, and Livia and Julia entertained the Women. The fame Solemnities were prepared for Drusus, and Holidays were again to be kept for his Triumph, when all these Expectations were blasted by his Death. Livia his Mother, to comfort her, was also honoured with Statues, and reckoned amongst fuch as had thrice brought forth. For though Fortune was not fo favourable as to give three Children to all Married Men or Women, yet the Law first made by the Senate, and afterward confirmed by the Emperor, gave the Privilege obtained by three Children to some of them, so that they should not be liable to the Mulct imposed upon Barren People, and a few things excepted, they might obtain all the Advantages due to them that had a numerous Issue. Augustus applying himself to Publick Affairs, ordained that on certain Days the Senate Augusta appoints certain therefore many took the Advantage to be absent. To prevent this, he appointed certain therefore many took the Advantage to be absent. To prevent this, he appointed certain therefore many took the Advantage to be absent. Senate to meet tain Days in every Month, on which it should be necessary for all obliged by the Laws to be prefent. That no just excuse might be pretended, he took order that no Judicial Proceedings, nor any other thing should hinder them. Now also he determined what number should be present at passing Decrees, according to the Nature of the Senatusconfulta; and again he increased the Mulct, imposed upon fuch as absented without a Cause. But, as usually it happens, the multitude of Offenders feemed to plead for Remission of the Mulct, and therefore he commanded, that when many offended, every fifth man, as it fell by lot, should be certainly punished. To be fure he Published in a List the Names of all the Senators; which Custom continued till the time of Dion Cassius.

66. Such Care was taken by Augustus, to constrain Senators to Assemble and give their Suffrages. If it happened that fo many did not meet together, as was needful, (for when the Emperor came thither, the Lift was always called over, and most commonly on other days) they that were present consulted of Matters before them, and what they resolved, was written down; but it did not ob-The Vote cat tain the force of a Senationification, but was called the Authority of the Senate, led the Authority of the Senate, led the Authority of the Senate, was the Senate, and the Senate, led the Authority of the Senate (led the Authority of the Senate (led

confultum could be made, yet the Senate would not have its opinion to be concealed, which afterwards being in due form ratified, obtained the name and whose Temple they met, with Wine and Frankincense; as also that a legitimate Senate should be held, but twice in one Month, viz. On the Calends and the Ides; that in the Months of September and October (Months of Vintage) it should not be necessary that any should be present, but such as were chosen by lot, force of a Senatusconsultum. This Custom was observed in those days, though in the time of Dio, he faith, it was in a manner abolished, as also what Augustus ordained concerning Prætors, to whom he gave liberty of Voting in the Senate; because they took it ill that in dignity preceding the Tribuni Plebis, they should have no Voice. As he now gave it them, fo time afterward took it away. But Augustus before he enacted these things, caused them to be written down and exposed in the Senate, giving liberty to any two that came in to read them, to find what fault they could, and propound other Rules. Here it will not be amifs to add what Suetonius hath written concerning this Subject. He tells us, In Offani, C.C. that before Augustus his time, the Number of Senators was rude and deformed, 35, 36. being above a thousand, some of them most unworthy, as being after the Death of Calar, taken in for favour or reward, and therefore by the vulgar they were called Orcini. Then Augustus by two Scrutinies, restored the Senate to its ancient lustre, in one of which, one man chose another amongst themselves, and the fecond was made at the choice of himself and Agrippa, at which time it was thought he wore a Breastplate under his Robe, and had ten of the most Valiant Senators, all his Friends, standing about his Chair. Cordus Cremutius wrote that at that time no Senator was admitted, but alone, and his Robe being first searched. Some he compelled to excuse themselves, but to such he granted the Senatorian mark in their Habit, the right of fitting to behold Sports in the Orchestra, and and of Feafting publickly. That fuch as were chosen and approved, might more Religiously, and with less trouble execute their Offices, he ordained before any fate down in the Senate, he should first Supplicate at the Altar of that God, in being a sufficient number to do the work. Moreover he procured that the Acts of the Senate should not be Published.

67. As to what he writes concerning Feafting in Publick, granted to fuch Senators as excused themselves, we must know that upon three Accounts the Romans used Publick Feasts. One was at the Funeral of some Eminent Person. Vide Donatum Another when they Sacrificed, and then there were Persons called Epulones, som-in 1. times three; and otherwhiles feven in number, who took care of those Epula or I calls. The third was after some Victory, as was often practised by Julius Cæfar, and others; and at this fort of Feasts chiefly Senators were entertained. From what both Dio and Suetonius write concerning the Incense, we may obferve that the Senate was not wont to Assemble but in some consecrated place. as in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, of Jupiter Stator, erected over against that of Vefta at the foot of the Palatine Mount; that of Concord near the Capinate was wont tol; of Tellus or the Earth; of Apollo; and Caftor and Pollux. To foreign Amto Assemble. bassadors the Senate was wont to give Audience in the Temple of Bellona, without the Walls; as also to such Magistrates as returned from the Provinces, and were not yet to enter the City before fomething was performed. Sometimes indeed the Senate Assembled in the Campus Martius, and in other places, but these were also Inaugurate and Consecrated; at least ordinarily it could not Assemble but in such. For the time when the Senate met, of old it might meet on any days but the Dies Comitiales, because then the Comitia of the People being held, the Senators could not be absent from them; nor were not to be hindered from giving their Suffrages. Neither could the Senate meet on unlucky days, because then no Sacrifices could be offered, which were requisite as we see. Neither when it Thundered, or Winds and Tempests raged; nor when both Conjuls were absent from the City, at least till the ninth day from their Absence. And some think, that because the Comitia were dissolved if any were taken with the Comitial Difease or Epilepsie, the same was observed in the meeting of the Senate. Seeing then that on all other days the Senate might lawfully meet, some there are that admire how Augustus, a man loving Business, should be for its Affembling but twice in a Month, at the beginning and middle. But their wonder ceaseth when they consider, that having taken upon himself the whole Government, he did it with defign that the greatest Affairs might first be debated by himself and his Councellors, whom, as Suetonius in the same place affirms, he chose by lot every six Months for this very purpose. The truth is, he had transferred all the Power to himfelf, both of Senate and People, and he would have them do nothing but what he pleafed, though he pretended that he took this course that things might be transacted with more mature Consideration and Advice. Indeed adventuring upon fo high and dangerous an Enterprize, as the changing of the Government, he used all the Cunning he could to cover his Defigns, and he was to pretend all Modesty and Sell-denial imaginable. This made him shun all needless and invidious Ceremonies and shadows of Respect, so long as he was possessed of the Substance; and even to make a shew of waving the Substance it felf, as a burthen too heavy for his no way ambitious Shoulders; at least of a resolution to be the publick Drudge, only for a certain and limited time. And yet he was content they should please themselves, sometimes in fancying, that they honoured him in giving him Titles, and Voting he should have such and

68. He defired to appear so popular, that one of his fellow Soldiers praying he would undertake his Cause; and he saying that because he was hindered by bufinels, he would fend him an Advocate; when the man replied in Anger, That he did not serve him in this fashion when he wanted his help, not sending one in his room to do it, but in his own Person undergoing all dangers for him, he went into the the Forum and pleaded his cause. In like manner he affisted another Friend he had, at the Bar, having communicated the matter first to the Senate, and he faved him; and not only not profecuted the man's Accuser, though he had used great liberty in his discourse, but being called to account for his ill manners, abtolved him. He appointed Quaftors on the Sea Coast near Rome, and in other places of Italy, there to præfide; which course he observed many years: but he himself would not enter into the City because of the death of Drusus. The Year that followed, wherein C. Afinius Gallus, and C. Marcius Cenforinus were Confuls, he came to Rome, where he found both them and other Magistrates accused for fach Powers, when he was already possessed of the Supreme. Let us hear what having procured their Places by Money. Yet did he diffemble the matter, and made no Inquifition, having refolved to punish none by hearfay, nor to pardon any that was manifeltly convicted. But of fuch as would ftand for any Office, he took moncy by way of pledge; and if they were found to use any Bribery, they made torseit of it. This was commended as laudable, but so was not another thing by all forts of Persons. The Laws forbad that a Slave should be tortured to confels any thing against his Lord. He therefore commanded that such Slaves should be fold to himself or the Publick when occasion required, that the propriety being altered, they might be Examined against those who were not now their Masters. Some Complained that the Law was eluded by this changing of Lords; and others faid it was necessary to be done, for that many in confidence that their Slaves could not be questioned, were incouraged to conspire against him and the present Power. Not long after he pretended he would lay down, and the fecond Ten Years being over, was brought, unwilling, to receive the Government for other Ten.

War in Gormany.

69. He undertook a War against the Germans, but staying himself at home imploy'd Tiberius, who passing the Rhine, all the Clanns sent their Ambassadors and begged Peace, except the Cantabri. Augustus refused to accept of their submission, except the Cantabri were concerned in it; and neither when they joyned would he grant them Peace, but disposed through several Cities the Ambassadors of the Cantabri, who being many and most considerable amongst them, would not endure the Uneafines of it, but killed themselves. So the Peace continued unmade, and the Barbarians were quiet, though to purpose afterward they avenged themfelves. Augustus gave money to the Soldiers, not upon the account of Victory, though he himself received and gave the Title of Imperator to Tiberius; but because in this Action Caius was first trained up to Military Exercises, Promoting now Tiberius to the Imperial Power in the room of Drusus, and gracing him with the Name, he made him Conful the fecond time, and commanded him according to the antient Custom to expose his Letters to view, and honoured him with a Triumph: For he himself would not Triumph, but rather chose that on his Birthday perpetual Games should be solemnized with Horses. He inlarged the Bounds of the Pomærium, and named the Month Sexvilis, after himself Augustus. Others would have given this Name to September, because in it he was born; but he preferred Sextilis, because in it he was first made Conful, and obtained many notable Victories: So writes Dio. And the same reason of his preferring Sextilis before Sextitia, called September, is given by Suetonius, who mentions this passage as relating to his new modelling or reforming of the year. And this he did, he tells us, as Pontifex

Maximus, which Place he resolved never to take from Lepidus while living. When he was dead he took it, and for a first Essay, he caused all the Fortune-telling Books, both Greek and Latin, which either had no Authors known, or those of no reputation, to be fought out and burnt, above Two thousand in number. The Sibylline Books he onely retained, and those choicely selected, which he laid up in guilded Repositories under the Basis of Palatine Apollo. Then he addes, That the Year being regulated by Divus Julius, but afterward through negligence difordered and confuted, he reftored it to its former Course; and in this reformation chose to give the Name of August to the Month Sextilis. After this he tells us what further he did about the Superstition of the Romans, as his honouring the Veftal Virgins, and reftoring feveral Ceremoies in order to it, amongst which were the Sæcular Games. But as to the reformation of the Year, Pliny and Augustus reformeth the others relate, how in the space of Thirty six years, twelve dayes were intercalated; whereas there ought to have been but nine. He therefore Commanded that Twelve years should pass without any Leap-year at all, that so these three dayes might be swallowed up, which increased by the over-hastiness of the Priests. For the naming of Sextilis after him Augustus, a Decree of the Senate passed; and vide usurism also one of the People, Pacuvius one of the Tribuni Plebis propounding the Law; in annu concerning which Macrobius in his Saturnalia, is to be confulted.

70. Augustus was well enough pleased with these things, but grievously afflicted The Death of with the death of Mecanas, who was serviceable to him in several respects. He held him fo faithful that he committed the Government of the City to him, though but of Equestrian Rank for a long time; and he found him useful to him when he was transported with immoderate Anger, to allay his Passion, and reduce him to a more quiet mind. Of this Dion Cassius gives us one instance. It happened, that when Augustus sate in Judgment upon accused Persons, Mecænas himself was present in Court, and perceiving that He would condemn many of them, being not able to come at him for the Croud, he wrote these words, Rife up at last Executioner; and as if it had contained some other matter, cast the Paper into his Lap; which having read, he prefently arose without senter cing any of them. And he was not at all displeased, but rejoyced that his Friends would take the liberty to reprove him, when his own Nature or that of the Matter before him inclined him to An-His Commen- ger. This is taken as a great Evidence of his Virtue, that though he opposed the Extravagant defires of Augustus, yet he was held by him amongst his familiar Friends, and withal approved himfelf well to all other Persons; and having such Interest in the Emperor, that he obtained for many of his Friends, Honours and Places of Magistracy; yet was he not so ambitious as to accept any Dignity himfelf, being contented with the Equestrian Degree. But what Dio attributes to his Humility, Others do it to his defire of Ease and love of Pleasure, though indeed more that of a Virtuoso than Sensualist. And herein he was much incouraged and humored by the Poets, of which he was a great Patron as of all Learned Men. Whoever reads the Poems of Horace, wherein he fo much commends a retired life, and refuscth troublesom greatness, cannot but sancy them sitting together, hugging themselves, and laughing at the follies of such as bussle and make a stir a little while, and prefer not the real injoyment of a fhort life, before being hurried out of the World in a Crowd of Cares and Business. It's agreed, that he loved to live within his Fortune. Cillnius was the antient Name of his Family, and Arretium in the Tyrrbenian Coaffs the place of it. Pliny tells firange passages of him, as Mecana Equit that he never was without an Ague; and for three years before his death never things of slept a quarter of an hour together. But Dia addes, That for the reasons related the support that the place of the state of the same of Augustus was grievously afflicted for his death, and this made him love his Me qui capit of mory the more, that though Mecanas was angry with him about his Wife, yet tuam. he lest him his Heir, and excepting Onely a few things, lest it in his power to be kind to his Friends. Mecanas first made use of a swimming place surnished with warm Water, and invented certain Notes or Characters for speedy writing, which he communicated to many by the means of Aquila his Freedman. This Year also wherein Augustus mended the Calendar, Horace the Poet died in the Fifty seventh year of his Age; His familiarity with Casar and Mecanas is sufficiently known. His Life is written by Suetonius.

...71. Tiberius on the Calends of January of the DCCXLVII. Year of the City, wherein he himself and Cn. Piso were Consuls, called together the Senate into the Court or Forum of Octavius. He undertook the Repairing of the Temple of Concord, thereon he fet his own Name and that of Drujus. After this he Triumphed, and this being over, he dedicated the Temple of Livia together with his Mother. Then did he Feast the Senate in the Capitol, and Livia the Ladies apart by themselves. A little after he went into Germany where some Stirs were made, but nothing memorable was performed in that Country all this Year. A great Fire happened about the Forum, which confuming many Buildings, was faid to have been procured by those that were deeply in Debt: Who conceived themselves much injured, as if this would ease them of their Burthens; though they were deceived, getting nothing thereby. But it produced this Effect, That from amongst the Plebeians were constituted certain Officers called Curatores Vicorum, who were permitted on certain dayes within the Extent of their authority, to wear the Robe of a Magistrate, and to have two Litters go before them; and to them were affigned the Slaves which formerly had attended the Ædiles for quenching of Fires. And now was the City divided into Fourteen Regions, the Government of which was affigned to these Curatores Vicorum, the Tribuni Plebis, and the Prætors by Lot.

72. The following Year had C. Antiftius Vetus, and D. Lælius Ballus for Confuls. Caius and Lucius being Educated in an high condition, in no wife imitated the modesty of Augustus their Father by Adoption. They not only lived more delicately, but grew infolent upon their Fortune; infomuch that Lucius on a time going to the Theatre, and there being received with Applause which some gave him with a willing mind, and others out of Flattery, was puffed up to that degree of Pride, as to ask that the Confulship might be given to his Brother Caius though yet a Boy. Augustus hearing of it was angry, and wished that never any fuch Necessity might lye upon him, as he had found formerly, that the Consulthip should be given to one under Twenty years of Age; but for all this his Son's preffing him to it, he answered, That the Office was to be discharged by a man, that could take care that he himself offended not, and could resist the Extravagant defires of the People: At length he gave the Priesthood to Caius, and leave to go into the Senate, and be present with Senators at Shows and Feasts. However, Tacitus writes, that he earnestly defired that both of them not being yet Seventeen years old, should be called Princes of the Touth, and Defigned Confuls. Yet Dion adds, that to make them fomething more modest, he granted to Tiberius the Tribunitial Power for five years; and committed to his care Armenia, which had revolted. This he did to no purpole, for he offended both them and Tiberius; them, because they thought themselves undervalued; and him, because he feared their Indignation; and therefore he betook himself to Rhodes, under Tiberius with colour of Study, and he took not all his Attendants with him, but did withdraw himself from their view and their Actions. Some say lest his Glory should dim the Lustre of the two rising young Men. Others thought that Augustus his Children being grown to man's estate, he quitted now, as it were, the Place and Possession of the second Degree, so long held by him after the Example of Agrippa, who when Marcellus was admitted to publick Offices, went to Mitylene; that being present, he might not seem either to withstand or detract from them, and this Account he gave of his withdrawing; yet a long time after. Some yet there were who thought he did this because of his Wite Julia, whom he could endure no longer; it's certain that he left her at Rome. Others imagined he took it ill that he was not adopted Cæfar; and fome fancied he was fent thither by Augustus; because he used some Treachery toward his Sons. 73. However we are further told, That diffembling the Cause of his Resolution, he asked leave of Augustus his Father-in-law, (both in respect of his Wife and himself) to depart. Neither would he yeild to his Mother, that humbly befought him, nor to his Father-in-law, complaining that he also was forfaken by the Senate, and when they resolutely detained him, he eat nothing in four days. At length having got leave, he went down presently to Ostia, not speaking a word to them that went with him, and kiffing very few at his departing; yet he opened his Will, and read it before his Mother and Augustus. As he failed where he lives privately, but hereupon a Report being raifed that he tarried upon occasion of greater hope, he failed to Rhodes almost, in foul weather. He went and acted like a private man in all respects, except in this, that he compelled the Pharians to sell him a Statue of Vesta, which he Dedicated in the Temple of Concord. He contented himself with no great House, and as little a Country place, being much taken with the pleasantness and healthfulness of the Island, since he Landed there, in his return from Armenia. He walked fometimes into the places of Exercise, without either a Littor or Viator, converfing with the Greeks almost on equal terms. Nevertheless Paterculus, his Flatterer, writes, That all Proconsuls and Legati going into the Provinces, coming thither to vifit him, always submitted their Fajces, although in this privacy, and protested that this Retirement of his was more Honourable than his living in the Principality. And yet as Suetonius tells the Story, Sometimes, even in Rhodes, he exercised the Power of the Principality it felf; for, being a diligent Hearer of Theodorus the Gædarean (a Rhetorician, who defired to be called the Rhodian) and of other Profesiors, it happened that the Readers diffented, and the Difference in Opinion procured a hot contest and quarrel in the School. Hereupon he interposed, and being thought to be Partial, was reviled by one of the contrary Faction, who used such Language, that Tiberius provoked therewith, went home like a private man, but speedily came abroad again like a Publick Magistrate with his Apparitors, and calling before him by voice of a Crier the Person that reviled him, commanded from the Tribunal that he should be carried to Prison.

74. Augustus reduced the undetermined Number of them that were to receive Corn from the Publick to Two hundred thousand, and some reported that he gave to every one Sixty Drachmes. When he exhibited the Speltacula, he brought the Flaminian Water into the Cirque, and in it Six and thirty Crocodiles were killed. Now first of all he instituted two Præfells of the Prætorian Guards. When he entered his twelfth Confulship with Lucius Sylla, he brought a. u. c. 7451 Caius, being now come to man's estate, into the Court, and designed him Princeps Inventutis, or Prince of the Touth, and made him Præfett of a Tribe. That this title of Prince was given him by the Equites, who gave him also Silver Spears, he himself shewed in the Breviary of his Acts, wherein he mentioned also that the Senate and People defigned both Caius and Lucius Confuls, to do him Honour, though they were but Fifteen years old, that they might enter upon that Office, after five years to be reckoned from the day that they were to be brought into the Court. In his Thirteenth Confulfhip he brought his Son Lucius into the Court, and conferred the same Honours upon him, that he had done three years before upon his Brother Caius, which the Coins do testifie, in which are the Effigies of Caius and Lucius with Bucklers and Spears, and this Inscription, Caius and Lucius Caesars, the Sons of Augustus, designed Consuls, Princes of the Touth. Thus he honoured the Sons, but found Cause to treat the Mother quite after another fashion. He found their Mother, and his Daughter, Julia arrived at that Excess of wantonness and Prodigality, that even in the Forum, and at the Rollra she held her Meetings and Junkettings by Night, abusing these Courts with Lascivious Acts, in which her Father had made the Law against Adulteries. He had believed formerly that she lived no strict fort of life, but did not think the had been fo wanton and Notorious, having the fame misfortune with other Princes to be least acquainted with his own most intimate Concernments. Now was he feized with fo extraordinary a Paffion upon full Discovery of her wickedness, that he could not contain his grief within his own dores, but Communicated his misfortune and the difgrace of his Family with the Senate; not being there present himself, but by a Writing which was read by the Questor. For he kept himself from Company a long time for very shame, and thought of putting his Daughter to Death. At last he Banished her to Pandataria, an Island of Cam-Banished their pania, whither her Mother Scribonia did voluntarily accompany her, who had been divorced from Cafar, that day she was Delivered of her, in the Confulship of Annal. L. Martius, and C. Sabinus: So that Julia was Eight and thirty years old at this time, as some observe. Her Husband now at Rhodes was not forry to hear these things, and that a Divorce was fent her in his Name by Augustus his Command; yet, as he thought it his duty, he begged of him by frequent Letters to Pardon her, and though the deferved very ill, yet that he would grant her whatfoever he had given her. 75. Augustus in this great misfortune was diverted by being necessitated to cast his thoughts upon Armenia. Pompey had only laid this Servitude upon them of that Country, to receive their Governors from Rome, and Augustus had set over them Artarasdes (or Artabazes) with this title. Him they now expelled, fet up Tigranes in his room, and called in the Parthians to affift in maintaining what they had done, who leaving the Alliance of the Romans, laid hold on Armenia. Augustus hearing of the Revolt, and of the Conjunction, was much concerned, and doubted what course to take. He could not manage the War himfelf by reason of his old Age. Tiberius had withdrawn himself, neither durst he trust any of the more powerful Citizens of Rome. Caius and Lucius were young and unfit for fuch an undertaking; but necessity urging, he made choice of Caius. He had indeed before this brought them, though young, into some charge in the Commonwealth, and being defigned Confuls, fent them about the Provinces, and Armies. He made Caius Proconsul, and Married him, thereby to procure him more Esteem and Friends to give him Councel. His Wives Name was Lollia Paulina, the Daughter, or Neice of Marcus Lollius, whom he appointed the Governor of his Youth. It's faid that Caius behaved himself variously in this Expedition, so asto afford matter both for commendation and dispraise; but through the Greatness and Majesty of the Roman Name, he quieted all things. At first Thraates King of Parthia was no whit terrified, although Augustus in his Letters had not called him King, but only by his Name; but proudly Writing back again, called himself King, and Augustus nothing but Casar. But when he knew that Caius was come into Syria, and suspected that his Subjects out of the hatred they bore him, would not be quiet at home, he obtained a Peace from him, but upon this condition, that he should leave off pretensions to Armenia. And now Artabazes being dead of a Disease, Tigranes sent Presents to Augustus, and not Writing himself King, begged the Kingdom. Augustus moved herewith, and fearing the Parthian War, accepted of his Prefents, and Commanded him with fome hope to go into Syria to Caius; and the Armenians thought it more profitable to be reconciled to the friendship of the Romans, and to live in their own Country, than to joyn with the Parthians, lose their Country, and have the Enmity of the Romans.

76. Augustus having again quieted all Nations, and shut the Temple of Janus the third time; having ordained a general Taxation throughout the Empire, that he might know the State and worth thereof; having also refuted the name of Dominus or Lord with great earnestness, which he forbad about this time even his Children and Nephews by an Edict to use towards him, the Lord and Heir of all things came into the World, in the fulness of time, revealed by the Angel Gabriel to the Prophet Daniel, for the fulfilling of the Promifes made concerning the Seed of the Woman, which should break the Serpents head. Great difference there is in af 0.194.48.3. figning the Year of the World, wherein our Saviour was born, by reason of the V. c. 752. difficulty of computation arising from the several Versions of the Scriptures, the Cafart Augusto intricate and uncertain Successions of the Judges, the variety of the forms of years, at Planto Siand the feveral reckonings as to parcels of fuch as are related in Scripture. A great lane coffhelp for the regulation of these things, is afforded from Prophane History. But it beginneth but with Cyrus, whose History, as to the restauration of the Jews, presenteth as with the first certain note of conjunction (he being so named both by holy and prophane Writers, but not Nebuchadnesar) and yet the duration of his Reign is also uncertain. Yet as from all these Opinions weighed together, a good account may be given in another place, more proper for the length of it, as to the Year of the World, so the Evangelist teaching us, that in the Fitteenth year of Tiberius, Christ was about Thirty years old, it must needs follow, that Augustus reigned Fifteen years after his Birth; fo that if we count (as fome do) the Reign'of Augustus from the death of Julius Casar, it lasted fifty seven years, and then must Christ be born in the forty second of it. But if we follow them (as the order of this Work doth) who with more reason fetch the beginning of his Empire from the death of Antony, and the Conquest of Ægypt, then Christ's Birth fell into the twenty eighth year thereof, and according to the computation which we most approve, into the 4003 year of the World, the 752 of the City, and the third year of the 1940lympiad, wherein Cafar Augustus himself the thirteenth time, and M. Plautius Silanus were Confuls. Although Cyrenius (who was Conful ten years before, and is called elfewhere P. Sulpicius Quirinus) might not formally be President of Syria (which Of Josephus Antiq. fice, as others fay, was now obtained by Quintilius Varus, the Successor of Saturninus, who as yet was not departed out of the Province) yet being fet over this Taxation by Augustus in that place, this Title might well be given him, though he then governed Cilicia, as Herod is by Josephus faid to be constituted Procurator De billo Juof all Syria, though it had its Officers, who were to act by his affiftance and di-daic. h. 1. 15. rection. Then did he prefer to the High-Priesthood one Ananel an obscure man, neg lecting Aristobulus the Son of Aristobulus the King, and Brother to his own Wife Marianne; and Antony defiring to see this Youth, for the same of his Beauty, he fearing the Roman might advance him, to flay him at home, gave him the Priestbood, and excused his neglect to fend him, by the inclination of the Tews to rebellion. Perceiving him then to be in extraordinary favour with the Tews, and that his Mother Alexandra (which he kept vevy close because of her restless spirit) plotted the escape of her self and Son into Ægypt, a year after, as he was swimming, he caused him to be drownad, and though Cleopatra accused him hereof to Antony, yet by Presents he made his Peace. In the Civil Wars he fided with Antony, who having Forces sufficient, defired him to chastise the Arabians, that denied the Tribute imposed on them. This he did, and though at first his attempts miscarried, yet in another Battel he quite overthrew and brought them under. After the overthrow of Antony, he had little hope that his own matters would go well. He murdered Hyrcanus, who onely furvived of all the Males of the Royal Family, and whom he had recalled from Babylon, whither he was them ibid. carried by the Parthians. He took the advantage of the Old man's intent to flye a 9, or into Arabia, through the importunity of his Daughter Alexandra, who promiwent to Rhodes to visit Cæsar, from whom he concealed not the love he bore to Antony, but with notable courage declaring it, withal fignified that he was ready to ferve him as faithfully; which so wrought upon the Magnificent Prince, that he liked him extremely, and confirmed him in his Estate. After Caefar's return out of Ægypt into Syria, he entertained him, and as he thereby procured the reputation of a noble and heroick spirit, so also an addition to his Kingdom. Yet was he unfortunate at home, having commanded feveral times, That it any thing happened in his absence, they should make away his beloved Wife Marianne. She hearing of it, used him frowardly, whereat being inraged, he was throughly perfuaded to put her to death, by his Sifter Salome; which envious Woman feigned fome acculations against her. But after the deed was done, having extraordinarily loved her, he fell even mad, and thereby into a great fickness, so that casting off all Government, he departed to Samaria, then called Sebafte, in honour of

Alexandra in the mean time endeavoured to get the strong places of Je-co. 11, 60. rusalem into her hands; wherewith he being acquainted, ordered her to be put to death, and then returning to the City, grew exceeding cruel and diftaftiul. The prejudice was increased by his making Games in honour of Casar, and hanging his Theatre with Trophies, which the People forely diffasted, as being by their Religion principled against Pictures. Ten men conspired against him, but were discovered and put to death. Not long after he redeemed his credit by liberality in a great dearth, and married the Daughter of Simon, whom he preferred to the Priethbood, having displaced Jesus the Son of Phabes. Then did he imploy his time and Treasure in Sumptuous and Royal Buildings, as that of Cæsarea amongst the rest, formerly called the Tower of Straton; and he built a Temple to the honour of Augustus, who had again inlarged his Dominions, and bestowed a Tetrarchy at his defire upon his Brother Pheroras. To the People, which was ready to mutiny, because of his Idolatry, he released the third part of their Tributes, to please them, forbad all their Meetings, punished severely such as were obstinate, and bound the rest to him by an Oath. After this, taking down the Old Temple Repaireth the of Jerusalem, he built another much more stately and magnificent (being a Work of most admirable Beauty) in the space of Nine years and six months; during which time, it's faid, that it onely rained on Nights, left the Work should be himdred. In the dedication he facrificed 300 Oxen, and the rest of the People according to their abilities. He made a Law, That Thieves which broke Walls should be fold for Slaves, out of the Kingdom. This the People ill refented, as Joiphus Astig. against their Religion, which not onely provided otherwise concerning Thieves, but would be broken also by these men, who must necessarily serve Idolaters. Now he himself fetched from Rome Alexander and Aristobulus his Sons by Mariamne, whom having fent thither to be bred, Augustus had kindly entertained. These Youths were teared by Salome and Pheroras, as intending to revenge their Mother's death, and therefore they resolved they must not live, especially she that was incouraged by the fuccess she had had against their Mother. And they presented her with an opportunity of accusing them, seeming indeed not to be well affected toward their Father, defiring the Kingdom, and exclaiming greatly against the authors of their Mother's Ruine. Herod troubled hereat, called to Court Antipater his Son, begotten when he was a private man, that opposing him against them, he might make them more careful of their behaviour. But thereby were they more incensed, and Antipater making use of his time, got more and more into his Father's affections, who commended him in especial manner to Casar, (though he had not a thought at first of making him his Heir) and sent him to Rome to procure the Emperour's favour.

Yet the young men by their tears, and Alexander's refutation of the calumny, so moved Cafar, that he reconciled them; and for that Herod had given him three hundred Talents, & been very liberal, as his cuftom was to be in all places, unto the people of Rome, he bestowed on him half of the profits of the Mines in Cyprus, and gave him liberty to leave which of his Sons he pleased his Successor; or if he would, to distribute his Kingdom amongst them all, which Herod presently would have done, but Cæsar would not permit it. In his absence the Inhabitants of Trachonitis, a considerable part of his Dominion rebelled, and were reduced by his Captains. After his return he made a Speech

After he had opened David's Sepulchre to fearch for Treasure, (as John Hyrcanus had done cop. to be before him) where he found none except very coftly attire, and Ornaments of Gold, 'tis observed, that his Family fell into a very sad condition, nothing being heard but complaints and accusations one against another. The greatest part of Antipater's malice fell upon Alexander, and the Court hereby was filled with tortures and flaughters. Herod suspecting all, and trusting none, put many to death, and those of his most intimate Friends, and committed Alexander to Prifon, being captivated by fo great a fear of an untimely death, that he was almost ready to run mad. These things were diverted by the rebellion of the Inhabitants of Trachonitis (which Countrey Cafar, having taken it from Zenodorus, gave unto him) who again revolting, were protected by Syllaus an Arabian, that being to marry his Sifter Salome was rejected, because he would not turn Few. Saturninus and Volumnius, Prefidents of Syria, resolved he might by force of Arms chastize these Rebels; whereupon he entred Arabia, and having formerly destroyed their Families, which they left in their Corn Countrey, took a Castle they held there. Syllaus now being at Rome accused Herod unto Casar, as having wasted all Arabia; and he fo far believed it, that he twice denied his Ambaffadors audience. The Rebels and Arabians hereupon did him much injury, which he was glad to put up for the present, but sent Nicholaus Damascenus to plead his

to the People, and named to fucceed him first Antipater, and then his Sons by

For whilest he was thus out with Cafar, the former stirs were renewed in his house by means of Eurycles a Lacedamonian, who winding himself into Alexander's acquaintance, betrayed him first to Antipater, and then to Herod himself. He denied all accusations, except that he intended with his Wife to fly to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, her Father; but Cafar being confulted, as we faid, willed Herod to call a Council at Berytus with the Roman Presidents, Archelaus of Cappadocia, and the rest of his Friends and Nobility thereabout, and do as he should be advised. He called all but Archelaus, and in an Assembly of 150 men declamed most furiously against his Sons, not producing any proof at all, further than that they intended to fly, and not fuffering them to be present to answer for themselves; He onely required the suffrages of the Assembly to countenance his private resolution, which the major part giving (though Saturninus and his Sons gave an indifferent Sentence) he, acted by fury, and unnatural madness, caused the resolution of the private sentences. ly plotted the destruction of his Father, and for that he was hated by all men, procured some esteem by his Gifts, and drew Pheroras into the Conspiracy, to the issue of whom the Pharifes promised the Kingdom. For resusing to take the Oath of Allegiance, they were fined by Herod, to whose Kingdom they prophesied destruction, and happiness to the Family of Pheroras, because his Wife payed their Fine. Herod getting out these things by the means of Salome, put the principal of the Pharifes to death, with others, and urged his Brother Pheroras to put away his Wife; which he refufing to do, he banished him his Kingdom. Pheroras then departing into his Tetrarchy, died shortly after, being visited by Herod, who buried him honourably at Jerusalem. Antipater standing in fear of his Father, wrought by his Creatures at Rome to be fent for by Cæfar. But this availed nothing; for in his absence all came out, which confirmed Salome's words (to which the King in this matter had given but little credit, knowing her to be too free in accusations) and brought vengeance upon him, notwithstanding all his crast, for the Murther of his Brethren.

81. Pheroras his Wife being accused of poysoning her Husband, her Maids were contourned, and in their pain gave some sufficient of the conspiracy, which was more cleared by one Antipater that had the ordering of Antipater's affairs, who confessed that his Master had compounded a poyson, and delivered it to Pheroras to against him. be given to the King in his absence, and that it was kept by Pheroras his Wife: She confirmed the same, declaring that the Poison was bought in Egypt by Antipater's procurement, that it was committed to her charge, and how, that when her Husband was Sick, and Herod came out of kindness to visit him, being overcome with his love he forbad her to give it him. Amongst the Accessaries was Herod's own Wife, the Daughter of the High-Prieft; the was put away, her Father deposed, and Mathias the Son of Theophilus preferred to his place; Herod alfo her Son was put out of the King's Testament, wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to him after his death. In the mean time Bathillus the Freed-man of Antipater returning from Rome was tortured, and confessed that he had brought with him a Poison to deliver to Pheroras, wherewith the King might be certainly and speedily dispatched in case the other should fail. Antipater returned ignorant of thefe passages, for that almost every one was his Enemy, and before his Father and Quintilius Varus, though he fought to cover his wickedness, all things were made plain against him, whereupon he was committed to close Prison. Shortly after Herod himfelf fickned, and became exceeding teafty and wrathful, as well for these things, as for that he thought the People was glad of his misfortunes, having at the initigation of the Doctors of their Law, cut down an Eagle of Gold of great value, that flood over the Portal of the Temple. But his Sickness more and more increased.

He was also vexed with a ravenous and infatiable appetite, and an Ulcer in his Entrails, with a strange and furious Colick. His feet were swoln with moisture, and a shining kind of slegm, his Stomach being no less afflicted. His body rotted, and was tull of crawling Worms, which afforded an intollerable ftench; befides, he was held with a filthy and troublesom Priapism, a strong Convulsion of his Nerves, and shortness of Breath, being generally judged thus to be punished for his infinite Impieties and Sins committed against the Majesty of God; and doubtless his intention to kill Christ, with the innocent blood of the Infants cried loud. He used all means for recovery, and went over Jordan to the hot Baths of Callirboe. Thence returning to Jericho, a Melancholick humour feized on him, which rendred him unfociable, and displeased with all men. Perceiving now that he should die, and supposing that the Jews would much rejoice in his death, he shut up many of the chiefelt of them in the Hippodrome, and gave in charge to his Sister Salome, and her Husband Alexas, that as foon as he was dead, they should cause them all to be killed, that a Lamentation might accompany his Funeral. Before his death he received Letters from Cafar, who gave him leave to deal with his Son as he faw occasion. Antipater yet believing that he was dead, plotted how to escape and feize on the Kingdom, but his Jaylor with whom he dealt revealed it to Herod, who commanded one of his Guard instantly to kill him; and to such an end came Son Assiptor, who community of his Brethren, and the fad Tragedies he had raifed in his Father's House. Herod having attempted to kill himself, died some five days after Death of his Brothers, and his Son, in the seventy second year of his Age, twenty seventh after his getting plotted a-gainft his Fapossession of the Kingdom, and twenty ninth after he had been declared King by the Romans; 'tis uncertain how long after the Birth of Christ, but as is supposed not above two years, in the first of the 195 Olympiad, the 754 of the City, Caius Ceefar, and L. Now he made Archelaus King, gave the Province Son being left Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanea, and Peneade to Philip, left Salome very well, and gave great Legacies to Cæsar and Livia his Wife. Archelaus at first was much cried up by the People; but afterwards the multitude calling to mind the death of Mathias, and his Confederates whom Herod had flain for breaking down the Eagle, fell into a Sedition (many flocking out of the Countrey to the Paffeover) and demanded justice against divers of his Officers; but this tumult was fetled by the flaughter of Three thousand men about the Temple. Then went Archelaus to Rome, not daring to take upon him the title without the leave of Augustus, to whose disposal his Father had referred his Testament. Many followed, and spoke against him, being affected better towards Antipas, the Jews also sent their Ambassadors, with whom joyned 8000 of their Countrey-men then living at Rome, in a Petition to Cæfar, that they might be joyned to Syria, and live under Roman Governors with-

Philip obtained Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis with 100 Talents. Archelaus had 500 Talents of yearly Rent out of his Countrey. Whilest these things were in hand at Rome, grievous Seditions tore the Jews in pieces at home; for they being now destitute of a King, several took upon them that title : Sabinus, who super-cap. 122 intended the affairs of Cafar there, gave the occasion, by pilling the people, which now at the Feast of Pentecost gathering together from all quarters, sought to shake Seditions in off that yoak. After great flaughters, at length all was quieted by the coming of Varus from Antioch, who lett the first Legion in Garrison at Jerusalem. 84. The Succession being setled by Augustus; a young man, and a few, born cap, 14, at Sidon, counterseited himself Alexander the Son of Herod by Marianne, affirm-

He deluded thouthe Son of He fands of Jews inhabiting Melus, as also them at Rome, by whom he was received as their King. But he could not deceive Cæfar, who made him confess the forgery, and because he had promised him pardon, if he would acknowledg the deceit, for that he had formerly laboured with his hands, he condemned him to the Gallies, and put the man to death who perfuaded him to turn counterfeit.

Annius Rufus. 85. Now that we may return to Roman Affairs, it will be convenient to inquire after Tiberius, and fee how the former humour of Retirement holds him. The time of his Tribuneship being over, he fairly confessed, That he went away meerly to flun all fuspicion of Envy betwixt him and the two Brothers. And he requested that seeing there was no danger of that, now that they were grown

Men, and next to the Emperor in Authority, he would give him leave to fee again his Friends, with whom he had a very great defire to be. This would not be granted, but instead of leave he was bid lay aside all care of those whom he had to resolutely left. Against his will therefore he staid at Rhodes, and by his Mo-Tibering denied ther's Intreaties fearcely obtained to be there as Legatus to the Emperor to cover the Ignominy; in the mean time, living not only privately, but in danger and fear, lurking in the middle of the Island to shun the Compliments of them that failed by. When Caius went to the Armenian War, he croffed over to Chius, to present his Service to him, and purge himself from all suspicions, and he was very humble both to him and his Attendants. So writes Dio, though Paterculus a great Flatterer of Tiberius talks of Caius his giving all honour to him as his Superior. Suetonius speaks of his going to meet him at Samos, and that there he found him much alienated from him, through the false Accusations of Marcus Lollius, being also come into suspicion by the means of some Centurions devoted to him, who going to the Camp, feemed to tempt the Soldiers to Innovations. Augustus dealt so treely with him as to tell him plainly of it, upon which he continually implored him to fend one to him of what Rank or Quality foever he pleased to be an Observer of his Words and Actions. Now lest he off his usual riding, and other Martial Exercises, and laying aside the Habit of his Country, reduced himself to the Pallium and Crepidæ; and in this condition he continued almost two years, every day more contemned and hated, infomuch that the Inhabitants of Nemaulus defaced his Pictures and Statues, and in a familiar Banquet mention being made of him, one of the Company role up and promifed Caius, that if he would but speak the word, he would bring him the Head of that Banished Man. Not so much through fear now, as manifest danger, he was moved Mmmmm both by his own, and his Mother's interest to solicit his Return. But Augustus resolved to do nothing in this Assair, without the consent of Caius.

86. It happened luckily for Tiberius that Caius Caesar fell out with M. Lollius, about this time; and if the Parthians told true, just cause he had for so doing. They discovered his perfidious and subtle Councils, how he took Bribes of the Kings, and Robbed all the Countries of the East, whereupon he renounced Friendthip with him, although his own Wife the Daughter or Neice of this Lollius is faid to have got a Gown in this Expedition fo fet with Pearl that it was valued at four hundred Sestertia. The Death of Loslius happened not long after their falling out, and most say by Poison which he took, and he being dead Quirinius was made Governor to Caius, who served Tiberius at Rhodes, being a good Friend to him, as Lollius was the Author of the ill will betwixt him and Caius Cafar; if Tiberius himself was to be believed. Now then the case was so altered, that by Caius his He is permit- Permission Tiberius was recalled; but with condition that he should bear no Ofted to Return fice in the Commonwealth, and accordingly being come to Rome, he gave himfelf wholly to eafe, doing fome private Courtefies, but medling with no Publick

Business. Not long after it happened, that Lucius Casar being appointed to go The Death of to the Armies in Spain, died at Marfeilles suddenly, being a man of no fame; after whose death, if we believe Paterculus, his Grandfather Augustus would have adopted Tiberius, but he fearing the Envy and Power of Caius vehemently refisted it. But Caius and his fear, were both shortly after removed out of the way. For he received a wound in Armenia, being inticed by Treachery to the Wall of a Town by one who pretended a Revolt, after which he performed no great matters. Then he began in Body to be less able, and in his Mind less disposed to be profitable to the Commonwealth. And he wanted not the Company of fuch Men as by their Flattery fomented his Vices, by which means he was come to be of that humour, that he had rather fpend all his time in any corner of the World, than return to Rome, though his Grandfather courted him by Letters, and at last grieved at his Refolution, advised him but to return into Italy, and he should do what he pleased. With much Reluctancy then he complied, and put himself upon the way, but being brought by shipping into Lycia, he died at Limyra, a City of that Country, twenty two Months after his Brother Lucius. The Bodies of both Brothers were brought to Rome by the Tribunes of Armies, and the filver'd Bucklers and Spears they received from the Equites when they came to be Men, were hung up in the Senate-House. But thus we see the end of both the Brothers, concerning whom this must be added, That they were taken out of the way, as a suspicion went, by the Arts of Livia to make room for her Son

87. Augustus his third ten years being ended, undertook the Government, unwilling and by constraint, for ten more; and now being more gentle and unwilling to exasperate the Senators against him, he would offend none of them any more. It happening that his Palace was burned, and many offering him much Money to Repair it, he accepted only an Aureus from a Body or Corporation, and a Drachme from a private man; and by an Aureus or golden Coin, Dion Cassius tells us, he means the Nomisma, that was twenty five Drachmes in value, as certain Greek Authors took it, whom he had read out of his love to the Attick Dialect. When his House was Re-edified, he would have it be counted Publick, either because the People contributed Money towards it, or because he was Pontifex Maximus, and would live both in a Publick, and his own Dwelling. He made Tiberius Nero his Partner in the Tribuneship, which he also eagerly refused both at home and in the Senate House; some say for five years, and others for ten. Another cast of his Office he gave again as Pontifex Maximus, in setting right the Roman Calendar. The third Intercalary Day being superfluous, Augustus again which had increased by the Default of the Roman Priests, was in the Month of February omitted; but afterwards he commanded that one Day in the beginning of every fifth year should be intercalated according to the Institution of Casar, and for the perpetual observation of this Order, he caused it to be Ingraven in a Table of Brass. And thence afterward the Accounts of Times took their rife, this course being constantly observed till the change made in the Calendar by

ago. But left the Fairs kept by the Romans every ninth Day, should fall upon the Kalends of January, one Day was often added in the end of the precedent year, over and above the Custom, and taken away again in the year following, that the course might agree with the former Institution of Tulius Cælar.

88. About this time the People, whether out of kindness to him or his Daughter, earnestly requested him to restore her: He answered, That fire and water should sooner meet than that she should be restored. Yet after some five years Confinement, they forced him to let her come out of the Island into the Continent, but he could never be brought to recall her all together; and when the People still intreated him for her, and were very urgent with him, he used this Imprecation openly, That they might have fuch Daughters, and fuch Wrvss. But he was very kind to her Husband, though the People affronted him for her fake; fo as Ælius Catus, and Sentius Saturninus, being Confuls on the fifth of the Calends of July, he adopted him, fwearing before the People, that he adopted him for the Commonwealth's fake. But the same day he also adopted M. Agrippa Posthumus, the Brother of Caius and Lucius, and searing that Tiberius elevated with his condition, should make disturbance, before he adopted him, he caused him to adopt Germanicus, the Son of his Brother Drulus, although Tiberius had a Son of his own, of his Brother's Name. Tiberius upon his Adoption, was immediately fent into Germany, where three years before, a War had broken out, and with him Valeius Paterculus, the Historian (formerly a Tribunus Castrorum) ferved in quality of Præfett of Horfe, as succeeding his Father in his Places, and Affistant in them. After this, he tells his Reader, or rather Tiberius, how gladly he was received by both Cities and Soldiers in Germany; how of the Soldiers one faid he had ferved under him in Armenia; and another in Rhætia, and another had received from him a Donative in the Vindelici, another in Pannonia, and a third in Germany. Upon the first entrance into this Country, he saith, the Caninefates, Attuati, and Bructeri were subdued, the Cherusci were received, and the River Vilargis afterward rendred famous by the overthrow of the Romans, passed over, Casar taking upon himself the most difficult part of the War. and leaving the more easie to Sentius Saturninus, who had been formerly in Germany Legatus to his Father. This year's Campagne continued till the Month of December, and thereby, as he words it, procured the Emolument of a vaft

> 89. Now if you believe him, the Piety of Tiberius drew him back to Rome for defence of the Empire, though the passages of the Alps were in a manner choaked up with fnow, and the fame at the beginning of Spring brought him back into Germany, in the middle whereof, at the Head of the River Julia, he had appointed the Winter Quarters. The Hiftorian falls into a Rapture confidering how great things, requiring how great a Volume, they did the following Summer under his Conduct. All Germany was over-run. Such Nations were fubdued, as were almost unknown by any Names, and those of the Chauci yielded Paterculus his themselves in an humble posture before the General's Tribunal. The Longobardi were distressed, being more fierce than the very German fierceness. In conclufion, he tells us, that from the Rhine, as far as to the River Albu, which flowed by the Borders of the Senones and Hermundori; the Roman Army passed with Enfigns difplay'd, and thither also by wonderful good fortune, through the care of the General, and due observation had of the time, came the Fleet, out of the unheard of, and formerly unknown Sea, up the Albs, and after Victory obtained over many Nations, with great plenty of all things, joyned with the Army of Cafar; a thing which never before had been conceived in hope, never before in fact attempted. The fawning of this Writer is indeed intollerable, neither can nor ought we to relate his extravagant flourishes; but he faith, that his Cafar being Conqueror of all Nations and Places whither he came, with a Conquering and untouched Army (except at one time, and that to the great loss of the Enemy, who did something by fraud) reduced the Legions into their Winter Quarters and went to Rome with as much freed as he had done the preceding year. Indeed nothing now in Germany remained which could be overcome, except the People called Marcomanni, who by Persuasion and Conduct of Maroboduus, forfaking their former Seats, and retiring into the inner Countries, had taken up the Grounds of the Hercynian Wood, and through his management, had arrived at a confiderable, nay, remulous greatness. Maroboduus was now to be feared, having so placed himself as to have Germany on his left hand, and Mmmmm 2

before him Pannonia; at his right, and behind him the Norici, at all which Coasts he might make an Impression. Neither could Italy be secure, the beginning of his Territories being not much distant above two hundred Miles from the Alps. This Man and this Country did Tiberius resolve, to fall upon the following year from several Quarters. Sentius Saturninus had Orders, that through the Territories of the Catti, cutting down the Hercynian Woods, he should bring the Legions to Boiohæmus; for io the Region was called, which Maroboduus inhabited; and Tiberius himself attempted to lead the Army that served in Illyricum, from Carnuntus, a place bordering on the Kingdom of Noricum against the Marcomanni. But Fortune fometimes breaks, fometimes delays the purposes of Men. Cafar had prepared the Winter quarters at the Danube, and the Defign was to be executed when Pannonia grown infolent with eafe, and Dalmatia trusting to its strength, by consent Rebelled, drawing all the Nations of that Tract into the Conspiracy, and making up eight hundred thousand

90. With part they determined to invade Italy, and with part Macedonia, under Dalmatia Re- Conduct of two Batones and Pinnetus. In Pannonia both the Roman Discipline and Language was known, and also Learning was common, and there was a familiar Conversation. This gave them the Advantage, that no Nation managed fuch a matter with more Discretion and Expedition. The Roman Citizens and Merchants were faln upon and flain, and many Soldiers cut off in places at greatest distance from the Emperor. Macedonia was overrun and wasted with Fire and Sword, and so great a fear this struck into the Minds of men, that Augustus Casar himself trembled at it: Levies therefore were made, the veterane Soldiers were recalled every where to their Colours, and both Men and Women were compelled to find Soldiers even though Libertines, the Prince being heard in Senate to fay, That without much care was used, in ten days, the Enemy might face Rome: both Senators and Equites promifed their utmost indeavours. Tiberius was appointed General. Paterculus was defigned Quafter, and though not yet a Senator, made equal to Senators; and now being defigned also Tribunus Plebis he led part of the Army delivered by Augustus, to his Son. Being afterward Legatus, what wisdom he then could not but observe in the Conduct of Tiberius, he declares in way of Rapture. After that, he relates how Melfala Governor of Illyricum, with the twentieth Legion half full, though surprized with the Rebellion, defeated and put to flight the Enemy. How that part of their Forces. which opposed it self to Cæsar, not daring to ingage, seized on the Claudian Hill, and there fortified it felf. Another that met with the Army which came from the Transmarine Provinces, under the leading of A. Cæcina, and Sylvanus Plautius, Men of Confular Dignity, put the Auxiliaries of Thrace to flight, falling upon them e're the unwary Captains thought of an Ingagement; and had not the valour of the Roman Soldier exceeded the Courage and Abilities of their Officers, the whole Party had mifcarried; but when many Centurions and Tribunes were loft, and much hurt received, the Legions exhorted one another to play the Men, and wrested the Victory out of the Hands of the Rebels.

91. Thus this War was full of Difficulties at first, but was in three years concluded by Tiberius. Pannonia first asked Peace. Bato and Pinetus both came into the hands of the Romans, the one being taken, and the other yielding himself, and though the Dalmatians were hard to be overcome by reason of the difficult fituation of their places, the fierceness of their Natures, and their great Abilities in Matters of War, yet they were not long after reduced, being almost ruined. While Tiberius was here in Germany, the Ambassadors of the Parthians having delivered their Message at Rome, were ordered to repair to him; being sent by the Nobility to defire to have for King one of the three Sons of Phraates, that remained Hostages at Rome. Hereupon Vonones was preferred before the rest, and being aided by Cafar, was joyfully accepted by the Parthians for some time. In the mean while, that we may return into Italy, Paterculus tells us, That Agrippa, who had been adopted the same day that Tiberius was, by his natural Grandfather, and for two years before had given fufficient notice how he would prove by his wonderful pravity of mind, being inclined to run headlong into mifchief, alienated from him the affections of his Father and Grandfather Augustus; and his Vices every day increasing, he had such an end as he deserved. His end followed afterward, and was brought about by Tiberius, whom Paterculus flatters, as fuch a virtuous and deferving Person as scarcely ever the like, writing a Panegyrick to him, rather than an Hiftory to another Reader. But we are told from other hands, that Augustus did proscribe his only Nephew M. Agrippa Posthumus, who was unlearned indeed and loolish, fierce out of a proud conceit of his strength. but yer found Guilty of no Crime; and that confileating all his Goods to the Military Treasury, he Banished him into Planasia, an Island near to Corsica.

92. But Augustus after he had adopted Tiberius and Agrippa, thinking himself strengthened by such an Addition, went about another Purging and Modelling of the Senate. Tew now quitted it of their own Accord as formerly, but fome were cast out whether they would or not. That he might not feem to do this as Cenfor, to do the work and folemnize the Lustrum, he took Proconsular Power. Several Young men both of Senatorian and Equestrian Dignity, fallen to decay without any Crime, he recruited. Taking notice how many Slaves were now Manumitted, he ordained of what Age both the Lord and the Manumitted Perfon should be, and other Rules to be observed both by Patrons and others toward Manumitted Perfons. In the mean time was discovered a Conspiracy against him. the chief Author whereof was found to be Cn. Cornelius Cinna Magnus, the Nephew of Pompey the Great by his Daughter. He knew not what course to take: for if he put them to death, he feared he should not thence free himself from the Plots of others; and if they were not punished, it would incourage others to do the like. He was not able to rest Night nor Day by reason of these anxious Cares, till Livia his Wife, took notice of his trouble, and got the matter out of him. Dion Cassius relates, a Conference betwirt them, whether real or framed by himfelf, but the iffue of it was this, that Augustus moved by her Arguments to methods of Clemency, only corrected the guilty Persons by words, and so dif-Link pro-tures yardon miffed them; nay, he defigned Cornelius to be Conful. And the Hiftorian tells for the Parties us, That by fo doing, he to far obliged all men to him, that then ceforth nor only no more Conspiracies were made against him; but not the least suspicion was had of any; but fo by the means of Livia, was Cornelius preferred, though she was suspected afterward to have procured the Death of Augustus himself. In the Confulship of the said Cornelius, and Valerius Messala, horrible Earthquakes happened, and Tiber so swelled, that it brake down the Bridge, and made Rome Navigable for feven days; the Sun was Eclipfed, and there was a Famine. The Navigation of the Senators and Equites began to behold the Circumfun Games apart, which was afterward observed. And the Nobility being backward to give their Daughters to be Vestal Virgins, a Law was made, that those of Libertine condition might become Preists in that College, and a Dispute being made about it by many, some were chosen by lot in the Senate, their Fathers being present; but not one was taken in to be a Vestal.

93. At this time the Soldiers grievously complained of the scantness of their Pay, and the rewards they received for their Service, and the more for being apprehensive of impending Wars, and none would bear Arms beyond the term allotted to warfare. Hereupon it was Decreed that to the Prætorian Cohorts should be given after they had served fixteen years, Five thousand Drachmes, and to others after the fervice of twenty years, Three thousand, man by man, At this time were maintained three and twenty Legions of Roman Citizens, or as fome affirmed, twenty five, whereas in the days of Dion Cassius, when he wrote his History, only nineteen remained, which he mentioneth in particular:

The Legions of Namely, the fecond Legion Augusta, which wintered here in the upper Britain, The Legons of Nation of Petrita, viz. One in Phemicia, called Gallica; ann-dayshare. Three that bore the Name of Tertia, viz. One in Phemicia, called Gallica; ann-maining in the ther in Arabia, called Cyrenaica; and a third called Angusta. There was a fourth known by the name of Scythica in Syria; a fifth Macedonica in Dacia; two fixths viz. one in Lower Britain, called Victrix, and another in India, named Ferrea:

there was a feventh in Upper Myfia, and called Claudia. An eighth was Augusta in the Upper Germany. Then two Decima; one called Gemella in the Upper Pannonia, and another in Myfia. An eleventh in the Upper Myfia, had the Name of Claudia, both it and the former having received the Name from Claudius, because they did not Rebel against him in the Sedition of Camillus. A twelsth was Fulminifera in Cappadocia. A thirteenth Gemella in Dacia. A fourteenth Gemella in Upper Pannonia. A fifteenth was Sirnamed from Apollo, and lay in Cappadocia. A twentieth Valeriana and Victrix had their Stations in the Upper Britain. These were the Legions of Augustus remaining when Dio wrote, the rest being either Disbanded, or by him and other Emperors mixed with other Legions, whence the Names of Gemella are thought, to have been derived.

it was put off till this time. But so was the Reveuue increased, and then Augu-

94. And because he had undertaken to speak of the Legions, he further tells us, He thinks fit to mention such as were afterwards instituted by following Princes, that those who defired to know their Originals, might understand it better in one continued discourse; Having the same Reason as he to inform the Reader, we shall follow him herein. Nero then instituted the first Legion called Italica, Such as were Wintering in the Lower Mysia: Galba the first Auxiliary in the Lower Pannoinstituted by nia; the Seventh in Spain. Vespassian the Second Auxiliary in the Lower Pannonia, and the fourth Flavia in Syria. Domitian the first Minervia (or Atheniensis) in Lower Germany. Trajan the Second Ægyptia, and the Thirtieth Germanica, to which he gave his Name. Marcus Antoninus the Second in Noricum the Third in Rhætia, which were also called Italica. Severus the First and Third Parthia in Meloporamia, and the Second Media in Italy. So many Legions Dio took notice of, besides that of the City and the Pratorian in his time. Under Augustus Twenty three or twenty five were maintained (he addes) and many other Auxiliary Companies of Horse and Foot, and Seamen, of which he knew not the certain number. The Guard (faith he) of the Emperor's Person, confifts of Ten thousand divided into ten Parties. Six thousand are appointed for Other Guards, a Guard to the City, divided into Four Companies. Then are there the Strangers, Horsemen, called Batavi, from Batavia, an Island in the Rhine, the Inhabitants of which excell in the Art of Riding; of them and of the Evocati he confeffeth he knew not the Number. Angustus then began first to use them, when he called together the Veteran Soldiers of his Father against Antony, and so kept them; and they continued to be a peculiar Body, bearing Staves as the Centurions. Upon these Accounts wanting Money, he consulted the Senate concerning the Establishment of a perpetual Revenue, whence without injuring any Perfon he might maintain and reward his Soldiers. They bufying themselves herein, and no man of his own accord feeking to be Ædilis, fome were chosen by Lot from amongst the Questors and Tribuni Plebis, and constrained to Execute the Office, as often at other times was practifed. Thus much Dio writes concerning the Legions and other Forces of the Empire, which indeed grew and increased, and again decreased as the State had need they should. Some reckon in Galba's time One and thirty Legions. In the Court of the Capitol was found a Stone, having the same Number of them as Dio, with some variety in the Names. As for the Evocati, we scarcely know what they were; but Lipsius points us to a certain place in Suetonius, which he thinks to make out the fignification of the De Magnituword. Speaking of Galba his being faluted Emperour, and of his Lifting Super-dim Rom.lib.ts numerary Soldiers above the former Army, and chusing a Council resembling a c.4 Senate, to which he would have things of confequence referred, he addes, That he made choice of Young Men of the Equestrian Order, who retaining the use of Golden Rings, were called Evocati, and were to watch about his Bed-Chamber in the room of Soldiers.

95. But such were the Forces Augustus thought sit to raise and maintain; it was another thing to procure the Money. In the Confulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus, and L. Arruntius, and the DCCLIX of the City, no Revenue could be found out whereon to fix the Expence which should be approved by all forts of perfons, who yet were vexed that there should be such need of inquiring after it. Augustus then for himself and Tiberius brought in Money to a Treasury which he named Military, and committed the Charge thereof to three Persons of Prætorian Rank chosen by Lot, and that for Three Years, who should be attended with two Littors, and other Servants; which Ceremony was observed for several years, but in Dio's time they were chosen by the Emperour, and had no Littors. But Money being thus paid in by him, and he promiting to do it every Year, feveral Kings and People also subscribed; for as for private persons, though there were also that offered, he would receive nothing. For all this Revenue would not in the least answer the Expence, and there being still need of constant supply, he ingaged the Senators every one in particular to find out a way, and deliver it in Writing to be confidered of by him; which he did not therefore do, because he found out none himself; but that they might be brought to approve that course which he was refolved to follow. Many being propounded, but none approved, he ordained that the Twentieth part of Inheritances and Legacies, those excepted which were left to the near of Kin and to the Poor, should be brought into this Military Treasury; and he did it, as having found this fort of Payment in the Commentaries of Cæfar. Indeed there had been formerly mention made of this thing,

The Roman Empire. Chap. I.

> flus ordered three Persons from amongst the Consulares to be chosen by Lot, partly to Contract, and partly to take away Expences.

A great Fa-mine at Rome.

96. But these things were no whit pleasing to the Romans, who were besides at this time afflicted with a grievous Famine: It was fo urgent, that the Gladiators and falcable Slaves were fent away to Eighty miles diftance from the City, and as well Augustus himself, as many others sent away their Servants; non-term was proclaimed; Senators were permitted to go whither they pleased: And lest the Senatusconfulta should thereby be of less force, it was decreed, That such as should be made by those that continued at Rome, should be valid. Men of Consular Dignity were appointed to Oversee the Corn and Bread, so that a certain quantity thereof should be fold to particular Persons. Augustus gave as much Corn gratis to those who were wont to receive it from the Publick, as they were wont to have; and yet all this being too little, he would not fuffer them to Eat publickly on his Birth-day. And whereas the City was in feveral Quarters much defaced by Fires, he appointed a Watch of the Libertini in feven places to prevent them, and over this Watch fet a Person of Equestrian Degree; and though he did not intend they should Continue, yet finding them very serviceable, he thought fit to Continue their Imployment; and when Dion Cafsius lived, those Night-Watchers were in being, but confifting as well of other Soldiers, as the Libertini, who had Charge also of the Walls, and received publike Wages. But the Common fort now harraffed with Famine, Tribute and Fires, was much inraged, and openly talk't many things Seditiously, and defired a Change, and many Libels were thrown about by Night, one P. Rusus being reported to be chief Author of these Mildemeanors. But the Suspicion light upon others, and indeed Rufus himself was absent, and not in Capacity to be Mover of such matters, but others under his Name went about to make an Alteration. An Inquisition was decreed to be made into the Offence; Judges were appointed, and had Salaries allotted, and fome were accused as guilty. But the Tumults ceased not in the City till the Scarcity being over, Germanicus Cæsar, and Tiberius Claudius Nero: the Sons of Drusus, in honour of their Father, set forth a Show of the Gladiators. The People was pleased that this was done in memory of Drusus, as also that Tiberius, when he dedicated the Temple of Caftor and Pollux not onely fet upon it the Name of Claudianus, (for so he called himself after he was adopted into the Family of Augustus, instead of Claudius) but of Drusus also; for it was his custom, whileit he managed Wars abroad, to come to the City as often as he might, partly to do some business, but chiefly out of fear lest Augustus should prefer any other in his Absence. This Year the Governor of Achaia dying when but half of his time was out, one part of his Province lying within the Ishmus, was affigned to his Questor, and the other part to his Legatus. Herod of Palestine being accufed by his Brethren, was banished beyond the Alpes, and part of his Dominions were made publick. Of this we shall hear from other Hands more fully than

Stirs in the

97. At this time he tells us thete were many Wars. Into many Countreys Invafions were made by Rovers, infomuch that Sardinia for feveral years had no Senator to govern it, but had Soldiers and Officers of the Equefician Rank. Not a few Cities attempted to Revolt, fo that the Provinces belonging to the People of Rome, for two years were governed not by fuch as were chosen by Lot, but by Suffrages; whereas such for many years were wont to præside over the Provinces of Cafar. The Isauri began with Depredations, but proceeded to a War, and were overthrown. The Gætuli not enduring to be subject to Juba, rose up against him, wasted his Borders, and killed many Romans, whom he imployed rogether with his own Army, and thereupon they were fo Elevated and made fuch work for Cornelius Cossus, that for subduing them he obtained Triumphal Honours, and the Sirname of Gætulicus. Several Expeditions were made into Germany, and by Tiberius as well as others, who pierced as far as Vesurgis and Albis; and yet no very memorable thing was done, though both Augustus and he received the Name of Imperator from the Germans, and C. Sentius who governed that Province had Triumphal Honours; because out of fear of them the Germans had twice made Peace with the Empire. They did not deserve to have it granted, having violated their Faith, but the Affairs of Dalmatia and Pannonia were now so unsettled, and required such speedy Correction as wrested it from the Romans. The Dalmatians not enduring the burthen of the Tributes laid upon them, having been formerly inclined to rebel, were now encouraged to perfect their Refolution, be-The Rebellion cause that Valerius Messalinus (so he calls him) the Governour of both Countries, of the Dalma. Was gone to the War which Tiberius now the second time made in Germany. At first some few rebelled, at the suggestion, especially, of one Bato Dysidiatus, and overthrew the Romans that went against them, by whose Example the rest broke out into rebellion. Then the Brenci, a People of Pannonia, taking for their Leader another Bato, went to Sirmium, which was held by a Garrison of the Romans : And might have taken it, but that Cacina Severus, who governed the Neighbouring Mysia, hearing of their Motions, met with and deseated them at the River Dranus. Notwithilanding the Victory, yet many of the Romans having faln in the Battel, the Rebels hoped they might recruit by the affiftance of their Friends, to procure which, they bent their utmost endeavours. In the mean time, Bato the Dalmatian, made an Inroad as far as Salonæ, where he received a great Bruife by a Stone, and returning without having any thing performed, tent others on the fame Errand, who wasting all the Maritime Tracts as far as Apollonia, in feveral Encounters with the Romans, both gave and received Defeats.

Augustus.

98. Tiberius having notice of these Disorders, and searing the Rebels might Invade Italy, fent before him Messalinus, and then followed with greater Forces out of Germany. Bate though not fully recovered of his Bruife, met and fought with Messalinus, and had the better of him; but afterwards was Circumvented and beaten, and then he betook himself to the other Bato Breucus, and they joyntly feized on the Hill Alma. There they were worsted by Rhymetalces the Thracian, whom Severus had fent against them, and afterward sustained the Violence of Severus himself; and when he was called away into Mysia by the Daci and Sauromatæ, there infesting that Country, and Tiberius with Messalinus flayed at Siscia, they took the advantage, and invading the Territories of the Allies of Rome, drew many into Rebellion with them. Tiberius came up with them; but they refused to give him Battel, and wandered up and down wasting all things in their passage with Celerity, to which their Skill in the Country and the lightness of their Habit did Contribute, Winter now drawing on. Some of them again invaded Macedonia, but were fet upon and defeated by Rhymetalces and Rascupolis his Brother, and the rest having their Territories depopulated, when Q. Cacilius Creticus and A. Licinnius Nerva Silanus were Consuls, left them and retired to Places more fortified by Nature, whence they made Incursions upon occasion. Augustus having notice of these passages, suspected Tiberius as out of defign to have a Command, drawing out the War in length, when he might put an end to it. Thither he fent Germanicus, now bearing the Office of Qualtor, and with him Soldiers not only ingenuous, but Freedmen, many of whom he redeemed both from Men and Women with Victuals sufficient for Six Months. As he made this Provision for the War, he put off the Choice of Equites, which was wont to be performed in the Forum, and vowed to Celebrate the Ludi Magni upon fome Prophecies pretended to be uttered by a certain inspired Woman. And though he knew well enough the was a Counterfeit, and acted a part out of Defign, yet the People being exceedingly perplexed both by reason of the Wars, and of a Dearth which again oppressed them, he made a show as if he gave credit to what the faid, and did all he could to give fatisfaction to the Multitude.

99. The charge of Provisions he again committed to two Consulares, to whom he allowed Littors. When there wanted Money for carrying on Wars, and maintaining of night-Watches, he fetled a Tribute confifting of the fiftieth part of price given for flaves; and he forbad the Money which the Quafters were wont to lay out upon the shows of Gladiators to be expended. Now that As in Ex. Disposition and Humour of Agrippa himself, was the cause, who spent his time in Fishing and at Sea, and thence took upon him the Name of Neptune, fell out into Extravagant Paffious; railed at Julia as his Step-mother; and not feldom accused Augustus as guilty of retaining his Father's Estate: when he would not be reclaimed, he was proscribed by Augustus, his Estate was confiscated to the Military Treasury, and he himself banished into Planasia, an Island near to Corsica. Now Germanicus was got into Pannonia, and all the Forces marched thither; but the two Batones observing the time when Severus came from Myfia, suddenly fell upon him as he incamped himself in the Volcaan Fens, and worsted him, after which the Romans were dispersed to invade the Enemy in several Quarters. No great matters were performed by other Parties; yet Germanicus overcame in fight, and much damnified the Macæi, a Nation of Dalmatia. The year following in the Consulship of M. Furius Camillus, and Sextus Nonius Quintilianus, both Pannonians and Dalmatians defired Peace, being distressed by Famine, and a Disease thence arising, from their feeding on Herbs and Roots, to which they were not accustomed. They defired it by their Ambassadors, and yet still made resistance through the procurement of them who expected no Security from the Romans. As Germanicus was belieging a certain strong City, and could not take it, one Pulio an Eques and German by Nation, cast a Stone at the Wall, which so broke and disordered the Battlement, that a man leaning against it, it fell down; and this fo affrighted the Defendants, that they fled into the Castle, which afterwards they yielded up with themselves. Bato the Dalmatian treated with Tiberius, and the day after being brought before him, as he fate on the Tribunal, Tiberius asked him, For what Reason they would revolt, and continue in Rebellion so long against the Romans? He answered him thus, Tou your selves are in fault, who appoint to the keeping of your Flocks not Dogs nor Shepherds, but Wolves. But so Dalmatia, partly by force of War, and partly by Composition returned into Obedience to the Romans.

100. At this time Augustus gave the Senate leave to take Cognizance of most things in his Absence, and abstained from appearing in Publick. And as in the preceding year, when Difturbances were great, he himself made all the Magistrates: now such as he would have advanced, he commended to the People. He was during the Wars in Pannonia and Dalmatia so intent upon them, that for better Correspondence, and to give Directions, he betook himself to Ariminum, whither when he went, Vows were made, and at his return Sacrifice was offered, as if he had returned from the Field. About the same time, Bato the Breucus, having betray'd Pinnes, and for a reward received the the Kingdom of the Breuci, was taken by his Namesake, the other Bato (who it seems for all his meeting with Tiberius, was still his own Man) and put to Death as he went about the Garrifons to require Hostages: He had him delivered up by some that held a Castle whither he had entred, and carrying him to the Camp, condemned him. After this, still many other Pannonians rebelled, but Silvanus had the better of them, and Bato seeing no hope to be remaining in Pannonia, fortified the Passages out of that into Dalmatia with Guards, and wasted this Country. The Pannonians Pannonia lub- feeing also their Territories harrassed by Sylvanus, received terms, though they could not for some time be restrained from Robberies; to which these Nations were extremely addicted. Tiberius against Winter, wherein Q. Sulpicius Cameri- Dio lib. 565 nus, and C. Poppæus Sabinus were Confuls, came to Rome, and was met by Augustus in the Suburbs. He brought him into the Septa, and saluting the People from the Tribunal, performed what was wont to be done at celebrating Victories, and particularly exhibited the Spellacula by the affiftance of the Confuls. The Equites now were mightily concerned to have a Law abrogated, which had been made concerning unmarried Persons, and such as had no Children. He therefore called before him such of them as were Batchellors, as also those that were Married, and to incourage the Married

101. Finding the Married fort to be far inferior in number to the unmarried, Anguitus

Maguitus

Maguit doth not make his Speeches for him, to this purpose. He applauded them both, for ferving the ends of Nature, and of civil Society. Shewed how Mankind, was ordained, Male and Female, by Conjunction, as it were, to prevent Mortali-, ty; and how without Children, as the Species it felf could not subfift, so no, Commonwealths could be supplied, either with Men for War, or Civil Imploy-, ments. He told them they alone deserved the Name of Men and of Fathers, , and as such he both praised them, and would prefer them as occasion should, ferve, to fuch Offices as they might transmit to their Children. And to some of them he presently gave rewards; and promised to do the same to others of, them. To the Batchellors, he made a Speech quite contrary, affirming, He was, marvellously troubled because of them, whom he knew not by what name to, And to the call. Not by that of men, for they performed no manly thing; not by that,

Batchellors in of Citizens, for the City might come to an end and perilli for all them; neither, behalf of Mar by that of Romans, for they intended to destroy the Roman Name. But by what; right of the Roman Name is the supplier of the Roman Name. Name foever they called themselves, or whoever they were, he said an unusual, thing had happened to him upon their Account. For he was wont to leave no-,

Chap. I.

824 thing undon, whereby to make of them a great multitude, but now he was, as forry to fee them fo many, and could have wished the number of them to, whom he spake before, to have been as great, and that they had either been. joined with them, or not feen by him: forafmuch as without having regard to, the Providence of the Gods, or the forecast of their Ancestors, they purposed to . abolish their Nation, destroy the Roman Name, and put an absolute end unto it., What feed or remainder, faith he, of Mankind would be left, if all People should, imitate you? and the beginning of mischief proceeding from you, you were, justly to sustain the blame of Universal Ruine. And it none shall follow your, example, for this very cause all must hate you, seeing you neglect that which, none other do, and introduce fuch Rules and Courfes of living, as if all would, imitate them, Mankind must fail and be lost; but if it hate and disapprove them, you must be condemned. He affirmed, That all Crimes laid together, would, not equal theirs. For they committed Murther in not suffering those to be born, , which ought to proceed from them; they were guilty of Impiety, in forcing, the Names and Honours of their Ancestors to cease; they were Sacrilegious in . abolishing their Kind, which proceeded from the Immortal gods, and destroying, Humane Nature, the greatest thing consecrated to them; and in this respect they, overturned their Temples, and their Altars; they diffolved the City in not obey. ing its Laws; betrayed their Country by making it Barren and unfruitful; nay,, utterly demolished the City, in depriving it of Inhabitants. For a City con-, fifts not in Houses, Porticus's or Forums void of Inhabitants; but in Men.

102. He farther bad them confider what Romulus their Founder would think, of them; and if he would not be angry to purpose, when he compared his Ori-, ginal with their course of life, who refused to beget Children even by lawful Mar-, riage. And what those Romans that were with him would think, recollecting, that they raviihed Virgins that were Strangers; whereas these their Posterity would not love those that were of the same stock with themselves; that they, entred into War to procure an Offspring, and these would not endeavour to have Children by their fellow Citizens. He urged the case of Curtius, who died that the Romans might not want Marriage, and of Herfilia that followed her, Daughter, and shewed to the Citizens Nuptial Rites. In truth their Ancestors, he faid, in behalf of Marriage, waged War with the Sabines, and that Peace, was made, which they by their coelibacy did break and dissolve. And to what, purpose, and with what design? to live in coelibacy as the Vestal Virgins? If so,, they ought to be punished as well as they, if they did not preserve their Cha-, stiry. He told them, they ought not to be displeased, at what he said, for if, they were displeased with his words, he, and their sellow Citizens had much, more reason to be displeased with their Actions. Therefore if they found themfelves touched, he advised them to repent, that in stead of reprehending, he, might commend and thank them for the time to come, as owning what a good, Legislator ought to establish. He told them, That before his time it was not. lawful for any to neglect Marriage and Posterity; Laws having been made. against it at the first founding of the Commonwealth, and the Senate and People having fince that, ordained many things against it. That he had increased, the Mulct of unmarried Perfons to render them Obedient, and appointed fuch, Rewards to the Obedient, as never formerly had been proposed, as an Incourage., ment for any Virtue; that if nothing elfe, yet these Advantages might provoke, them to Wedlock, and the Procreation of Children. But for their parts, they, neither defiring the Rewards, nor regarding the Penalties, but as if they lived. in no Society or Commonwealth, gave out that they made choice of a Life that . was free and void of trouble, without Matrimony or Children; whereas in fo doing they were no better than Thieves and Robbers, and the most savage Beasts. For really they were not so far taken with any solitary kind of life, as to live, without Women, or not to have a Bedfellow or Companion at the Table, but . by this course studied how to gratifie their wanton Lust and Appetite.

103. Yet he had permitted them to court fuch Virgins as were not quite ripe, for Marriage, that pretending to the title of Sponfi, who would shortly cele-, brate the Nuptials, they might the more look after their Families; and he had, allowed the Marriage of Libertina to those that were not Patricians. Neither, had he put them upon any hafte, having given them first the space of three years, , and then of two. But neither by threatning, exhorting, deferring or intreating,, had he gained any thing. They could not but perceive how many more they, were than the Married men, whereas they ought to have produced as many, nay,, as many more in their Progeny. By what other course was the Nation to be, continued? How could the Commonwealth be preserved without Wives and, Children, except they expected the Fable to be fulfilled of Persons rising out of, the Earth? For shame he bad them esteem it the greatest wickedness after the, Extinguishment of the Roman Stock and Name; to deliver over their City to, Strangers, whether Greeks or Barbarians. Shall we, faith he, for this reason, manumit our Slaves because we would have many Citizens? Shall we give, freedom of the City to our Affociates, that it may be filled with People, and, you who from the first Original are Romans, having reckoned up the Quinti,, Valerii, and Julii, resolve together with your selves to destroy all such Names, and Families? I am ashamed with words to set forth what it is that you practice., Therefore put a flop to your madness, and now at length consider, that many, of us being confumed with Wars and Diseases, the City cannot be safe, except it, be supplied with a stock of Children. Yet let no body think I am ignorant that, there are some difficult and troublesom Occurrents in Marriage and Procreation, of Children; but you ought to confider, that there is nothing good that hath, not some bitterness mixed with it; that the greatest and most excellent injoy-, ments have many fad and harsh things joyned with them, which if you would, decline, you must not defire the good themselves, seeing we cannot attain to, fincere Virtue or Pleasure, except labour be used to attain them. Though Ma-, trimony have its Inconveniences, yet compare the Advantages and them to-, gether, and you shall find them over-ballanced by far, not only as to the Con-, veniences which the thing in its own Nature affords, but as to the Rewards also, proposed by the Laws, of which a little part doth allure some men to undergo, Death it felf; and these ought to induce you all to obey me. And it's a shameful thing, if for the same reason you will not marry Wives, and bring up Chil-, dren, for which others will not stick to give their lives. I thought fit (Citizens,, for I hope you are now perfuaded to retain this Name, and to accept of those of, Husbands and Fathers) thus to expostulate with you, unwillingly truly, but, out of necessity; not as an Enemy, or one that hates you, but out of love, and defire to have many like your felves; fo that inhabiting lawful Houses, and, having our Habitations full of a Roman Offspring, we may approach to the gods, with our Wives and Children, and Communicating with one another in all, Publick things may converse together in the injoyment of them. For how can, I be faid to govern you, if I fuffer always some part of you to be diminished?, How can I be called any more your Father, if you beget no Offspring ? There-, fore if you really love me, and have given me the Name of Father, for Honour,, and not out of Flattery, do your endeavour to become Husbands and Fathers;, so that you may be partakers of it, and I my self may not bear it in vain., Having spoken in this manner to both forts, he increased the Rewards of such as had Children, and made a difference by fetting a Mulct upon Batchellors, yet fo, as he gave them the space of a year to consider; and such as would obey him should be free from the Mulct. Nay, he was fo kind, that whereas by the Law called Lex Voconia, Women were Prohibited to come to any Inheritance above a certain Sum, he loofed fome from that Obligation; and bestowed upon such as had vowed perpetual Virginity, the time Rewards as upon Mothers. In order to these things, was framed the Law Pappia Poppæa, preferred by M. Pappius Mutilus, and E. Poppæas Secundus, who being Consuls for part of the year, neither of them had either Wives or Children; by which very thing Dio suggests how necessary it was that that Law should be made.

104. While these things were done at Rome, the Romans that with Germanicus, marched against Rhætinum, a City of Dalmatia, received loss by Fire, wherewith the belieged did furround them, and retired themselves within the Castle. Several Towns were taken, yet many still held out, and a Famine being by this means occasioned in Italy, Augustus sent Tiberius again into Dalmatia. He perceiving the Soldiers were impatient to finish the War, though it were with danger to the State, that being together, they might be able to plot new Matters, divided them into three Parties, whereof one he committed to Silanus, another to M. Lepidus, and with the third he and Germanicus went against Bato. Silanus and Lepidus without difficulty overcame their Adversaries in Battel. Teberius over-ran the Country, and still pursued Bato, till he besieged him in a Castle called Anderium, which was extraordinarily fortified by fituation, and that Pro-Nnnnn 2 vision they had made within for such extremity. Nay, they laid Ambuscado's to flop the beliegers from forage, fo that Tiberius belieging them, in a manner was befieged. He knew not what to do, the Siege being troublefom and dangerous, and yet he thought it would be very ignominious to raife it, and the Soldiers fell into a Mutiny, with fuch a noise that the Enemy who watched under the Castle out of very lear retired from their Station. Tiberius being partly pleafed and partly angry at what had paffed, both rebuked and commended his Army, and yet not daring to ftir, he kept himself quiet till such time as Bato sent and defired Peace, and his Allics being not perfuaded to imbrace it, he forfook them, and refused to give them any relief upon demand. Hereupon Tiberius despised them that kept the Castle, and resolving to Storm it, moved his Men by Arguments to mount the Precipice on which it ftood, and by conftant Supplies to incouraged them, that part of the Defendants having iffued out and betaken themselves to the Woods, were purfued and knock'd on the head like so many Sheep, and those in the Castle yeilded it up upon Conditions, which Tiberius performed. After this Germanicus took a Fort called Arduba, and Postumius reduced other places. Now did Bato fend his Son Sceva to Tiberius, and offered if he might be accepted to deliver up himself and all his into the Power of the Romans. Having received his Faith, he came by Night into the Camp, and being the day after brought before Tiberius, fitting on the Tribunal, he did not at all deprecate his own Punishment, but stretching out his Head as to be cut off, used many words to excuse his Companions, and being again asked by Tiberius, why they had Rebelled, and folong continued the War? He answered, That the Romans themselves were the cause of it, who fent not Dogs nor Shepherds, but Wolves to keep their Flocks. Thus Die by degrees and order of time, what Paterculus tells in short.

He composed 105. After this fort was this War composed, with small advantage on the Roman fide, much Money being expended, many Legions being maintained, and but very little booty got. But Germanicus brought the News of the Victory, for which the Title of Imperator was added to Augustus and Tiberius, a Triumph decreed them, and two Triumphal Arches in Pannonia, on which Trophies were Honours voted to be placed. To Germanicus were decreed Triumphal Ornaments, as to others of the Captains, and Prætorian Honours: they voted that first after the Consulares, he should give his Opinion, and being loosed from the Laws, might stand for the Confulfhip fooner than usual. It was farther decreed, That Drujus the Son of Tiberius, though he had no part in the War, might before he was taken into the Order, come into the Senate, and having executed the Quaftorship, speak his Opinion before those of Pratorian quality. Such things were decreed, but News brought out of Germany, spoiled all the Sport of the Triumphs. The Romans in that Country held feveral Places, but not altogether, but as they were brought into fubjection by chance here and there, and therefore in Histories, no mention is made of them. But however in those places they had their Winter Quarters, and built Towns; the Barbarians admitted of their ways and Customs, and met with them at the Forum, yet so as not to forget their own Customs, and the liberty of their Country. Now was Quintilius Varus fent to govern there, one born, if you will hear Paterculus, rather of an Illustrious than a Noble Family, a Man Illustri magis both as to Body and Mind addicted to rest, and accustomed to the idleness of the quan nobili Camp, rather than Action, but not a Contemner of B ney, as Syria bore witness; which being Rich (as Prefident) he entered Poor, but left it Poor coming away Rich. He thought the Germans as tame as Sheep, and having nothing but the Voice and Members of Men, though they could not be conquered with the Sword, yet might be tamed by Laws. He therefore fpent his time amongst them in Careffes, and deciding Controversies, yet even then he would Command them as Roman Slaves, and exact Money of them as from Subjects. The Germans could not brook his management of Matters, and the rather because the chiefest of them were sensible of the loss of the Supreme Command, and impatient to have it restored to their Country. But seeing many Romans to live about the Rhine, and many amongst themselves, they durst not break out into open Rebellion, but so humoured Varus as ready to obey him in all things. They pretended great Controversies amongst themselves, and drew him from the Rhine to the Territories of the Cherusci, and the River Visurgis.

106. There living securely in perfect Peace, they persuaded him that without the affiftance of the Soldiers, he might hold them in that Subjection. And he was to filly as being in an Enemie's Country, not to keep together his Men, and in one place, but distributed many of them to several weaker People of Germany, who defired to have them upon pretence of fecuring the Garrisons for feizing Highway-Men, and conveyance of Provisions. There was a young Man, Noble in Birth, Valiant of his hand, of quick apprehension, and of a prompt Wit, for a Barbarian, by Name Arminius, the Son of Sigimer, Prince of that Nation, who by his very Eyes and Countenance discovering the ardour of his Mind, had formerly been a diligent Attendant in the Roman Wars, and had obtained the Jus Civitatis, and the Equestrian Degree: He well knowing, that no man can fooner be ruined than he who hath no apprehension of danger, and that the most frequent beginning of Calamity is Security, abused the Sottish humour of the General, who conversing with him every day, and being told of Plots that were to be against his Person, would not believe the Informers, but bad them have a care of themselves. Then by Conspiracy did some of the furthest Germans make an Insurrection, with defign that Varus going to suppress it, might pass through the Territories of those he supposed his Friends, and be the more liable to Destruction. They had so orordered their Affairs, that he should have no Forces at hand to rescue him, and those Romans that they had received in several places, as was said, they put to Death. Then did they fet upon him as he went through a Wood, which was very difficult to pass, when he had not the least apprehension of any mischief, but marched in his Rear very diforderly.

Chap. I.

The Defeat of 107. Abundance of Rain falling, took away from the Romans the use of their Varye, and the Arms; fo that more Germans pouring themselves upon them, they were cut down and flain; Varus and other of the Principal Officers left they should fall into the Enemies Hands, killed themselves. This being understood, none of the Soldiers made any refistance, but either followed their Example, or cast away their Arms, and exposed themselves to the Sword. Now were both Men and Horses killed without any opposition, and all the Romans had either been flain or taken this day but that the Germans hurried away to take the Booty; whereby it came to pass, that the most hardy sscaped, and the Trumpeters sounding, it being now dark, the Enemy believed that some Succours were sent to them by Asprenas. This belief reftrained the Germans from purfuing, and Asprenas indeed as soon as he had notice, hasted to their relief. But thus were cut off in a manner three Legions, as many Alæ, and fix Cohorts; an overthrow the greatest of all the Romans received fince that of Crassus from the Parthians. This was the most valiant Army they had, and the chiefest for Discipline, Strength and Experience, as Paterculus, who then lived affures us, who adds, that the General had a greater mind to die, than to fight, flabbing himfelf, as his Father and Grandfather had done before him. Of the two Prafeits of the Camp, as L. Eggius gave a good example of Valour, fo Ceionius afforded as bad, who after that most of the Soldiers were cut off, became the Author of yeilding, and chose to die rather as a Malesactor by Punishment, than in Battel. But Volumnius the Legatus of Varus, being otherwise a quiet, and anhonest man, deserted the Foot, and ran away with the Alæ of Horse to the Rhine, which fact fortune it felf revenged; for he did not furvive the deferted; but himself perished a Desertor: The Body of Varus when half burnt, the furious Enemies tore in pieces. His Head was cut off and carried to Maroboduus, who fent it to Cafar, and at length it was honoured with the Sepulture of his

108. When Augustus had the News of the Defeat, he was afflicted in an extraordinary manner. He had in all his life-time, as Suetonius tells us, but two great overthrows, and they were both received in Germany, viz. that of Lollius, and this of Varus: that of Lollius brought more Infamy than loss, but this of Varus he terms almost exitiable, three Legions with the General, the Legati, and all the Auxilia being cut off. Upon notice of it, he fet Guards up and down the City, that no Tumults might be raifed upon this occasion, continued the Government to the Præsidents of Provinces, as by their experience most sit to keep the Associates in order. To Jupiter he vowed the great Games if he restored the Commonwealth into a better condition as had been done in the Wars of the Cimbri and Mark. It was reported, That he was fo far dejected with the lofs, that he let his Beard and the hair of his Head grow for feveral Months; fortimes would knock his Head against the Dores, and roar out, Restore the Legions, Quintilius Varus; and he observed the Day of the Defeat every year, as a Day of Mourning. Dio tells us, he feared the Germans and Galls would be in Italy, and was fertible that their Roman youth was inconfiderable, and the Auxilia of the Affociates were much diffressed. Yet he fet himfelf all manner of ways he could, and as the prefent posture of Affairs would permit, to prevent mischief. For as much as such as were of the Military Age would not give their Names to the Service. Some on whom the lot iell, he punished by Confiscation of their Estates, and branding them with Infamy; and this not being effectual, but that many yet disobeyed, some he punished with Death. Then gathering by lot from amongst the Veteran Soldiers, and the Li-Lertini, as great a Force as he could make, he dispatched it away under Command of Tiberius into Germany. And there being many Galls and Germans at Rome, fome upon the account of Travel, and others ferving in the Guards, he difarmed and fent them out of the City. These things he did, and the usual Sports, and other things were omitted. But hearing afterwards that some Soldiers survived the Defeat, that a Guard was put upon Germany, and the Enemy durst not pass the Rhine, he was freed from his terror, and began to examine the matter. He suspected that so sudden and great a mischief came by the Anger of their gods, declared by Prodigies both before and after, which Dio relates.

Tiberias in-

809. Tiberius made an Invasion into Germany, together with Germanicus, who vades Goman had the Power of Proconful. Some Parts of it they wasted, but subdued no Nato fmall pur-pose. tion thereof, fighting not one Battel, nor ingaging with any Enemy, for, whatever Paterculus may talk in commendation of Tiberius, Dio writes, that they were in heavy fear of another overthrow, and stirred not far from the Rhine, but kept themselves somewhere thereabouts till Autumn, at which time having celebrated the Birth-day of Augustus with Games, and by the help of the Centurions, having had the Exercises of Horsemen, they returned into Italy. Now at Rome , Drusus Cafar the Son of Tiberius was Quafter, and fixteen Prators were made, for fo many stood for the Office, and Augustus in this conjuncture of Affairs, would difgust no man, though in many years that followed there were but twelve. He forbad Fortune-tellers either privately or before others to prædict the Death of any man, not that he was folicitous concerning himfelf, for he publickly exposed to view the Scheme of the Heavens, under which he was born. Healfo required of all that were subject to his Command, that they should not give any Honour to any of the Governors in the time of their Administration, nor within fixty days after their departure, because many by virtue of the Honours and Applauses they received in the Provinces bore themselves high, and did very bad things. To Ambassadors at this time three Senators gave Answers. And, which was accounted wonderful, Equites were permitted to fight in the Exercises of the Gladiators, fome of them counting it no Ignominy; and an Edict having been published to restrain them: notwithstanding they were resolute, and the more, because their Combats were greedily beheld, and Augustus himself was present with the Prators who distributed the Rewards.

110. After this Germanicus bore the Office of Conful together with C. Capito, though he had not yet executed the Office of Prator, and did nothing worthy of Memory, but only over-ballanced his Colleague. But Augulus now grown very old, by Writing recommended Germanicus to the Senate, and the Senate to Tiberius. He himself being not in a condition, did not read the Writing, but Germanicus, as he was wont to do. Having made an excuse about the German War, he defired of the Senate that they would not falute him at his own House, nor take it ill if for the time to come he did not publickly converse with them, for it had been the Custom frequently to falute him, especially when the Senate was held, in the Court, and Forum, as he went in or out, and as he fat or lay in the Palace, not only of Senators, but Equites, and some Plebeians; yet for all this did he not cast off the care of the Commonwealth. For he granted to Equites a Right to stand to be Tribuni Plebis, and he commanded an Inquisition to be made after Libels, which being found in the City should be burnt by the Ædiles, and out of the City by the Governors of the feveral places; and he animadverted upon some of the Authors of them. And whereas it was found that of many Perlons that were Banished, some lived out of the places to which they were confined, and others too delicately there where they were appointed to abide, he ordained, that none of those to whom Water and Fire were forbidden, should remain in the Continent, or in any Island which was not fifty miles distant from the Continent, Coos, Rhodes, Sardinia, and Lesbus excepted, though Dion Cassius knows not for what reason. He forbad they should pass over any whither, or have any more Vessels than one of Burthen, containing a Thousand Amphora; and two for Sailing; neither above twenty Slaves or Freed-men; nor possess above fifty thousand Nummi; in case of Disobedience, he both threatned to punish the Exiles. and fuch as affifted them in the breaking of these Laws.

111. When L. Munatius, and C. Silius were Confuls, Augustus undertook, unwilling, the Government for ten years, now the fifth time. He Prorogued the Tribunitial Authority to Tiberius; he granted to Drusus his Son, Power to stand for the Consulfhip in the third year, though he had not born the Prætorship; and not coming now into the Senate himself by reason of his old Age, he defired to have twenty Councellors for a year affigned him, whereas formerly he was wont to have fifteen for fix Months. It was Decreed that whatever he refolved upon with those, the Consuls, and Consuls designed, his adopted Nephews, and others he at any time affumed, after deliberation, should be of the same force and virtue as if they had been Voted in the Curia. These things were ordered by a Senatusconsultum, though he had the Power before, and as he lay upon his Bed he would give Judgment. The Payment of a twentieth part of Inheritances lately mentioned, feemed generally a grievous burthen, and some stirs it was feared would happen upon it. Hereupon he fent a Writing to the Senate, wherein he defired they would confider and find out some other ways of raising Money; and this he did not to abrogate that way of Tribute, but that they finding out no one more convenient, it might be established by them, though unwilling, and the Odium be taken off from himself. But because if Germanicus and Drufus should speak their Opinions, the Senate might think they spake as he directed them, and so might leave the matter undiscussed, he forbad them to give any Vote at all. The Debate in the Senate was very high about it, and by Letters he was told, that fome would indure any thing fooner than the twentieth part, whereupon he transferred the Payment upon Lands and Houses, and speedily without showing how it should be paid, fent Officers up and down to take an account of the Wealth both of Cities and private Men, that out of fear of greater expence they might submit to the twentieth part. And his Design had its Success. But now in the Augustalia, or Games celebrated upon Augustus his Birth-day, it happened that a Mad-man sate down in the Seat of fulius Cassar, and taking away his Crown, put it upon his own Head; and in the Opinion of Dio, it did really portend (as it was imagined) fomthing to Augustus; for in the following year wherein Sex. Apuleius, and Sex. Angujus dies. Pompeius were Confuls, going into Campania, and having exhibited the Spellacula at Naples, he died at Nola.

Chap. I.

112. His Wife Livia was suspected by some as having set him forward to another World. For not long before, he had gone without her knowledge into the Island to his Nephew Agrippa, and he seemed now to be reconciled to him, which she fearing might amount to as much at length as to deliver up the Empire into his hands, was thought to poifon fome particular Figs, as they grew in the Garden, and to avoid suspicion, to have her self eaten the wholsom ones from the fame tree. His Death is faid to have been foreshewn by some tokens the year wherein he died. He made his third Census, in the Lustrum whereof were found Four Millions and one hundred thirty feven thousand Polls of Roman Citizens. Celebrating the Lustrum in the Campus Martius, with great concourse of People, an Eagle they say slew about him several times, and directing her flight to a Chappel, fat down over the Name of Agrippa, at the first letter. Augustus considering this, commanded Tiberius to make those Vows, which it was the Cuitom to make for the following Lustrum. For though the Tables were written and ready, yet he refused to undertake that which he should not perform. About the same time the first Letter of his Name on his Statue in the Capitol was struck out by a Thunderbolt. Hereupon the Fortune tellers faid, he should live only One hundred days longer, which was signified by the letter C and was to be reckoned amongst the gods, \mathcal{A} far the rest of the Name in the Hetruscan Language, fignifying a God. In the mean time he wrote a Breviary of his Actions, which he commanded to be cut in Brass and set before his Mausoleum. His time being come, he sent for his inward Acquaintance, and fpoke what he had a mind to recommend to them, and told them this, That he received Rome made of Brick, but left it of Marble; by which expression, Dion Cassius tells us, he did not mean the Elegancy of the Structure, but the firmness of the Empire. Some say he called for a Looking-Glass, caused his hair to be Combed, and his wrinkled Cheeks smoothed up. Then like an Actor upon the Stage, he asked his Friends if he had performed his Part well, and upon their answer yea, he said Plaudite, and so died in the imbraces of his beloved Wife Livia, bidding her remember their Marriage, and farewel. He died in the fame Room as did Ottavius his Father, and on the fame Day (August the Nineteenth) on which he entred upon his first Consulship, having lived Seventy fix years, all but thirty five days, having held the Monarchy from the Battel at Allium, as Dio computes, forty four years, wanting thirteen days, in the Seven hundred fixty feventh year of the City, the fecond of the One nundred ninety eighth Olympiad, the fifty feventh after the Death of Julius Cafar, and the fitteenth after the Birth of Christ, Sextus Pompeius, and Sextus Apuleius being Confuls.

813. He was the Founder of the Roman Monarchy, his Uncle having been rather the chalker of it out. He obtained it with the Destruction of many Persons, and spared none to make way for his Purposes. Faults he had. He deceived Pompey under colour of Peace, and Lepidus under a show of Friendship, as some observed. He drew on Antony with the Treaties of Tarentum and Brundulium, and with the marriage of his Sifter, which deceitful Alliance, they fay, cost the other his life. A Peace followed this, but a bloody one, as witness the Death of Lollius and Varus, and in Rome it self of Varro, Egnatius, and Julius. It was objected against him, that he took Nero's Wife from him, and asked the Opinion of the Pontifex in a Scoff; Whether there might be a lawful Marriage betwixt them, she being still with Child by her former Husband. They forgot not the lasciviousnels, and Riot (so Tacitus writes) of L. Atedius and Vedius Polito, and to be fure not the demeanour of Livia, whom they esteemed a burthenfom, nay intollerable Mother to the Commonwealth; and to the House of the Casars, a dangerous Stepdame. They added, that there was no honour left for the gods, seeing he would himself by the Priests and Flamines be worshipped in the Temples, with all the Ornaments belonging to their Deities. They judged that Tiberius was designed Successor, neither out of love to himself, nor care of the Commonwealth, but out of a deep infight into his lofty and bloody difpofition and defign, that being fo unequally compared with him, he might win glory afterward to himself. For though not many years before, he had uttered Honourable Speeches in the Senate concerning Tiberius; yet when he moved for the Tribuneship to be again renewed to him, he interlaced in his Speech fome things concerning his Attire and Behaviour, which in excufing of him feemed to turn to his Reproach. But on the other fide we have feen how kind and Popular he was. His Defects cannot be excused; but they must needs be heard, who in his Commendation alledge, that the Empire he bounded with the Ocean and other Rivers at a great distance, that the Legions, Provinces, and Navy were conjoyned in Peace and Unity, Justice was administred in the Cities, the Allies treated with Civility, the City beautified with fumptuous Buildings, and if rigorous dealing had been used against some few, it was settling of Peace and quictness in the whole.

CHAP. II.

From the Death of Augustus, to that of Tiberius.

The space of Twenty and two years, seven Months, and odd Days.

THE Death of Augustus was not presently known. For Livia fearing lest Tiberius being as yet in Dalmatia, some stirs might happen to his difadvantage, concealed it till his coming. So Die tells us most Au-thors, and those most worthy belief delivered; though there were not wanting. who wrote that Tiberius was with Augustus in his Sickness, and received something in Command from him. Tacitus makes it a doubt, whether Tiberius found him alive or dead; For Livia had befet the House, and gave out words sometimes as if he recovered, and having made all fure as the time and occasion required, the same rumour, which not long before gave hopes of Augustus his Amendment, now published his Death, and that Nero was in possession of the Empire. The Body of Augustus was by the Principals of the several Cities born from Nola to Rome in Course; it was received by the Equites, and brought to Rome in the Night. The day after, the Senate affembled, to which the other Senators came onely in the Equestrian Habit, and the Magistrates in the Senatorian, except the Pratexta. Tiberius and his Son Drufus came in common Mourning, and offered Incense at their coming, omitting the Trumpeter. The Senators sate in their usual places, but the Consuls lower, one on the Bench of the Pratorians, and the there on that of the Tribuni Plebis. Impunity was granted to Tiberius, for having touched, which was by Law forbidden, and accompanied the Body. Then did one Polybius a Libertus of Cæfar, read the Testament of Augustus, it not being thought fit that a Senator should read it; wherein he left most he had to Tiberius nis will read and Livia: Senates and Livia: For he had defired of the Senate, That he might have leave to give her more than was permitted by the Laws. He gave Legacies to many private perfons, to those of the Pretoria Guards, and every Inhabitant of Rome. To the Sons of fuch as had left him their Heir, he commanded that the Inheritances should be restored; which indeed had been his practice all along. He was kind to the Children of other men, but his own Daughter he would not reduce into her Countrey; nay; he forbad she should be buried in his Sepulchre, though he

2. Befides his Will, four Writings more were produced in the Senate. In one And four o-ther Writings he had left Instructions concerning his Funeral in In another, an Enumeration ther Writings he had left Instructions concerning his Funeral in Instruction Pillars of was made of his Atchievements, which he Commanded should be cut in Pillars of Bras, and exposed before his Sepulchre. The third Writing contained an Account of the Number of the Forces; of the Publick Revenues and Issues; of what Money was in the Treasurie, and other things belonging to the Publick Government. In the fourth he gave advice to Tiberius and the Commonwealth. Amongst other things it was his Opinion, That many Slaves should not be manumitted, left the City should be pestered with a croud; nor many be made free of the City, that they might preserve a difference betwixt themselves and their Subjects. Then he would have their commit the Government to those that were molf qualified for it, and not to put too much upon one man, left he should turn Tyrant, or in his Ruin the Commonwealth might receive danger. He charged them to be content with their present Fortune, and not to desire to inlarge the Bounds of the Empire; for it being difficult to keep so much as they had already nomines of the Empire's to state of the what they had already. And that this was his Opinion, He refitting not only by Words but Actions, for though he might have brought many Barbarians under, yet he never would. His Funeral was performed in great State, and an Eagle let loofe from the Pile as to carry his Soul to Heaven. Livia, and with her the chiefest of the Equites continued in the place five dayes, to gather up his Bones and put them into the Monument. Men mourned for him according to the Custom not many dayes, but Women an whole Year, as had been decreed. Indeed few really mourned for him at present, but afterwards all found reason to do it, whil'it they had the fad occasion to compare him and his Successor together: But now at present, Temples were creeked to him, and a Summe of Money was given by $oldsymbol{T}$ iberius.

Livia to Numerius Atticus a Senator, and one of Pratorian Degree, for having fworn that He faw him afcending up into Heaven, as Proculus antiently had faid of Romulus.

3. Tiberius was by birth a Patrician, had liberal Education, and a Wit more than ordinary. He made no show of aiming at such things as he defired, and would use discourses contrary to his design; denying what he desired, and seeming to content to what he difliked. By the practice of him and his Mother, Agrippa Polthumus was Murdered e're the death of Augustus was known. He had fecured the Soveraignty fufficiently by strong Hand, though he played the Dissembler most egregiously, refusing the Government so long as till the Senators fell down at his feet, and befought him to accept of it; whom he answered with ambiguous words, and at length complaining that a miferable and intollerable Servitude was imposed on him, received it as by constraint, and yet so as he feemed to fignifie that he would again relinquish it. Indeed there was cause for him to fay, as he did, that he took a Wolf by the Ears. For Clemens the Slave of Agrippa had got a confiderable party together, under pretence of revenging his Lord's death: Scribonius Libo fecretly plotted his own advancement, and the Legions both in Germany and Illyricum mutined, the former chusing Germanicus for their Prince, who earnestly refused to accept of their Offer, and at length quieted them with much ado, as Drusus did the other in Pannonia, they being trighted into obedience by a total Eclipse of the Moon, which fell out on the 27th. of September, five hours after Midnight. Clemens was apprehended, and Libo not effecting any thing, was in the fecond year accused to the Senate. Tiberius in the mean while looking carefully to himself, notwithstanding these motions, obtained the Supream Power, betwixt which and his rule with Augustus for two years there was this difference; That his former Command extended onely to the Armics and Provinces subject to Augustus, but this to the City it felf Mistress of all. Formerly he had Tribunitial and Censorian Power; but now he became Monarch, and was loofe or exempt from all power of Laws, as Augu-Itus beiore him. For he had not together with him when living, so equal authority as afterwards L. Verus had with M. Antoninus the Philosopher; which two first governed the Commonwealth upon equal terms; but such like as Antoninus Pius had with Adrian, who also adopted him, and made him his Collegue in the Proconfular power as to Provinces, and in the Tribunitial power at home. And therefore Suetonius telleth us, that Tiberius first affembled the Senate by virtue of In Tiberio first affembled the Senate by virtue of Cap. 23, his Tribunitial Office onely.

4. Tiberius at first carried himself (as ever in some cases) very cunningly, cloak- Sutton in Tibe-Tiberias at first ing with marvelous diffimulation those enormities which afterwards appeared. For 110 Camp 26.27.

fome time he counterfeited incredible patience, flooped too low in his complement- 28,000. The ing of Senators and Magistrates, rejected all high Titles and Honours (not enduring the name of Dominus or Lord) and consulted the Senate continually, not doing little or much without its confent; nay, fuffering fome things therein to be carried against his mind; he was also at first very temperate in his diet, and exact in reforming manners, by degrees falling into his natural humour. From the beginning he was much afflicted with the fame of Germanicus, his Brother Drufus his Son by Nature (begotten of Antonia the younger, Daughter of Antony the Triumvir, by Octavia the Sister of Augustus, concerning which Antonia, Pliny reporteth that she never spate) and his own by adoption; who now prosperously carried on the War in Germany. Within two or three years a very plaufible occafion presented it felf for the calling of him back from those Legions which were to much at his devotion. For it hapned then that the Parthians were in great commotions about their Kings. Phraates had twenty feven years before for his own fecurity fent four of his Sons as Hostages to Rome, through the procurement of his Wife Thermusa an Italian woman, which having been formerly his Concu- Josephus Anbine had then a Son by him, and that this her Son might obtain the Crown, tiquit 11b. 12. got the rest to be sent out of the way, and then they two murdered the King. This Bastard called Phraataces reigned; but being hated by the People for his Paricide, was not long after flain, and then was fet up one Orodes of the Family of the Arfacidae, who being also hated for his cruelty came to the same end. Then Tacitus Annai. fent the Parthians for one of the Hostages, and Vonones the eldest was dismissed 1.2. by Tiberius. But they counting it a diffrace for any to reign over them, who (as they termed it) had been a flave to Cælar, rebelliously cast him off, and called in Artabanus, who then reigned in Media, and was also one of the Arfacidæ or the Blood Royal of Parthia. He at his first entrance was repulsed by Vonones: but the fecond time overthrew him, and got possession of the Kingdom. Vonones retiring into Armenia fent to Tiberius for aid, who, for that Artabanus threatned hard, and the principal of the Armenians were of his faction, did not think fit to make War upon him: therefore Vonones yielded himself to Creticus Silanus, who governed Syria, and Artabanus fet Orodes, one of his own Sons over Armenia. At the fame time Antiockus King of Commagena dying, a contention arole between his cap. 49. the Nobility and Commons; the former would have the Countrey reduced into Tacitus at the form of a Roman Province, but the people were for a King. Now also Philo Prins. pator King of Cilicia being dead, his subjects were divided upon the very same grounds. Syria alfo, and Judwa being weary of their burthens, defired a diminution of their Tributes.

5. Tiberius now perfuaded the Senate that the abilities of Germanicus were re-them cap. 43. quifit for quieting the East, whereupon the Provinces beyond the Seas were decreed to him, with larger power than had been granted to any that governed them, either by lot or the gift of the Prince. Germanicus was often importuned by Tiberius upon this ground to return, yet intent upon his business he first subdued feveral Nations in Germany, and by the overthrow of Arminius obtained great glory, which was fomthing obscured at last by a Shipwrack. It was the defign of Tiberius to expose him unto danger and treachery; therefore he removed Silanus his friend, and put Cn. Pifo a troward man into his room, to whom he gave in charge some secret thing as many believed. Germanicus, being thus expelled to compose the assure in the East, as * one truly termeth it, placed Zeno the Sound in Compose Son of Polemo Kingot Pontus over Armenia. Q. tence of quiet-tence of quiet-ing the fast exposes him to danger and Rome. and there bears will him to the was at Rhodes, and therefore was called to Rome, and there kept till his Death. Q. Servæus also was set over Commagena. Artabanus fent to Germanicus about renewing the league, and good correspondence, defiring that Vonones might not be kept in Syria, nor fuffered by his Meffengers to fow discord amongst the People, offering him also leave to come to the bank of Euphrates; to which he answered, as became the State and himself. For Germanicus there was an universal mourning, not only in Rome and the Provinces, but also amongst Barbarians and Enemies themselves. He was a Person excellently accomplished, and of a most sweet disposition, whereby he became the love and delight of the People, and Augustus long debating with himself whether he should not leave him his Succeffor, at length caused Tiberius to adopt him, who tisthought, being restrained by fear, and reverence of him, after his Death broke out into such courses as made the other more missed and glorious. By his Wife Agrippina (the Daughter of Agrippa and Julia) he died Father of three Sons, viz. Nero, Drufus, and Caius; and of as many Daughters. He died in the thirty fourth year of his Age, and that which followed his second Consulfit, M. Junius Solanus, and C. Nor-

Drafus had the year before the Tribunitial Power conferred on him; but for that he was none of the most towardly, was little regarded by his Father, who as foon as his Funeral was over, returned to his wonted Employments, forbidding any longer vacation upon his accornt. The Inha-Sunon in Tionbitants of Ilium fending their Ambassadors something too late to condole his death, vio cap. 52. he answered, that He also was forry for the death of Hector their excellent Countreyman. Tiberius after this commended the two Sons of Germanicus, Nero and Drusus, to the Senate; which done, Sejanus began to strike at them, though at first through the fides of their Mother, labouring to bring them all into suspicion and hatred. The first advantage he took was from the Prayers of the Priests, who made Vows for their Health, as for that of Tiberius; for he took it hainously, that they here Tacitus at fain should be made equal to him. Then did he provoke them, and never ceased pra. till he caused them to be declared Enemies by the Senate, after which he starved them to death, using also their Mother most injuriously, for that she was not fparing of her Tongue in reprehending and upbraiding him. Now was Tacfarinas, who had maintained a tedious War in Afric, flain by Dolabella. As for Tiberius, by the perfuafion of Sejanus, he withdrew into the Isle Capreæ, and thence cap. 40. forward minding nothing, gave up himself to all forts of enormities.

He was exceffively covetous, both as to getting, and keeping what was unjust. He was so undutiful to his Mother, as he refused to come at her, when living; and when dead, he neglected to bury her; neither would he perform her Will, but perfecuted her Friends; but she was justly rewarded (though as to him unjustly) having over and above other wicked practices, being suspected His Character to have had an hand in the death of Germanicus. Having chosen Twenty of the Principal Men of the City to be his Counsellors, he scarcely left two or three of them alive, Sejanus being found out, and punished justly for his wickedness. Amongst others that were innocent, he fpared not the familiar Friends of his Mother, Nephews, Agrippina or Sejams. No day either holy or prophane was free from flaughters. Every office little or great was Capital. Many were condemned with their Wives and Children. Rewards were proposed to Informers, and all Testimonies taken for true. Simple death he accounted nothing, and therefore invented painful waies; especially after he knew how his Son Drufus died, he neither spared any person nor fort of Torments. Caius the Son of Germanicus he cared not for, as suspecting him; and Tiberius his Grandson by Drusus he despised, as conceived in Adultery.

9. In the Twelfth year of Tiberius was Pontius Pilate fent into Judæa to fucceed Valerius Gratus, the fourth Governour after the banishment of Archelaus 1.18, 23, 6the Son of Herod to Vienna. Coponius was the first, M. Ambivius was the second, Eufth Early Hill. L. 1. 6.9. Annius Rufus the third, and Gratus the fourth. Pilate at his first entrance set up Luc. 3. the Images of Caefar at Jerusalem, which moved the Jews to Sedition; but overcome by their intreaties, he removed them to Cafarea. He being now Governor of Judæa, Herod Antipas Tetrarch of Galile, his Brother Philip Tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis, and Lyfanias of Abilene, Annas (who, formerly having had the Office, though displaced by Gratus, yet for his authority still carried the name) and Caiphas (otherwise called Joseph, whom lately Gratus had placed in the room of Simon, by him deposed also) being High-Priests, in the Fisteenth year of Tiberius entering, John Baptist began to Preach and Baptize in the resemblance

Jesus now about Thirty years of age, being baptized of John in Jordan (and owned for the Melliah and Son of God, by the descending of the Holy Ghost in the form of a Dove, and refting upon him, as also by a Voice from Heaven) was led of the Spirit into the Wilderness to be tempted of the Devil. After his temptation he returned in the Power of the Spirit into Galile. Going into Galile he A. Then came he to the exercise of his Ministry, the Acts whereof are distinguished by four Passeovers. Amongst the four Evangelists which describe them, Matthew alone hath neglected the order of time, which is constantly observed by the rest, except in the History of John's casting into Prison, as Luke hath recorded it. 11. Jejus having ascended to Jerusalem at the time of the first Passeover, cast in the mystery of Regeneration, and Faith in himself. Leaving then Jerusalem, Exulprio he went into Judga with his Disciples, where abiding, he baptized by the Mini letz Richardfiry of them; John then baptizing in Anon; for he was not yet cast in to Prilon and abdadas A certain question arose about Purifying, betwixt some of John's Disciples and the in provincia Jews. John instructed now his Disciples concerning Christ the last time, as they are told him of his acts with some emulation, and not long after he was cast into Prifon, for reprehending Herod the Tetrarch his Incest with his Brother Philip's Wife. Jefus hearing of his Captivity, and that the Pharifees took notice that he baptized more by the hands of his Disciples, departed out of Judea (where he had remained some Eight moneths) and came into Galile. In his passage through Samaria he discoursed with a Woman at a Well near unto the City Sychar, the Inhabitants of which by her means he brought to the acknowledgment of himself, four moneths before Harvest, or the Palfeover, about the middle of the Ninth Moneth called Ab. Having stayed two dayes at Sychar, he proceeded, and returned the second time into Galile out of Judga after his Baptism, being received with great respect by the Galilæans, who had seen what he did at Jerusalem. Preaching in their Synagogues here, he also healed at Cana, the Son of the Nobleman that was fick at Capernaum, which was his second Miracle in Galile. Having wrought Miracles at Capernaum, he went to Nazareth, where he had been brought up, and expounding the Prophet Esay concerning himself, they first admired and then cast him out, and would have thrown him down headlong, but he passed away through the midst of them.

12. Leaving then Nazareth, he taught at Capernaum, where they were aftonished at his Doctrine, and cast out an unclean spirit that was first commanded filence. Departing out of the Synagogue into the house of Simon and Andrew, he cured of a Feaver Simon's Wive's Mother. At Sun-set he healed fick Folks brought to him, and cast out Divels, first put to silence. In the Morning he went out into a defert place to Pray, and the multitudes endeavouring to detain him, he answered, He must also Preach in other places; and coasting through Galile, he Preached in their Synagogues, and cast out Devils. Then taught he the People out of Simon's Ship on the Lake of Genefareth, and helped them to a miraculous draught of Fishes; whereupon Simon Peter, Andrew, James, and John, being commanded to follow him, he maketh Fishers of men. Then going through all Galile healing and teaching, his Fame spread through Syria, and multitudes flocked to him. In a certain City he healed a Leper, which though forbidden, yet noised his Fame, and such Companies now followed him that he could not enter the City, but taught without in defert places, and prayed. After a few dayes he returned to Capernaum, and teaching in his own house he healed the Paralitick, who was let down in a Bed, and forgave him his fins before the Pharifees. Thence going towards the Sea he taught, and passing by called Levi or Matthew, then sitting at the receit of Cultom, by whom being featted, he defended his Disciples against the Pharifees, for eating with Publicans and Sinners, and for not fasting. And it came to pass, that on the second Sabbath after the first (that is, on the second Sabbath of the new year, inflittuted after their return out of Zegyri, and beginning with the Moneth Nifan or Abib) Jesus passing through the Corn-Fields, defended his Disciples, who plucked and cat cars of Corn, against the Pharisees, and explained the Doctrine of the observation of the Sabbath.

13. After these things there was a Feast of the Jews, (that is, the fecond Paffeover Job. 5. of his Ministry) and Jesus went up to Jerusalem, where on the Sabbath-day he healed one who had layn 38 years diseased at the Pool of Bethesda, for which thing, and because he had called God his Father, the Jews went about to kill him, and he opposed against them his most Divine Apology. Departing thence, in the Synagogue, on another Sabbath, he healed a man that had a withered hand, for which the Pharifees and Herodians presently sought to kill him. Jesus knowing this, departed to the Sea, where teaching the People, he commanded a little Vessel to wait on him, because the multitude crouded him. In these days he spent a whole Night in Prayer upon a Mountain, and when it was day, made choice of Twelve, whom he called Apolles. Going down into the Plain he healed the Sick, and coming home, fuch was the presse, that they could not eat, whereupon his Friends came to take him, supposing he had been besides himself. When he had seen the multitude he ascended into the Mountain, and his Disciples coming to him, there he Preached his long Sermon, first speaking to the Apostles, and then to the multitude. Having ended all his words in the audience of the People, he entred into Capernaum, and healed the Centurion's Servant ready to die. The day following he raifed from the dead the Widow's Son in the City Naim, whence his Fame was spread abroad. Then fent John his Disciples from Prison to him. to ask Whether he was the man, or they must look for another; who being departed with an answer, Christ took occasion to speak of John, and upbraided the Cities, acquiefcing in the Will of his Father as to the revealing or hiding the things of Salvation. Then Simon the Pharifee inviting him to Dinner, a Woman that was a finner washed his feet with her tears, which defending against Simon, he forgave her her fins. And it came to pass afterward, that he Preached through every City and Village, his Disciples being with him, and certain Women miniftring to him, amongst which was Joanna the Wife of Chusa, Herod's Steward. Then healed he a man possessed with a dumb and deaf Divel, and defended himfelf against the Pharifees, who said, that he cast out Devils by Beelzebub Prince of Divels. To the Scribes and Pharifees demanding a fign, he onely giveth that of Jonas, and his Mother and Brethren asking to speak with him, he declareth who are his nearest Relations. On that day going to the Sea, he taught the People from the Ship in the Parable of the Sower and others. On this fame day when it was Evening, he would they should pass to the further side, and having dismissed the multitude, when in their passage a great Tempest arose, he chiding the Winds stilled the Sea, and faved his Disciples then in danger. Coming unto the further fide into the Countrey of the Gaderens, or Gergafens, which lyeth over against Galile, two Dæmoniacs met him, exceeding fierce, (whereof Mark and Luke mention but one) out of which he casting the Divels, permitted them to enter into the Swine. The Gaderens hereupon desiring him to depart out of their Coafts, he (having difmiffed the man who defired to be with him, and upon refufal, Preached throughout Decapolis what things Jefus had done for him) returned by Ship unto the further fide, and so to Capernaum his own City.

14. And it came to país, that when Jesus was returned, the People gladly received him; for they were all waiting for him. And being by the Sta-side, he answered the Disciples of John, inquiring why his Disciples lasted not, feeing they, and the Disciples of the Phanjees lasted often. Whilst he spake, he was besought to heal the onely Daughter of Jairus; and as he was going down, a Woman that had had an iffue of Blood Twelve years, was by touching the hem of his Garment made whole. Passing thence, he cured two blind men, whom he charged with threatning to say nothing of him; but in vain. As they passed away, a man possessed with a dumb Devil was presented unto him, whom he healed, the company admiring, and the Phanjses blaspheming. Then going about to all the Towns, he Taught and healed, and coming into his own Country was contemned again by his Country-men, as he taught in the Synagogue on the Sabbath-day, they calling him Carpenter, though they admired him. Going about the Villages he taught, and pitying the multitude because the Harvest was great and the Labourers few, he bade his Disciples Pray for Labourers into the Harvest. Then fent he out his Twelve Disciples two and two, commissionated with Power to preach and heal. Having made an end of commanding them, he went and Preached in their Cities: and the Twelve went about the Villages, teaching and healing every where. Now about this time was John Baptift beheaded, through the procure ment of Herodias, which being told unto Jesus by his Disciples, who buried him, after the return of his own, he went with them by Ship into a defert place called Bethfaida. The multitude hearing of it, got thither before him, where he faught and healed them. And Jejus went up into a Mountain, and there fate with his Difciples, and the Paffeover was nigh. It being late, he having Compaf fion on the multitude, fed the number of Five thouland men (befides Women and Children) with five Barly Loaves, and two fmall Fifnes, whereof twelve Baskets full of fragments were taken up. When they would come and take him by force to make him a King, he caused his Disciples to pass over to the other side oppo-fite to Bethsaida, and towards Capernaum. Having Prayed in a Mountain apart; he came towards his Disciples, walking upon the Sea, when they had now rowed Twenty five or Thirty Furlongs, and were troubled with a contrary Wind. They being affrighted at him, he made known himself, and saving Peter (who had defired he would bid him come to him on the Water) when he was finking, he passed over with them. Coming into the Land of Genesaret, they brought all forts of diseased persons to him, desiring they might touch but the hem of his Garment, which as many as touched were made whole. The day after his paffage came the People which he had left on the further fide to Capernaum to feek him, where in the Synagogue he Preached concerning the Bread of Life, afferting himfelf to be it against the murmuring of the fews. Many now of his Disciples departed from and walked no more with him. And though the Twelye refused to depart, yet he declared that one of them was a Devil, meaning Judas

15. After the Third Passeover of his Ministery, the Scribes and Pharises that were come from Jerusalem came to him, and complained that his Disciples eat with unwashed hands; To whom he answered concerning their abolishing God's Commands by their Traditions, and taught the multitude what he declared to his Disciples, that Not what entreth in, but what cometh out, defileth a man. Departing into the Coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he cast the Devil out of the Daughter of the Syrophænician Woman, because of the greatness of her Faith. Passing thence to the Sea of Galile through the midst of Decapolis, he healed a deaf man, who had an impediment in his speech, and ascending into a Mountain healed many. In those dayes a great multitude having stayed with him three dayes, he fed them to the number of Four thousand Men, befides Women and Children, with seven Loaves, and a few little Filhes; and feven baskets full of fragments were taken up. Taking Ship presently, he came into the Parts of Dalmanutha, or the Coasts of Magdala. The Pharises asking a sign, he sighed deeply in his Spirit, for that these Hypocrites could discern the sace of the Sky, and not the signs of the times; and refufing to give them any other fign than that of Jonas, he left them, and returned by ship to the surther side. His Disciples having forgot to take Bread, and brought but one Loaf with them, he bids them beware of the Leaven of the Pharifees and of Herod; and expoundeth his meaning to be of the Leaven of Doctrine. Coming then to Bethfaida, he cureth a blind man by degrees without the Town. Passing thence into the Towns of Cæsarea-Philippi, he asked his Disciples concerning the opinion which men had of him, and then what they themselves thought; To which for themselves Peter answered, That he was the Christ; which thing he forbad them to declare, foretold his Death and Refurrection, called Peter Satan, for checking him about his Sufferings, and foretold his Transfiguration, which after some fix dayes was fulfilled. The day following coming down, he cast out a Devil out of the Lunatick, which his Disciples could not eject. Passing thence, they journeyed through Galile, which he would not have known, and taught his Disciples that he must die, and rife again; which they understanding not were troubled, and afraid to ask him. Being arrived at Capernaum, the Lord paid Tribute-money, and taught his Disciples Humility by the example of a little Child; speaking also against offending one's weak Brother, and forgiving one another seventy seven times by the Parable of the King's two debtors. John telling him that they had seen one casting out Devils in his Namé, he said he was not to be forbidden; and again spake against offending weak ones, and bade them beware that no Member offended them. After these things Jesus walked in Galile, for he would not walk in Jury, because the Jesus Gought to kill him. Now the Jesus Feast of Tabernacles (the Scenngazia) was at hand. His Brethren, or Kinsmen, willed him to go up that his Disciples might believe in him; but he resused to comply with them therein who themselves believed not, and went up after them, to comply with them therein who themselves believed not, and went up after them.

not openly, but as it were in fecret. 16. When the time was come that he should be received up, he stedsastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. The Samaritans not receiving him, he checked his Disciples, who would have had fire called down from Heaven upon them. Several in his passage desiring to follow him, he gave answer to them all. After these things he sent out Seventy Disciples before his face, two into every City and Place where he would come. And in the midft of the Feast when the multitude was busse in inquiring about him, he came, and taught in the Temple. Some were fent to lay hold of him. On the last, and great day of the Feast, when he spake of Faith in himfelf, a great difference arose, and the Messengers that were sent to apprehend him, with Nicodemus, defended him against the Pharifees. Departing into the Mount of Olives, he returned early in the morning, and refuted as a Judge to condemn the Woman taken in Adultery. In the Treasury he spake much concerning many Truths, concluding with before Abraham was, I am; whereupon the Jews took up thones to caft at him; but he hid himself, and passed away through the midst of them. Passing by he saw and cured a man that was born blind, who for vindicating him was cast out of the Synagogue. He then Preached concerning the true Shepherd, Sheep, and Door, as also of Thieves and Mercenaries, which caused a diffention amongst his hearers. The Seventy then return with joy, and a certain Law-yer asking him what he should do to inherit eternal life, he sendeth him to the Law, and to declare who is our Neighbour, speaketh the Parable of the man that fell among Thieves. After this he was entertained in the house of Martha, which ministred to him, while her Sifter Mary hearing his Word was preferred before her. And it came to pass that after he had done praying in a certain place, one of his Disciples desired him to teach them to Pray, as John also taught his Disciples; therefore he prescribed the second time the same Lord's Prayer, adding arguments for constancy and firmness of Faith. He cast out a Devil which was dumb, and proved against the blasphemers that he did it not by Beelzebub. While he said these things, a certain Woman faid, Bleffed is the Womb that bare thee, and the Paps that gave thee suck, to which he answered. The multitude gathering about him, he laid, that Generation fought for a fign, but no fign, but that of Jonas the Propher should be given it saying, that the Queen of the South, and the Ninevites, should condemn it in judgment. Dining with a Pharifee who had invited him, and wondred that he walhed not, he fpoke against their Hypocrifie, and denounced also woes against the Expositors of the Law. He bade his Disciples beware of the Leaven of the Pharises (Hypocrifie) and not fear those that could kill the body. He refused to be a Judge betwist a man and his Brother about the Inheritance, and thence took occasion to speak against anxious Cares of the World, bidding them be ready against the uncertain time of their Lord's coming.

ready against the uncertain time of their Lords Schmigs.

17. There being fome that told Jefus of the Galileans, the bloud of whom Pilate mingled with their Sacrifice, he took thence occasion to prefs repentance, and spake the Parable of the barren Fig. Tree. On a certain Sabbath he healed a Woman that had a spirit of infirmity Eighteen years, which act he defended against the Ruler of the Synagogue, and compared the Kingdom of God to a Graun of Mushraf-seed, and to Leaven. Journeying towards Jeruslahm to the Feast of the Dedication, he Taught through the Cities and Villages, and answered that Question, Whether few shall be laved? To certain Pharisice, who bade him be gone stored the Arable of the Healed of the English of the Cities and Villages, and answered that Question of the Chronic of the Pharise of the Healed of the English of the Healed of the think of the Healed of Healed of the Healed of Healed Healed of Healed of Healed of Healed Healed of Healed Healed of Healed of Healed Heale who were covetous derided him, whereupon Preaching against them, amongst other things he spake the Parable of the Rich man and Lazarus. Speaking to his Disciples against offences, he also teacheth that we must forgive our offending brother. The Apostles desiring him to increase their Faith, he speaketh of the power of that Grace, and by the Parable of the servant sheweth, that when we have done all we can ne are unprositable servants, having done but what we ought. Passing through Samaria and Galilee, towards Serujalem, he healed the ten Lepers, whereof one only returned and praised God. To the Pharisee saking him when the Kingdom of God should come, he answereth, and declareth to his Disciples, that the day of the Son of Man should be like to those of Noah and Let, but he must first suffer many things. To incourage his Disciples to Pray, he spake the Parable of the unjult Judge: and to some that thought themselves righteous and delpised others, that of the Pharifee and the Publican.

Chap. II.

18. At the Feast of Dedication, when it was Winter, Jesus walking in Salomon's Porch, to the Jews, who bad him tell them plainly whether he was Christ or not, he answered, that He and his father are one, whereupon they taking up flones to throw at him, he defended his Divinity by his works, and the Scriptures, and escaped when they sought to take him. Passing beyond Jordan into that place where John baptized, he taught and healed, many believing on him, and anfivered the Pharifees tempting him, that it is unlawful for a man to put away his wife, except for Adultery. Now admitted he Infants, though his Disciples rebuked fuch as brought them, and as he was paffing thence to come into the way, he anfwered the young Rich man that asked him what he should do to inherit eternal life, and bad him fell all he had, and give it to the poor, then to follow him. Hearing that Lazarus was fick, he abode in the place where he was two days, and then coming to Bethany, after he had been dead four days, raifed him from the dead. Hereupon Caiphas Prophefying that he was to die for the people, they re-folved to put him to death; which he understanding, went into the City Ephraim, and there taught. Ascending towards ferusalem, he went before his Disciples, who were amazed and afraid. He now told them of his Sufferings, which they did not at all understand; and the Sons of Zebedee asking to fit on his right and left hand in his Kingdom, he gave them a repulse, and improved it to the Teaching them all humility. Coming near to Jericho he healed a blind man. In Jericho he called, and was entertained by Zachæus, and paffing thence restored fight to two blind men, whereof one was Bartimæus; when they drew near to Ferufalem, they thinking that the Kingdom of God was near, he fpake the Parable of the King, who going a journey committed ten Talents to his servants to be improved till his Return. The Paffeover being now at hand, many went up to Jerufalem, to purifie themselves, and Jesus, six days before it, came to Bethany, where they made him a Supper. Lazarus fate at Table with him, but Mary anointed his feet. and wiped them with her hair. Many of the Jews came, not only to fee Him, but Lazarus alfo, upon which account, for that many believed on him, the Chief Priests consulted also to kill Lazarus. Going towards Jerusalem, when he was come nigh to Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount of Olives (on the twenty ninth of March) he fent his Disciples for the Asse's Colt whereon he rode to Ferulalem. When he came near the City he wept over it, foretelling its final destruction. Out of the Temple he cast Buyers and Sellers, where the Children cried Hofanna, and many believed on him, the great ones studying how to kill him. Certain Greeks who were come to the Feast defiring to fee him, he Preached concerning his Passion, and had a voice from Heaven answering his Prayer, which fome thought to be of an Angel, and others of Thunder. It being late, he went to Bethany with the Twelve. Notwithstanding, the multitude had seen so many works, yet they believed not, that the Saying of Esaias might be fulfilled. Yet many of the Chief Priests believed on him, but durit not confess him, for the Pha-rifees. Jesus cried, and spake concerning Faith in himself:

19. The next morning as he returned he hungred, and cursed the barren Fig. tree: He cast Buyers and Sellers again out of the Temple, and suffered nothing to be carried through it. Whilst he taught concerning Faith in himself, the Chief-Priest consulted how to kill him, searing the People. At evening he went out of the City, and returning in the morning, his Disciples sound the Fig. tree withered, whereupon he took occasion to Preach concerning the power of Faith. As he taught in the Temple, the Chief-Priess, and Pharises, and Elders, asked him by what Authority he did thest things to whom he answered with another question concerning

John's Authority, spake the Parable of the two sons, asking them, whether did the Will of his Father : and that of the husbandmen, who killed the heir of the vinyard, applying them to these men, who now studied how to apprehend him, but seared the Feople. Again, he spake to them the Parable of the marriage of the King's son, and the Excuses of the invited, with the Want of the Wedding-garment. Then the Pharifees sent some to entrap him in his Talk, who asking him whether it was lawful to give tribute to Cafar ? admired his Answer, and left him. On that day the Sadduces asked him concerning the woman married to feven Husbands, whose the should be at the Refurrection? to which having answered, and afferted the Refurrection, a Lawyer tempted him, asking him, which is the greatest Commandment ? Having answered him, he asked the Pharifees whose Son Christ is ? and no man could answer him any thing, nor durst thenceforth ask him any more questions. Then speaking of the Scribes and Pharifees, he pronounced eight Woes against them, and upbraiding Jerufalem with her cruelty and obstinacy, foretelleth her destruction. Sitting over against the Treasury, he saw a poor Widow cast in two mites; and going out to his Disciples, who admired the Structure, he foretold its ruine. His Disciples asked him on the Mount of Olives, when these things should be, concerning the Sign of his coming, and the end of the World; he anfwered largely, advising them to watch, for they knew not what hour their Lord would come, illustrating his Doctrine by the Parable of the Ten Virgins, and the talents committed to the fervants, to traffick. And he described the last Judgment by a Severing of goats from the sheep. By day he taught, at night he went to the Mount of Olives, and all the People came in the morning to hear him in the Temple. When he had ended these Sayings, he said to his Disciples, Tou know that after two days is the Feast of the Passeover, and the son of man is betrayed to be crucified. The great ones affembling in the house of Caiphas the High-Priest, confulted how to kill him; but they faid, not on the Feast-day, lest there be an uprore amongst the People. Jesus being in Bethany in the house of Simon the Leper, a woman poured Oyntment upon his head, which he defended against his Disciples, foretelling his Burial. Then entred Satan into Judas, who offered himself, and covenanted for Money to betray him. 20. In the Fourth Paffeover Jesus himself, Our Paffeover, was offered, and an end thereby was put to all Sacrifices, which were but types of this. Some think that he did not this time eat the Paschal Lamb, but only unleavened Bread and bitter Herbs, fuch as were used by those that could not come up to the Sacrifice, being in another Country. For a (a) learned Man distinguisheth betwixt (4) Grotius παί ομα θύσιμον and μνημονοδίκου, which later was performed by those that were a Annot. in Matth. c. 26. far off, in memorial of the thing, it being unlawful to kill the Lamb any where out of Judæa. Now Christ would not facrifice, because he himself was now to be offered. That he did not do it, appeareth, because as soon as he came into the house he sate down; and this many of the ancient Greek Fathers did believe. These words of Christ, with desire I have desired to eat this Passeover with you before I suffer, the same learned Man expoundeth as meant, that he hasted to that Supper because the time of his death was at hand, which would take from him the liberty of celebrating the παίοςα δύσιμον. It being granted that he kept the Paffeover a day before the Jews observed it, (b) another contendeth that Christ kept it on the (b) Possius de true day, and that the Jews receding from the Law, put it off till the following law case day, or the fifteenth of the Month Nisan, being the Sabbath, left they should be minice Symbolic like 10th. debarred of working for two days together. But the other opinion is more probable, which holdeth that he anticipated it, being as the true Paffeover, to be of fered up on the true day of killing the Paffeover, which fell out on the day preceding the Sabbath, and not on the Sabbath day. It clearly appeareth in Scripture, what things our Lord did and suffered for unworthy Sinners, after he had eaten this Supper, though the order of the former passages concerning his Preaching be obscure, and therefore we have more largely described them. Being betrayed by Judas into the hands of the Chief-Priefts, and by them delivered up to Pilate the Governour, he, convinced of his innocence and their malice, fought how to deliver him, till they told him, that if he did it he was not Cæsar's friend; whereupon fearing to be accused to Tiberius, of Protecting one who affected the A.D. 33. Kingdom, he condemned him, and delivered him to the Soldiers to be Crucified. V. C. 787. This was about the fixth hour, or a little after Noon, at what time a great darkness arose, for the Sun was obscured, and so continued till the ninth hour, or three of the clock. Then Christ to shew the bitterness of his torment cried (yet)

with a loud voice, Eli Eli Lamafabachtani, and receiving the Vinegar, after he had commended his Soul into the hands of his Father, gave up the Ghoft. Thus he who was in the form of God, and counted it no Robbery to be equal with God, made himself of no reputation, and suffered Death, even the (most ignominious) death of the Cross for ingrateful men. 21. That the darkness was Universal, appeareth from the Records of Heathen Writers, which, as (c) Orostus (c) Lib. 7. c.4. faith, besides the Evangelists, mentioned the greatness of the Eclipse. And (d) (d) Apological faith, besides the Evangelists, mentioned the greatness of the Eclipse. 22. That Christ was put to Death in the reign of Tiberius by Pontius Pilate (1)(4) Annal. Cornelius Tacitus writeth, an Author guilty of Ethnick ignorance, and prejudice. 1.15, 6.44 The tellino- But (b) Josephus the noble Jewish Historian giveth him an honourable tellimony, (s) Anti-1,119. ny of Josephus writing, That At the same time there was one Jesus a wife man, if it be lawful to 6.4. call him a man; For he was a worker of wonderful works, and a teacher of those which willingly receive the truth. He had also many followers, not only Jews but Gentiles: and he was believed to be Christ. And whereas by the malice of our Princes, Pilate condemned him to be crucified, yet notwithstanding they who first loved him have persevered. For he appeared to them alive the third day; the Prophets having foretold in their writings, these, and many other wonderful things concerning him : and to this day the People from him called Christians hath not ceased. This he relateth, after he had spoken of that Sedition which hapned because of Pilate his bringing in of Casar's Images. Some from amongst our selves have not given credit to this relation, thinking it to be foifted in by some Christians, for the greater honour of our Religion. But as the piæ fraudes supposed to have been used by the Primitive Christians, are rather increased than otherwise, by some, who either pedantically, and out of oftentation feek for applause from the prejudice of their own cause (as one hath done of late in reference to the matter in hand) or as out of a melancholick and distrustful humour question the evidence of the truth; fo is there no reason that this testimony should be condemned amongst them. For Josephus maketh mention of John Baptist, giving him large commendations, and relateth also that he was beheaded; though he affigneth the cause to have been out of jealousie of him, and lest he should make some commotions through his popularity, which likely enough might be some cause, especially the malice of Herodias confidered, which woman would not be wanting to fill his head with suspition, although the main reason was his reproving of the incest. He also maketh mention of James the Brother of Alphaus, whom he calleth the brother of Jesus Christ, how he was put to death at Jerusalem, saying, that all good men were forely troubled at it; and clearly expresseth himself distatisfied in it, writing, that Ananus, who commanded the Murder to be done, did ill, and this he faith not only because the Judicial power was taken away from the Jens, as is evident from the course of his words.

23. It is hence clear enough, that Josephus was not in the number of these whom Herod Agrippa could have pleased in the killing of the other James, the Defended to brother of John; and truly amongst the Jews, such as were not extremely malicious not feigned by against Christ, were something inclining to him, if we consider the temper of that People. It cannot therefore be faid, that Josephus was so inveterately despightful against Christ and Christians, that, as some have thought, he utterly passed over the flory of Christ upon that account. This Principle would have induced him to rail rather than to be filent to be filent to be fatter the Christian generation, rather than to fay nothing, or especially to seem displeased at their sufferings. It's true, he was with the younger Agrippa, but almost a Christian, and therefore we rather follow the translation of ferome, which rendereth his words credebatur effe Christus, than to take them as Eulebius and Rusinus have them, and as they are found in the present copies, o yesses &T @ w, Christus hic erat. But some there were amongst the learneder fort of fews, who knew not really what to blame as to Christ, nay they believed in him, only they defired still to *keep the Law, fuch was their te- * All: 15. naciousness as to it. But Josephus lived to see Je-4.5. rusalem utterly destroyed, and thereby an occasion for such an advantage taken away; and affliction maketh men more feriously to consider things; so that he might be tavourable enough towards Christ himself, though as to the Law he might still be pertinacious, as many of them were. Eusebius writeth, that the Verses of Sibylla were accounted by fome as feigned by the Ecclefiafticks, but not a word of this matter.

24. The Jews had great expectations of the Coming of the Messiah, at that very time when the Lord Jefus was upon Earth. They knew that the Prophecies of old respected that season: they understood well enough the weeks of Daniel, and that the Scepter was departed from Judah, when they had no Judiciary Percepturat Power as to life and death left amongst them. This expectation was so great, that oriente toto or it possessed the whole Eastern part of the Empire, though it was understood in this & constant the same sense only, as by the carnal fort of Jews; amongst whom how many satis, at to tracounterfeits do we read of, which at that time prefumed upon it? Hereupon, put fales though Christ came in an humble way, yet his Miracles caused a reverence and patients. esteem of his Person, nay they durst not but think well of him as the Messiah Sutton. in (how long dost thou make us to doubt ?) till confounded by the spiritualness of his vepos Preaching, offended at his opposition of their Traditions, and Pharifaical Tenents (as contrary to their Law, which they thought must necessarily indure for ever) and especially moved (the greatest of them) by their corrupt interests of profit and applause (which made them deny him, though they knew the Resurrection, and to fin against their own Consciences, and the Holy Ghost) they rejected, and put him to death. That Saying amongst the Talmudists, and ascribed to the house of Elias (whom some will have to be John Baptist) is commonly known, viz. that the World should continue fix thousand years, whereof two thousand belong to Tohu or Inane (that is the void space of time betwixt the Creation and the Law) two thousand to the Law, and two thousand to the Messiah; that then it should be destroyed. Now as the first division lighteth well, if the Tohu be taken as ending at the birth of Abraham, the Father of the Faithful (or those in Covenant with God) fo the fecond endeth much about the Birth of our Saviour (reckoning as to both those accounts the years of the Patriarchs, according to the Hebrew Text) and pointeth out the time of the Message. Suids mentioned out of Theodosius a noble Jew, that before Christ did rebuke the Scribes, they marvelling at his wife answers and questions made him one of the Priests, and entred his name, ໂກຍຮ ດ ບໍ່ເອ ປີຄົນ ກຸ່ Mapias, Jesus the Son of God and of Mary, otherwise he being of the Tribe of Judah could not have been suffered to Preach at Nazareth and Capernaum as he did.

25. But (that we may improve those things as to Josephus) it doth appear, that not only before Christ gave them offence, and that before he died, some had honourable thoughts of him, but also after his death they accounted him the very Messiah, though they would not part with their old way of worship. Their * Tal * Babylonian. mud, like to Augeas his Stable, is full of filth, amongst which but a few Granes of Corn do appear. 26. There are not wanting Testimonies concerning the truth of Christ and his Doctrine, from the Heathen. Rhodiginus and Volateran deliver it as a matter of credit, that there was an Altar in Egypt Dedicated unto a Virgin that should bring forth a Child: and Postellus, that there was another intituled Primogenito Dei, to the first legotten of God. Upon the Star which appeared at his Birth (which some think the same mentioned by Pliny, and called Stella crinita sine crine) many meditating turned to the truth, as Charemon amongst the Stoicks, and Challadius amongst the Platonists, who thereupon went into Judæa, and became Jews. It is also reported that the Romans called their Temple which they had built to It is also reported una time turning states and temperature from the Basichus for Victory. Templum pacis atternum, the overlading Temple of Peace, because the Oracle at Delphi told them it should stand dum peperit virgo, till a Virgin brought forth a Child; but as soon as Christ was born it fell. The Oracles gentle at defidition of the Child; but as soon as Christ was born it fell.

nerally tell in the reign of Tiberius, when the time of Christ his Preaching was Graculous come, who was the eternal Word of his Father. Plutarch of this Subject wrote a Tract, fearching much, as a Philosopher, what the cause of this strange change should be. After his acute fearch after fundry causes, and accurate Philosophical disputes, he refers it partly to the absence of the Demoniacal spirits, which he thinks might die, or remove from place to place, either banished by others more potent, or upon some dislike; and partly unto the alteration of the soil wherein Oracles were feated, which yielded not exhalations of fuch Divine temper as in former times it had done; for, without a certain temperature of exhalations, or breathing of the earth, he thought that spirits could not give their Oracles, more than a Musician can play without an Instrument. Accordingly he expected, that Oracles should either come in Use again in Greece, or else burst out in some convenient foil. But where have they thus burst out? Christianity chased them away whereever it came, and put those spirits to silence, which were afraid of the Christians in the Primitive times, fo, as those Holy Men could make them confess they were Devils, and chase them out of such Bodies as they had possessed; for the truth whereof Tertullian in his Apology appealeth to the Confciences of the Heathen themselves, and therefore he would not in so publick a Defence produce an untruth, which must have been notoriously known. Therefore the filence of the Oracles was not from any of those causes (which to one that hath opportunity are in themselves easie to be consuted); the truth was, the time was come wherein the strong man's house was to be entred, his goods spoiled, and himself bound; Now the Prince of this world was to be cast out: Satan fell like lightning from Heaven upon the approach of that true light which lighteneth every man that cometh into the world. 27. That notable flory which Plutarch bringeth for confirmation of his Opi-

much for our purpose; if we consider the time thereof. Thamous the Egyptian Master, as he failed, was requested by an uncouth voice uttered three times from Land, to proclaim the news of Great Pan's death as he passed by Palodes. Thamous, whose name was unknown to his Passengers, till he answered to it at the third Call, was refolved to have let all pass as a fancy or idle message, if the wind the true fiep-and tide should grant him passage by the place appointed: but, the wind sailing herd, him on a sudden, at his coming thither, he thought it but a little loss of breath to cry out aloud unto the shoar, as he had been requested, Great Pan is dead. The words, as Plutarch relateth, were scarce out of his mouth, before they were anfwered with a huge noise, as it had been of a multitude, fighing, and groaning at this wonderment. Now, if these Spirits had been by nature Mortal, as the nion, concerning the Mortality of those Dæmoniacal spirits, maketh exceeding

Philosopher thought they were, the death of their Chief Captain could not have feemed to strange: but that a far greater than the greatest of them, by whose power the first of them had his being, should die to redeem his Enemies from their thraldom, might well feem a matter of aftonishment, and deep forrow unto them. The circumstance of the time will not permit us to doubt, but that under the known name of Pan was intimated the great Shepherd of our Souls, who had then laid down his life for his flock; not the feigned Son of Mercury and Penelope, as the Wife-men foolishly resolved Tiberius, who having had the truth of the Story confirmed to him by car-witnesses, called a Convocation of wife-men, to resolve him who this great Pan lately deceased should be. The Scriptures set forth unto us the true cause, why both the wild goatish Pan, and all the rest of that Hellish crew should at that time howl and mourn, seeing by our great Shepherd's Death they were become Dead in Law; no more to breath in Oracles, but quite to be deprived of all fuch strange motions as they had seduced the ignorant World with before. All the Antick tricks of Faunus, the Satyrs, and such like Creatures were now put down; God had refolved to make a translation of his Church; and for this cause the Devils were forced to dissolve their old Chappels, and feek a new form of their Liturgy or Service. These passages are pregnant enough, though we allege not what Nicephorus reporteth, that the Oracle at Delphi (perhaps not just then extinct) said that this Pan was Thais Espais, an Hebrew Child; and though we omit what Suidas writeth, that Augustus sending to Pythia to inquire who should succeed him, had answer, that an Hebrew Child, Lord of the Gods, had commanded him to be gone down again to Hell, and therefore he must no more enquire there. Whereupon Augustus erected an Altar in the Capitol Primogenito Dei, To the first born of God.

28. But amongst other testimonies of the Heathen concerning Christ, that of The Testimo- the Sibyle's must not be omitted. These Women were indued with extraordinary gifts of Prophecy, as certain previous pledges, that the Gentiles should also drink of the true, heavenly, and eternal Fountain. Like to those was Balaam the Midianite, an Idolater, yet called a Prophet by the Scriptures, who amongst other things, foretold that a Star should rife out of Jacob, and a Scepter from Israel. There were many of these Sibyll's as we have already shewn, and several of them Prophefied of Christ. Their Sayings were made much use of by such ancient Christians as had to do with Pagans, and Heathen Philosophers. (a) Justin Martyr (a) In Page telleth fuch, that the old, and very ancient Sibylla, of which Plato, Aristophanes, ne. p. 16,60. and others have made mention, Spake of one God, and against Idolaters; as also of ad 37. vide. the Coming of our Saviour Jesus Christ, plainly, and manifestly, and of his works. (1) Clemens also writeth of Hydaspes an ancient King of the Medes, who clearly (b) Strew. 1.6. foretold that the Son of God should come. Concerning the Verses of sibylla Erythrea many have written, and many of them are produced by Eusebius in the Oration (c) of Constantine to the Clergy, the Acrosticks whereof make up these (c) cap. 18. words. * Inous reperts but, &c. - felts Christus Dei Filius, fervator, rux, and foretel the last Judgment and Authority of Christ. There are others also cited by (4) L14618. (d) Lattantius, which freak of Christ his * coming into unjust hands, his being stricken * 18 edou on the head, and wearing a Crown of Thorns; the giving of him Vinegar, the renting yas robornelof the weil of the Temple, and his being dead three days. Now fome were of opinion nion of old, that these were feigned by Christians, as appeareth by what Constant light of the tine (or Eusebius for him) subjoyneth. But there are many that give no credence, voley gastfaith he, thereunto, although they confess that Sibylla Erythraea was a Prophetes . Lis ariums yea, they suspect that some of our Religion not ignorant in Poetry, made these Verses; 26,25, 26,25, 26, and that they are falfly inscribed, and reckoned among the Oracles of Sibylla: seeing they contain very profitable sentences, both to restrain the licentiousness of immoderate pleasure, and persuade to a modest continency of life. But the truth of this matter doth manifestly appear, for our men have with great study so accurately compared the confineth such times, that none can suspect that this Poem was made, and came forth after Christ's coming, and therefore they are convinced of fallhood, who blaze abroad that thefe Verses were not made by this Sibylla. For it is manifest that Cicero, having read this Poem, did translate it into Latine, and joyned it to his works, who was afterward put to death by the Triumvir Antonius, and Antonius was overcome by Augustus, who reigned fix and fifty years: Tiberius succeeded Augustus, in whose reign our Saviour came into the World, and the mystery of Religion began to flourish. and the people were changed. Of which I suppose the chief of the Italian Poets hath thus fung. 29. He meaneth Virgil, whose Poem he reciteth concerning the Golden days Edise. 4-foretold by Sibylla Cumaca (by which name the Romans called all the Sibylls, because of the old Cumana or Cumaa, whose Verses were burnt in the Capitol, in the 671 year of the City, and were supplied by other fetch't from Erysbræ, and elsewhere) as also concerning a Child that was to be born. He ascribeth to this Child such Divine things, as none can doubt, but that he must be above a man, whom Sibylla described by such expressions. Now that such Verses could be seigned by Christians none can affirm, but the grofly ignorant, who know not that Firgil died feveral years (viz. 18.) before Christ was born. Neither can it be thought he feigned it on his own head, although we cannot fay with Constantine or Eusebius, that he did thus mystically involve, and cover the truth, lest the Emperour should be offended with him for writing that which was contrary to their Laws, and Statutes established, concerning their gods; or that we do believe that he foresaw the happy and glorious mystery of our Saviour's Coming: but that he might avoid their cruelty, he spake his audience in the accustomed manner. Some of late also have rejected the Poems ascribed to these women, as seigned by Christians, because they seem to speak more plainly of Christ, than the true Prophets do, and exhibit rather an History of Christ already come, than a Prophecy of his Coming, They think it contrary to the Word of God, to think that these profound mysteries should be more clearly propounded to the Gentiles than to the Jews. This also moveth them (for we will confess the utmost) that they perceive many of the Ancients in the most Primitive times, to have counted it the choicest work they could perform, to help the Heavenly truth by their fictions, whereby the new Doctrine might more eafily be admitted by the Pagan wife men. And as they cannot but most grievously reprehend this thing, so not sufficiently can they admire the judgment of those Fathers, who with such facility received these writings, and as doubt not to produce testimonies from them, to underprop the heavenly truth. 30. But it is answered by way of utter denial, that there were many in the

Primitive Times, who fought to establish the truth by fictions and lies, and by Challenge made, for them to produce any one lie or fiction made or used by the most ancient Fathers, though for a good end. Certainly they who in their Difputations with the Pagans, appeal to the testimony of the Sibylls, deserve great commendations for their Prudence. And hence may it be proved, that those testimonies were not forged, because they in all Conflicts more willingly had recourse to them than to any other. For, can we imagine them fools, with whom these Fathers had to do? They were as cunning and knowing as the best; they were Philosophers, Rhetors, Professors of Arts, States-men, and most commonly fuch as enjoyed the greatest honours. Where is it objected by any of these in the most Primitive times, that these testimonies were seigned by Christians? This Answer would have been easie and ready, and such as would instantly have stopped the mouths of Primitive Saints. But the wifest and bitterest of the Enemies of Christians, do not make any such Reply, in the most ancient times, knowing well enough these Oracles, to which the Romans had ever recourse, and which were known fufficiently to the whole World, through which it ran for current, that in the Books of the Sibylls was held forth, that one (hould reign who came out of the East. The clearness of these testimonies concerning Christ, can make nothing against them; for Esaias spake not more evidently of Christ than Balaam, who faid, that a Star should rife out of Jacob. Who dare prescribe to God a manner of prophefying? as if it were not free to him to fpeak plainly or obscurely to Jew or Gentile, or as if there were not in the Scripture most clear Predictions concerning Christ. But grant that the Sibylline Oracles are clearer: Ought not those things which are predicted to the Gentiles concerning Christ to be clearer, because they wanted Moses, and the rest of that learning, which should direct them unto him, that what here was wanting might be supplied by the perspicuity of these Oracles? Although we ought not to judge of these Oracles, by that light which at present appeareth. For what things are most evident to us after the accomplishment, were most obscure when they were predicted. If any one had feigned them, he would have made them industriously more obscure, that they might feem written before the things were done, and like to those Prophecics which are contained in the Scriptures. These Heathen Prophets spake sometimes clearly, according to the intention of God who overruled them; but often abruptly. It's thought they prophefied as of old Balaam's Afs spake, and not otherwife did Hydaspes and the Sibylls speak clearly of the Coming of Christ, the Holy Spirit moving them, and governing their tongues. It appeareth (a) from Justin (a) in Apologic

Martyr, that it was forbidden upon pain of death to read Hydaspes, Sibylla, or the 2-p.82-toiss Prophets, lest the People should attain to the knowledge of good things. To these (b) Clemens bringeth in St. Paul himself referring the Greeks: Take ye also (b) Strom. 1.6. the Greek Books, acknowledge Sibylla that the manifested one God, and things to come. Take ye also Hydaipes, read him; and you shall find the Son of God more clearly and openly described.

31. To omit what might be (and by others hath been) produced out of * Heathen Writers concerning the bleffed Trinity (for we may eafily admit, that God, activit, Dii, who was ever the God of the whole World, and defigned to do the Gentiles good 1 to 6.33 also in the knowledge of himself, might give to them such Hints of the truth, as we have the such that the suc afterwards might be improved for their welfare) we shall come to the last testi- Tertal. Apolmony concerning Christ, and that such an one, as will reduce us to the course of log. 6. 21. our design. After that Christ was risen from the dead, and had sent his Disciples port unto chout to preach and work miracles for the conversion of the World, Pilate who then governed in Judæa, reported his Passion and Resurrection to Tiberius and the Senate, with the miracles done by him, or by them in his name; and how the multitude of believers daily increasing, he was accounted a God. Tiberius hereupon reported the matter to the Senate, with his favourable suffrage, that Christ might be accounted a God. But the Senate, because they were displeased that They had not first moved it, refused to canonize him, and by an Edict commanded that Christians should be banished the City; especially by reason that Sejanus, the great Minister of State, most obstinately contradicted this Religion. But Tiberius by another Edict threatned death to the accusers of Christians. These things thus related by (a) Orosius, are also wit (a) Lib.7.6.4. nessed by (b) Eusebius, Tertullian, and Justin Martyr, whereof, the testimo (b) Erc. History. nies of the two later are incontrolable; for in their Apologies they durft not mention fuch things, and cite fuch testimonies as they must needs know would be eafily confuted.

32. (a) Tertullian writeth, that Tiberius referred it to the Senate, with the (a) Apologic. accuse the Christians. This he openly afferteth in his Apology to the Pagans, writing also in another (b) place of the same excellent Work, that Pilate, who in (b) cap. 21. his heart believed in Christ, at the same time wrote all the History of him to the Emperour Tiberius, whereupon the Casfars themselves had worshipped our Master, if their Government in so doing had been consistent with the men of this World, and Christians permitted to have been saluted Casars. He giveth another reason, why Christ was not at first worshipped as a God. There was an ancient Law that forbad Introducing new Ceremonies into Religion, as worshipping strange Deities, unless approved by the Senate; and this was an inviolable and unalterable Law, to which the Prince himself was subject. He instanceth, that Marcus Æmilius would have had divine honours rendred to his Idol, called the god Alburnus, but could not obtain it. As for Justin Martyr, he maketh it more evident, telling plainly the Pagans in his second Apology, that they may know these things thus to have been, in the Acts which were written under Pontius Pilate; and again, that they might know, that Christ wrought such miracles, from the Acta (or Acts) made under Pontius Pilate. Now the word Acta fignifieth fometimes the Journal-Book of the Senate, then called Acta Senatus, and otherwhiles the Records of the People, or of the Publick, then De Actin connamed Atta Publica, Diurna, and Urbana. In the former fort was contained falant omnico whatfoever was done or faid by the Fathers. In the latter, things concerning the Lipfan in People, as Publick Judgments, Punishments, Assemblies, Buildings, Nativities, Comment. ad the Death of Eminent Persons, Marriages, and Divorces. These afforded matter Taciti Annal. for Historians to digest and adorn. Now Justin Martyr either meaneth those Aila Publica, wherein might be recorded what notable things hapned in the Provinces; and fell under the administration of the several Deputies or Governours: or rather those Alla which Pilate himself composed in his Province. For we cannot but imagine, that care would be taken for the Recording of things memorable, as well in other places, as in the City it felf. The Provinces had their Subcenfors and their Tables. And the Presidents and Deputies not only certified by Letters occafionally what happened, but, as we may eafily apprehend, did refer in Atta all memorable things; which were fent to Rome, and there, it's probable, either tranferibed into, or laid up with, the Atta Publica. But, thus much of the testimonies of Jews and Heathens concerning Christ. 33. The Lord Jefus having rifen the third day from the dead, and after his Refurrection given Commission and Instructions to his Disciples, whom he ordained his Ambaffadors to the whole World; forty days after, he arose, ascended into Heaven, and fent down the Holy Ghost upon his Disciples, according to his Promise, The Ascention for the Furnishing of them to the Work, ten days after his ascention. Many being converted to the Faith, the Church increased, and living in Love and Unity together, they had all things common, none calling any thing his own which he possessed. About the end of the year, as is rationally computed, the Greeks or Hellenists (Jews which living out of Judea spake Greek in a peculiar dialect, which is called Hellenislick, and used the Scriptures in their Synagogues in that language) murmured against the Hebrews (or those who both read and spoke He brew) for that their widdows were neglected in the daily ministration. Here, upon the Apostles committed it to the number of the faithful, to chuse seven men who stiould take care of what was gathered for the poor, and these Ecclesiastical The feven Writers call Deacons. About this time James the Apolle the Son of Alphaeus (who is also called the brother of the Lord, and was firnamed Just) was created the first Bishop of Jerusalem. For thus Clemens wrote in the fixth Book of his Hypotyposewn, as he is cited by Eusebius. Peter, and James, and John, though they were preferred, after the ascention of the Lord, contended not amongst themselves for glory and honour; but with one consent appointed James the Just Bishop of Jerusalem. The fame Clemens in his first Book, diftinguished thus concerning the two Junt the fift which bore the name of James. There were two James, the one termed Just, who tallop of fr was thrown down headlong from the pinacle, and brained with a Fuller's club, the nation. other beheaded. Of him that was called Just, Paul made mention, saying, I saw none of the Apostles Save James the brother of the Lord. In the year following Christ's resurrection, a great Persecution was raised by the Jews against the Church. wherein Stephan one of the feven Deacons and the Protomartyr was stoned to Death, by the procurement especially of Saul a Jew of Tursus in Cilicia. But in this fame year as this Saul was journeying to Damascus to make havock of the A. D. 23. Church, he was converted, and called to the Apolleship, after which he went of a from Damascus into Arabia, as he himself testifieth in his Epistle to the Galatians. V. C. 787. Print However it came to pass, Cains succeeded him, and some (d) judged him willing (d) xiphiling that so it should be, because he would prove a very bad man, and hoped that there by the faults of his own reign might be fomething covered. He was received with (c) Josephus great applause by all men. By the Army, for that he had been brought up con- at supra tinually amongst them. Some say he was born in the Camp; 'tis certain that the firname of Caligula he had for that reason, because he was wont (f) to wear that (f) Sutton in habit of the ordinary Soldiers. By the people he was gladly entertained out of prints their affection to Germanicus, and commiseration of his family so grosly abused by Tiberius, whose cruelty he escaped meerly by his great diffimulation, and taking

2. Caius, within a few days after the sumptuous Funeral of Tiberius, made A- Josephs Amits. grippa King of that Countrey whereof Philip had been Tetrarch. This Agrippa was the Grand fon of Herod the Great by his Son Ariftobulus, whom he put to death, being begotren of Berenice the Daughter of Salome. Having run through many ftraights for want of Money by reason of his great profuleness, he became at length very dear to Caius, who restored him to liberty (being imprisoned by Tiberius for wishing his death, that Caligula might succeed him) and then set the Diadem on his head. He had a Sifter named Herodias, married to Philip Herodes (not Philip the Tetrarch) his and her Uncle, and Brother to Philip Antipas on the Father's fide, his Mother being Daughter to Simon the High-Prieft. This Woman Herod Antipas was fo taken with, that though he had already to Wife the Daughter of Aretas King of Arabia Petræa, yet he Divorced this, and Married her, upon which account Aretas made War upon him, and defeated his Forces, which * was taken by the People as a Judgment of God upon him for putting to * 1dem. cap. 7. For he caused the images of their Gods to be brought to Rome, whereof the heads being taken off. that of his own was placed upon each in their stead. He would offer himfelf to be adored amongst his brother gods as he called them, and ordained Temples and Priefts with Sacrifice of no commoner things than Peacocks, Turkies, and Pheasants, which were to be offered every day; and he invited the Moon to his Imbraces. He could not endure to be accounted the off-fpring of Agrippa, because of his ignobility; but gave out that his Mother was conceived of the incest of Augustus with his Daughter Julia. He himself committed incest with all his Sisters, and spared not the chastity of either Sex. So imperious he was, that he would make Persons of greatest Rank run by his Chariot, and stand girt with Towels when he was at meat. So cruel, that he killed his Grand-mother Antonia by unkindness, he murdered his Brother Tiberius, though he had adopted him, with all his Kindred except his Uncle Claudius, whom he preserved for a

he made havock of them, caufing fome to be knocked in the head with Clubs, if he were but disturbed in the shows. He would cast old men, or infirm, to wild Beafts, and shutting up the Earns and Store-houses proclaim a Famine. Many of Quality being first Stigmatized, he condemned to the Mines, or to repairing of High-ways, thut them up like Beafts in a Den, or fawed them afunder; and that for no greater Matters than if they had not high thoughts of his gifts and shows, or had not fworn by his Genius.

5. He forced Parents to be present at the Death of their Children. To one Idem ibid. that excused himself by Sickness, he sent a Litter to carry him. A certain Knight capp. 27, 28, whom he cast to wild Beasts, crying out that he was innocent, he caused to be or. taken out, and his Tongue to be cut out of his Head, after this to be cast in again. Demanding of one whom he had recalled out of Banishment what he did all that time? upon answer that he prayed for the death of Tiberius, and that He might succeed him, supposing that all whom he had Banished prayed also for his Death, he gave command that they should all be killed. He would suffer none to be put to Death but by degrees, that so as he said they might feel themselves die. He forely afflicted the order of Knights, and being incenfed against the multitude for favouring a Party against him, he wished that the People of Rome had but one neck. He was wont openly to complain of the condition of his time, because not signalized by any publick Calamity, and how by the Serenity thereof he should be buried in oblivion (his being herein contrary to the disposition of Phalaris) in formuch as he would wish for some overthrow of the Armies, some Famine, Pestilence, Fire, or Earth-quake. He purposed utterly to destroy the works of Virgil and Livy, and take away the Law. He took away honour from Families, and when he met with any beautiful person, made them as deformed as he could. He was so Prodigal that he would drink most precious Pearls dissolved in Vinegar, and invent all forts of delicacies, by which course he spent infinite Sums in the space of three years, which Tiberius had hoarded up; and to recruit his Coffers raifed unheard-of Tributes. Amongst other means for increasing his Revenue he fet up Stews in his Palace, and some were fent about to invite all forts of men to them, fuch as came being commended for increasing Cafar's Revenues. He purposed to depart to Antium and thence to Alexandria, but first to kill all the chief both of the Senatorian and Equestrian rank; and answerably hereunto were there found after his death two Books, whereof the title of one was Gladius, or Sword; and the other Pugio, or Dagger, wherein were written the names of fuch as he intended to murder. A great cheft also was found full of divers Poisons, which being by Claudius his appointment cast into the Sea, the water is reported to have been so infected, that the fish was therewith killed, and was cast up by the tide upon the shoar. These things are reported by Suetonius, concerning which Author yet it is observed by some, that he wrote the lives of the Emperours with as great liberty as they lived them

They killed him as he returned from the Games of the Palace to refresh himself, Chareas giving him the first wound. His guard of Germans (which loved him exceedingly, because of the profit they reaped from the execution of his cruel commands) in a great rage flew all they could meet in the Palace, and with much ado were kept from putting thousands to death, that were now affembled in the Theatre. Nay the common People allured by his shows and largesses, endeavoured to find out the Authors of his death, to whom Valerius Afiaticus (who had been Conful) coming forth whilft they were in an uproar, and every one inquired who had done the deed, O, faid he, I wish I had done it. Being once advised to beware of a Cassius, he suspected Cassius Longinus the Proconsul of Asia (of the same Family with Cassius one of the Murtherers of Julius Casar) and fending for him, put him to death, never thinking that Chareas had also that and tending for mint, but mint to the state of the state year of the City, and the 42 after the Birth of Christ, he himself the fourth time, 01. 205. 48. 1. and C. He was at first discharged by the messages of the Senate, but again took heart, at the Counsel and directions of King Agrippa, so that the Senators despairing of Success, gave over their Enterprize, but not without (some of them) feeking the Sovereignty for themselves, which would have produced as greatSlaughters and Defolations as ever, had any of them obtained liberty to profecure their defires. The People were for Claudius his preferment, envying the Senate it's ancient Power, and making account by the Sovereignty of one to be sheltred from it's avarice. Hereby also they thought to avoid such Civil Wars as fell out amongst the great ones in the time of Pompey. The wifer fort knew that it was impossible the Commonwealth should subsist but under Monarchy: fome one they were lure would establish himself, and that through Desolations, Confusions, and Slaughters, they must come to it at last. Self-preservation therefore, and publick interest easily led them to the next Heir, who by his Birth could challenge an interest. For hereditary Monarchies, by preserving due Reverence, excluding Emulations and Contests amongst equals, by preventing numerous pretentions, and the extravagant grandeur of divers Families, can only secure the Peace and Prosperity of their Subjects.

and Euphrates, limits fet by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine (for to he himself speaketh in Julian) or invincible, and not miscarry through its too great bulk and burthen. Strabo is of opinion, that he despited it, seeing no cause to fear, nor hope of much profit from the Britains; and yet it seemed positions, un-that no finall danger would be presented from other Nations lying about the touched by Island. But at length he departed from Rome with a purpose to transfer the War into Britain; but when he was come into Gall, the Britains pacified him by Ambassadors, and having obtained his amity, dedicated Presents and Oblations in the Capitol. They brought the Island now familiar to the Romans, and endured Taxes and Imposts, which faith Strabo, are now nothing grievous to them, being raifed out of such Merchandise and Commodities as are Shipped to and fro out of Gall and Eritain: those be Ivory Works, Bits and Bridles, Chains and Wreaths, Veffels of Electrum and Glass, with other base and common Wares of like fort. And therefore there needs no Garrison for that Island. For is would require one Legion at least, and some Horsemen, if Tributes were to be Le-Angallas was vied from thence, and the faid Tributes would but countervail the Charges of maindirected from taining a Garrison there; for of necessity, by imposing a Tribute, the Revenues coming by Tollage and Poundage, and such like Imposts, would be less: and if any violent course were used, some Peril or other must be expected. The Year following alfo, Augustus intended a second Expedition into Britain, because there was some variance about the Covenants: but by occasion of some insurrections made in Spain by the Cantabri and others, that Journey was stayed.

The Roman Empire.

11. Tiberius nothing transported with an inordinate desire of inlarging the Empire, feemeth to have rested in that counsel of Augustus; For he produced a Book written with Augustus his own hand, wherein was contained the whole Wealth and Estate of the Commonweal, what number as well of Roman Cititizens as Allies were in Arms, how many Navies, Kingdoms, and Provinces, what Tributes and Imposts belonged to the State, with a resolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the same bounds. Which advice and resolution of Augustus contented him to well, that, as Tacitus reporteth, he would attempt nothing in Britain, nor maintain any Garrison or Deputies here. For, whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what Coasts and Countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it feemeth, that the Britains entertained amity with the Romans. For when as at the same time Germanicus sailed the Ocean, some of his Company being by force of Tempest driven to this Island, were by the Princes thereof sent back again. That Cains Cafar cast in his mind to enter this Island is certain: but by his shittle brain, sudden repentance, and wonderful Attempts against Germany it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which he hovered) with the fame of some mighty piece of work, he Cains his rare made a Bridg between Baia and the Piles of Puteoli, three Miles and Six Hundred Paces in length. But having atchieved no greater exploit, than received to grace Adminius the Son of Cynobellinus King of the Britains (who being by his Father Banished, had fled over Sea with a small Power and Train about him) he sent magnificent and glorious Letters to Rome, as if the whole Isle had been yielded up into his hands, warning and withing the Posts to ride forward directly into the Forum and Curia, and in no wife to deliver the faid miffives unto the Confuls, but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent Affembly of the

12. After this, to the Ocean he marched, as if he minded to translate the War over into Britain. There upon the shoar he embattelled his Soldiers: he himself took Sea in a Gally, and having lanched forth a little from the Land, returned again. Then mounting an high Scaffold, he fate him down, and gave his Soldiers the Sign for Battel, and commanding the Trumpets to found, on a atchievement. fuddain charged them to gather Cockles, Muskles, and other small Shel-fishes. Having gotten these spoils he waxed proud, as if he had Conquered the Ocean: and having rewarded his Soldiers, he brought some of these Shel-fishes to Rome, to shew the booty he had gotten. In token and memorial of this great atchievement, he caused to be built a brave high Turret, out of which as from a Watch-Tower, there might blaze all night long, Lights, and Fires, for the better dire. ction of Sea-men. The ruines hereof are some times seen at a low-water on the shoar of Holland, by the People inhabiting thereabouts, called Britenhuis, that is, the British house, who also find oftentimes stones ingraven with letters:

It is probable, that Dit L. 16,6 with this Watch-tower afterward being repaired by Septimous Severus, became a Granary for reception of Corn, which was brought out of Britain, whence it might take its name of Britenhuis. For Zozimus writeth, faith Cambden, that Corn was wont to be brought out of Britain by Ships to this place, and thence with Barges and Boats haled up the Rhene against the stream, to serve the Roman Garrisons : seeing that Julian the Emperour built Garrisons, as Marcellinus faith, wherein might be inned and kept the Corn, that the Britains usually transported thither.

13. But, afterwards the inland parts of Britain wasted, rather with Civil Wars and Factions than by the force of the Romans, came by little and little subjected to them. Some making choice of their protection swore allegiance to them, and practifed by all means to subject their Native Countrey unto their Government. The principal of these Fugitives was one Bericus, who moved, and perswaded Claudius to give the Attempt upon Britain, which none assayed to do since the time of Julius Cefar, and which then was up in a broil and commotion, for that the faid Fugitives were not rendred again unto them. Claudius claudius send-therefore in his Second Year Ordered A. Plautius the Prator to pass over out of Gall, who having by the means of Narciffus quieted the Soldiers that refused to make War without the compass the World, overthrew several times the Sons of Cynobellinus. His Lieutenant was Flavius Kespasian, who behaved himself very gallantly in the Service. But Claudius in his Fourth Year being very ambitious of a Triumph (as not contenting himself with Triumphal Ensigns decreed to him by the Senate) without a just cause pitched upon Britain as yet Seditious, because their Fugitives were not restored. Sailing from Oftia, he was twice in danger of Shipwrack, once near Liguria, and again near the Islands Stachades (four or five in the French Sea near Languedos and Provence) where from Maffilia (now Marfeils in Provence) he went by Land as far as Gefforiacum (now Pring thither Bologue) and thence passing into the Island subdued part of it, and amongst shinest sub-other Towns Camulodunum (now Maldon) the Regal Seat of Cynobellinus, with the Orcades: Die writeth, that at his first Landing he defeated the Barbarians in Battel. But Suetonius faith, he performed these Acts without a Battel, and the loss of one drop of Blood. Having been divers times saluted Imperator (a sum at sething directly saith Dio against the Roman Custom; for lawful it is not in one pracept 17. War to assume that Title oftner than once) he disarmed the Britains, and committing as well the Government of these, as the War with the other (not vet fubdued) to Plantius, he hasted to Rome in the fixth Month, sending before him

Pompey and Silanus his Sons-in-Law with Tidings of the Victory. 14. So great amatter it was, and of such consequence to have Conquered even so small a parcel of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in honour of Claudius, Yearly Games with Triumphal Arches, both at Rome, and also Gefforiacum in Gall, and a most honourable and stately Triumph. To the beholding hereof Governours of Provinces, and some banished Persons also were permitted to come to the City: a Naval Crown was fixed on the Loover of the Palace, as the Enfign of the British Sea subdued by him : the Provinces brought in Crowns of Gold, and Gallia Comata one above the reft weighing nine pounds: and the hither part of Spain, another of seven pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitol by the stairs on his knees, supported, and heaved up by his Sons-in-Law on either side. He entred in Triumphing wife the Adriatick Sea, embarked in a Veffel more like some exceeding great House than a Ship. Unto his Wife Messalina was allowed the highest place to sit in, as also to ride in a Carroach or hanging Coach. After this he fet forth Triumphal Plays and Games, being made Confut for that purpose. The Solemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when he was gone afide from the fight, others had the charge hereof. Horse-races for the Prize he promised as many as those days would admit. Howbeit, above Ten there were not; for between every course of Horses Bears, were killed, Champions performed their duties, and choice Boys sent for out of Asia, danced the Warlike dance in Armour. Upon Valerius Asiaticus, Julius Silanus, Sidius Geta, and others, in regard of this Conquest, Conquest, he heaped Triumphai Ornaments. He suffered Licinius Crassus Frugi to follow after himself in his Triumph, mounted upon a trapped Courier with a rich Caparison, and arrayed in a Robe of Date-tree work. Upon Folidius the Eunuch he bestowed a Spear-staff without a head: upon C. Gavius Chains. Bracelets, Horse-trappings, and a Coronet of Gold; as is to be seen in an ancient Marble at Taurinum.

15. In the mean time Aulus Plautius went on with the remainders of the War in Britain, and sped so well, that Claudius passed a Decree That he should enter Rome in Ovant Triumph: and when he was entred into the City, he himself And Vilipifian went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way. Velpafian, partly Sutton in Veproper in and Clauding and partly under Planting Sought Things Partly faffan. under Claudius, and partly under Plautius, fought Thirty Battels with the Enemy; subdued also two most mighty Nations, and above twenty Towns, together with the Isle of Vetis or Make. For those exploits he received triumphal Ornaments, and within a short space two Sacerdotal Dignities, with a Confulship which he bore the two last Months of the Year. Titus also served in quality Idem in Tito. of a Tribune under his Father with exceeding commendations for his industry and valour (for he valiantly delivered his Father when befieged) and no less Repute of his modest carriage say some, as appeareth by a number of his Images and Titles to them annexed, throughout the Provinces of Germany and Britain. About this time a new Island appeared in the Egean Sea named Thia near to Hiera, which One Hundred and Ten Years before it first also sprung up: And both Oroflut lib. 7. of them lay betwixt Thera and Therafia, which in like manner One Hundred ep.6. and Thirty Years before the Original of Hiera were first seen amongst the Cy-Pind. 26. 87. Domitius Anobarbus. The Maid was formerly contracted to L. Silanus an eminent young man, but he accused by Vitellius was put out of his Pratorfbip, and the match was broken betwixt him and the Princess, whereupon he shortly after killed himself. And a Year after was Claudius persuaded by Pallas to adopt Nero his Wive's Son. though he had a Son of his own, by name Britanicus, but two Years younger. Felix fent Go. Pallas was so high flown in favour, that he procured his Brother Felix to be sent Governour into Samaria, and afterwards got his power extended to Judea, Gali-lee, and Peras, where he acted the part of a Tyrant, and having married several great Ladies, obrained also Drufilla Sister to Agrippa. The Parthians now again at variance amongst themselves, and wearied with the Tyranny of Gotarzes, asked a Prince from Rome. Claudius fent them Meherdates the Son of Vonones, and Grandson of Phrastes: but he was presently betrayed into the hands of Gotarzes. At this time also the Britains rebelled.

The Britains

17. Now was P. Ostorius Proprætor here, upon whose first coming the Bri-Tacitus Annal. tains grew confident, as contemning him for his want of experience. The lib. 12. Winter being begun they made excursions into the Territories of the Allies of Copp. 31, 32. Rome. He knowing that the first event would either incourage or daunt them? fet upon, and scattered them, then went about to disarm all such as he had reafon to suspect; but the Icent (inhabiting those parts now called Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridg bire, and Huntington bire) a strong Nation, refusing to submit, drew others in to them, and pitching upon a very convenient ground gave Battel to the Romans, who by reason that they despaired of Pardon, had much ado to overcome them. By this foil of the Iceni, others before unfettled were contained in obedience, and Oftorius led his Army against the Cangi (a People living towards the Irifb Sea) and wasting their grounds had passed on well nigh to the Irifb Sea, when he was recalled by the discord of the Brigantes (people inhabiting the North part of this now called England) the Ring-leaders of whom when he had taken off, the Rebellion was extinguished. But the Silures (inhabiting Southwales) would by no means be either allured or discouraged from waging War, trufting to the strength of Charactacus the greatest Prince amongst the Britains, who excelling as well in policy as the knowledge of the Countrey, transferred the War into the Territories of the Ordovices (now Northwales) as more convenient for him by reason of the Mountains and Rocks. Here he made a speech to his Officers, putting them in mind how their Ancestors had repulled Cafar the Dictator, and willing them to behave themselves at this time, Are reduced, as the beginning of their liberty or eternal slavery. Till they came to strokes the Romans had the worst of it; but afterwards breaking into the Rampires they eafily routed the Britains, and got a great Victory, wherein the Wife and Daughter of Caractecus being taken, his Brethren yielded themselves.

Being carried to Rome, the people was called together as to some famous show, and the Pratorian bands were placed along for the reception of him. The Prayers of the rest were by reason of fear, base, and nothing savouring of Nobility: but Cariffacus, neither hanging down his head, nor craving any mercy, when he stood before the Emperour's Tribunal, spake to this purpole: If my moderation in prosperity had been as great as my Nobility and Fortune, I had come rather as a Friend into this City, than a Captive: neither would you have difdained to receive me with Covenants of Peace, being a Prince descended of Noble Progenitors, and a Commander over many Nations. My present state is, as to me His speech to the Empe-Dishonourable, so to you Magnificent. I have had Horses, Men, Armour, and Wealth: What marvel if against my will I have lost them all? For if you will rule over all men, it followeth that all men must abide Servitude. If presently I had yielded, and been dewvered into your hands, neither had my Fortune nor your Glory been very remarkable: and oblivion would have followed my punishment. But if you fave me alive, I (ball be an example of your Clemency for ever.

they being all unbound did their reverence likewise unto Agrippina (who sat aloft not far off in an high seat to be seen) giving her the like praises, and in the same degrees of style as they did the Emperour himself. Surely a strange precedent without any example, faith the Historian, that a Woman should fit and command the Romin Enfigns. But the carried her felf as a fellow and affociate in th Empire gotten by her Progenitors. After this the Senate was called together, and the Fathers made long and glorious discourses, as touching the Captivity of Caractaens. Neither was this less honourable, as they affirmed, than when Pub. Scipio shewed Siphan, L. Paulus, Perfes, or whosoever else exhibited Conquered Kings to the view of the People. As for Oftorius, it was Decreed that he should be honoured with triumphal Ornaments. But his Fortune soon changed, either for that he grew secure upon the Captivity of so considerable a man, The pritains or the Enemy was highly moved to revenge it. For a Party left to awe the Stagniare up. lures was incompassed by the Britains, and if help had not presently come in from the adjoining Villages and Fortresses, had been utterly cut off, besides, that the Commander in Chief with Eight Centurions, and many others was flain. Not long after fuch as went to gather Forrage, and several Companies fent in to their aid, were also routed, and the Enemy was hardly restrained at length by the help of the Legions. After this hapned many Skirmishes, as they met by chance, or were defirous of Booty, and two Auxiliary Cohorts were intercepted, with the Spoils of which other Nations were drawn to revolt, and not long after Oftorius spent with care and pensiveness died. To his place Claudius preferred A. Didius, who found things but in a bad condition, through the boldness of the Silures. But the Britains falling out amongst themselves were feveral times overthrown, and then kept under.

Subdued.

Claudius, the Twelfth Year of his Reign ending, bestowed on Agrippa the Joseph Anti-Tetrarchy of Philip, as also that of Lysanius, taking Chalcis from him after he quest lib 20. had Governed it Four Years. causes of both Cities, whose Mother Agrippina now began to be discovered to her Husband. He chanced in his drink to lay that it was Fatal to him first to endure, and then to punish the wickedness of his Wives, and he repented of his folly in preferring her Son before his own. She bethinking her felf how to escape the danger, first gave him Poison in Mushrooms his beloved meat, but it passing through him, the used the skill of Xenophon the Physician, who as it were to A.D. 55. help him to Vomit, put something down his Throat dipped in a most violent ν c 867. Poison, and so he died, who within a small time upon a very small account had put to death Thirty Five Senators, and Three Hundred Equites. He was a man Sutton in Clauthat before his coming to the Government was despiled by his Relations as some die. imperfect thing, and afterwards was but counted blockish, and despicable by others, yet sometimes he would judg very wifely and circumspectly, and so far profited in liberal fludies (which he very much plied) that he wrote divers things, and amongst the rest a learned defence of Cicero in answer to the Books of Asimius Pollio. He was fearful above measure, so that (amongst other demonstrations) when Camillus, who attempted a Rebellion, sent to him a reproachful, and menacing Letter, willing him to lay down the Government, he was in doubt, and seriously consulted whether he should not do it : and this made him put many to death upon idle and malicious acculations. He was the very Slave of his Freedmen (whereof Narciffus and Pallas were chief) who rather Reigned than he; for, they managed all things according to their Pleasure or Lust, bestowing favours upon whom they pleased, and killing any, though never so worthy, or nearly allied to him. He excused his anger and peevilnness by a publick Declaration. He was so forgetful that he would several times ask for such as he had put to death. He would eat and drink at any time, or in any place: he was a great player at Dice, of which Art he fet forth a Book. He died on the third before the Ides of October, in the 64 Year of his Age, when he had Reigned Thirteen Years, Eight Months, and Twenty Days, in the 807 Year of the City, the 55 after the birth of Christ, M. Asinius Marcellus and M. Acilius Aviola being Confuls, 21. Now that we may note briefly such Ecclesiaftical matters, as fell out in the Reign of Claudius. In his First Year James the Brother of John was, as we faid, put to death by Agrippa, and Peter being cast by him into Prison was delivered by an Angel. In his Second, Paul returned out of Arabia, to Damascus, whence he came to Jerusalem to see Peter. Hence he went to Tarfus, and not long after to Antioch, being called by Barnabas, who had been sent thither by the Apostles. In his Third, Paul Preached for a whole Year at Antioch, together with Barnabas. In his Fourth, Paul carried the Almes of the faithful from Amioch to Jerusalem, because of the Famine foretold by Agabus. Thence returning to Antioch, he was fent with Barnabas to Preach the Gospel in Asia, In this Fourth then, and the Fifth Year of Claudius he Preached Christ in Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, and returned to Antioch. In the Sixth he was fent from Antioch to Jerusalem to the Council with Barnabas, whence returning to Antioch he reprehended Peter, who came thither a little after him, for his diffembling, and not long after went with Silas into Alia, to confirm the Churches he had Founded, In the Seventh of Claudius he Preached Christ in Crete, and through Pisaia, Pamphylia, and Phrygia, visited the Churches, and converted the Galatians to the Faith. In the Eighth he came to Tross, and thence into Macedonia, where at Philippi, as also at Theffalonica, at Beraa, and then at Athens he Preached the Gospel. About the end of the Ninth Year he came to Corinth, where he found Aquila and Priscilla, with whom he stayed half a Year Preaching the Gospel, and thence wrote both his Epistles to the Thessalonians. In the Eleventh Year he came from Corinth to Ephesus with Aquila and Priscilla, whom there leaving, he went to gerusalem to the Feast.

Thence he returned to Antioch and Ephesus through Phrygia, Galatia, and the higher parts of Ata. Being at Ephelus in the Twelfth Year, there he continued Two Years, till the Tumultrailed by Demetrius. Hence he wrote his Epiftle to the Galatians; the former also to the Corinthians, and to Titus, but about the end of the following Year; as also the first to Timothy. About the end also of the Thirteenth Year, or the beginning of the following, he came into Macedonia and Athaia, to receive the Collections to be carried to Jerufalem. And hence (from Corinth) being to pass into Asia, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans about the end of the following Year. About the end also of the Fourteenth Year he was imprisoned at Jerusalem. And being carried to Casarea was there kept Prisoner by Felix for two Years. Concerning the Chronology of their accounts, Ludovicus Cappellus is by Students to be consulted, in his Historia Apostolica Illustrata.

22. St. Peter the Apostle is reported in the second Year of Claudius to have come to Rome, having been formerly Bilbop of Antioch, in which See he was fucceeded by Evodius one of the Seventy Disciples, of whom also Paul maketh mention: some say that he continued Bishop at Rome Twenty five Years, viz. of S. Patr his Twelve under Claudius, and Thirteen under Nero. Perhaps he might come to being at Rome. Rome at this time, but that he stayed there Twenty five Years is but to be taken for a Fable. For we read that Claudius Banished all Jews from Rome, and he being a Tew, must needs give place, or abide the danger. We do not find he had any trouble, and this was by reason of his absence. It's probable that he went away when Aquila and Priscilla departed Rome, and met St. Paul at Corinth. Eusebius indeed often mentioneth his being at Rome, and writeth, that he suffered Martyrdom together with Paul under Nero. This might be at his second return unto Rome, fo that we may count Twenty five Years from his first Coming under Claudius unto the end of his Martyrdom under Nero; it being, to fay truth, better thus to reconcile Writers, than flatly to deny all, or to fay, he never was at Rome. Here he met with Simon Magus again, and confounded him, as it's reported. This man being a Samaritan, of the Village Gitton, was Alis 8. Baptized by Philip the Deacon in Samaria. He would have bought of Peter the Enft. 6.2.6 i. gift of the Holy Ghost; and thence of him arose the word Simony. He came to Rome in the time of Claudius, where calling himself a God, he was honoured with an Image, having this infeription, Simoni Deo Santto. He had to his yoke- Idem c. 12, 13, mate one Helene, by Ireneus called Selen, a Witch and a common Harlot, whom 14he called the Principal understanding. He said unto the Samaritans that he was free the Father, unto the Jews, that he was the Son descended from Heaven, and Ephiphan. I. i. unto the Gentiles, that he was the Holy Ghoft. Peter foiled him in Samaria, 10m. whence for thame he fled; and leaving Samaria and Judea, he failed from East to West, and came to Rome, under Claudius, where Peter methim. Peter it's said had much to do with him in the presence of Nero. Some write that he had three Conflicts with him; and in the end Simon feeing himself foiled, and his Witchcraft not at all to prevail, told them he would leave their City, and flie up into the Heavens whence he came. Whereupon at a certain day appointed. he climbed up into the high Capitol, whence he took his flight by the means of Witchcraft, and the Spirits that bore him up in the Air. The People at the fight hereof was amazed. But Peter fell down and prayed God that his Witchcraft might be revealed to the World. He had no sooner spoke, but down came Simon Magus, and was broken to pieces, so that he there miserably died. Now again to the course of our History.

23. The death of Claudius was kept private by Agrippina, till fuch time as Tacitus Annai. the Empire could be secured to Nero her Son, who then, at noon time of the large day, the doors of the Palace being opened suddainly, accompanied with Burrhus Captain of the Guard, went to the Watch, by which at the instance of the Captain, he was received with lucky Acclamations. Being put into a Litter, he was thence carried to the Camp, where speaking at the time required, and promising a Donative to the Soldiers, after the example of his Predecesfors, he was faluted Emperour, and prefently owned by the Senate, and in the Mro fucceed- Provinces. Claudius his Testament he never published, lest the People should be moved by the injury offered to Britanicus, to whom his Father was fo Superlatively unnatural, as to prefer his Wives Son before him. Indeed some of the Soldiers at first paused, and looking back, asked for Britanicus; but finding no body to ftir in his behalf, joined themselves to the multitude. Nero came to the sunon in Me Government, being Seventeen Years Old, Six Years after he had been adopted rone c. 7by Claudius.

24. Nero at first carried it exceedingly well towards People and Magistrates, Governing according to the Pattern of Augustus, whose prescript he professed he would observe. He omitted no occasion of shewing liberality, clemency, All Princes red, that All Princes came [bort of them. Heavy Tributes he either took off or Arrhive Village Concession and Control of the People, gave Annual Stipends to impove Arr. and mildness, insomuch that Trajan himself admiring his first Five Years, averleffened, diffributed money to the People, gave Annual Stipends to impove dir. rished Senators, and to the Pretorian bands Corn every Month freely. Being defired to subscribe to the execution of a condemned Person, Ob, said he, wish I knew not letters. But this good beginning is rather to be attributed to Burrhus and Seneca (the latter of whom, after his Adoption, was his Schoolmafter) who being in power, mutually helped each other. Agripping thought Tacitus Agral. by virtue of his name to rule indeed, and at the beginning Poiloned Silanue L 13.6.1, 66 Proconful of Asa, and made away Narcissus; without his knowledge the former, and the latter without his confent; and had gone further, but that Burrhus and Seneca interposed. Not long after, jealousies arose betwixt them, for he falling in love with Atte a Freed-woman, and distasting such as she leaned upon, removed Pallas her Minion from publick imployment, which so far exasperated her, that she upbraided him with Britanicus, as most fit to enjoy his Fathers Seat. This Seat she told her Son he now enjoyed by her means, and not sparing to lay open all the evils, as she said, of their unhappy Family, her own Marriage and Sorcery; the took it as happy for the gods and her, that Britanicus was living, and protested she would go with him to the Camp.

25. This, together with Britanicus his frowardness (who being Fourteen Iden ibidans, Years old, began to be fensible of his condition, and to move compassion towards himself) made Nero resolve to dispatch him out of the way, and for that he could not do it openly to his Brother, he procured Poison to be given him, which working downwards first without any great incommodity, he caused to be boiled to that height, that it inftantly killed him the second time, whilst he himself fate at a Supper with him, as knowing nothing. He made him be buried the poisoneth the same, though a very rainy Night, his mean Funeral being provided beforehand. Agripping very much troubled that her refuge was gone, was shortly after accused to her Son, as intending by a Marriage with Rubellius Plantus (who was as near to Augustus as Nero himself) to invade the Sovereignty. Being fomething gone in drink when he heard of it, he would have had her killed out of hand, but being hindred by Burrhus, the next day she stoutly denied any fuch Delign, and the wound of jealoufie for the time was skinned over. After iden ibidicasi Beginneth to two Years, Nero began to discover what his Nature prompted him to. Difguifing himfelf in a fervile habit, he ran about the City by Night to Taverns and Stews, accompanied with fuch as himfelf, where taking away things by force, as also cutting and flashing such as they met, he himself came into danger of life. 26. A little before those things, he sent Porcius Festus into Judes to succeed Tolobus Anti-Felix, who being out of his Office, was accused at Rome by such Jews as dwelt quit. 1. 20.17. at Cafarea. Nero pardoned him through the intercession of his Brother Pallas,

E-flus fucceed who was as yet in favour. About the same time happened a great differition betwixt the Jews of Cafarea and the Syrians, which there inhabited with them, about the Right and privilege of the City. They pretended that Herod the founder of it was a Jew, and those answered, that e're he named it Cafarea, it was called the Tower of Straton, at what time none of the Jews inhabited it; and the Syrians by a great Sum of Money procured Beryllus (who had been Nero's School-Mafter) to get them the Emperours Letters, whereby was abrogated that Privilege which the Jews had formerly enjoyed with the Syrians. Herewith the Jews incensed, were still seditious till the beginning of the War. Great motions at this time fell out in the East. The Parthians had fet upon Ar-Tacitain fie menia, having driven away Rhadamiftus Nephew to Mithridates, whom Claudi-pra c. 34, 641 as had fet over that Kingdom, and who was killed by the other, that he might fucceed him. Nero fent to preferve that Countrey Domitime Corbulo, who for two or three Years had little to do, because the Parthians deferred the War. But now Tiridates Brother to Vologefus the Parthin heing resolved to fight for carbate pro-the Diadem, the Armenians also inclining to him, Corbulo took several Forts, and sperch in the besinged Artaxata the Metropolis, which, though the Inhabitants opened the Gates, and for this were spared, yet because it could not be held for the great-ness of it, was burnt and razed. Nero for these things was saluted Imperator, very great Honours were Decreed to him, and a far greater stir was made by the flattering Fathers than was convenient.

27. The same Year that these things were done by Corbulo, being the Fifth of Popular, which Otho her Husband, who also had been too familiar with her in the days of her incented him Collins and Alexander of the second s his Reign, Nero fell in love with Poppas Sabina, the Daughter of P. Ollius, though the named her felf after her Grand-Frther by the Mother's fide, because more eminent. He came first acquainted with her by the commendations of first Husband Rusus Crispinus: She incensed him more against his Mother, because she feared, that as long as she lived, he would not dismis Octavia and marry her felf. Sometimes she laid at him by divers Criminations, and otherwhiles jeered him as a Pupil, who not only wanted Command and Authority, but also Liberty. Some have suspected, that Agripping sought to commit In-Tactius Annal. cest with her Son. How true soever this was, he now began to be absolutely 41461,2,000 weary of her, to shun her company, and within a while resolved to make her away, though folicitous how to doit. At length Anicetus his Freed-man and Sutton in No.

This Ship was thus made, and she brought into it by her Son, under colour of doing her honour, but the upper part of the Ship falling, chanced to miss her, though it killed one of her attendants. One of her Maids knowing nothing of the defign, cried out, that she was Agrippina, hoping thereby to save her self, and was thereupon killed by the Oars; but she her felf being filent, escaped them, and fwom to Land. Her Escape struck Nero with great consternation, who called up Burrhus and Seneca to give their advice. Whether they knew of the thing before or no is uncertain. Some fay, Seneca asking Burrhus whether the Soldiers should not be commanded to kill her, he answered, they would do no such

his Promise of dispatching her. This he readily undertaking, accompanied with two others, went to the Village where she lay. One of them first bruised her Head with a Club, another drawing his Sword, the stretched out her Belly He causeth his and bad him strike that, and so died of many wounds. Hereupon he grew exceffive Proud, as Lord over fo many Sleves, and prefently un-masking himfelf, without any care of his actions, fell into fuch diforders, as he appeared rather a Devil incarnate than a man. He became a Stage-player, learning that Art, and exercising himself therein in publick continually. He ordained Games to be solemnized at Rome every Fifth Year, in imitation of the Greeks, and called them Neronia; persons of all sorts, and degrees, being constrained to be Actors. These being continued Night and Day, most horrid things were committed, Prince, Senate, and People, either through affection or fear; not only giving compute way, but compelling to such filthiness. Corbulo at this time prospering in Ar-

But whilft these things His Province were adoing, news came to Suetonius of the Revolt of his Province. For, Prafat agus King of the Iceni, that his Kingdom and Family might be freed from moleflation, left Cafar his Heir, together with his two Daughters. But it hap- A. Provoked by these things, and Fear of worse, when they should be reduced into the form of a Province, the Iceni took Arms, ftirring up the Trinobantes to Rebellion. Others also with joined them, having heretofore combined to recover their liberty out of hatred to the old superannuated Soldiers, who being planted as a Colony at Camalodunum, committed grievous outrages against them, and these were rather cherished by the Army than otherwise, in hope of the like liberty for the time to come. But this Colony not being fenced by any Fortifications, for the Founders rather looked at the pleasantness of the situation than commodiousness of the ground; the Britains accounted it no great matter to de-

ing then befer round by the Natives, all things were burnt and deftroyed, and Petilius Cerealis coming to their relief with the Ninth Legion was utterly defeated, all the Foot being cut in pieces, and the Horse with himself glad to run away to the Camp; whereupon Catus passed over into Gall, having by his avarice been the great cause of this defection. The same Defeat was given to Verulamium (out of the ruins of which arose St. Albans) a Town free of the City of Rome; for the Britains passing by Castles and places of defence, set upon fuch as were most obnoxious to their fury. At both places were Maffacred 70000 persons, none being taken or sold after the custom of War, but either put to the Sword, Hanged, Burnt, or Crucified as Malefactors. Suctonius passed through the midst of his Enemies to Londinum (now London) a Town not then notable in respect of a Colony, but for multitude of Merchants, and plenty of Traffick very famous. Perceiving it but badly provided of Soldiers, although he once thought to make it the Seat of the War, he left it, being not prevailed with to stay either by the Prayers or Tears of the Inhabitants. For, resolving with the loss of one Town to preserve the rest, he took all along with him that could go; and all others, whom either Sex or Age, or the pleafantness of the place detained, were destroyed by the Enemy. Having got together an Army of 10000 men, herefolved to venture a Battel with all expedition; and for that purpose made his choice of convenient ground. Boadicia carrying her two Daughters in the Chariot with her about to the Companies, told them it had been usual before for the Britains to fight under the conduct of Women, but the was now in another capacity than her Ancestors, being not to fight for a Kingdom, but as one of the ordinary fort to revenge her loft liberty, her own stripes, and the violence offered to her Daughters. As for her self she said she was refolved to win the Field, or die; as for men, they might live if they pleased, and be Slaves. Suetonius on the other side considering the weight of the Enterprize, was not filent.

31. The Romans, though far inferiour in number, yet in Military knowledg Tacitus it priand Discipline far exceeding the Britains, put them to the worst, and made of his casp. 371 them great flaughter by reason of the difficulty of flight; for those having 34. brought their Wives to behold the Battel, and be Eye-witnesses of their Valour, they had placed them in Waggons about the Army. Some reported that scarcely fewer then 80000 of the Conquered were flain, and of the Conquerors about 400, and Boadisia ended her life by Poilon. Afterwards, the Army being increased by a great Supply sent over by Cafar, wasted the Countrey with Fire and Sword, which was forely oppressed by Famine; for being intent upon the War, the Britains had neglected the Sowing of Corn, hoping also to enjoy the Provisions of the Enemy. For all this they were not forward to ask Peace, being incouraged by Julius Cassilianus, who being sent to succeed Caius, diagreed fo far with Suetonius, and so illed him to those at Rome, that he wrote they must not expect an end of the War till some one was sent to succeed him, attributeing all mishaps to his unfitness, and all success to the good Fortune of the Commonwealth. To view then the condition of Britain; was Polyeletus the Freedman of Nero lent over, who coming in with a great Train feemed terrible to the Roman Soldiers, but ridiculous to the Britains, who burning with affection to liberty, and as yet ignorant of the power of such, wondred that the General and Army (which had put an end to such a War) would obey Slaves. Suetonious was commanded to deliver up his Army to Turpilianus, who was even now out of the Confulship, and neither provoking nor being provoked coveted flothful idleness, as Tacitus telleth us, with the specious, and comely name of

Yet so ridiculous and degenerate were they at Rome, as to erect Trophies over the Parthians, though they knew nothing of the success, either one way or other. The Pathian Ambassadors came to Rome to desire that (as they hinted) which had been gotten by force, but without effect, for War was decreed against them to be managed by Corbulo; yet were they dismissed with gifts, so as there might be hope, that, if Tiridates himself would intreat for the Diadem, it should not be in vain. Corbulo again invaded Armenia; at which the Parthians affrighted came to a Treaty, wherein it was agreed that Tiridates laying down his Diademat the feet of Nero's Statue should not receive it without his leave. Nero now growing worse and worse, broke out into most horrid impieties, well nigh beyond all belief.

Pifo the head of the party. It was discovered by Milichus the Freed-man of Sceninus, who had commanded him to fcour his Dagger, and provide necessaries for wounds; whereupon some would have had Pifo to have gone to the Roftra, and laid open the Tyrant to the People, to obtain their help; but he refused. The next after him that A. D. 66. was put to death was Annew Seneca the Philosopher, and Nero's School-mafter, V. c. 818. 36. Pompeia Paullina the Wife of Seneca (Dio calleth her a most noble Woman, perhaps the Daughter of Pompeius Paullinus, to whom Tacitus giveth the Title of Confularis, and who was fet over the publick customs or imposts) cut also her veins, that she might die with him, but Nero bearing her no malice as it happened, fent some to stop the bleeding, and recover her. Seneca had another brother besides the father of Lucan, who was also put to death. This was Annæus Novatus, otherwife called Junius Gallio from his adoptive Father, being also mentioned in the Atts of the Apostles, and then Governour of Achaia. Their Father was M. Annæus Seneca a Rhetorician of Coruba in Spain, whose Suafories and Controversies are yet extant, joyned to his sons Works. Nero proceeded in his madness and cruelties. Acting the Stage-player still he was reviled at this Return home by Poppea his wife, for which he kicked her great with child, and thereupon she milcarried. Then raged he against many of greatest note, amongst whom was Mela the father of Lucan (who had formerly perished for the conspiracy) and this allayed the grief which was conceived for the dea th of many others, by the Pestilence that now raged, because they seemed thereby well delivered from the fury and rage of the Prince, who now neither used choice nor measure in his flaughters. Being puffed up with the success of his cruelty, he faid, that None of his Predeceffors knew their power, hinting also, that he meant to destory the remnant of the Senators. It was believed he had agreat defire to deliver up quick men to be devoured of an Ægyptian, a monstrous eater of raw flesh, or any other thing that was given him. 37. Neither was there wanting to him luxury and effeminateness, suitable to his cruelty, nor any other vice, whereby the truth of that saying of Domitius his father might appear, who hearing of his birth, said, That From himself and A-Vid. Such he thought to be fordid and base, as took account of their expenses, and he extolled and admired his Uncle Caius, for spending in so short a time so vast sums, as had been hoarded up by Tiberius. To Tiridates that came to Rome to take a Diadem from his hands, he allowed an incredible fum for his daily expenses, and as profusely gratified him at his departure. He put on no garment twice, plaid for vast sums at dice, fished with a golden net, when he journed any whither, he never had less than a thousand Caroches in them bld cast. his train, and he caused his Mulesto be shod with Silver. To the madness of this expence he was incouraged by one that made him fair promifes of discovering a vast treasure in Africk, which Dido the Queen flying out of Tyre should thence bring with her. But being deceived, aswas likely, with fo foolish a project, he took such courses as became Nero to recruit his Coffers.

38. When Tiridates was departed into Armenia, he went into Greece, there to act Tragedies, to fing, and run races in the Chariot. Running in the Olympick Games, although he fell from his Chariot, yet he was arewarded with a Crown as Viftor. He took from Appollo the Cyrrhaun Territory, and defaced the place where they were wont to receive Oracles, killing men at the hole whence the blaft came. He attempted to cut through the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, digging first himself, and carying out the first basket of Earth upon his shoulders: but with the same fuccess as others had before him. When he was in Achaia news came from Cestius Gallus Prefident of Syria, concerning the Rebellion of the Jews. and hung up leveral, who, though Jews born, were made Equites of Rome, and all under pretence that some had reviled him for cruelty. Not content herewith, he pertwaded the People of Jerusalem to go out to meet, in a courteous manner, certain Soldiers that were coming thither, to whom he fent, that they thould not return their civility, that so they might be offended, and give out words, which advantage he commanded them to take, and fall upon them. This was performed, and many perished, whom the Chief-Priests and others with lamentable intreaties had periwaded to go forth, hoping thereby to pleafe the Tyrant, and prevent mischief. From this violence sprung the War, in the Twelfth Year of Nero's Reign, the Seventeenth of Agrippa, the Second of Florus his Government, the 819 of the City, and 67 after the birth of Christ, C. Suctonus Paullinus and L. Pontius Telefinus being Confuls.

39. Some of those that were most eager after Rebellion, assaulted a Castle Iden ibid. 6.17. called Massaulted as Romans, and placed therein a Garrison of their own. And in the Temple Eleazar the Son of Ananias the High-Priest Captain of the Guard and a forward young man, perfwaded the People no more to offer the Sacrifices which were wont to be offered for the good of the Romans. The Chief-Priest and Nobility diffwaded them all they could from Rebellion, but profiting nothing, belought Agrippa and Florus to come and suppress the Sedition betimes. Florus glad to hear luch news, gave no answer. Agrippa sent 3000 Horse, which being received into the upper part of the City, the Rebels took the lower part with the Temple, and after some ado brake also into the upper Quarters, burnt divers Palaces and publick Houses, and then besieged the Tower of Antony, which having taken within two days, they put the Garrison to the Sword. After this they laid siege to the Kings Palace, whither Agrippa's Soldiers being retired, upon their desire they were dismissed. But the Romans yielding upon the Faith of Eleazar, were all cut in pieces contrary to his word, except Mitilius their Captain, who begging hard for his life, promiled to be Circumcized and turn Jew: and this was done on the Sabbath-day, in September. On the same day were all the Jews of Cafarea Massacred by the Inha itants, to the number of above 200000, not one being left alive; for in several plat those that escaped were taken by Florus, and brought out bound to the People. Turoughout all Syria the flaughters of the Jews were renewed. At Alexandria also a sedition being raised, 50000 Tews were slain in one day by two Roman Le-

But though he might easily with a little patience have taken the City, yet raifed he his Siege, having neglected many opportunities. He departed to Antipatrie, lofing many of hismen by the way, that were out off by the Jensy who followed him close in the rear. With this fuccess the Jens being elevated, created two Commanders to govern the City, viz. Joseph the Son ot Gorion, and Ananus the High-Priest: and they fent several Captains and Governours into the Country, amongst whom was Joseph, who wrote the History of this War. He fortified the feveral Towns of Galilee, and indured as great a conflict as to his own Person, with divers, both there and at Ferusalem, (who envying him the honour of his Command, would have had him turned out) as he did afterwards with the Romans. But Ceftius fent to Nero then in Achaia, as we faid, to let him understand the state of affairs, laying all the blame of the Rebellion upon Florus.

41. Nero deliberating what Captain he should send into Judaa, wanted Corbulo whom he had killed. Atlength he pitched on Vespasian, who having been trained up in Martial matters all his Youth, he thought him only capable of fuch a Charge, though a little before he was grievously offended at him, for that he little regarded his finging (either departing from off the stage, or sleeping if there) so that he forbad him not only his presence, but also publickly to falute him. Hereupon he withdrew himself, and lurked out of the way in fear of his life, but Nero having now need of him, and not fearing him, because of the meanness of his birth Volpation tent and name, gave him this imployment. Nero being come to Naples heard of the conspiracy on that day he had killed his Mother, and was then little moved at it; but seemed rather to rejoice for the occasion that was thence of-fered to spoil the rich Provinces of Gall. For though the Mathematicians had told him that he should be for faken, yet he interpreted it of the losses suffained in Britain and Armenia; and some also promised him, though in this condition on, the Empire of the East, and some by name the Kingdom of Ferusalem; but most affirmed that things would go well at this time. He took nothing so ill in all the opprobrious speeches of Vindex, as to be called an unskilful Musician. and, after the name of his Family, Anobarbus; yet at length terrified by many messages he returned to Rome. Now had he most horrid projects in his head, as of killing the Captains and Governours of Provinces, with all the Exiles, and all of Gallisk Original at Rome; of poiloning the whole Senate in Feaffing, burning the City, and letting loofe wild Beafts upon the People, thereby to hinder the quenching of the Flames. From these things he was thought to be terrified more by despair of accomplishing them, than out of any repentance concerning his purpole. In preparing for his expedition his special care was for the choice of carriages, wherein to convey his Concubines and inftruments for

When he heard of the revolt of the rest of the Armies, in a great rage taking some poison with him in a Golden Box, he left his House, and sending certain of his trustiest Servants to Ostia to make ready some Ships, moved the Tribunes and Centurions of his Guard about flying with him , but some staggering at it and hanging backwards, others flatly refuled it. Then he confidered whether he should not fly to the Parthian, or in an humble manner to Galba; or whether going to the Rofra in a mourning habit, he should not there ask pardon in as doleful manner as he could for what was past? but he was fearful to to be pulled in pieces ere he could reach the publick meeting-place; and put off those thoughts till the next day. At night finding his Guards withdrawn, he started out of his Bed, and sending his Friends about to their Lodgings, went also himself; but none would answer; so that he returned to his Chamber, whence his Attendants also were now fled, having taken away the furniture, and removed out of the way the Box of Poison. Then defired he that some one would kill him, but none attempting it, Then, faith he, I have neither Friend nor Enemy, and ran down as to throw himself into Tiber. But stopping ere he came there, he defired some lurking hole wherein he might recover his Spirits, and Phaon his Freedman offering him his affiltance, he went with him to a Village four Miles diftant in a difguife, hearing as he paffed the Prayers of the People for his destruction. In this First Persecution, besides Paul, who was beheaded, and many others, Peter also was Crowned with Martyrdom; being Crucified as 'tis reported with his head downward, which kind of death he himself defired, because he would die in a more dishonourable fort than his Lord and Master. CHAP. IV.

From the Death of Nero to that of Domitian, the last of the Family of Vespasian, the space of 27 Years.

ALBA after the Death of Nero obtained the Principality, yet not long; Tacitus Hifter. or being Emperour, he maintained not the opinion which had been con- Sutton in Galceived of him whilst a private man; for he gave way to a cruel and ba. covetous humour, acting all things according to the Will and Lust of three men whom the People thence called his School-masters. But his severity towards the Soldiers, especially that speech Legi à se militem non emi, procured his ruin, who upon the revolt of the Armies in upper Germany betrayed him to M. Salvius Otho, notwithstanding he had adopted Pifo. He was murdered by them in the Forum near the place where Curtius rode into the hole, and his head being cut off, for tome time was carried up and down on a Spear, till his Enemies had with the fight fatisfied their flouting appetite, and then it was buried with the Body. He died on the 17th. of the Calends of February, in the 73. Year of his Age, having Reigned Seven Months.

But A. Vi- Olbons, tellius was shortly after saluted Emperour in Germany by the Army there, being Son to L. Vitellius, who Governed Syria. Being lent into Germany by Galba, he denied nothing to the Soldiers, but granted them their wills, with impunity in all things, and for that was rewarded with this Election. Hereupon Otho defired the Senate that they would fend to him; to acquaint him with his Electi-

His interest was todraw out the War in length, having the Enemy at advantage, who was ftraightned both for necessaries, and by reason of the narrowneis of the passage: but he rashly and imprudently resolved on a Battel, either for that Vitellius was not yet come, or urged by the earnestness of the Soldiers. They had four Ingagements, whereof in the first three he had the better, but in the last at Bebriacum (a Village in Italy betwixt Cremona and Verona, now called Labemein) was worsted; yet so as he might without difficulty have recovered himself, though taken at unawares, and deceived by pretence of a parley. But being ashamed to seek his own establishment with the hazard of so many mens lives, rather than out of any desperation, he killed himself. He was much extolled for his generous death (as it was accounted) which rendred him so much more defirable than his life had done, that many thought him to have killed Galba, not so much out of the desire to rule, as to restore liberty (so called) to the Common-wealth. He died on the 12th, before the Calends of Mar,

When yet in Gall he heard of the event of the Battel at Bebriacum, he presently cashiered the Pratorian bands, as giving a bad example of revolt, and 120 which had demanded a reward of Otho for killing Galba, he commanded to be fought, and put to death. Hereby he much commended himself to the People, and gave hopes of an excellent Prince; but carrying on all things afterwards according to his natural inclination and former courle of life, he deserved to be ranked amongst the worst of Governours.

4. He returned to Rome in a triumphant manner, and gave up himself to Luxury and Excess, wherein he also tolerated his Family and Soldiers, as in all manner of wickedness. Coming through the Fields where the Armies fought, when many loathed the noisomness of the Carkeises, he stuck not to say, Optime olere occisum hostem, & melius civem : that A stain Enemy smells well, but sweet-

He drunk much Wine in the place before them all, to prevent any hurt that might proceed from the stench, and caused this Liquour to be diftributed to the Soldiers, with the like vanity and infolence. Entring the City as into a Field with Trumpets founding to the charge, with Colours flying, and in his Coat-armour, he fell more and more into the neglect of all Laws, divine and humane. He made himself Perpetual Conful; and that it might be seen after whose Pattern he meant to Govern, in the Campus Martius attended by a number of Priests he Sacrifized for the Soul of Nero; and at a solemn Feast commanding a Musician tosing something of Domitius, he leaped up and applauded the beginning of Nero's Songs. The People being about to rages commit-rife against them, they betook themselves to the Temple, where they made one Phanias an ignorant fellow High-Priest, though he was not of the Order of Priests; but they were opposed by Ananus, who procured the People to rise against them, and beat them into the inner part. Hereupon they sent to the Idumeans, accusing Ananus of an intention to betray their Country, and forafmuch as they fought for the liberty thereof, and now were belieged, they implored their affiftance. Twenty Thousand came, and being let into the City, together with the Zealots, committed horrid outrages against the Inhabitants. They flew 8000 the first Night, and afterwards other 1200 of the chiefest, (amongst whom was Ananus) besides an infinite number of the common fort: then at length the Idumeans perceiving the wickedness of the Zealots, and that they had falfely accused the Nobility, set at liberto 2000 which they had imprisoned, and returned home. After their departure the Zealots renewed their flaughters, and raged more cruelly than ever, especially against such as they had found attempting to flie to the Romans.

Fugitives to fave their Country, prepared for the Siege of Jerusalem, and that he might not leave an Enemy at his back, took in Gadara (where 13000 were put to the Sword) and all other places beyond the River, except the Castle of Macheron. He built Castles at Jerisho and Adida, and made all things ready for the Siege, but hearing of Nero's death, and the fuccession of Galba, he deferred the Expedition, and sent Titus to know Galba's pleasure. But as Titus sailed by Achaia he heard of his end, and Otho's advancement, whereupon he returned to his Father. Uncertain what would enfue, and who should be Em-Velpasian sub- perour, they neglected the War against the Jews, for they seared their own Country, and therefore thought it an unfit time to affault strangers. Yet he drew out his Army from Cafarea, and subdued all the Forts of Tudea save three Caftles, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the Thieves. Befides these Ferufalem only remained to be Conquered.

9. Vespasian hearing of Otho's death, and having compassion on the State , thought of freeing the Commonwealth from the Tyranny of Vitellius; but for that it was now Winter, and he was at a great distance from Rome, he strove to conceal that indignation which he had conceived. But Mucianus President of Syria perswaded him to it very earnestly: certain Soldiers also who were removed out of Syria into Messa, giving him large commendations, the three Legions which proceeded as far as Aquileia to help Otho, resolved to proceed, notwithstanding his death, and put Vespasian's name into their Colours. Cacina (otherwise called Allienus) the General of Vitellius, made hast and got to Cremons before them; but confidering the effeminateness of his Army, he hearkned to the friendly advice sent him by Antonius, and perswaded his Soldiers, by laying before them the weakness of Vitellius, and the force of his adversary, to revolt. They accordingly sware fealty to Vespasian, but prefently repenting, cast bonds upon their General as a Traytor, and exhorted even Antonius to imbrace the quarrel of Vitellius; then coming to blows, though

For, he would eat four or five Meals a day, which that he might be able to bear, he used frequent vomiting, and inviting himself to the Houses of his friends, he would, as Nero did, put them to incredible expenses. At his coming to Rome his Brother made him a Feast, wherein were terved up 2000 feveral Dishes of Fish, the daintiest that could be found, and 7000 forts of Fowl. But he far exceeded this preparation at the Dedication of the Great Platter, which he called Minerva's Target, in which were mixed together the Livers of Guilt-heads, Brains of Phefants and Peacocks, with the Tongues of Phenicopters, and the small Guts of Sea-Lampries fetched as far as the Carpathian Sea and the Straights of Gibraltar. To one in a Fever, defiring a draught of cold Water, he gave Poifon in it with his own hands. He scarcely ever spared any of his Creditors or others that asked him the Money he ought. One of them faluting him, he fent away to be put to death, and presently again calling him back (for which the by-standers commended his elemency) he caused him to be killed before his eyes, faying, that he would satiste his eyes with the slaughter of him; and another that interceded for him, he put to death with his two Sons. A certain Knight whom he commanded to be flain, to fave his life, told him he had made him his Heir, whereupon he commanded his Will to be produced, in which finding that the man's Freedman was made coheir with him, he caused them both to be put to death. He was cruel to Mathematicians, because they foretold his Reign should be but short. And to compleat all, he was suspected to have killed his Mother. These Vices only seemed to put him in mind of his condition, for else so great a stupidity had seized on him, that if others had not known him to be the Prince, he himself would quickly have forgot it. He accounted all tharp that was wholesome, liking of nothing but what was pleasant; and fortifying himself only with mirth and sottishness against all dangers, he forgot all things past, and regarded nothing present or to come: not a word of War proceeded from him, the rumour and talk of which was forbidden in the City. But he was within a thort time rouzed by the coming of the Forces of Vespassian, who was by others put upon seeking the Empire, being then in Judea. the Empire.

Thence removing to Josapata, on the 21 day of May he took it by ftorm after 40 days, though ftoutly defended by Joseph the Historian. Joseph was taken and kept to be sent Prisoner to Nero; but desiring to speak with Vestalian, foretold him that he should dismiss him out of Captivity, but as Emperour. After this, bestowing his Army at Casarea and Scythopolis, to refresh the Legions, he himself went to Cesarea Philippi, where he was entertained by Agrippa the King for twenty days. They knew and talked to one another, nay intermitting the fight for some time, gave Victuals one to another, and yet after their repairs fell to it again. But in a morning the Soldiers of the Third Legion faluting according to the fathion, the rifing Sun, Vitellius his men thought Mucianus was arrived, and thereupon betook themfelves to Cremona, where loofing Cacina, they procured him to make their Peace, and the Massan Army entering the Town made great disorder.

10. Vitellius hearing of this was amazed, and not knowing what to do, became ridiculous unto all men; for his affairs went down the wind in all pla-Finding is to ces. He covenanted then with Flavius Sabinus the Brother of Vespasian for his own fafety, and prefently after, at the stairs of the Palace, before many Soldiers. professed he would give up the Empire, which he had unwillingly taken upon him. But the Soldiers crying out against it, he deferred the thing, and in the morning went to the Rollra in a mourning habit, where with many tears out of a paper he uttered the same words he had before spoken to the Soldiers, who again interrupting him, the People bad him te of good chear, and promifed him their affiftance. Taking courage herear, he forced Sabinus (who was Governour of the City) with others into the Capitol, which letting on fire he suppressed them, Sabinus being put to death, whole Nephew Domitian (afterwards Emperour) was hid by the Priest of Jupiter's Temple and escaped. Then would be have had the Senate send Amballadors to the Enemy with the Vestal Nuns to beg Peace, or at least so much time as to consider what was to be done. But Vespassion's Soldiers inraged at the report of the besieging of the Capitol, made hast. Petilius Cerealis being fent before with a Thousand Horse set upon the City, but was forced to retreat. Antonius Primus coming on with the rest of the Army, many skirmishes happened, till such time as the Guards being beaten from off the Bridg Velpalian's men entred the City with great fury, wherein they committed grievous outrages. Vitellius was pulled out of an hole in the Palace where he lurked, at first unknown; but being discovered, he desired he might be kept in Prison, for that he had something to reveal, which concerned the fafety of Velpasian. But his hands being tied behind him, and an Halter cast 4. The Tripin e're day following Mucianus entred the City, and the Soldiers being hindred from his departure any further flaughters, the Empire was by the Senate decreed to Vespasian, who hearing these things at Alexandria, receiving congratulatory Embassies from all quarters, and having settled affairs in Egypt e're he set forward for Rome, ordered his Son Titus to fall upon Jeru/alem, and finish the War in

Commotions

11. Whilft Velpalian and Vitellius were yet disputing the controverse, great Tacitus History commotions happened in Germany, the Batavians (now Inhabitants of Holland lib. 4in the Low-Countries) rebelling first at the instigation of Claudius Civilia, the most eminent amongst them, who having been sent Prisoner in Chains unto Nero, and dismissed by Galba, came into danger again under Vitellius, the Army requiring that he should be put to death. He drew into the Conspiracy, befides the Caninafates (a more inconfiderable people inhabiting the fame Island) by secret messages the Auxiliaries of Britain, and the Batavian Cohorts, which then quartered at Mogontiacum, now Mentz. They cast out, or destroyed the Roman Garrisons, overthrew Aquilius Captain of the Vantguard, and after him Mumius Luperous the Lieutenant. Herennius Gallus also, endeavouring to hinder the march of the Batavian Cohorts, was worsted by them. Civilis after the coming of the Cohorts, to colour the matter, fware his Soldiers to Vefpafian, and befreged such as refused in the old Camp. . After this the Romans mutining against Hordonius, the command was given to Vocula, and Herennius Gallus was made his Lieutenant. Vocula in his first ingagement with Civilis had the worst, but at length by good hap overthrew him, the Vizard of his friendship to Vespasian being drawn off.

12. The report of Vitellius his death through Germany and Gall doubled the Identified War. For now Civilis, without any pretence of friendship to Vespasian, carried himself as an Enemy to the Romans, and Vitellius his Soldiers rather wished for external servitude than his Government: the Galles also took heart, interpreting the burning of the Capital to presage the destruction of the Empire. The Treviri therefore (now Inhabitants of Triers) and the Lingones (now of Langres) revolted, when all Gall was in a tottering condition, and what was worfe, and unheard of, the Legions proved unfaithful, and were corrupted. For Nocula being flain, they took an Oath for the Empire of Gall, and to them other Legions in leveral places joined themselves, some being besieged upon necessiry, and afterwards cut in pieces by Civilis as they had deserved. In the mean time Tulius Sabinus one of the revolters taking on him the name of Cafar, led a great and disorderly Company against the Sequani (inhabiting the Country now called La Franche Conte) who not refusing Battel routed the multitude, and put him to flight. These things being reported at Rome rather with improvement, all things seemed there to be lost, whereupon Domitian the Son of Vespasian, and Mucianus, addressed themselves to the War, and four Legions were presently dispatched away towards Germany. 13. By this time the Galles, by the means especially of Julius Vindex, began to confider of the power of the Romans, and at length approved rather of a service Peace than a dangerous War; Petilius Cerealis allo gave the Treviri a great Over throw, and most of the revolters returned to obedience. After this he accepted of Battel from Civilis a nd Classicus his companion, in the beginning whereof he had the worst, for the Legions began to be broken, the Horie was put to flight, Composed by and the Bridg over the River Mosella gained by the Enemy; but though he had now lost even all for want of heed, yet he restored all by his diligence, so as, on the same day he took and destroyed the Enemie's Camp. Domitian and Mucianus fieard of the success ere they came to the Alpes, and Mucianus perswaded Domitian against marching further, knowing his ambitious and haughty humour, which he had already betrayed whilst at Rome; but his advice succeeding not, he went with him out of compliance to Lyons, whence, as 'tis faid, Domitian wrote privately to Cerealis to deliver up the Army to him, that he might therewith leize on the Empire. But perceiving he was despised for his Youth, he betook himself to such courses whereby he thought that his designs might best be covered. During these Stirs Vespasian was yet at Alexandria. Afterwards both Civilis recruited his Forces through Germany, and Cerealis also doubled his ffrength, whereupon followed several fights, the effect of which was a Peace. For the Batavians were so chastized, as glad they were to accept of it, as Civilis of Vespasian hearing of this, and the wasting of Masia, sent Rubrius Gallus to chaftize them, by whom many being flain, such as escaped returned home in great fear. The War being thus ended, the General taking more care for the future, fortified the places with ftrong Garrisons, that the passage might be utterly impassable to the Barbarians. These first eruptions of the Barbarous Northern Nations are therefore more to be noted, because at length they over-ran and destroyed the Roman Empire. Now return we to the affairs of the Tens, and the War managed by Titus.

In the mean time such Idameans as had of late fled into the City, and were become of John's party (whom the Zealots had now chosen their Captain) fell at odds with him, detesting his cruelty, and killing many of his men, forced the Tyrant out of his Palace into the Temple ; but Citizens fearing that by night he might fall our upon the City, let in Simon, and then set upon the Temple, but in vain. Cafarea, where gathering together some Forces with Aids from the Neighbour- & Capp. 2,3,4 ing Kings, he appointed the reft to follow him, and marched towards Jerusalem, accompanied with Tiberius Alexander, (who now began to be in principal favour) and Joseph the Jew, he being for the truth of his prediction now released out of bonds. He fat down within fix or feven furlongs of the City, a little before the Feast of the Passeover, and therein shut up an infinite multitude, which according to the custom flocked to that folemnity; and hereby all Provisions were confumed in a short time. The three Factions upon fight of his great Army agreed to oppose it, and issuing out, made great disorder, forcing the Romans to forfake their Camp, and flie to the Mountains, but they were repelled by the great care and industry of Titus. But on the day of unleavened bread (April the 14.) Eleazar, who kept the inward part of the Temple, opening the Gates to the people, which was defirous to Sacrifize, John fent many of his party in amongft the reft with Swords hid under their Cloaths, who killing Eleazar, and many of his faction, feized also on that part of the Temple, and thereby the number of the factions was reduced to that of two. Yet he fent Joseph the Historian to them, who exhorting them with many words to yield, was entertained only with Scoffs and Reproaches. The people thinking to escape out of the City, John and Simon stopped up all passages, yet the Famine increasing many came out, whom being taken Titus caused to be Crucified to fuch a valt number, that room was wanting for Croffes, and Croffes for Persons. On the 12th of May he began four Mounts whereon to place his Battering Rams: two near to the Castle Antonia, where he hoped he might take the Temple, and other two near the Monument of John the High-Prieft, where he thought he should with most case break into the upper part of the City. But John, whose part it was to oppose the Romans in the former place, cast down, and burnt two of them, and two days after Simon did as much by the other, though seventeen days had been spent in making them all. He destroyed also many Rams and Engines, and brake into the very Camp of the Romans; but was repelled by Titus from Antonia, who in a Council of Officers resolved now to compass the whole City with a Trench, which with incredible diligence and celerity was finished in three days, with thirteen Forts to hinder the flight of the belieged, and hinder the conveyance of relief into the City.

A certain Noble-woman fod her Child to eat it, and fuch a mortality enfued, that from the fourteenth of April to the first of July were carried out to be buried at the publick charge One Hundred and Fifteen Thousand and Eighty Carkeises of the poorer fort, as Titus was told by one Mannaus, who was appointed to pay the Money. Hundred Thousand of the ordinary fort were cast dead out of the Gates, and others that were dead besides, were innumerable; for because they could not carry all out, they laid them up in Houses. A Bushel of Corn was fold for a Talent, finks and holes were raked to find old dung of Oxen to eat, which moved the Romans to compassion, but the seditious were hereby nothing changed. For Simon notabitaining from Murders and Rapines, notwithstanding this lamentable condition, killed Matthias the High-Priest, by whom he had been let into the City,

City, with his three Sons, and fixteen others, pretending that they purposed to flie to the Enemy. Judas one of his own Officers hereupon weary of his cruelty, attempted to berray a certain Tower, whereof he had the charge, to the Romans: but being discovered, was put to death with ten others of his complices. John also being driven by necessity, converted the Golden Vessels of the Temple with the Sacred Money to prophane uses, and was constrained to divide the Wine and Oil, ordained for Sacrifices, to his Soldiers.

18. Titus cut down all the Groves within a great distance of the City, and Idem 1.7. c. 1. causing more Mounts or Scaffolds to be Erected within Twenty-one Days, on the first of July began to batter the Wall of Antonia, John that opposed him being beaten back, and on the fift day broke into the the Castle. At this time many many false Prophets suborned by the Seditious, told the multitude they must expect affistance from God, and therefore though Titus often exhorted them to luded defen-dants refuse to yield, they flatly refused, boasting that they would rather endure all miseries.

Chap. IV.

The contest was earnest about the Temple. The Wall of the inward part thereof was too ftrong for the battering Rams, and the Defendants valiantly relifted at the top: the foundation of the Gates could not be undermined, and therefore Titus was constrained to set them on fire. Yet was it his intention to save the Temple, but on the Tenth of August, a certain Soldier without any command, (nay against the command of his General) moved as by an instinct from above, cast fire into the buildings on the North fide, which catching the flame imparted it to the Templeit felf, notwithstanding all that Titus could do to quench it, on the same day of the same Month that it was formerly set on fire by the command of Nebuchadnezar. The Temple thus burning, Titus was faluted Imperator by his Soldiers, and the Tyrants with their Companions fled into the City. They now defired a parly with the General himself, who checked them much for their obftinacy, but promifed them life if they would yield. But refufing to commit themselves to his fidelity, they required to depart the City with their Wives and Children, wherewith being greatly vexed, he commanded it to be proclaimed by a Crier, That they should not look any longer for Mercy. 19. He permitted his Soldiers to plunder and burn the City, but the feditious Iden ibid. wretches got to the King's House, where many had deposited their wealth, and 6.14, 15, 16, thence repelled the Romans. They also killed of their own Country People to the number of Six Thousand and Four Hundred, and rifling the money got them into the upper and strongest part of the City, called Sion, where for all this danger they still most cruelly Tyrannized. Titus having considered the strength of the place, provided Engines to batter the Walls, and began fo to do it on the Seventh day of September. Part of the Wall being broken down, the Tyrants were feized with great fear and amazement, not knowing what to do. Some faid the East part of it was broken down, others that the Romans were entred, and that they faw them out of the Towers; so that the power of God appeared in the overthrow of these wretches; for they for fook the Towers which were their only ftrength, and in vain seeking to escape, hid themselves in Caves and Privies. The Romans entering, put all to the Sword, and burnt the Houses with all that fled to them for lafeguard. Titus commanded both the Temple and City to be utterly razed by a plow brought over them, according to the custom; only the West

To such an end came this famous City, on the Eighth day of September, in the Second Year of Velpasian, be and Titus his Son being Consals, Thirty Eight Years after the death of Christ, the Blood of whom now fell heavy upon them. It had been taken in all fix times; by Afocheus or Shifhack King of Ægypt, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey, Herod and Sosius, and now by Titus; but twice only was it destroyed. viz. by Nebuchadnezzar and Titus. It was first built, faith Josephus, by Melchisedeck King of Salem, and afterwards inlarged by David. It was burnt by the Babylonians, One Thousand Four Hundred Sixty Eight Years and Six Months after the Founding of it, and Four Hundred Seventy Seven Yars and Six Months after it had been taken by David from the Canaanites. By Titus Vespasian it was destroyed One Thousand One Hndred Seventy Nine Years after David took it, but from it's first Founding to it's last Destruction intervened Two Thousand One Hundred Seventy Seven Years. John and Simon having hidthemselves were taken, and the former being condemned to perpetual Priton, the other was referved for a Triumph. rest of the Thieves and Seditious were discovered, one telling of another, and were all flain. Of those which during the whole War were taken Captives the number amounted to 97000, and of those that Perished in the Siege to 110000c. So heavy was the guilt which lay on them for the death of Christ, and such were the horrid Enormities committed by them, that we have reason to agree with Josephus, who thought, that if the Romans had delayed to come against Lib. 6. 6. 16. them, the City would either have been fwallowed up of the Earth, or have perished by some Deluge, or else by Thunderbolts and Lightning have undergone the punishments of Sodom, whose Inhabitants they exceeded in wickedness. A Year after was Lucilius Baffus fent Lieutenant into Judæa, who having the Army of Cerealis Vitellianus, took the Castle of Herodian and of Macharun beyond Jordan. Not long after Vespasian wrote to Liberius Maximus the Governour, Ident. 7. c. 25, to fell all the Land of the Jews, upon whom wherefoever they lived he imposed 26, 28, 29, a Yearly Tribute to be paid into the Capitol, it being that they were wont to 30, 31. pay into the Temple at Jerusalem. About a Year after Publius Sylva succeeded

Ifus then dead, and finished the War, taking the strong Castle of Massada from Eleazar, who held it with 960 Hacksters, such as upon his motion set fire to the Castle and all their Goods, and then killed themselves. Many like them flying out of the Country came to Alexandria in Ægypt, where they follicited the Jews to revolt, but were by them delivered up to the Romans, and those of them that then escaped were afterwards taken. Vespasian hearing of The Temple their attempt, gave order to Lupus Governour of Alexandria, to demolish the of the first formed.

There one Jonathan a Weaver led many of the fimple fort into the Wilderness. promiting to thew them figns and wonders; but by the chiefest of the Tews the matter being discovered to Catullus Governour of those parts, he sent Soldiers who flew most of them, and not long after Jonathan himself was A Sedition of taken. Catullus a covetous man procured him and others to accuse many unjustly, whom having slain and seized on their Estates, he carried him to Rome, where following the same Trade, Joseph the Historian was also accused; but Vespasian having found out the deceit, caused Jonathan first to be whipped, and then burnt alive. Catullus at present escaped through the mildness of the Emperour, but not long after fell into grievous anguish of mind, imagining he faw the Ghosts of those he had slain, and his bowels rotted away from him, that he died miserably. About this time the Alani, who being Scythians inhabited about Tanais and the Lake Meetis, confulted with the King of the Hyrcanians who was Master of the Straights to invade Media, which they entred and facked at their pleafure, Pacorus the King being forced up into a strong Hold, and glad to redeem his Wife and Concubines with an Hundred Ta-The Alani in-lents. 25. Titus his eldeft Son fucceeded him (by whom Jerufalem had been taken. and destroyed) on the eighth of the Calends of June. He was born that year wherein Caius was flain, and brought up with Britanicus the Son of Claudius, Europ. 1.7. being instructed in the same things by the same Masters: he was thought also Orosine 1.749. to have drunk tome of the poylon which Nero gave to that Prince, and that this alie. was the cause of his want of health some conjectured. He performed the Office of Tribune both in the Wars of Germany and Britain with great Commendations, A. D. 79. and after that, being Quaftor, came to have the command of a Legion in Judaa. v.c. 832. After his Father came to the Government he was suspected by some, when Titi 1. he was yet in Ægypt, as intending to establish himself, whereupon he hasted to Rome to cut off all jealousies. Taking then part with his Father in the Publick Cares, he triumphed with him over Judea, executed with him the Censorship, Tribuneship, and seven Consulships; nay, taking as it were all upon him, he dictated Letters in his Fathers Name, published Edicts, spake in the Senate, and that in the room of the Quafter, and took on him the Government of the Palace, which never had formerly been discharged but by fome Roman Knight; and this Office he executed with fuch rigor, that he contracted much envy, and was accounted cruel. He was suspected of Luxury, for leafting with voluptuous perfons till midnight; of Incontinency also, being (amongst other Arguments) too familiar with Berenice the Sister of King Azrippa, to which Lady he is also said to have promised Marriage, but performed it not, because of the distaste of the People. Moreover rapacity was laid to his charge. He was both accounted and openly talked of as another Nero, and fearcely did any ever come with more fear or less favour to the Govern-

But so contrarily to expectation did he behave himself, that his former carriage did but fet him off with the greater luftre; and fo free was he from His admirable all Vice, and adorned with so many Virtues, that he became the Love and Delight of M. mkind, and by an happy exchange was fo called. His temperance he inewed in the moderation of his Diet, the choice of his Companions, and putting away Berenice: His moderation by abstaining utterly from other mens Goods, and refusing often ordinary Benevolences, although no man ever exceeded him in Munificence. He was the Mirrour of Courtefie, being wont to fay, That no man fould go forrowful from the presence of the Prince; and on a day having done no courtese for any man, he said, Amici diem perdidi, My friends I have lost a day. Several sad Accidents hapned in his little time; so great a Pestilence as seldom had been known. So great a fire there was in Rome, and kindled from Heaven, that it burnt three days together. by L. Antonius President of upper Germany, whom he had incensed by the odiousness of his vices, and especially by uncivil language. This he finished though absent with admirable felicity; for, that very hour the Fight was to be, the Rhine fwelled fo high, that it hindred the Auxiliaries which were fent to Antonius, from joyning with him. In the fecond year of his reign Agricola defeated the Tacitai in vita Ordovices in Britain, and took the Isle Mona about Autumn, and that upon his Agricole. first coming into the Island. So that the years of the Expeditions which Tacitus afterwards relateth, are rather to be reckoned from the Kalends of 7aneary of the former year, as Jacobus Cappellus hinteth. Though Dion Callius, as appeareth from Xiphilin, referred the discovery of Britain being an Island to the reign of Titus: Yet others unto the time of Domitian, who at length envying Agricola that great glory he had got in reducing Britain, recalled him,

Britain, wherein Cn. Julius Agricola haraffed all the Country of the Enemies, and first of all the Romans, that we know of, faith Dio *, knew that Britain was * Apud Xipho compassed about by the Sea. For certain Soldiers in a Sedition having killed their in except. 1.66. Centurions and Tribunes fled to their Ships, and launching out, failed about that part of Britain which lieth toward the West, being carried by waves and wind: when they had done this, and by chance light upon the other Camp of the Romans on the other fide, Agricola fent out others to hold the same course, from whom he also knew that it was an Island. These things being done in Britain, Titus was saluted Imperator the sisteenth time. Agricola passed the rest of his life in Ignominy and Poverty, because he had done greater things than were suitable to a Prator; and for that cause he was afterwards put to death by Domitian, though by the permission of Titus he had triumphed. But concerning these things Tacitus is rather to be consulted in the life of Agricola.

27. Titus put down Informers, usually tolerated before. His mercy was too great; for he vowed he had rather perish than destroy another, as according to the judgment of some it came to pass. Amongst others that plotted his destruction, he not only spared his Brother Domitian, but had him in the same respect as from the beginning, and owned him as his Partner and Successor; only betwixt them two he befought him with tears at length to relent to Love and Unity. He was a man of excellent parts, both outward and inward accomplishments; but to the great loss of Man-kind, was presently taken away, whether by the treachery of his Brother or no, is uncertain. In the beginning of his Sickness he is faid to have look'd up to Heaven, as taking it ill he should dye so soon, being not conscious to himself of any Sin, save one, which as he did not express, so it is altogether unknown. He was with good reason sadly lamented throughout the Provinces. He died in the fame Village his Father had ended his days, near the Country of the Sabines, in the forty fecond year of his Age, when he had reigned two years, as many months, and twenty days; in the 834 year of the City, A.D. 81. M. Plautius Silvanus, and M. Annius Verus being Confuls.

28. Domitian (so called from Domitilla their Mother) succeeded Titus, being Sutton & Exmore like to Nero, Caligula, or Tiberius, than either Father or Brother. His youth tropius. he passed disgracefully enough. Doubting upon the death of his Father, whether he should not give a double donative to the Soldiers to obtain their good-will, he never feared to boast that he was left Partner in the Empire by his Father, but that his testament was corrupted. He never ceased to plot against his Brother A. His cruelty.

30. Domitian having suppressed the Rebellion of Antonius, grew extraordinarily cruel, putting men to death upon small and trivial accounts. Those of any note that were of his party he tortured to death by ways unheard of, and confounded the cause of the innocent with that of the guilty, raging against the Christians with a second persecution. He arrived at that horrid arrogance. that he sticked not to say in the Senate, That he gave the Empire to his Father and Brother, who did but restore it to him; and (what was worse than this) he would be called our Lord and God. Being hereby rendred terrible and hateful unto all, he wrought his own destruction, which fearing, and being foretold it by the Chaldwans, he grew timorous out of measure, and was moved with the least suspition. Hence did he cause the place where he was wont to abide, to be befet with the stone Phengites, that he might see if any one came behind him; and though he was fufficiently ambitious, yet did he refuse an extraordinary honour offered him by the Senate, viz. that when he bore the Confulship, Equites flould go before him with spears amongst the Sergeants. Hence also he put Epaphroditus his Secretary to death, because it was believed that he had helped Nero in dispatching himself; and he killed Flavius his Uncle, though he had openly owned his two Sons as his Successors, whereof the one he called Vespasian, and the other Domitian; which hastened his destruction. Eight months after he was flain by his own fervants, of whom Parthenius the chief of his Chamber was principal, Domitia his Wife being drawn in to the Conspiracy, for that she feared A. D. 96. to be poyloned for her kindness to Paris. Longinus Proculus then in Germany is Domitiani 15. faid to have foretold the very day of his death, and Apollonius Tyanæus a famous Magitian (who being convented before him vanished out of his fight) spoke of it that very hour, exhorting Stephanus as it were to strike him home. The people took his death indifferently, the Soldiers heavily, which they shortly after revenged upon the Murtherers; but the Senate as it were triumphed, and ordered the memory of him to be abolished. The best thing we find concerning him is, that though he was no Scholar himself, he took care for repairing of Libraries. He was murthered on the fourteenth before the Calends of October, in the forty fifth year of his age, and the fifteenth of his reign, in the 849 year of the City: A.D. 96. T. Fulvius Valens, and C. But Irenaus, Eusebius, and Epiphanius rank them thus: Peter, Linus, Cletus, or Anacletus, Clemens; for he whom Irenæus and Eusebius call Anacletus, is by Epiphanius and Damafus called Cletus. This Cletus according to Damafus died in the fecond year of Domitian, on the fixth before the Calends of May, and was succeeded by Anacletus. He affirmed himself the Philasti. Saviour of the World, and that he came from Heaven to fave Mankind, and that all who would be faved must be baptized in his name. Out of his Doctrine (that we may speak of these Hereticks briefly) budded that of Saturninus of Antioch; who not long after in like manner taught, 1. That the World was made by feven Angels, without the knowledge of God the Father. 2. That Christ was but the shadow of a man, for he had neither the true Body nor foul of a man, and thus he fulfilled the mysterie of our Redemption. 3. He said moreover, that Marriage and Procreation was of the Devil. Bafilides, of whom were named the Bafilidir ani, agreed in feveral points with Simon, Menander, and Saturninus, He taught, that Christ did not suffer, but Simon of Cyrene; that Christ taking the form of Simon laughed them to forn. 2. not overcome (as they termed them) the fecular Potentates, unless every one played his part after the same secret operation. These were the most vile Hereticks in filthiness of all others. They held 1. That the Soul was made of the substance of God, and that brute beasts have reason as man hath. 2. That there are two Gods, a good and an evil one, and that this evil God was the Creator of all things. Carpocrates also taught 1. That Christ was a meer man born of Joseph, and not of the bleffed Virgin, that he was a good man, and therefore after he was Crucified, his Soul went up into Heaven, but his body is still in the Grave. 2. That the World was made by Angels.
3. That there is no refurrection. 4. He rejected the Old Testament as not Canonical.
Besides these, at this time arose the Herefie of the Ebionites, fo called from Ebion. He taught, that Christ was but a meer man. 2. That when Jesus was 30 years old there descended on him, and dwelt in him another person called Christ, and thus Jesus and Christ dwelt, and were united together. 3. He agreed with Cerinthus in the rest of the Heresies, touching Circumcifion, and keeping all the Law of Mofes. He denied the Epiffles of Paul, accusing him that he tell from the Law. The Jewish Sabbath, and other Ceremonies he observed together with the Jews, only the Sunday he celebrated as we do in remembrance of the Refurrection. 'Tis reported that St. John hearing Ebion was in the Bath refrained his company, and having feen and allowed the three Friphan. From the Death of Domitian to that of Pertinax, and the exposing of the Empire to publick fale by the Soldiers, the space of 97 years.

After his assuming the Government, a strong rumour went abroad, that Domitian was yet living, which fornewhat perplexed him, till by Parthenius, and Petronius, Captains of the Guards, he was put out of doubt; and afterwards his election was confirmed by the Senate.

2. Most of the Golden and Silver Statues of Domitian, who was hated by all men, he caused to be taken down, of which was raised a great Sum of Money. The Triumphal Arches, of which many had been erected to him, were also demolished. He absolved them who were held guilty of Impiety, and restored the Dio 110.62. Exiles. Slaves and Freedmen, who had been treacherous to their Lords, he commanded to be put to Death, taking care that they accused their Masters of no Crime; neither did he suffer any to be be accused of Impiety, or the Jewish rites; for many had by Calumnies been condemned, and amongst the rest Seras the Philosopher, which caused a great Tumult; (for all accused all) So that Fronto the Conful was reported to fay, That It was a very bad thing to have an Empeperor, under whom it was not lawful to do any thing; but much worse when every Nerva his good one might do what he pleased. Nerva was old, and had a weak Stomach, Government which caused him to Vomit what he took. Statues both of Gold and Silver he forbad to be erected to him, and he restored the Goods as were found in the Palace, to such Owners as Domitian had unjustly deprived of them. To Roman Citizens that were poor, he gave Lands, to be divided by certain Perfons of Senatorian Rank. Wanting Money himself, he set to Sale abundance of rich Clothes and Furniture, both of his own, and what belonged to the Publick. Houses also and Lands, and what things foever were not Necessaries; neither was he rigid-in Exacting the Price, but herein shewed himself liberal towards many Persons. He took away many Sacrifices, Circensian Games, and other Shows, to diminish Expences. He Swore in the Senate, that by his Order no Senator should Le put to Death; and his Oath he kept, although a Conspiracy was hatched against him. Doing nothing without the Affistance of the Principal Senators, he enacted many Laws, of which was remarkable one, which forbad the making of Eunuches, and another which Prohibited the Marriage of a Niece.

3. He fluck not at taking Virginius Rufus to be his Colleague in the Confulfhip. though he had often the Title of Emperor given him; on whose Sepulchre was Ingraved, That having overthrown Vindex, he enfured the Empire not for himfelt, but his Country. Nerva indeed was fo good a Prince, that he dared to fay; That he had done nothing, but that quitting the Government, he might fafely live a private life. When Calpurnius Crassus, descended from that Noble Family, and others had conspired against him, he placed them at the Spettacula near himself, before they knew that they were discovered, and delivered them Swords into their Hands, to try as he faid, whether they were sharp; but his defign was to let them see that he cared not though he were presently killed in the place. Casperius Ælianus, whom, following the Example of Domitian, he had fet over the Prætorian Guards, stirred up the Soldiers against him to require certain Persons to be punished; and he so opposed himself against what was intended, that he offered his Neck naked to them, but profited nothing; they being killed whom Ælian had demanded to be flain. Perceiving that he was despised for his Age, he went up into the Capitol, and there with a loud voice praying that it might prove happy for himself, the Senate and the People of Rome, he adopted M. Olpius Trajanus Crinitus, who now governed Germany, and afterward he defigned him Cafar in the Senate. This he did, though he wanted not Kindred of his own; for he would not prefer his own Relations before the Publick Good, neither did it affright him that Trajan was a Spaniard, and not an Italian, and that before him none of another Nation had held the Roman Empire, judging that the Virtue, and not the Country of a Man was to be efteemed. This Account we have from Dio, who writing of the Perfecution raifed against such as followed the Femile Rites, we have cause to believe that Christianity was chiefly meant thereby; for our Ecclefiaftical Writers fay, Nerva recalled fuch as were Confessors upon that account, and that St. John the Apostle by virtue of that Indulgence returned out of Pathmos to Ephefus. We are told from other Hands, that Nerva only banished Craffus the Conspirator to Tarentum. That he eased the Commonwealth of grievous Impositions, and conjoyned two things in the times of some of his Predeceffors infociable, viz. Sovereignty and Liberty. He lived with Trajan but three Months; For falling out with one Regulus a Senator, he was in fo great a Passion, that it drove his Natural heat into a Fever, whereof he died on the fixth before the Calends of February, having, as Dio tells us, lived fixty five Years, ten Months. and ten Days, and Reigned one year, four months, and nine days, in the DCCCLI year of the City. A. D. XCVIII, he himself the fourth, and Trajanus Cæfar the fecond time, being Confuls.

Traign Suc-

4. Trajan was a Spaniard by Birth, of the City Italica, of an Ancient rather than an Eminent Family, and took the Enfigns of the Empire at Agrippina in Gall. As foon as he was Emperor he wrote much to the Senate, and amongst other things, that he would never put to Death any good Man, nor mark fuch with Infamy; and this he not only at present confirmed by Oath, but also afterward. He fent for Ælian and the Prætorian Soldiers, who had moved Sedition against Nerva. as though to make Use of them, and caused them to be flain. He presently reduced all Germany into its former condition, as well as brought under several Nations beyond the Danube. When he came to Rome, he did many things there for correcting the State of the Commonwealth, and in favour of good Men, of whom he took care, To the Cities of Italy he gave much, toward the Education of Children. When his Wife Plotina first of all entred the Palace, she turned her self upon the steps to the Multitude, and told them, That she entred such a fort of Woman as the defired the might come out again; and indeed, the carried her felf fo in her greatness, that nothing could be faid against her. When he had staid fometime in the City, he was provoked to undertake a War against the Daci, the King of whom, Decebalus (or Decebalis, Diurpanes, or Diurpanis, for he hath feveral Names) had forced Domitian to pay Tribute. Trajan found himself burthened with the Payment of the Money, befides the Difgrace, and he was netled with the Reputation that people had got, with their confidence thereupon, and the daily increase of their Forces. Decebalus when he heard of his Design, was troubled at it, knowing that formerly he had not overcome the People of Rome, but Domitian; but now he should have a War with the People of Rome, and Trajan the Emperor too; that Trajan, who for Justice, Fortitude and Goodness was excellent, and vigorous in Body as well as Mind, being in the Two and fortieth year of his Age. These good qualities Dion Cassius makes out in many Particulars, though to the Virtues lately mentioned, he adds not Temperance. But he writes that though he was given to the love of Boys and of Wine, yet did he nothing that might be reprehended; for though he drank largely, yet he was Sober, and He makes War as for what concerned Boys, he was troublesome to no body. For those his good upon the Daci. qualities and his Skill in War, Decebalus feared him. Trajan gave him Battel, and therein made great flaughter of the Enemy, but had many of his own Men wounded, so many, that Linnen failed to bind up their wounds, the want of which to supply, he spared not his own Robe.

5. After this Success, he removed into the higher part of the Country, where feizing on divers Hills, he came, not without danger, to the Royal Seat of the Daci. Their King fent feveral times, and at length obtained Peace, which he was to purchase by delivering up his Arms, his Engines, and them that made them; by giving up Fugitives, dilmantling his Forts, and having the same Friends and Enemies with the People of Rome, he laid afide his Arms, and having faln at the Feet of Trajan, and done his Reverence, he fent to the Senate to have the Peace confirmed by the Fathers. These things performed, and these Agreements made Trajan left a Garrison in Zermizegethusa, and fortifying the rest of the Country returned into Italy. At Rome the Ambassadors of Decebalus were admitted into the Senate, where they fpake a few things, having laid afide their Arms, and holding their hands joyned together like Slaves or Captives. The Peace being confirmed, they had their Arms restored, and Trajantriumphing over the Daci, obtained the Sirname of Dacicus. He presented a Show of Gladiators, with which Sport he was delighted, and of Dancers in the Theatre. Yet in fuch a noise of Arms, he cast not away the care of other matters, but in the Forum of Augustus, the Porticus of Livia, and other places administred Justice from the Tribunal. But within a little while word was brought that Decebolus acted all things quite contrary to the League, receiving Fugitives, fortifying places, and folliciting the Neighbouring Nations to the War, whereupon he was by the Senate judged an Enemy, and Trajan again undertook the War in Person. When he was come into Mysia Decebalus sent Provoked a grin, he makes forme to watch their time, and kill him, but this being discovered, he perswaded a second Ex. Longinus one of his Officers to come to him about an Agreement, and then kept medition.

He makes a

him, hoping to make his terms by him, till he killed himfelf. 6. In the mean time Trajan caused a Stone Bridge to be laid over the River Danubius, fuch a Bridge as Dio, or Xiphilin, could not fufficiently admire. Though there were other works of his, very Magnificent, yet in his Opinion this excelled them all. It stood upon twenty Piles of fourfquare Stone, an hundred and fifty foot high from the Foundation, distant from each other an hundred and feventy feet, and conjoyned with Arches. It was built in a River full of whirlepits, having a muddy Channel, and in which the Stream could not be turned another way, rapid in its motion, and uncertain as to its breadth and depth. The Piles only remained in the time of Dio, ferving for to shew that there is nothing but the wit of man can accomplish it. Trajan built it with this Design, That if War was made upon the Romans that lived beyond the River in Winter when it was frozen, Succours might by it be fent over to them. But Adrian on the contrary, fearing that the Barbarians should kill the Guard, and break into Mysia, commanded the upper parts of it to be broken down. Trajan having finished the Bridge, passed over, and waged War with the Daci, rather more securely than speedily; and hereby at length subdued them. Many things he performed both like an Expert Captain, and a Valiant Soldier, and his Men gave notable Testimonies of their Valour. At length Decebalus understanding that his Seat, and all the Country about it was taken, left he should run the same risque, killed himself. His head was sent to Rome; Dacia became a Province of the Roman People, and into it Trajan led a Colony. Bicilis the Companion of Decebalus discovered that he had caused the Current of the River Sargetia to be turned another way, and in the Channel thereof had buried his Treasure, and then suffered the Stream to return to its former course; after which, he killed such Slaves as he had imployed in the work. This Treasure, and such good things as he had hid in Caves, was fecured as excellent booty.

7. At the same time Palma the Præfelt of Syria, subdued that Part of Arabia Arabia joyned which joyned to Petra, and thereby increased the Dominion of the People of Rome. To Trajan when he was returned to Rome, Ambassadors from several Nations made their Addresses, and particularly from India. He Exhibited Shows for an hundred and twenty three Days together, in which fometimes were killed a thousand Beasts tame and wild, and sometimes ten thousand; and a thousand Gladiators fought. He converfed with his Friends with all freedom, and especially with one Licinius Sura, of whom he was bidden to beware. This man was fo rich, that he built at his own expence a Gymnafium for the City, and on a time invited Trajan to Supper. The Emperor went, and difmiffing his Guard, first, called Sura's Physitian, and bad him shave his Eyelids, then his Earber whom he permitted to do the fame office upon his Chin; for this was the ancient Custom both of the Roman Citizens and Princes, Hadrian being the first of the Emperors that let grow his Beard. Afterward being washed he went to Supper; and the day after told his Friends, who were wont to calumniate Sura, That if he would have murdered him, he had fufficient opportunity to have done it. But he was so far void of sear, that when he delivered the Sword to one whom he had advanced to Command the Prætorian Cohorts, with which he was to be girt, he gave it him naked, and bad him draw it in his defence, if he governed as he ought to do; but if contrary, then to use it to his destruction: yet was he fo prudent as to Animadvert upon fome who had plotted his Death, in the number of whom was Craffus, their Cause being first heard by the Senate. He built Libraries, and erected a vast Column in his own Forum, partly for a Sepulchre, and partly for a Monument to Posterity, having digged away the hilly ground, and by that means levelled the Forum.

8. After this he made War against the Armenians and Parthians; finding himself concerned, as he faid, That the King of Armenia had not received a Diadem from himself, but the Parthian King; but his great Inducement was desire of Glory. When he came to Athens, he was courted by Ambassadors sent from Chasses, who promifed all fair things, but he would not be diverted from the Expedition. Af-

He makes War ter he was come into the Enemie's Country, he was met by the Satrapa, and the against the Parthian King, neighbouring Kings, who presented him richly; he took all Armenia, punished Paramasites the King thereof, and rewarded the King of the Heniochi. Having placed Garrisons as was convenient, he came to Edessa, where he received the iubmission of Angarus, who ruled Ofroena. When he arrived in Mesopotamia, Chofroes offered to quit that Country and Armenia, but he proceeded against his Captains Manus and Manisarus into Adiabene. When these things were heard at Rome, many Decrees passed to honour him, and amongst other marks, the Sirname of Optimus was conferred on him. He in his Expeditions travelled on foot; as he marched, Exercised his Soldiers, and tried their Courage and Fidelity by spreading abroad false Reports. Nisibis and Barnæ being taken, he was Sirnamed Parthicus; but he gloried most in that of Optimus, whereby his Nature and Difposition was expressed, and not his Wars. Returning to Antioch, he there made iome Stay, and was frighted with a most terrible Earthquake, which afflicted other Cities, but especially this, in an unheard of manner. With the fall of Houses and Rubbish, and by other means a vast number of People perished, so that the Town being full of Strangers, who came either for Law-Suits, upon Messages or other Business, the Court being there all the Winter, there was no Nation that received not loss from so great a Calamity. Trajan himself escaped out of a Window, being, it's faid, drawn out by one of more than humane proportion, and though the Earthquake ceased, he continued many days in the open Air. The Hill Corafius was so shaken, that its higher parts fell down, and it looked as if it would tumble upon the City. Other Mountains were levelled, waters broke out where formerly none appeared, and Fountains which formerly poured out water were stopped up.

9. When Spring came on he led his Army into the Enemies Country, refolving to pass the River Tigris, and knowing that thereabout was no Timber for building of Ships; the Vessels he had made of Trees felled in the Woods about Nisibis, he caused to be conveyed thither in Carriages, being so framed as to be taken in pieces and fet together again upon occasion. With them he made a Bridge at the foot of the Mountain Cardynus, in despight of the Enemy, who was discouraged by his multitudes of Men, and the fight of Ships in that place, where they Trajan takes in thought they had no reason to expect them. Then croffing the River, he took in all Adiabene, being that part of Affyria belonging to Ninus, with Arbela and Ganzamela, where Alexander overthrew Darius; it was called Attyria, the letters S.S. being by the Barbarians changed into T.T. To Babylon he marched without controul, there being none left in his paffage to oppose him; for the Parthians were weakened by Civil War, and this fort of Difcord was not yet taken up amongst them. There he had opportunity to behold a Lake of Bitumen, of which the Walls of that City were built, being of that Nature, that mixed with Brick or small Stones, it was more strong and durable than any Stone or Iron. He beheld the mouth thereof, when fo great a vapour proceeded out of it that no fort of Terrestrial Animal, nor Fowl was able to bear it, but died with the finell thereof; and had it proceeded far, the place had not been habitable; but it contained it felf in a narrow compass, to the bounds of which when it came, it returned back. The like to this Dio tells us he himself had found at Hierapolis, a Town of Afia, the vapour of which, as he heard and faw, was pernicious to all living Creatures, Eunuchs or gelded Men excepted, the reason of which he confession he did not understand; no more do we.

10. Trainn had a defign to joyn Euphrates with Tigris by a Ditch, thereby to convey his Boats for making of a Bridge; but finding it was higher than Tigris, he changed his purpole, let it should make Euphrates rapid and nor Navigable. He conveyed then his Vessels by Land over the narrow place betwixt them; for, Euphrates talling into a Fen, joyned it self with Tigris. Having passed Tigris, he took Cresiphon, and thereupon had the Title of Imperator, and that of Parthicus constitute, that he should Triumph and keep as many Festivals as he pleased. Now had he a great desire to Sail down into the Red Sea, being a Sinus of the Ocean, and called Erythram from Erythrus, who there reigned. In his passes he was in danger, by reason of the rapid Stream of Tigris, the Winter Season, and the Tide; but coming to the Sea, and taking notice of the passing into India the affigured, that had be been a young men beword here sided in the Tide; but coming to the Sea, and taking notice of the passing into In he was in danger, by reaton of the rapid Stream of Tigris, the Winter Season, the and the Tide; but coming to the Sea, and taking notice of the paffage into Indiana, the affirmed, that had he been a young man he would have failed thither. Indiana curious Inquiries concerning that Nation, and would fay, Alexander was an happy man, yet ioneturnes affirm, That he had gone farther than he, and so he wrote to the Senate; although he could not defend what he had got. But he wrote fo often of formany Nations subdued by him, that the Fathers not able to reckon them, voted him as many Triumphs as he pleased to accept of, ordered a Triumphal Arch to be creeked in his Forum, and the Citizens would have gone this teginning.

His call not far to meet him, had he ever returned. His latter end however did not answer his beginning. So while he spent his time in failing to the Ocean, all he had let to bridle them, while his Journey answered not his expectation, for he saw and heard nothing besides heaps, falls and ruins; only he made a parentation to Alexander in the House wherein he died.

11. The News of the general defection being brought to him while still on Shipboard, he fent Lucius and Maximus against the Rebels, of whom Maximus was overthrown in Battel, but Lucius behaving himfelf very gallantly, recovered Nifilis, took Edeffa, and after he had plundered it, fet it on fire. Befides this, Seleucia was taken and burnt by Erycius, Clarus, and Julius Alexander. But fearing that the Parthians would also revolt, he resolved to give them a King, and When he was come to Ctefiphon, calling them and the Romans together in the Field, after he had from an high Tribunal boafted of his Performances, he fet a Diadem on the Head of Parthamasperes. This done, he undertook an Expedition against the Agareni in Arabia, who had also revolted, possessing a City neither great nor rich. For, the adjoyning Region, for the most part, was Defart, having He maker a no Water, or that unwholfom, and being deflitute of Wood and Forage, to fmilds Exper that no great multitude of Men could there long continue, and it was protected the rearish. by the most violent Heats to which it was exposed. Therefore neither Trajan now, nor afterwards Severus took it, though they cast down part of the Wall. Trajan fent his Horse against them, and afterwards he followed in Person; but the Horse received much loss, and he himself narrowly escaped, one that rode near to him being flot dead; for though he disguised himself, yet by the gravity of his Person they guessed him to be the Emperor. Now did the Heavens shake with Thunder, Rainbows were feen, Lightning, Tempest, Whirlwinds, Hail and

Thunderbolts

Thunderbolts fell upon the Romans, as often as they attacked them, and when they went to Supper, they were exceedingly plagued with Flies, both in their Meat and Drink. Therefore did Trajam diflodge and get him gone, and not long after fell into his Mortal Diftemper.

A furious Rebellion of the Tews.

12. In the mean time, while he was thus imployed, the Jews supposing him intangled in an inextricable War, perfwading themselves also, that by the Earthquake was portended the ruine of the Roman Empire; moreover imagining that from the first year of Cyrus, to this present, had passed but Four hundred and eighty three years, and consequently that but one of Daniel's Weeks was unfulfilled, entred into a Conspiracy, and made incredible Slaughter of the Romans, using in several Countreys, some say several Captains, whereof yet Barcocab was Chief. The fury of this Rebellion fell upon Agypt, Cyrene, and Cyprus; and Die tells us, That about Cyrene one Andreas was their Captain. The manner of their Outrages they committed, both upon Greeks and Romans, was as horrid as the Facts themselves, though these horrid beyond all belief, if they had not been related by most credible and impartial Writers. From the head they sawed them downwards, they cast them to wild Beasts, caused them to fight and kill one another; they eat their flesh, besmeared themselves with their blood, and wore their skins. In and about Cyrene perished by this means Two hundred and twenty thousand men, and in Ægypt and Cyprus Two hundred and forty thousand; upon which account, in the time of Dio, it was not lawful for a Jew to come in Cyprus, if he entred there, he was presently slain. Trajan resolved to prosecute them throughout his Dominions, not as Enemies or Rebels, but as Creatures noxious to Humane Society, and that with revenge fuitable to their Crimes; and for this purpose sent Marcus Tubero, with a great Power, both by Sea and Land, who neither in a short time, nor without cruel hostility finished the War; but he flew many Myriads of the Jews. Their carriage in the West made the Emperor suspect their Brethren in Mesopotamia, whereupon he commanded L. Quintius to Banish them that Country, and he joyning Battel with them, slew also a great Number.

13. Dio writes, That Trajan thought of making in person another Expedition into Mesopotamia; but his Disease growing upon him, he took his Journey for Italy, leaving P. Ælius Hadrianus in Syria with an Army. Therefore though Armenia was taken, and a great part of Mesopotamia, and besides, the Parthians were overcome; yet the Romans thought they had in vain been at fuch pains, and undergone so many Dangers, for that the Parthians detesting Parthamaspates were resolved to be governed according to their own Customs. As for Trajan, he suspected that his Disease came by Poison; some thought it proceeded of Blood, which being wont to iffue from his Interior Parts every year, had of late stopped; and indeed he was feized with an Apoplexy, fo as he loft his Senfe in fome part of his Body; but he manifestly laboured of a Dropsie. Being brought to Selinus a City of Cilicia, called Trajanople in Dio's time, he foon died, after he had Reigned Nineteen years, fix months, and fifteen days. He extended the Empire farther than any of his Predecessors, so that now it reached from the Irish Ocean further than the River Tigris; from the Atlantick Sea to the Perfian Gulf; from Mount Atlas to the Caledonian Forest; as also as far as the River Albis, and beyond Danubius. His Moderation was exceeding great, he so using his Subjects as he himself, he said, would defire his Prince should use him, were he a private Perfon. Though he was not learned, he much favoured Humane and Secular Learning, conversing very often and familiarly with the Profesfors thereof, whom he alio preferred to Publick Offices. But Humane and Secular Learning he only favoured; for he raised the third Persecution against the Heavenly Doctrine and Church of Christ, which drew down its thought, the heavy Judgments we have mentioned, upon the Empire during his Government.

Ignatius answered. No body calleth Theophorus a Cacodæmon, for Devils Bilhopo 6th. flie from the Servants of God. But I know thou so callest me because I molest them. For I confess I have Christ the heavenly King; and dissolve their councils. Trajan demanded, who is Theophorus? Ignatius replied, He who hath Christ in his breast. Trajan faid, Dost not thou think we have the Gods in our breast which assist us against our Enemies ? Ignatius answered, In that thou esteemest the Devils of the Gentiles to be gods, thou errest. For there is one God, who made Heaven, and Earth, and Sea, with all that are in them; and he bath one only begotten Son Jesus Christ. whose friendship I have obtained. Trajan then said, Thou speakest of him that was crucified by Pontius Pilate. Ignatius replied, Of him who crucified fin and the inventor of it; and who approveth not of him that serveth Idols, but who in his heart wifely understandeth this. Trajan added, Dost thou then carry Christ in thy felf? Ignatius said, Iea, for it is written, I will dwell and walk in them. Trajan concluded thus, I award that Ignatius, who faith, he beareth in himself the Crucified, beafts for a show to the People. This was accordingly executed upon the most holy Martyr, on the Twentieth of December, as it is recorded in his Ada, or the Memorials of him, collected by Philo, Gaius, and Agathopes, who followed him whom he cau from Syria to Rome; concerning which, as also the Epistles which go under his fein to be call to wild beals name, the Differtations of the most Reverend and Learned Arch-Bishop of Arbe conveyed in bonds by Soldiers to the great City Rome, there to be devoured of

15. Ignatius being vexed by a tedious journey, that his constancy might be consult usfirishaken, when he came to Troas (or new Troy, built not far from the place where um in notice ad that of Priamus (tood) understood that Peace was restored to his Church of An-Epist. Ignation and Philadeltioch. This came to pass whilst Trajan still continued there, consulting about the phenos. Parthian War, as appeareth from Malela the Historian of that City. For Tibe-Therianus his rianus the President of the chief Nation of Palestine, moved the Emperor to moderation by this Letter: I am wearied with punishing and putting to death the Galileans (who come before us under the name of Christians) according to your Commands, yet they cease not to reveal themselves for the slaughter. And although I have laboured both by exhortation and threatnings, that they might not dare to make known themselves to me as professors of that doctrine; yet being prosecuted, they do not cease. I desire therefore that what your pleasure us in this kind, your Majesty would please to certifie me. * Suidas mentioning also this message of Tiberianus unto Irajan, * 11 vut Mitigateth the addeth, that the Emperor forbad all his Subjects to punish the Christians. Yet Tealarge.

that this indulgence was not so universal, but that it most especially concerned Palæstine, Syria, and other parts of the East, where the Emperor then resided, appeareth from Ignatius his deprecation, that the Persecution might cease, when he was even to be brought into the Amphitheatre; as the Atta or Memorials concerning him relate. But befides this Letter of Tiberianus, there is extant another of Pliny the younger, who was moved to write to the Emperor upon the same occation, and for the same end.

16. For being Proprætor of Bithynia, the variety of cases in those that were accused, plin. 1918. 97. Letter of Pliny troubled him; although, to comply with the iniquity of the times, he declareth, that fuch i. 10. as stood out his threatnings thrice, he commanded to be led to punishment. He fignificth, that out of such as had formerly been Christians, but now worshipped the Images of the Emperor, and the gods, and blasphemedChrist, he could not get any confession of any other fault or error, than that they were wont on a day appointed, before it was light, to meet together, and fing an hymn to Christ; and bound themselves by a Sacramentum or religious Oath, not for any wickedness, but that they should not commit robbery, theft, or adultery, that they should not break promise, nor cheat. Which being done, they were wont to depart, and meet again to eat, promiscuously but innocently. To get out the truth he tortured two women servants, but could not find any thing justly chargeable, though through his Ethnick pravity and defire to please the Emperor, he termeth the faith Superstitio prava & immodica, or a naughty and immoderate superstition. He addeth, that it seemed to him a thing worthy of serious consideration; especially for the number of those that were in danger: for many, faith he, of every age and order, and of both Sexes, are brought, and will be brought into danger. For not only hath the contagion of this superstition gone through Cities; but also Villages, and Fields, which, as it feemeth, might be flopped and corrected. To be fure, it's clear enough, that the Temples which were almost desolate, begin to be frequented, and the sacrifices of long time intermitted to be restored, beasts for that Use now going off, which till now scarcely any would buy. Whereby it is easie to guess, what a multitude of men might be reclaimed, if there were but place for repentance. Thus Pliny, to whom Trajan anfwereth(that we may only repeat the Summe)that Christians are not to be fought for, but if accused and convicted, except they recant, to be punished; concerning the abfurdity and injustice of which Sentence, Tertullian excellently argueth in his Apology, most worthy to be read of all Christians.

Chap. V.

17. In the Reign of Trajan died St. John the Apostle, the time and manner of St. John the his death being uncertain, though all agree as to the place, which was Ephelus. (a) Jerome referreth his death to the fixty eighth year after the Passion of Christ, (1) In Jouini (1) The first first in with the third of Trajan, and the twenty seventh of December, on an in the first Feria. (b) Others place it in the seventy first after Christ's Passion, (b) Arabica and the fixth of Trajan. Dorothæus Bishop of Tyre (in his Tract written con face) capst cerning the lives, ends, and Martyrdoms of the Prophets, Apostles, and seventy lum ad A.D. Disciples) writeth, that being a hundred and twenty years old, yet living (the 103. Lord would (o have it) he buried himself. (t) Jerome alleged out of Tertullian, that (c) ut sort, in the time of Nere (though others fay in the Reign of Domitian) he was thrown in Mat. 6.20. at Rome into a tun of hot boyling oil, yet thereby took no harm, but came out after this trial purer than he west in. (d) Augustine calleth him a Martyr by (d) In John. will: Polycrates Bishop of Ephelus (as (e) Eusebius allegeth) sticketh not to call (e) Lib.3.31 him a Priest, a Martyr, and a Dollor. But that which (f) Augustine writeth of (f) ubi sup. his end, is strangest of all (and let the credit thereof rest in the choice of the Reader,) how John caused at Ephesus his grave to be made, and in presence of divers went in alive, and being no fooner in, and to their feeming dead, they covered him. Which kind of rest, saith he, is rather to be termed a sleep than death, for that the earth of the grave bubleth or boyleth up after the manner of a Well, by reason of John's resting in it, and breathing: a sign of his slumbring therein. Though he died at Ephesus, yet was not the succeeding Bishop, much less any other, Heir of that Authority, which for so many years he had obtained in the Church, as having many outlived the rest of the Apostles. For to the Apostles succeeded not Apostles nor universal Messengers of Christ, of which fort Fohn was for many years, and he alone; but Bishops, every one circumscribed within his own Limits. In the days of Trajan, and this third Perfecution was Crucified (g) Simeon Cleophas Bishop of Jerusalem, being an hundred and twenty (e) Eustib. 1. 3. years old. Justus a Jew succeeded him, after whom some place Zachæus, Tobias, 120, 32. Benjamin, and John in the nineteenth and last of Trajan. In the eleventh of his Reign was Euaristus Bishop of Rome Crowned with Martyrdom, on the fixth of the Calends of November, and Alexander succeeded him, who also being Martyred in the nineteenth year, on the fifth before the Nones of May, (b) Xistus had his feat (b) Entito I. & according to Damajus. And we must not forget that Heros succeeded Ignatius in cap. 35 the Sea of Antioch.

18. Trajan, that we may conclude his Story, was esteemed a Prince of unuful Civility and Fortitude, and Aurelius Victor tells us some reason, because the Estate of the Roman Empire had been so afflicted and wasted by many and cruel Tyrants, that he was believed fent by heaven, by defignment to amend and repair it. He pleased the more because he took order for supply of Rome with Provisions, inftituting a Company of Bakers; and it was thought a great Advantage to the State, that for speedy Intelligence, he more vigorously managed the Cursus Publicus. Pliny Junior, who flourished in his time, upon his being promoted to be Conful, made a large Panegyrick in the Senate still extant, wherein as he extols him for many things, fo in an especial manner for removing grievances, and heavy Impositions, particularly that of the Vicesima, or twentieth part of Estates, first required by Augustus, which his Successor again rigorously exacted. That Inclination he had to Wine, of which also Nerva is faid to have been guilty, it's faid he moderated by Prudence, giving order, that after a full meal, no more should be brought in, though called for. All the respect and love he had from the People, was cemented by his familiar converse. For he would make visits to his Friends, see them when Sick, eat at their Houses, and often ride in their Chariots. He was liberal, and studied to inrich those with whom he had but small acquaintance. In his time was but one Senator Condemned, and he by the Senate without his knowledge. Hereby he procured fuch fame even after his death, that in the Acclamations of the Senate, the Fathers would wish that the succeeding Princes might be happier than Augustus, and better than Trajan. Eutropius

The Death of writes, that he died of a Flux at Seleucia, a City of Ifauria in his return from Persia, in the fixty second year of his Age. He alone, he adds, was buried in the City. His Ashes in a golden Urn were put in his own Forum, under his Column, which was an Hundred and forty four foot high. In his time flourished, besides Pliny Junior, Plutarch, Lucian, Suetonius, L. Florus, Cornelius Tacitus, and others. His Death fell in the fifth of the Two hundred twenty fourth Olympiad, the Eight hundred and seventieth of the City A. D. CXVII. Quintus Niger, and T. Vipsanius Apronianus, being Confuls.

19. It was commonly believed, that the Defign of Trajan was to leave Neratius

The Roman Empire.

Priscus his Successor; and his Friends were so much inclining to it, that one time he told him, He commended the Provinces to him, in case that any thing fatal should happen; many faid, that he thought good to imitate the Example of Alexander the Macedonian, and dye without a certain Successor; and that he intended to fend an Oration to the Senate, wherein he would defire, that if any thing happened to him otherwise than well; they would give a Prince to the Commonwealth, yet so, as he therewith added several Names, out of which they should Hedrian Suc- make choice. But the Succession fell upon Hadrian his Kinsman, who was born at Rome, in the year that Vespasian the Seventh, and Titus the Fifth time were Consuls, but had his Original also from Italica. It was given out that Trajan adopted him before his Death, and some name the day whereon he should receive Letters which certified him of fuch Adoption. But most agree that for it he was obliged to Plotina the Empress, and Eutropius writes, That Trajan refused to adopt him, though the Son of her that was his Coufin German by the Mothers fide, whereas others fay, That his Father Ælius Adrianus, Sirnamed Afer, was his Coufin German, and so related. Dio writes, That he was joyned to Trajan in Affinity, as well as Confanguinity, having Married his Brother's (some fay his Sifter's) Daughter, and lived with him continually. He advanced him to feveral Offices in the State, and feveral Military Commands in the Wars, which he himfelf managed in person. Being sent his Prætorian Legate into the lower Pannonia, he restrained the Sarmatæ, supported Military Discipline, bridled the Extravagancy of Procurators, and for this obtained the Dignity of Conful. He was supported by Sura the Emperor's Favourite, and Plotina the Empress, who procured him, after Sura's Death, his fecond Confulship, and to be designed Legatus in the Parthian Expedition.

20. When her Husband was dead, with the affiftance of Attianus his Country man, the procured him to be Emperor, being in love with him, and incouraged, by reason he was not far off, and had great Forces. Dio tells us, He had it from Apronianus his Father, who governed Cilicia, who told him all the particulars, and that especially how Trajan's Death was concealed for some days, that the Adoption might proceed, which was discovered by her Subscribing the Letters fent in his Name to the Senate, which had never been practifed before. Spartianus writes, That some reported how by Plotina's means he was adopted after the Death of Trajan, one being suborned to counterfeit his weak voice. After his having obtained the Empire at Antioch, he fet himself to govern it in a peaceable manner. Therefore the Barbarians rebelling, whom Trajan had fubdued, and ftirs happening Quits all be-youd Euphrates and Tigrs, you Euphrates and Tigrs, following therein the Example of Cato, as he faid, who declared the Macedonians to be free, because they could not be held in subjection. At first he studied to shew himself addicted to Clemency. He begged pardon of the Senate, that he had not made them Judges concerning his Succession, and excused it by the suddenness of his being saluted by the Soldiers, because the Commonwealth could not be without an Emperor. The Senate having decreed a Triumph to him, which was due to Trajan, he refused it, and caused Trajan's Image to be drawn in a Triumphal Chariot. The Title of Pater Patriæ being given him, both at first and afterwards he refused, saying, That it was late before Augustus deserved it. The Aurum Coronarium he remitted to Italy, and lessened it in the Provinces, yet fetting forth the difficulties at large under which the Treasury laboured. A Conspiracy was hatched against him by Negrinus whom he had defigned for his Succeffor, but being discovered he was put to Death, and so were his Complices, Palma, Celsus, and Lucius, by command of the Senate, but against his will, as he wrote in his own life. But he was ill spoken of for putting to Death these four Persons of Consular Dignity; and to cause it to be forgotten, he came to Rome, where he gave a double Congiary to the People, and in the Senate he fwore, having excused what was done, that he would never punish a Senator but by the Sentence of the Fathers themselves.

21. That the Magistrates might not be charged with the Cursus Publicus, he laid the burthen upon the Treasury, as soon as he came to the Government. To obtain a good name, he remitted to private Debtors dwelling in Rome and Italy, an infinite Sum of Money, and vast Arrears to others in the Provinces. causing the Bonds whereby they stood engaged, to be burned in the Forum of Trajan. The Estates of condemned Persons he forbad to be brought into his private Fiscus, but to be accounted for in the publick Ærarium. He increased the liberality of Trajan, to Boys and Girls that wanted maintenance. To Senators who were decayed, not by their own faults, according to their charge of Children, and their quality he gave allowances for life. Most of the Senators he admitted to familiarity. The Circensian Games decreed to him, he retused, but only on his Birth-day, and faid often both in the Affembly of the People, and in the Senate, that he would fo govern as the Interest in the State being that of the People, and not his. When he had entred his third Consulship, he made many Confuls the third time; but a vast number he honoured with the second; and his third Confulfhip he held only four months, during which time he often fate in Judgment; when the Senate was legally affembled, either in the City or without, he was always prefent, and promoted the honour of it all he could, especially taking care, that the Dignity should not be cheap, for he difficultly admitted any into it. Yet would be venture to make himself rather cheap in visiting fick Persons twice or thrice a day, though but Equites, or even Libertini; he would comfort, relieve, and advise men of such quality, and take them to his Table, doing all things like a private man. Travelling into Gall, he was as liberal to all that had need of his liberality.

22. Thence he passed into Germany, and there, though he was more desirous of Peace than War, so exercised his Soldiers, as if some War and Expedition had been at hand. He taught them to bear and endure hardship, and that by his own Example; for living himfelf like a Soldier amongst the Manipulares, he publickly fed upon Military Fare, which was Lard, Cheefe, and that they called Polca, or Water & Vinegar, as did Scipio Æmilianus, Metellus, & Trajan. On fome he bestowed Rewards, on others Honours, to make them more willingly undergo what he feverely imposed. Indeed Spartianus tells us, He restored the Discipline of the Camp, which had decayed by the carelessness of other Princes, ordaining Offices and Allowances. That this is true, in part we have fome reason to believe from what other Historians also write of Trajan; Vegetius mentions Hadrian's Constitutions about Military Affairs; Dion Cassius tells us, That his Rules and Orders were to his time observed for Laws; and Casaubon mentions a Coin, on the Reverse of which Discipline was ingraved. He was also so extraordinarily Skilled Hadrian wrote in the Art Military, that he wrote a Book of Tatticks, which lying long obscure, at length faw the light in the days of Aanstasius, by means of Orbicius, who to his Objervations, and the Experiences of the ancient Captains, added others of his own time, as Salmafius hath observed. But what Spartianus writes of his restoring, we must not believe; as if he alone restored the Discipline which had

he had small time to make reformation, it being a common word amongst the Soldiers, That They must mind their Duty, for it was Galba, not Getulicus. Vefpa- Difemilis mifian also was a good Soldier, and no doubt careful this way. To be fure so was litere, Galba Trajan, who also, as appears from Vegetius, published many Constitutions upon 611. this Subject.

23. But Spartianus, the better to make good his Assertion, proceedeth and telleth us, That he never suffered any Soldier, without warrantable Cause, to be absent from his Colours; when this happened, usually the Tribunes were in fault, by giving leave upon frivolous pretences; but, Tribunes in his days were commended for their worth, and not by the favour of the Soldiers, or their commendation to the General, as had been practifed toward the end of the Commonwealth, when they were not chosen by the People in the Comitia. To excite them to Travel, he himself would march on foot, armed as he was, twenty miles; for it was the usual and ordinary Custom, for the Soldiers to Travel five hours every day, in which space they got twenty or four and twenty miles; twenty miles in the Law being effeemed a Journey, and called Militaris gradus; as twenty four, gradus plenus. He caused to be pulled down all arched XXXXX 2

Gave his Sol-

Rooms, Galleries, and fuch Coverings as the Soldiers made o're their Tents, for keeping off the heat of the Sun; The Army in Summer was Exercised in the Field; in Winter, if it rained or fnew, under Coverings, and then only; and for this purpose they made Porticus's or Galleries, but these were more for Necessity: fuch as Hadrian pulled down were rather the green Porticus's made against Heat, and for pleasure, by them when Idle and Extravagant. Frequently he went meanly clad, which is to be understood when he was in the Camp; for that he used Gold in his Ornaments, and first of all Princes in that fort called Mantilia, fome Authors wrote, The Belt he wore was without Gold; whereas it was the custom for the Roman Captains to have them sparkling both with Gold and Gems. The Hilt of his Sword was fearcely of Ivory, though this was despited in those days. Soldiers that were Sick, he vifited at their Lodgings. He himfelf would He further re- chuse the ground where the Camp should be, though this was the Duty of the Metatores. He chose no Centurions but those that were Robust, and of good Repute; neither made he a Tribune that had not a Beard, or was not of fuch an Age as his Prudence and years might be equal to the Charge. Nothing did he permit the Tribune to receive from the Soldier, though there was an ill Custom, for the Officers to sell leave to the Soldiers of being absent from their Colours, and to convert their Pay and Allowances to their own Use. All delicacies he removed, and reformed what was amifs in their Arms and Furniture.

The Roman Empire.

24. He made inquiry into the Age of the Ordinary Soldiers, suffering none to ferve who was of less than Valour required, nor of greater than Humanity would fuffer, or the Ancient Custom; and he made it his business to know them both as to their Persons and their Number. He was also diligent to understand what Military Provisions for Horse and Man were laid up in the limitaneous Cities; he curiously inquired into the Revenues of the Provinces, that if any thing was wanting, he might supply it. No man ever took such care not to buy or feed any idle thing. His Soldiers being thus brought to imitate their Emperor, he came He comes into into Britain, and here correcting many things out of order, he first of all others raised a Wall eighty miles long, to divide the Parbarians from the Romans. Septicius Clarus the Præselius Prætorio, and Suetonius Tranquillus his Epistolarum Magister, he removed from their Places, for being more familiar with his Wife Sabina, than he commanded, or the reverence due to his Court required; and he faid, That had he been a private man he would have put away his Wife, as morose and froward. And he was not only curious as to matters of his own House, but in fuch as related to his Friends; so as by the Frumentarii he discovered all things; neither did they understand that the Emperor knew how they governed them-Goes iano Gall, selves before he let them know how they did it. Having setled his Affairs in Britain, he returned into Gall, being troubled to hear of the Sedition at Alexandria, which was raifed by occasion of their God Apis, who having been found after many years, the People fell into a Tumult about the placing of him: At Nemausus he raised a Basilica of admirable work, in honour of Plotina. After this he went into Spain, and wintered at Tarraco (now Arragon) where at his own Expence he re-edified the Temple of Augustus; for the Inhabitants of that place raised Temples to him amongst the rest. He called a meeting of the Spaniards at this place, at which they of Italian Extraction endeavouring in jefting wife to draw their Necks from Burthens, and the rest in good earnest, he ordered his matters very prudently.

25. In those days in many places where the Barbarians were divided from the Romans, not by Rivers, but Limits made by Art, he raised a fort of Rampart with pieces of Timber in the manner of an Hedge or Wall. Over the Germans he fet a King; he appealed the motions of the Mauri, and had Supplications decreed him by the Senate; Afterward he composed the War of the Parthians by a Conference. He travelled out of Spain into Africk, and so into Ægypt and Syria, with the rest of Asia. Coming into Achaia, he was at Athens initiated in their Mysteries called Eleufinia; after the Example of Hercules and Philip; many favours he bestowed upon the Inhabitants, and having been formerly their Archon he prefided at their Solemnities, as Agonotheta; and in Achaia it was observed, that it being at their Sacred Solemnities, the Custom for those that were prefent to have Knives about them for fear of Treachery, none that were fo armed entred with Hadrian. After this he went into Sicily, and there up to the Hill Ætna, to fee the Sun rife in form of a Bow. Thence he came to Rome, and from Rome passed again into Africk, where he conferred many benefits on the Provinces, as the Coins still bear witness, in some of which he is styled the Restorer of Africk. Spartianus adds to these his Narrations, that scarcely any other Prince travelled with fuch fpeed through fo many Countries. As to this, Cafaubon observes, that he was accounted another Hercules, for his travelling fo affiduously through the Roman world, and doing good in his passage. For Victor tells us, That he had his Troops of Smiths, Architects, and other Artificers, not unlike the Military Legions distinguished into Cohorts, for making or beautifying of Walls. Casaubon faw a Coin in the possession of Thuanus, whereon he was both called Roman Hercules, and accourred like to that Hero. In others he found him ftyled Soter. or Saviour, because going about the Provinces, he severely punished Governors thereof, whom he found faulty, who were often more cruel than any Monsters. But whereas Spartian adds scarcely, this Learned man thinks he doth it, because of Julius Cæsar, who like Lightning ran through the Provinces, and illustrated most of them by his Victories. Next to him was Augustus, who yet as Suetonius confesseth, came not in Africk nor Sardinia, though in all the other Provinces. All the other Princes, Trajan excepted, were in a manner Homelings. But as for Hadrian, Dion Cassius in this respect prefers him before all the other Emperors without exception. 26. Having returned from Africk to Rome, he went again into the East, and took Athens in his way, where he perfected the works he had formerly begun, and dedicated the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, and an Altar to himself; and in the same manner passing through Asia, he Consecrated Temples of his own Name. Then did he receive from the Cappadocians, Slaves, for the Service of the Camp. Of old when the Roman Discipline was vigorous, the Soldiers were not permitted to have any Slaves to follow them, and when the Custom was come up, yet fuch Captains as were fevere, would cause them to be dismissed. But afterward it grew to that height, that every ordinary or Common Soldier would have his Slave. These Slaves the Ancients called Calones, and the later Romans Galearii from carrying their Helmets, who were wont to dig also, to make Trenches, and labour at fuch works as the Soldier himself formerly wrought. Now out of Cappadocia did Hadrian furnish himself, for out of that Country the greatest part of Slaves proceeded, that People being noted by the Greeks to be of a tervile Disposition, and io much also by the Romans, that Cappadox and Mancipium with them, fignified the same. But to pursue our Story, Toparchs and Kings he invited into Friendship, and particularly, Costroes the Parthian, to whom he restored his Daughter taken by Trajan, and promifed the golden Chair, which had also been taken; but performed not his word. Some Kings came to his presence, whom he treated in fuch fort, that it repented the rest that they did not come. In his Progress through the Provinces, he fo severely punished the offending Officers and Governors, that he himself was believed to procure their Accusers. The Antiochians he so much hated (for their lightness and prating it's most probable) that he determined to separate Syria from Phanicia, that Antioch might not be called the Metropolis of fo many Cities. At this time the Jews raifed a War, because they were forbidden to Circumcife themselves. He ascended the Mountain Cassus, where it is reported, the Sun might be feen to rife at the fourth watch of the Night, to behold this fight : Now there were two Mountains of this Name; one at Pelufium, at the entrance into Ægypt, and the other hanging over the City of Antioch, where we may perceive Hadrian was about this time. But next to this, Spartian subjoyns, that having passed Arabia, he came to Pelusium, and built more Magnificently the Monument of Pempey, which Monument was in the other Mountain Cafus adjoying to Pellylum. As he failed through the Nile, he loft Antinous, a beautiful Youth he had. Some believed that he devoted himfelf for Hadrian, it being a Custom of old to kill one's Self; to prolong the life of a Friend, as they believed they thereby did, one live thing being given for another.

Others thought he was killed by him, that by his Entrails he might discover future things, as there was also a Custom amongst the Pagans. However here he died. as Spartianus faith, devoted to him, the one way or the other; and he loved him exreamly; in fuch a way it's thought by fome, as is not to be named, for he was very beautiful, as his Image expressed in a Medal doth shew, which Casaubon saw amongst the Rarities of Thuanus, the President. And the Greeks, to flatter Hadrian, Consecrated him for a god. Having the Town named after him, where he was Buried, he had there, and in many places of Greece Temples and Priefts, and they faid he gave out Oracles, as fuch as flattered Alexander, faid of Hapheftien, whom he made a god in the same manner. Spartian adds, That Hadrian himself was reported to compose the Oracles of Antinous. 27. For he was most studious of Poesy, and indeed of all forts of Learning; most Skilful in Arithmetick, Geometry, and Painting; to which some add, the Art of Medicine. He pretended also to have Skill in Singing, being too much given to his Pleafure in this kind, for concerning fuch as he loved, he Composed many amorous Verses. As of Arms, and the Art Military he was most know-Hadrian's va- ing, he could manage the Weapons of the Gladiators. He was fevere and merrious Humour. ry, fair-spoken and grave, wanton and yet flow; close-handed, and counterfeiting liberality; cruel and yet merciful, and in all things ever various. He inriched his Friends, and even such as asked nothing, denying nothing to those that did; yet would he hear readily whatfoever was whifpered against them, and there was scarcely any either of those to whom he bore the greatest Friendship, or favoured with the greatest Honours, whom he did not afterwards treat as Enemies. Amongst others, he compelled Severianus, his Sifters Husband, and one of Ninety years of Age, to die, that he might not over-live him. His Freed-men and some Soldiers he profecuted. Being very ready in Composing both Profe and Verse, and most Skilful in all Sciences, yet, as more Learned, he derided all Professors of Arts, contemned and oppressed them. With these Professors and Philosophers, he often would contend by Writing Books or Verses. Favorinus a famous Learned Man of this Age, having made Use of a word which Hadrian reprehended, would not contend but yielded, and being reprehended by his Friends for fo doing, the word being used by good Authors, he made them laugh, by telling them, that They did not well in that they would not suffer him to believe him learneder than all others, who had at his Command thirty Legions. He was so desirous of same, that he delivered Books of his own Life written by himfelf to those of his Freed-men that were Scholars, commanding them to Publish them in their own Names. For the Books of Phlegon were faid to be of Hadrian's making. He wrote most obscure Books in imitation of Antimachus. He loved the ancient way of speaking. He declaimed

Controversies. He preferred Cato before Cicero, Ennius before Virgil, Cælius

Lefore Sallust; and in the fame boafting manner he judged concerning Homer

28. He seemed so much to be Skilled in Astrology, (by our Historian called Ma-Science, he would write down what would was skilled in the first of January at Night, he would write down what would happen to him the whole year; and that year he died, he wrote what he should do to the hour of his Death. But to flew more of the strange contrariety of his humour, our Author telleth us, That he was inclined much to reprehend Musttians, Tragadians, Comadians, Grammarians, Rhetoricians and Orators; yet he both honoured and inriched all Professors, though he ever vexed them with Questions. And notwithstanding he himself was the cause that many went Melancholick from him, yet he would fay, he could not endure to fee any one fad. He was very familiar with Epittetus and Heliodorus the Philosophers, befides other learned Men of all Professions, but was reported most to prize Favorinus, concerning whom we read so much in A. Gellius. Such Teachers as seemed unable for their Professions, he dismissed both with Wealth and Honour. Them with whom he had been at Enmity whilst a private Man, being Emperor he so lar neglected, that to a Capital Enemy when made Augustus, he said, Thou hast escaped. Such as he himself called to the War, he surnished with Horses, Mules, Clothes, Money, and all Conveniences. He often washed publickly, and with all, being a most boasting Lover of the common People. He was so great a Lover of Travel, that he had a defire to see all he had read of the several Places in the World. Cold and Tempestuous weather he so patiently endured, that he never covered his Head. To many Kings he was very kind, of most he bought Peace, and by fome was despised: to many he gave great Gifts, but greater to none than him of the Hiberi, to whom he gave an Elephant, and a Cobort of Five hundred men, after many other things. He also having received from Pharasmenes great Prefents, and amongst them Chlamydes or Soldiers Coats made with old, he caused Three hundred Malefactors to be put to fight in the Theatre

iled with fuch Coats, on purpose to deride his Presents.

29. When he fate in Judgment, he had in his Council not only his Friends and Companions (Comites) but Lawyers also, and especially Julius Celsus, Salvius Julianus, Neratius Priscus, and others, but such as all the Senate approved. Amongst other things, he ordained that in no City should any Houses be demoHis Laws.

lished for conveying their Materials to another City. By this passage of Spartian, it should seem that he made some Edict about this matter, but in our Books of Law, no fuch Conftitution of his we meet with, and therefore feveral Learned men are of opinion, That these words of the Historian relate to a Senatusconfultum, made in the fifth year of his Reign, and the Confulship of Aviola and Pansa. By this the Fathers ordained, that it should not be lawful to remove such things as joyned to Buildings, in way of Trade; to buy, tell, or leave them in Legacy, nor to fell or bequeath an House to be demolished; which thing was also forbidden in the days of Vespasian. Now this Spartian may mean, though his words do not express the intent or purport of the Senatusconfultum, a thing usual in vide casaulari. those Writers of the Historia Augusta, when they talk of Law Matters. He tells int. I. us farther, that to the Children of Condemned Persons, he granted the twelfth part of their Estates. Of the ancient Cornelian Law concerning Proscription one branch took away all Access to Honours from the Children of proscribed Perfons; by virtue of the other the Goods of the Father were to be fold. The first branch was taken away by Julius Cafar, and fucceeding Princes, and the latter was mitigated by this Law of Hadrian, who yet was not fo merciful herein as Marcus, who reigned after him. Crimes of Treason he admitted not. He refused to be Heir to unknown Persons, neither received he the Inheritances of fuch as were known to him, if they had Sons. Concerning Treasure, he ordained that if one found it in his own Ground he should enjoy it, if in that of another man, he should give half to the owner; and if in publick Ground he should divide it with the publick Treasury. He forbad that Slaves should be killed by their Lords, and Commanded that they should be Condemned by the Judges, if they deserved it. To a Brothel House-keeper, and a Master of Desence, he forbad an 'He or She Slave to be fold without a Judge, and the pleasure of the

30. Such as had wasted their Estates, if they were Men, and at Age when they did it. he Commanded to be difgraced in the Amphitheatre, and difmiffed. But Catamidian what difference this was is difficult to be understood, the word that Spartian useth, vilcatonidis being variously interpreted. Cafaubon will have it fignifie, that such were led are through the Theatre, there to be scoffed at, and derided as Criminal Persons usually were, both word and Custom being taken from the Greeks. But Salmasius catemia cadi. contends that the word imports a beating betwixt the Neck and Shoulders; a Punishment usual for Malesactors. And a great Malesactor doubtless is he, who by wasting his Estate, Robs his Wife and Children of what was left them, as well as him, by their Ancestors. But this punishment was to give Example to others, and prevent the like Crime in lookers on, of which there must have been Multitudes in the Amphitheatre. More mild and effectual was the other courfe the Systaminian Roman Law took against the Extravagancy of a Spendthrist, by virtue of which has too different Prator forbad him the Use and Government of his own Etlate, and affigned an tunning the systamic difference of the course of th him a Guardian no otherwise than as to a Mad man. But Spartian in reference to ad irojum the Laws made by Hadrian, farther tells us, That he took away the Ergaliula interdice. of Slaves and Liberti, or those that once had been such. So now we read it; but in stead of Freed-men, Salmasius will have Freemen to be read. Ergassula were Libergrum pro places where Slaves or other Persons were kept in Bonds, and set to hard labour liberteram for some Offence committed. Of these some were publick, as the Mines, and Ergaffuli vor fome belonged to private men, unto which, in the Days of Augultus, fome free mentantum and ingenuous Persons were by violence and stealth cast; and in the time of Ti- triam formatioberius, others to hun being called to Arms, put themselves; and therefore both ne Grace, camp these Emperors took care for the searching and purging of them. Now Hadrian at alias plura a siculis Remacommanded them to be taken away, whether furnished with Slaves or Freemen. #1 [umpfrit. Freedmen, indeed, were for their Ingratitude to their Patrons, reduced into the sales. state of Slavery, and afterward might be condemned to the Ergaftula, but then it was as Slaves, and as he well observes, not as Liberti or Freedmen. Spartian adds, that Hadrian separated the Baths according to the Sexes. In former times Men and Women washed together without any shame, as to nakedness; which filthy custom, the Greeks took from the Romans, as Plutarch complaineth. Cafaubon thinks the Custom began when Agrippa first of all others, opened publick Baths at Rome. Now Hadrian indeavoured to take it away, but his Endeavour succeeded not, or but for a little time. For Marcus after him, made a new Law for this purpose, which prevailed, till taken away by Heliogabalus; but Alexander Severus restored it by another Constitution. Yet Alexander's care had but small Effect;

the ancient Christians giving way to the Custom, though Prohibited by the Constitutions of Clemens. The Fathers in their Synods also forbad it, but their Authority was long neglected after the Decree of the Laodicean Council. But at length the Canons got ground, as should appear from a Novel of Justinian, by which amongst others, this is made a lawful cause of Divorce, If a Woman without leave obtained from her Husband shall wash with Men. Farther, Hadrian ordained, That if a Person was killed in his House, the question should not be put to all his Slaves, but only fuch as by their nearness might know of it. By Question is meant-Examination by Torture, as will largely appear in the fecond Part of this Work.

31. So Popular was Hadrian, that, though Emperor, he would take Inferior Titles, as of Prator in Hetruria, in the Latine Towns of Dictator, Ædilis and Duumvir. At Naples he was Demarchus, in his own Country Quinquennalis, as also at Adria, which was efteemed as his other Native place, and Archon at Athens. Almost in all Cities he built and celebrated Games. At Rome after other vast Divertilements in honour of his Mother-in-law, amongst other Species which were wont to be given to the People, he gave Spices. In honour of Trajan, he commanded water made of Balfam and Saffron to be sprinkled on the People, through the Degrees of the Theatre. Though every where he erected infinite Structures, yet he put his Name to none but the Temple of his Father Trajan. At Rome he repaired the Pantheum, the Septa, the Basilica of Neptune, many Temples, the Forum of Augustus, the Bath of Agrippa, and consecrated them all to their own and ancient Names. All these, or most of them, had perished by Fire in the Reign of Titus, and had been begun to be repaired by Trajan, but were left imperfect. He made a Bridge of his own Name (called Pons Ælius, as appears from Dio) and a Sepulchre by the River Tiber. So writes Spartian, though others will have Hadrian's Sepulchre, which Procopius terms a Tower and a Castle, to have been built after his Death by his Successor Pius. Marius Maximus said he was Cruel by Nature, and therefore did many things piously, that what was the lot of Domitian might not also happen to him. Though he rejected Titles, and would not have his Name fet upon Buildings; He named, Spartian faith, many Cities after himfelf Adrianople, as Carthage it self, and part of Athens; besides an infinite number of Aquæducts, he diffinguished by the same Name. Yet Salmasius tells us, That using his utmost diligence, he could find but Nine Cities of his Name, whereof two were most known, and by no other; to the rest remained their other Names, though their Inhabitants boasted themselves for Hadrianopolita, and so would be called. One of these was in Cyrenaica; and the other in Thrace, Twenty four miles distant from Plotinopolis. Further, Hadrian first ordained the Officer called Advocatus Fisci, whereas, as Casaubon notes, the Affairs of the Treasury were managed formerly by the Procurators of the Cæfars.

32. He had a vast Memory, and a great readiness of Speech; for, he dictated himself his Orations, and answered to all things when he was saluted by the Common fort on certain Days, he would return their Names to many without a Nomenclator, though he had heard them but once, and spoken all together; so as he would correct the Nomenclators often when miftaken. He could tell the Names of the Veterane Soldiers whom he had difmissed from Service. Books which he had never feen before, and haftily read, he would repeat by heart. At one and the same time he wrote, dictated, heard, and discoursed with his Friends. Of all the publick Accounts he was fo much Master, as scarcely was a Diligent Father of a Family of those of his own House. Concerning the Judges or Governors of Provinces, he fought what he could by Inquiry, and fo long till he found out the Truth. His Freedmen he would neither have known in publick, nor be thought to have any power with him, being wont to impute to the preceding Princes the faults of all this fort of men that ferved them, and condemning all of his own that made their boafts of him. Such Cities, and Persons as were afflicted with Famine, Pestilence, and Earthquakes, he relieved. He gave the Privilege of Latium to many Cities; whereby we may understand, that it was not he that made all the Subjects of the Empire free Citizens of Rome. Under him were no troublesom Expeditions, and Wars were in a manner passed over in filence; yet was he beloved by the Soldiers for his extraordinary care of the Army, and for being most liberal to them. The Parthians he always had his Friends, because he took away their King whom Trajan had imposed on them. He permitted the Armenians to have a King, whereas under Trajan they had but a Legatus, or Lieutenant. From the Mesopotamians he exacted not the Tribute imposed on them how he ob-

by Trajan; but why should he meddle with Armenia or Mesopotamia, when these Provinces and Affyria, at the beginning of his Reign he had quitted and refigned up to the Parthian, perceiving them not capable to be held by him. The Albani and Hiberi were his mighty Friends; because he had been liberal to their Kings though they would not come at him. The Kings of the Bactrians in an humble manner fent Ambaffadors to defire his Friendship.

33. He himself often affigned Tutors. Enacting Civil as well as Military Discipline, he commanded Senators and Equites, ever to wear their Gowns in Publick, except they returned from Supper; and he himself always wore the Gown in Italy. It feems he re-enforced Augustus his Law, which took in the common People also, though by Hadrian they were left to their liberty. Before this Restraint of his, both Senators and Equites would use the Penula and Lacerna in Publick. But Marcus was so great a lover of the Gown, that he always used it himself in Italy, and commanded his Soldiers also to be Gowned, wherein his Son Commodus also was so much concerned, that some he caused to be killed who met him in a Barbarian's Habit. But Hadrian required it not when they returned from Supper, because then they wore their Garments proper to eating; so they had Clothes proper for the time of Bathing, and from the Baths they might return in fuch, He received the Senators when they came to Feast with him, standing; and always when he lay down to Meat, was either clothed with the Pallium, or Gown put from his right Arm toward the left Shoulder; which he did, by his Example, to Correct the Extravagancy of the Romans, who in those days when they went to meat, were wont to change their Shoes for Sandals, and their Gowns for Senatorian Weeds, which were fo large; that in nothing they more shewed their Luxury: But he either wore the Pallium, which left the Arms at liberty, or elfe had his Gown removed from his right Arm; which he must necessarily have loose and free. And he not only regulated the manner of Eating, but the Expence thereof, by direction from the Governors of Provinces, and reduced it to the ancient Custom, by recalling the Sumptuary Laws; not the Lex Faunia, or Licinia, (fo Salmafius thinks;) which, were too ancient and unfuitable to those times, but the Julia; by which it was ordained, that not above Two hundred Seftertiz should be laid out upon a Supper; on the Kalends, Ides and Nones Three hundred and on other Festivals, and a Thousand at Weddings, and the like.

34. Carriages with great Burthens, he fuffered not to enter Rome, neither Horses to be ridden in Cities, which Law Casaubon tells us, was changed for a milder, which permitted one to Ride in Cities on Horseback, but not in a Chariot, as our Neighbours of Amsterdam, lately Prohibited the Use of Coaches in theirs. Before the eighth hour of the Day; he suffered none except Sick Persons to wash in Publick. The ninth hour at Rome was the usual time for Suppling, and then were opened the Taverns, Baths, and Brothel Houses; but it seems Hadrian would allow the Baths to be fet open at the eighth. He first used the Ministery of the Roman Equites, for dispatching Epistles and Petitions. He himself frequently heard Causes both at Rome, and in the Provinces, taking in to his Affistance, the Confuls, Prators, and the best of the Senators. He constituted four Confulares. Judges through all Italy. When he went into Africk it rained, which it had not done for five years before, according to our Historian; and for this the Africans loved him. But it feems, his ordering of his Head in Rain was fuch, that he Showers and Colds, he fell into a lingring and Confumptive Difeafe. Then being folicitous concerning a Successor, he thought of Severianus, and others, but looking upon them as Emperors, he detefted them, though he repressed the force of his natural cruelty, till by a flux of Blood he was almost brought to his end. Then did he command Severianus to die, as affecting the Empire; in that he fent forme Victuals from Supper to the Emperor's Slaves, had fet him down in a Royal Seat, placed by the Bed, as the Custom was, and though an old Man of Ninety Shews his Gru-years of Age, had gone bolt upright to the Stations of the Soldiers; many other being put to Death, either openly, or by cunning and secret means. Amongst these, his Wife Sabina was also said to have been taken away by Poisson. Video. the Hiltorian speaks of her Death as caused by him; yet voluntary, writing that Being affronted by almost service Injuries, she was compelled to a voluntary Death; and that the openly boasted how infussferable an huntour she had endured, and had laboured, that the might not be with Child by him, to the Destruction of 896 35. He adopted Ceionius Commodus Verus, the Son-in-law of Nigrinus, who confpired against him, whom formerly he had respected for his handsomness, and called him Alius Verus Cafar. In respect to this Adoption, he gave the Circenfian Games, and a Donative both to the People and Soldiers; he honoured him with the Pratorship, the Government of Pannonia, and two Consulships. But he was very fickly, infomuch that he could not give him thanks in the Senate for his Adoption, which made him often fay, that he had leaned to a rotten Wall, and had loit a Thousand Sestertia. Having taken too strong a Purge, or some other fort of Physick, he died in the Night, through a great Islue of Blood which happened to him while he flept; Hadrian being wont to foretel his short continuance. He died on the first of January, or the Calends, and therefore he forbad he should be mourned for. Though on the third day after the Calends was the greatest Solemnity for naming Vows for the health of the Emperor; yet the first day it felf was very Solemn, and fuch Ceremonies they were generally unwilling should be interrupted, or the Festivity lessened by Mourning. Ælius Verus Cæsar being He adopts An- Dead, he adopted Arrius Antoninus, afterward Sirnamed Pius, but on condition that he should adopt other two, which were Arrius Verus, and Marcus Antoninus. Many were vexed at the Adoption of Antoninus, particularly Catilius Severus, Prafect of the City, who aimed at the Sovereignty; which being discovered, he was put out of his place, and deprived of his Dignity. Hadrian weary of his life, commanded his Slave to run him through with his Sword; which being known, Antoninus and the Præfetts came in, and defired him to bear patiently the violence of his Disease; at which he was angry, and commanded him that had made it known to be killed, but Antonimus preserved him, who affirmed, that being adopted, he ought not to fuffer Hadrian to be flain; otherwife he should be a Parricide. He made his Testament, and this done, endeavoured again to kill himfelf, but the Dagger was stoln away from him, after wich he grew more cruel; and he demanded Poison, of a Physician, who that he might not give it him, slew himfelf. At length he went to Baiæ, leaving Antoninus at Rome, to govern; where all endeavours for recovery being frustrate, having sent for Antoninus, he died in his fight on the fixth day before the Ides of July; and being hated by all Men, was Buried in Cicero's Village at Puteoli.

36. This is the Account we have from Spartianus, concerning the Reign and Character of Hadrian; and the largest we have from any Author now extant, being to our great loss deprived of so great a part of Dion Cassius his works. And we could have wished Spartianus himself had been more copious; for the Reader must take notice, that though we have such slender Intelligence of the manner of it; yet we are told, That Hadrian made a great alteration in the form of Government, to great that the obliterated most of that which was introduced by Augultus; nay, that the Model, as it food in Constantine's time, was most of it of his contrivance. Yet when we come to particulars, we find little in Spartian; but that He made four Confulares Judges, through all Italy. Only Sex. Aurelius Victor tells us much in little; that The Publick and Palatine Offices, as also of the Militia, Hadrian put into that form, which a few things being changed, remained in his days. But we cannot be of this opinion, that they were but a few things; For from this time down to Constantine, an Alteration crept in by degrees, as all Sublunary things are fubject to change. But it will not be amis to hear what a very great Man, Onuphrius Panvinius faith, concerning this Subject. He writes, that there were four Authors of a new form of the Commonwealth in the whole Roman Empire. These were, Romulus, Augustus, Hadrian and Constantine. That Hadrian made this alteration first after Augustus; and he founds his Affertion on this Affirmation of Viller. Before he comes to demonstrate it, he premiseth a Description of the whole Empire, taken out of Appians Proem to his Books of the Civil Wars. Then he renews his Affertion, that this Description of the Empire falling chiefly into the Reign of Hadrian, he made a new division of all Nations and Provinces therein mentioned, and ordered the Empire in a far differing manner from that wherein it was conflituted by Augustus. Which division of Provinces, and new Constitution of the Empire, he faith he will suggest chiefly out of Sextus Rufus, and begin with Italy, the Lady of all : Italy, and her three Islands were distinguished into leventeen Dioceses, or Administrations; The Governors of which were some Consulares, some Correctores, and some Prasides. There were eight Consulares, two Correctores, and seven Prafides. In Gulls, Aquitaine and Brittain, were eighteen Provinces; in Illyricum seventeen; in Thrace six, and in Africk as many. As for the division of Asia, it's wanting.

37. But for Italy, eight Provinces, or Dioceses as he calls them, had Consulares. two had Correctores, and feven had Prafidents. For those of Spain, Gall and Britain, he faith not which had which, fo bold are some in following Victor; they knew not why, as to particulars. Generally Learned men have concluded that the Confulares, who by that Name and Authority governed Provinces, were instituted partly by Hadrian, and partly by Constantine. But Salmasius contends; that the Division of Provinces into Confulares, and Pro-Confulares, was not only Provinces, was not only when brought before Constantine, but also before Hadrian, he being Consularis of a Province, who governed it by Confular Authority. That Hadrian brought not first up the Administration of the Confulares, but that Italy before his time not being governed by Confulares, he appointed fuch Judges to administer Justice to all the Provinces of that Country. He fetcheth them from the Institution of Augustus, who sent such Officers to govern some of his Provinces when the Partition was made betwixt him and the People. Cafaubon observes, that Marcus afterward to these Consulares, substituted Lawvers, and so was Italy governed till the Reign of Macrinus, under whom these Juridici failed, as he gathers from the fragments of Dic. Afterwards we shall see in Constantine's Model, that Consulares were a fort of Governors, and of the ordinary Governors of Provinces. Hadrian it feems did not first institute them; but he might introduce some things circumstantial as to their Office. No more did he institute that of Prator, which was very ancient; but in his time a great Accident happened in reference to the discharge of the Prator's

The Edictum

Commenta-

Chap. V.

38. For under him we are told by Eutropius, that the Edict called Edictum Perpe-Perpetuam com- tuum, was Compiled by Salvius Julianus. And the Emperor Justinian in his Preface before the Digests to the Great Senate, attributes this to Hadrian himself, faying, That what things were every year published by the Prætors in their Edicts, he comprized in one little Book, taking in excellent Julian to that Enterprize. During the Commonwealth, the Prators had Power to Correct the Rigor of the Law, and the Adiles Curules had in certain Cases authority to make Laws also. But as their Offices, so their Edicts were but Annual before the Cornelian Law. Now Salvius Julianus, whom Spartian writes to have been one of Hadrian's Councellors, reduced them by his Command into order, and framed out of them a perpetual Edict, to be as a certain Body of standing Law, and to prevent the great Confusion occasioned by the New Edicts which each made at the Entrance into his Office. This Edict which was henceforth to be their guide and rule in Administration of Justice, consisted of One hundred and ninety Books or Chapters, and being confirmed both by Prince and Senate, was afterward il-Instrated by the Commentaries of two most Noble Lawyers, Paulus, and Vipian, Bine illa to of whom the former Composed Eighty Books, and the later Eighty three. And Pandellis, ulpi well might they bestow their pains upon it; for this was the Archetype of the anus ad Edi-Pandetts, the most noble Body of the Roman Law, and the Sum of what is left Edition. unto us, most of the Books now remaining, referring unto it as a Fountain, and the greatest part of the Digests being transcribed out of the Volumes written up-

39. From this time forward it came to pass, that whereas fince the Monarchy introduced by Augustus, the Prators had still made their Laws or Edicts: the Lawyers also reigned in the Forum, with remarkable Authority, and moderate Princes very often consulted the Senate upon any new Law to be made (whereupon their Oration in Senate are recited in Books, and have the Name also of Senatusconsulta) after the Publication of this Volume of Edicts, the Prators no more proposed any of their own; but like other Magistrates, began upon occasion to confult the Prince, who ever had at his Hand the best Lawyers to advise with, as we see Hadrian had. And indeed by all of that Noble Profession, the Reign of this Emperor deserves much to be taken notice of, both in respect that the Perpetual Edict was made in his time, and not without good reason, Justinian in Composing his Code, begins with the Constitutions made by him, omitting those of the former Emperors; as also that now the Power of making Laws remained in the Princes alone; in the Privy and Select Council of whom, all things necesfary for the Government of the Commonwealth, the State of the Empire, and the Discussion of Causes and Controversies were handled and debated. But this Plat Marie-Salvius Julianus, that eminent Lawyer of Milan, the Scholar of Jabolenus, is thought tatibus Jurie Author also of that called Interdictum Salvianum; as also of the New Edict con-civilia, c. 24 cerning the joyning of other Children with an Emancipated Son. For he was Prætor; he was also twice Consul, and Præsect of the City, besides several Governments of Provinces: and which made him more Noble, faith Spartian (in the life of Didius Julianus the Emperor his great Gandson) a Lawyer. Heit was that composed the perpetual Edict, and not Didius Julianus the Emperor, as Grotius strangely mistook, being decieved as Menagius believes, by a most corrupt in sparsion. place of Aurelius Victor.

40. By all that has been faid, we may eafily perceive that Hadrian was really Hadrian con- a great Person, as to his Parts and Accomplishments. But that his humour was cealed his Hu-compounded, and that he was various, appears from Spartian, who is most in his Commendation, and as is abundantly evident from other Writers. They agree that he indeavoured to conceal his Crueity, and other Vices; but it would now and anon fliew it felf, as it did even at the first, though he caressed the People all he could, to make it have a good Opinion of him; and fwore to the Senate that he would never punish a Scnator, but by the Sentence of that Court. But he broke his word toward his latter end, when he put to Death many of that Order, which fome may charitably attribute to his not being himfelf. He is charged with Envy, and that toward his very Benefactor Trajan. For to this both Eutropius and Sext. Rufus do attribute his quitting Affyria, Mesopotamia, and Armenia to the Parthians, and his resolution to have Euphrates to be betwixt them and the Romans, yet this he might do being of the same Opinion as Augustus, that the former bounds of the Empire were large enough, and that Trajan did but indanger it by making it greater. This, together with defire of Ease both of himself and People, might be the principal Cause of his quitting those Countries; for though he understood the Art of War, as we have seen, very well, yet he had devices to keep it off; and would not fail upon occasion to do it by underhand Gifts and Presents he made to Neighbour Princes, and he would boast that he did more (this way) for the fafety of the Empire, than others had done by their Arms. But whereas Spartian talks that there were no heavy Expeditions under him, and that Wars were in a manner transacted in filence, he wrote it without good Intelligence, or duc Confideration. For befides that he is faid by fome to have overthrown the Sauromatæ (or Sarmatæ, inhabiting the Countries now called Ruffia, and Tartary) he had a bitter contest with the rebellious Jews.

41. The principal cause of their rebellion was, for that he built a new City, and therein a Temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, where Jerusalem stood, and called the place after himself Ælia Capitolina, and he forbad them to be Circumcifed. They were confirmed in their Sedition by one who pretended he came down to them as a light from Heaven to fave them from flavery and bondage, faying, he was the Star foretold by Balaam, whence being called Barcocab, he was first worshipped as the Messiah, and anointed at Bitter, a City in Africk, but afterwards proving to be an Impostor, they called him Barcozba, or the son of a lye. Dio Likes, 1793. wrote, that the whole World was in a manner shaken with this Commotion of the Jews. Hadrian sent the best Captains he had against them, whereof the chief was Julius Severus, who had at this time governed Britain. Albeit in the end he had the victory, yet would he not have wished for many Triumphs at the same rate. For very many of the Romans fell; infomuch that Hadrian writing to the Senate, used not that beginning which other Emperors were wont: Si vos liberique nestri valetis, Bene est; Ego quidem & exercitus valemus. But the extraordinary strength which now apeared in the Jews was given them for their destruction. The greater danger their mutiny had occasioned to the Empire, the greater was the Emperors feverity in punishing their rebellion past, the greater his care to prevent the like in time to come. In Battels and Skirmishes were flain of them 580000. befides an infinite number confumed with Famine and Difeases, during the time of this lingring War, protracted of purpose by the Romans, not willing to try it out in open field with such a forlorn desperate multitude. Dio, who lived not long after this time, emphatically notes, that they were left few in number, their Land laid waste, sifty of their strongest Munitions utterly razed, and Nine hundred eighty five of their Chief, and most populous Towns sackt, and confumed by Fire. Hadrian after this strange desolation, by Publick Decree ratified by the Senates confent, prohibited any 7ew to come within the view of Judæa. Before this overthrow they had manifest figns foreshowing their Defolation. Solomon's Sepulchre, which they held in greatest honour, faith Dio, a little before this War fell afunder of its own accord; Wolves and Hyenaes howled throughout their streets, and devoured them in the Fields. Such Jews as Hadrian took Captive, he banished into Spain his own Countrey (this was their Tenth Captivity, faith John * Vafaus) where they had their Synagogues, till the time of * chron. Hiff. Ferdinand and Isabel, and Emanuel King of Portugal.

42. The State of the Jews from this time until the expiration of the Roman Empire cannot cafily be gathered from any Roman Writers, who feldom youchfafe the fews or Christians any mention, unless inforced thereto by some famous War or Mutiny, or by some other event redounding to the Roman glory. Judga after this time was not famous for any tumult till the ruin of Romes greatness; the Jews wanted strength, and the Christians willing minds to procure the Emperor's glory by Seditions. Hereupon whatfoever calamity either of them fuffered by the Romans, was passed over by Roman Writers, as private wrongs not worthy registring in their Annals. Upon this account 'tis no wonder they took no notice of our Saviour, or his Acts, all tending to Peace and Loyalty. For as Tacitus notes, Judæa was most quiet in Tiberius his time, which was the best news the Romans cared to hear thence. Yet the general estate of the Jews between Hadrian's and Honorius's time, as * one observes, may be gathered out of the reverend Fathers of the Primitive Church; who usually stopped the mouths of Heathens, or blashhemous Atheists, by propoling their condition, then known * Dr. Jackes unto all the World, for such as our Saviour had forefold it. "Thus much of the partial upon the condition of the parti Jews until the feries of time and affairs reduce us to them.

Hadrian's Character.

43. Hadrian, if we look at his natural disposition, was as it were compounded of vice and virtue, yet so as he seemed to have the command of them, and may be reckoned amongst good Princes. He was much addicted to studies, and well feen in most of the liberal Arts; here was his fault, that he defired to comprehend all, and did not referve himself for the most worthy, being one of the most curious men that ever lived. And in him that Saying was fufficiently demonstrated, Non est curiosus quin idem sit malevolus. For he was so envious that he mortally hated all better Scholars than himself, and consequently the greatest Professors in all Sciences; but such as were unable for their Profession he would difmiss with great rewards, as was said. He killed Apollodorus the Architect for shewing him fomething freely the Errors in his Buildings. One of his Præfects was Similis, who as Dio writeth, getting leave to retire, and live quietly in the Countrey his last seven years, commanded this Inscription to be set on his Tomb: Here lieth Similis, whose life confisted of many (or fixty seven) years, yet he lived but feven. His cruelty toward his latter end we may in charity impute to his per-vifiness contracted by the Dropsie, with which he was fore vexed in every part. In his time the Church was under fome Persecution; for Xistus Bishop of Rome was Crowned with Martyrdom in the tenth year of his Reign, on the eighth of the Ides of April, to whom succeeded Telesphorus, according to Damasus; but this was rather from the malice of others, and the wicked custom then on foot, than out of his inclination. Being something satisfied with the Apologies of Quadratus and Ariftides, two learned Men, he wrote a Letter to Minutius Fundanus Proconful of Afia, which Justin Martyr hath exemplified in his fecond Apology, and from him as it feemeth, Eufebius in his History, after this manner:

44. The Emperor Caefar Ælius Adrianus to Minucius Fundanus. I received a Letter from Screnius Granianus, that right worthy man thy Prædecessor, the occasion whereof I cannot with filence pass by, lest thereby men be troubled, and a gap left open to the malice of Sycophants. Wherefore if your Provincials can prove ought against the Christians whereof they charge them, and justifie it at the Bar, let them proceed, and not impeach them only for the name with making outcries against them. For it is very expedient that if any be disposed to accuse, the accusation be throughly known of you and fifted. Therefore if any accuse the Christians that they transgress the Laws, see that you judge, and punish according to the quality of the offence; But in plain terms, if any upon spite or malice in way of cavillation complain against them, see that by all means you chastife and punish him according to his malice. 45. Antoninus succeeded his Adoptive Father Hadrian, and was Sirnamed Pius. Concerning the reason of this Sirname, some fetch it from his Piety to his Father-in-Law, whom Hadrian feeing him to lead when old and weak, into the Senate, and to fustain him with his Arm, was so taken with him, that thence he was moved to adopt him, as the Senate was to give him this Sirname. But others derived it from his pious and grateful Memory of his Adoptive Father, to whom he not only built a Monument refembling a Castle, at least a Tower, as Procopius describes it; but presently after his Death, when the Senate was much incenfed against him by reason of his cruelty shewed to several Members thereof. and refused to canonize him for a Divus, or give him, as they worded it, divine Honours, he with much pains obtained it of them: Besides this, he made him a Sepulchre at Puteoli, ordained Games every fifth year, with Flamines and Sodales, and many other things in honour of him as a Demy-God. Some thought him fo called because he saved such as Hadrian in his Extremity commanded to be killed; others, because he would not suffer him to kill himself, and others derive the Sirname from his own innate Goodness and Clemency of his Nature. He is called by Capitolinus, who wrote his Life, T. Aurelius Fulvius Boionius Antoninus Pius, deriving his Pedigree by the Father's fide, from Gallia Transalpina, and the City Nemausus, or Nimes. His Grandfather was Titus Aurelius Fulvius, who through various Honours, arrived at the fecond Confulship, and the Præfectship of the City: his Father Aurelius Fulvius who also was Conful, a temperate and honest Man. His Mothers Mother was Boionia Procilla, his Mother Arria Fadilla, and her Father Arrius Antoninus, who was twice Conful, a Person by the Historian termed Sanctus, who told Nerva in the Senate, That he pitied him for being Emperor. This his Grandson was born in September, when Domitian the twelfth time was Conful, together with Cornelius Dolabella. 46. While he was a private man, he most commonly lived in the Countrey,

For he overcame the Britains by Lollius Orbicus, raifing another Wall made of Turffs, after the removing of the Barbarians: he compelled the Moors to defire Peace: by his Legatiand Præfidents he also reduced the Germans, Daci, Jews, and other Nations which rebelled. Moreover he repressed Rebellions in Achaia and Ægypt, and restrained the Alani, who often attempted to stir. The Imperial Height and Dignity he brought to the greatest Civility. Being Emperor, he bore so much respect to the Senate, as when he was a private Man, he defired should be given to him by the Prince. He ordained nothing concerning the Provinces or other Matters, without the advice of his Friends, and according to their Opnions composed his forms. 47. Confication of Estates in his time was more rare than ever, for though feveral were found guilty of Treason, yet one Person was only proscribed for affelling the Sovereignty, Attilius Tatianus, and that by Decree of the Senate, and yet he would not have him forced to reveal his Complices, and he was ever ready to help his Son in all things. Prifcianus also perished who was guilty of the same Crime, but he killed himself, and he forbad the Conspiracy to be inquired into. His manner of living was fuch, as there was opulency without reprehenfion, parfimony without fordidness, and his Table was furnished by his own Servants, Fowlers, Fishers, and Hunters. The Accounts of the Provinces, and the Revenue he understood very well. His private Patrimony he gave to his Daughter: but the Profits of it (but for some time surely) to the Commonwealth. He fold things belonging to the Emperor which were superfluous, and often lived on his own Lands, neither made he any Expeditions, but only travelled to his own Estate, and into Campania, saying, That The Train and Attendance of a Prime, although too sparing, was burthensom to the Provincials; and yet was he of great Authority amongst all Nations; for he refided in the City, that, as in the middle, he might with more speed receive Messages from all quarters. He gave a Congiary to the People, and a Donative to the Soldiers. Besides many works of his own, and the repairing of others, heaffifted many Cities with Money, either to raise new Fabricks, or restore the old; nay, he would help the Magistrates and the Senators of Rome in the discharge of their Functions.

48. He refused to be left Heir by fuch as had Sons. To a good Judge hegave no Succeffor fo long as he lived, except to Orphitus Præfest of the City, at his own defire. For Gnavius Maximus, the Præfestus Prætorio arrived at his Twentieth year under him; a most severe Man, to whom Tatius Maximus succeeded, in whose Place, when dead, he substituted two Prefects, Fabius Repentinus, and Cornelius Victorinus; of whom Repentinus was libelled, as if he came to the place by means of the Prince his Concubine. The fcarcity of Wine, Oyl, and Wheat by health of the ringe in Concading the fupplied out of his own Treasury, by buying them up, and giving them gratis to the People. For, in his time there was a Famine, the Cirque fell down, and Earthquakes happened, which over-turn'd fome Towns of Afra and Rhodes; all which he wonderfully restored: There was also a Fire at Rome, which confumed Three hundred and forty Islands, or Houses, as our Historian explains himself, for the Houses were Insular, made at distance one from another. King Pharasmenes came to him to Rome, and paid him more respect than to Hadrian. He made Patorns King of the Lazi. He drew back the Parthian King from invading the Armenians, only by his Letters. He took up Controversies betwixt Kings. The King of Parthia, who defired to have back the Royal Chair taken by Trajan, he denied. He reliored Rimithalces to the Kingdom of Bolphorus, having heard the Controversie betwixt him and the Curator. He fent aid into Pontus to the Olbiopolitæ against the Tauroscythe, whom he compelled to give them Hostages. Now Casaubon tells us, that the Olbiopolitæ were Greeks, at least mixt with Greeks; the Tauroscythæ were Barbarians, either Scythians or Goths, ealled also Getes. The Senate decreed, that the Months of September and October should be called the one Antoninus after him, and the other Faustinus, after his dearly beloved Wife Faustina; (who died in the third year of his Reign and was made a Diva by the Senate, with a Temple, and other things suitable to that Heathenish Honour) but he resused it. But the Marriage of his Daughter Faustina to M. Antoninus, he so highly folemnized, as to give a Donative to the Soldiers. 49. His Præfects he both inriched and honoured with Confular Ornaments.

To Pardon he was most prone. He conversed with his Friends as a private man, living with them in the time of Vintage. He used his Freedmen very feverely. To Rhetoricians and Philosophers throughout the Provinces How Learned he gave both Honours and Salaries; though other Writers afcribe this, to Hadrian who went before, and Marcus who followed after him. He enacted many things, and made use of these Lawyers, Vinidius Verus, Salvius Valens, Volusius Metianus, Ulpius Marcellus, and Jabolenus. All Seditions he repressed, not by Cruelty, but by Modesty and Gravity. He forbad the Dead to be Buried within Cities. He dated the Charges of the Shows of Gladiators. The Curfus Publicus, or Curfus Vehicularius with great diligence he made less burthensom. Of all things he did; he gave an account in the Senate, and by Edid's. He deceased in the Seventieth year of his Age, and yer he was milfed as if he had been a young Man. He contracted his Dileafe by eating Cheele at Supper, which Vomiting in the Night, the next day he was feized by a Fever. The next day after finding himself very ill, he recommended the Commonwealth and his Daughter to M. Antoniuns, his Præsects, or Officers being present, and commanded the Golden Fortune which was wont to be fet in the Bed Chamber of the Emperor to be carried to him. The Tribune according to the Custom coming for the Watchword, he gave him Equanimity, and fo turning himself as to sleep, he died at Lorium. When in his Fever he was delirous, he talked nothing but concerning the Commonwealth, and the Kings with whom he wasangry. His private Estate he left to his Daughter, and Legacies to all his Relations. He was comely and tall of Stature, and when he was old, because he was weak, was swadled with small pieces of wood, to make him go upright. In his old Age, before any came to fabite him, he was wont to eat dry Bread to strengthen his Spirits. He was called Divus by the Senate, every one striving to pay him this respect, commending his Piety, Clemency, Ingenuity, Sanctimony; and all other Honours they gave him which were wont to be conferred on the best Princes. Capitolinus tells us, he deserved a Flamen, Circensian Games, a Temple, and those they termed How Honour Antoniani Sodales, being almost of all Princes the only man that lived, so far as now nonounced himself, without civil and hostile Blood, and who might justly be compared with Numa, whose Felicity, Piety, Security and Ceremonies he always obtained. So much writes Capitolinus concerning this Prince, but whereas he faith he died in his Seventeenth year, Casaubon saith it is most false; for if we reckon from the twelfth Confulfhip of Domitian, wherein he was born, we shall find, he tells us, Seventy and four. 50. Others write, That this Emperor, for the Victories obtained here in this Island, had the Sirname of Britannicus, who as * Pausanias telleth us, fined the * m Areadisis Brigantes part of their grounds, because they had fallen with War upon the Genunii, the Allies of the Roman People. And at this time faith Cambden, as we collect out of Jabolenus, Seius Saturnius was Archigubernus of the Navy in Britain. But whether by this title he was an Admiral of the faid Navy, or a principal Pilot, or the Master of a Ship, I would have the Lawyers to tell. Antoninus ruled with fuch care, moderation, and humanity, that he was called another Numa, all things flourishing in calmness and tranquility. He repaired several Cities that had been overturned with Earthquakes, in which and other respects Pausanias giveth him large commendations. He was excellently learned; a fubtil and deep Philosopher. He was rendered favourable to Chriftianity by the Apologies of Julin Martyr, and the supplications of others in behalf of the faithful in Ana, which were grieved with all forts of contumelies practifed against them by their Provincials. He graciously sent a constitution in their behalf unto the body of Afia, which was read at Ephefus in the audience of this great Assembly, and yet is preserved to our fight in the end of Justin Martyr his second Apology, and by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, according to this tenour. The Emperor Cafar, Titus Ælius Adrianus Antoninus, Augustus Pius, Pontifex Maximus, fifteen times enjoying the power of Tribune, four times Consul (not thrice, as it is corruptly written in Eusebius) Father of the Country, to the People of Asia, Health. I know the gods are careful to disclose hurtful persons. For they punish such as will not worship them, more grievously than you do those whom you bring in trouble, confirming that opinion which they have of you to be wicked and ungodly men. It's their defire in Gods quarrel, rather to die than live. So that they become conquerors, yielding their lives unto the death, rather than to obey Edicis. It shall feem very necessary to admonish you of the Earth-His Edict in quakes, which have and do happen amongst us, that being therewith moved, you may behalf of the Christians compare our estate with theirs. They have more confidence to Godward than you have, you during the time of your ignorance despise other gods, contemn the Religion of the immortal God, banish the Christians which worship him, and persecute them unto the death. In the behalf of these men many of the Principal President's have written heretofore unto our Father of famous memory, whom he answered in writing again, that they were not to be longer molested, unless they had practifed treason against the Roman Empire. And many have informed us of the same matter, whom we answered as our Father did before us. If any therefore hereafter be found thus bussed in other mens affairs, we command that the accused be absolute and free, though he be found such an one, I mean as faulty, and that the accuser be grievously punished. That this Edict was proclaimed at Ephefus in the hearing of the great Assembly of Asia, witness is Meliton (faith Eusebius) Bishop of Sardis (who flourished at that time) in his profitable Apology for our Doctrine, delivered unto the Emperor Verus: But Antoninus died on the Nones of March, after he had reigned Twenty two years, seven months, and Twenty fix days, in the first year of the 235 Olyms piad, the 914 of the City, A.D. 161. In his time flourished besides many excellent Lawyers, and Justin the Christian Philosopher (the Son of Priscus Bacchius; and born in Flavia, a new City of Palastine, as he faith himself) Polycarpus Bishop of Smyrna, Galen that excellent Physitian, and Elian Writer of the Natural and Various Histories.

In the fifth of Pius died Hyginus, on the third of the Ides of January, and Pius succeeded him, when Sex. Erucius Clarus and Cn. Claudius Severus, as Damasus Damasus, will have it, were Confuls; which if it be true, the See was vacant four years. In the thirteenth of Pius died Pius the Bishop, on the fifth of the Ides of July, and and his feat being vacant fourteen days, Anicetus the eleventh succeeded him on the twenty fifth of July, the first feria. Hereticks.

52. After the Bishops and Fathers of the Church, it's convenient to continue the feries of Hereticks formerly laid down, to distinguish the Tarcs from the Corn. About the year 110, (a) Thebulis was the first Heretick (a) Enfel 14. in the Church of Jerusalem. It's faid, that he fell from the Faith because they 6.22. would not chuse him Bishop after Simeon. About the same time were certain Hereticks called Ophitæ, who worshipped a Serpent, and thought that the Serpent which deceived Adam and Eve was Christ: they kept a living Serpent, which with opening of the cheft and charming of the Priest came forth, licked the pripher berty Bread upon the Altar, and wrapped it fell about it. Their manner was to 371 kiss the bread, and so to eat, believing verily that the Serpent had confecrated it. They defended themselves, saying, That the Nicolaitans and Gnosticks delivered August Lide has them this service. About the same time there were certain Jews, which believing in Christ called themselves Nazaræi of Nazareth. In consessing Jesus Christ to be Epiphan, berest the Son of God they contraried the Jews. But they erred in Christian Religion, 24in that they addicted themselves wholly to the whole Law. There were other He- 1dtm barref 38; reticks which honoured Cain, and took him for their Father, whence they were Aug. called Caini. They highly esteemed of Esau, Corab, Dathan, and Abiram, with the Sodomites. They called Judas the Traitor their Coufin, honoured him for betraying of Christ, affirming that he forefaw how great a benefit it would bring to Mankind. They read a certain Gospel written, as they faid, by Judas: they reviled the Law, and denied the Refurrection. There were others called Sethiani, who derived their Pedigree from Seth the fon of Adam, whom they honoured. and called Christ and Jesus; they held that in the beginning of the World he was called Seth, but in the latter days Christ Jesus. Epiphanius saith, that he dif-puted with some of them in Ægypt, and that the last of them were in his time. Cerdon the Heretick came from Syria to Rome, when Hyginus was Bishop there. He taught that God preached by the Law and Prophets, was not the Father of our zate Lord Jesus Christ. He said, that Christ was known, the Father of Christ unknown. He denied the Refurrection, and the Old Testament; he held other things with Epiphan. Early the Manichies; and Marcion was his Scholar.

53. In the time of Hyginus, Valentinus the Heretick came to Rome, lived under Pius, and continued till Anicetus. He taught 1. That Christ brought his slesh with him from Heaven, and took no flesh of the blessed Virgin, but passed restallish code through her as water through a Conduict-pipe. 2. That there are two beginnings tra Valentinis of all things, Profundum, i. c. the Deep; and Silentium, i.e. Silence: thele being and. Epiphen. herse married together, had iffue Understanding and Truth, which brought forth Three hundred Aona or Ages, and of these were the Devil and others born, who made Philogrins.

the World. In the Reign of Antoninus Pius, Marcion also the Heretick began to teach, living in the time of Justin Martyr, who wrote against him. He was Native of Pontus, first a Stoick, then a Christian; he followed Bastides, Cerdon, and Valentinus, in their Herefies. Meeting Polycarpus, he faid, Knowest thou us? Polycarp answered, I know thee for the first born of Satan. Epiphanius writeth, that be-Essis. 1.4. ing a Bishop's Son, when he had defloured a Virgin, he was by his own Father [11, 14. excommunicated, and afterwards flying to Rome, because they there admitted him 42. not into the Church, he began to Preach detestable Doctrine. He taught, that Thispipil. there were three beginnings, Good, Just, and Evil: that the New Testament was Journal. contrary to the Old. He denied the Refurrection. He baptized fuch as died with-Irenans 1. 3. out Baptism, faying, that Paul bad him do so. He taught that Marriage was un- 14 and lawful, and that it was a great Sin to Marry. That Cain, the Sodomites, and all wicked men were faved, because they met Christ when he descended into Hell, but the Patriarchs and Prophets are still in Hell, for not meeting Christ; for they thought (faid he) that Christ came to tempt them. Under Anicetus also came to Rome Marcellina, a woman which infected many with the Herefie of Carpocrates, who called himself 20051166. She is faid to have kept and offered incense to the Statucs and Pictures of Christ (which the Gnosticks said, had been made by command of Pilate) as also to others of St. Paul.

54. About the nineteenth year of Antoninus Pius, the beginning also of Montanus his Herefie is placed by Epiphanius; but from Eusebius, Cappellus would gather, that the original of it was fitteen years before, because the Historian writerh, that Apollinaris wrote against Miltiades and Montanus the Hereticks, under the Haref. 48. Proconfulfhip of Gratus, who feemeth the fame with him, whose Consulthip is by Cassiodorus cast into the fourth of Pius. He thinks therefore, that in the nineteenth year fome new thing might be attempted by Montanus; as he might this year institute his Prophetelles. These were his two Country-women, Priscilla and Maximilla, born at Pepuza a City of Phrygia, upon which account he called Hierusalem by that name. Cappellus further observeth, that of such things as are attributed to Montanus, fome were truly his, fome after his death were added by the Montanists, and some falfely ascribed to them. Montanus really held, that the Promise of sending the Holy Ghost was deserred till his time, and in himself sulfilled, because the Church heretosore could not bear the yoak of more severe and holy Discipline, which he indeavoured to bring in, by appointing the eating of dried meats, fasting, and Monogamy, or fingle Marriage. The Montanists, after their number was increased, did those things which Hierome mentioneth, viz. they appointed themselves Patriarchs, two Cenonæ, which word seemeth of Phrygian Original, and three Bishops. That is falfly imputed to them, which Ferome faith Ad Marcelland others did attribute, but he would not believe, viz. that they pricked an Infant, and tom 3.49.9. with his blood made up the Eucharift. If this opinion may be attributed to any Hæresie, or if this prejudice did not arise from the imputation of this kind of cruelty by the Heathen to Christianity it felf, the Carpocratians rather than the Montanists were guilty of it. But because both forts were called Gnosticks (as swelling with an opinion of knowledg) what was acted but by one, might eafily be attributed to the other. So because Montanus, as full of the Holy Ghost, called upon men in the name of the Father, he was believed to confound the Persons of the Trinity into one, which was the invention of the Sabellians a hundred years after. 'Tis further faid of him, that he baptized the dead, and not allowing of fecond Marriages, permitted Married Persons to be separated when they themfelves would. That he took away repentance, affirming, that Sinners could never have their Sins pardoned by repentance. And that the Apostles and Prophets understood not any thing they had written, but were Arreptivii. Now to return

55. Marcus Antoninus, the Successor of Antoninus Pius, a Man who lived as or Antonimus Plus, a Man who lived as a Philosopher all his life, and who in Sanchity excelled all Princes in the Opinion Plus, of Capitolinus, was the Son of Annius Verus, who died in his Prætorship, and Grandson of Annius Verus, who was both Conful and Præfett of the City, and brought in amongst the Patricians by Vespasian and Titus, the Censors. He was born at Rome in the Gardens on Mount Cælius, the Six and twentieth of April, his Grandfather being the fecond time Conful with Augur, and was thought to derive his Pedigree from Numa. At first he had the Name of Catilius Severus, his Great Grandfather by the Mother's fide. After the Death of his Father, he was called by Hadrian Annius Verissimus, to express the veracity of his Nature, and was Adopted and Educated by his Grandfather on the Father's fide, being called Annius Verus, after he had taken the Gown of a Man. He was grave from his first Infancy. And as foon as he was taken from Nurses, was delivered to great Masters to be taught Philosophy, whom he much respected. He had those that His Gratitude taught him Musick, Geometry, Grammar, and Rhetorick, both Greek and Latine; amongst whom, he chiefly respected Fronto a Latine Orator, to whom he desired in the Senate 2 Statue to be erected; and Proculus, who instructed him in Latin Grammar, was so dear to him, that he promoted him to the Proconsulship, taking the Burthens thereof upon himself. Even while yet a Boy, he vehemently studied Philosophy. When twelve years old he took the Habit of a Philosopher, and with it the Patient enduring of all things, infomuch that he studied in the Pallium, and lay on the ground, his Mother hardly prevailing to have him make Use of a Couch foread with Skins. When he was made Partaker of the Imperial Dignity, yet would he go to hear Apollonius the Chalcedonian a Stoick Philosopher. He heard Sextus of Chæronea the Nephew of Plutarch, and others, Stoicks; and Most prizeth of Peripateticks Claudius Severus; but especially Junius Rusticus, a Stoick, he revered and chiefly followed, being very able for Civil Affairs and Matters of War as well as most Skilful in the Stoick Discipline. With him he communicated all his Publick and Private Councils, whom he would kifs even in the presence of the Præfetti Prætorio, whom he honoured with a fecond Confulship, and after his Death required of the Senate that he should have Statues. So great Honour he gave to those that taught him, that he kept their Images of Gold in his Lararium or Houshold Chappel, and always graced their Sepulchres with Porches, Sacrifices and Flowers. Belides what is mentioned, he studied the Law, and in such labours took fuch pains, that he disordered thereby his Body; and in this alone was

Places in the State, he inriched other ways. 56. For studying the Law, the Historian tells us, That he had L. Volusius Macianus for his Master. This is that Macianus whom he formerly named as Councellor to Antoninus Pius, who in the Treatife written by this Marcus concerning him/elf, and often in the Pandects, is falfely called Marcianus. Being a most Learned man, he composed many Books, as Sixteen De Fideicommissis, Fourteen De Publicis Judiciis, a Book in Greek upon the Rhodian Law, and which must especially be mentioned, another De Affe, or Distribution of an Inheritance, which Cujacius formerly caused to be bound up with the Code of Theodofius, and not long fince pide Mencel-Fredericus Gronovius published at the end of his Learned Commentary De Sester. un is American Commentary De Sester. the Distribution now mentioned. 57. Marcus took his toga Virilis in the Fifteenth year of his Age, and then was the Daughter of L. Ceionius Commodus; by the order of Hadrian contracted to him. Not long after he was made Prefett for the Latine Feria, and in that place carried himself very discreetly. He granted all his Fathers Patrimony to his Sister, faying, when his Mother called him to a Division, That he was content with his Grandfather's Estate, and that she, if she pleased, might give his Sister hers too, that she might not be inserior to her Husband. Notwithstanding his gravity, contracted by the study of Philosophy, he was so good natured, that he would be drawn to fee the huntings of the Theatre, and behold the Speltacula, and naturally he loved fuch Exercises. Though the study of Philosopy diverted him from all. yet not fo as to take away his Civility; for he was temperate without Contumacy, bashful without laziness; and without sadness grave. Being adopted by Antoninus, who had Married his Aunt, he was rather afraid than merry, and when his Domesticks wondred at it, and asked him the reason, he argued with them concerning the Inconveniences which attended the Sovereign Command. Then for Annius, he began to be called Aurelius, because of his passing into the Aurelian Family of the Antonini. Hadrian being dead, Antoninus resolved to have him for his Son in-Law, the Contract being diffolved betwixt his Daughter and Verus. who was not ripe enough for her, and he defigned him Quastor and Conful with himself. He conserred on him the Title of Cafar, with other Honours, and the Confulship the second time, when he himself bore it the fourth. After this, Marrying Faustina, Pius his Daughter, and having a Daughter by her, he was adorned with the Tribunitial Power, as also with the Proconsular, (which Augustus and his Successors took to themselves, though Antoninus Pius seems to be the first who used the Title of Proconsul) and the Privilege of making the fifth Report. being in fuch credit with Pius, that he would promote no man without him, neither would give car to any whifpers against him. For twenty and three years he so demeaned himself in this his Father's House, that the Old Man's love to him increased, neither in all that time did he lye from him above two Nights, at seve-

58. After the Death of Pius, being constrained by the Senate to take the Pub-He joys with lick Government upon him, he made his Brother L. Commodus Partner with him in the Empire; calling him Lucius Aurelius Verus Commodus; he gave him the Titles of Cafar and Augustus, and thenceforth they began to govern the Commonwealth with equal Right, and the Roman Empire to have two Emperors, upon which account they are in Law-Books known by the Names of Divi Fratres. He himself presently took the Name of Antoninus, and as the Father of L. Commodus called him Verus, and adding that also of Antoninus, betrothed to him his Daughter Lucilla, and upon this occasion, whereas Trajan had given Maintenance to certain Boys and Girls, whose liberality had been increased by Hadrian; and Pius, in Honor of Faustina, had given Alms to Girles, which from her had the Name of Faultiniana: now there were other both Boys and Girls taken in, and allowed Maintenance. Having dispatched what was to be done in the Senate, and in the Camp with the Soldiers, to whom they promifed Twenty thousand Nummi a piece, and to the rest proportionably (that is, as Casaubon notes, as much more to the Centurions, and treble to the Tribunes and Prafects of Ala) they buried their Father magnificently in the Tomb of Hadrian, and both of them commended him by Funeral Orations, conferring on him the usual Ceremonies of a Divus. After their possession of the Empire, they both carried themselves so civilly, that no man missed the lenity of Pius. Still did Marcus follow the study of his dear Philosophy, but received some disturbance therein by the rising of Tiber, which overflowed to fuch extremity, that it spoiled many Buildings, and other Things, drowned many Animals, and procured a most grievous Famine; all which mischiefs they moderated by their presence and care. The Parthian War also now broke out, which Vologejus had designed in the Reign of Pius, but now he declared by driving away Atidius Comelianus, who governed Syria. A War was also ready to break out here in Britain, and the Catti made Irruptions into Germany near the Rhine, and into Rhetia. Against the Britains was sent Calphurnius Agricola, and Aufidius Victorinus against the Catti. But against the Parthian by confent of the Senate was Verus himself sent, whom Marcus his Brother accompanied as far as Capua, and gave him a Train befitting his Person.

> 59. Verus being come into Syria, lived deliciously at Antioch, and Daphne, and exercised himself with the Arms of Gladiators and Hunting, carrying on the War against the Parthians by his Lieutenants; whereas Marcus was no hour free from business, and partly unwilling, partly content, bore with the voluptuous humour of his Brother. Statius Priscus prospered well in Armenia, taking the City Artawata, whereupon the Sirname of Armeniacus was given to both the Emperors, and Marcus refused it at first, though he took it afterward, as also that of Parthicus upon the ending of that War; and that of Pater Patriæ, he put off till the Return of his Brother. He ordained that all Citizens should within Thirty days enter their Children that were born at Rome, in the Registers of the Governors of the Ærarium of Saturn; and throughout the Provinces he brought up the Use of the Publick Tabularii (Slaves at present, though afterwards Freemen) who should do the fame there, as the Governors of the Ararium did at Rome, keeping the Publick Records; fo that if any one in the Province happened to be questioned concerning his Liberty (as whether he was not a Slave) thence he might bring proof, as also might any one concerning his Age. About the state of the Dead, whether they were free Persons, he forbad inquiry to be made after five years. No Prince ever shewed more respect to the Senate; when he could he was always present, though he had nothing to report, if he was at Rome; and if he had any thing to Communicate, he came out of Campania when he was there. And in other Affem Nihil vos mo-

He graften aimade the Senate to Judg of Appeals from the Consuls. He used singular Diligence mitted state. in Judicial Proceedings, and added Days of Judicature to the former, so as in all tain, at conscious

60. The Guardians which governed the Perfons and Estates of Children under Puberty, the Romans called Tutor's; and fuch as governed the Effates and Persons of those that were Puberes, but under Five and twenty years of Age, they called Curators. Now as for Curators, whiereas formerly they were not affigued for wantonnels or madnels, but by the Law called Lex Latorin, he decreed that all that were once Adult fhould receive Curators without rendring any cause why. This Len Latoria being also called Quinavicenaria, because the Legitimite Age of Twenty five by the setermined, contained, as Jacobus Gothoffedut hath Observed, cer. In 1.2. De Do tain He whereof this was the first, to provide Curator Ret Minors, that were this a it. as determined, contained, as Jacobus Gothofredus hath observed, cer. Int. 2. De Dowanton or Spendthrifts, and for those that were Distracted! The second ordained 22. that Minors or those under that Age, should not stipulate, or oblige themselves by making Bargains; whereupon it followed, that a Creditor who trufted one under that Age, should lose his Money, or that wherewith he trusted him. Further, Marcus had a care to lessen the Publick Charges. He set himself against Ca-

Marcus fers himself against lumnies, imposing a mark upon false Accusers. As for such Accusations as increased the Revenue, he despised them. For Publick Allowances, he invented many things. Heaffigned Curators out of the Senate to many Cities, that thereby he might extend the Senatorian Dignities; For not only Cities, but Regions and High-ways had their Curators, who took care of them. He provided for the Italian Cities in time of Famine, by Corn given them from Rome; being very careful that Grain should not be wanting. He qualified every way the Shows of the Gladiators, as also the Charges of the Stage Plays, commanding that the Players should receive but five Aurei, and that no Setter of them forth should exceed ten. Now for the Shows of the Gladiators, Cafanbon observes, that he qualified them three ways, especially; First, by diminishing the Expences of them. Then by commanding that they should be without Blood, at least when He was there, and without killing, their Swords being blunted, or so ordered that they could not deadly wound, as the Athletæ were wont to fight. And in the third place he took the Gladiators to ferve in the Wars, making Soldiers of them; contrary to the old Custom, whom he called Obsequentes, as Capitolinus also observes; which raised a Discourse amongst the People:

61. He took special care of the Ways both of the City, and of the Provinces. nal form of Go-He provided for Italy by giving it Juridici, according as Hadrian had commanded those of the Degree of Confulares, to administer Justice. Appian writes, That the Consulares continued not long after Hadrian's Death; and indeed the Jurisdiction in the Provinces' of Italy was in various Hands, formetimes administred by Consulares, sometimes by Juridici, sometimes by Correctors, and in the time of Constantine and afterwards, by Consulares again, who yet feem not to have been of the same Dignity with those in the time of Hadrian, to whom Capitolinus gives the Appellation of Consulares viri. The Historian farther writes. That Spain being exhaulted, he supplied it out of Italy, against the Command of Trajan; but he did it modeftly. As to this, we must know, that Italy being much unpeopled by the Civil Wars, Augustus replenished it with frequent Colonies, and from him the succeeding Princes took it for a Maxim of State, to be sparing in raifing Men out of Italy; which was fo constantly observed, that the Italians withdrew their minds from War, and applied them to Arts of Peace and Agriculture, as we shall see more in the second Volume of this Work. The Legions therefore being ever supplied with Soldiers out of the Provinces; and especially out of Spain, later Princes were wont to fill up the Towns that were fo exhaufled with Italian Colonies, which it feems Trajan forbad; but Marcus thought fit for all that todo it, but with much Modesty and Reverence to his Memory. Laws made by We are told further by Capitolinus, That Marcus added other Laws concerning the Twentieth part of Inheritances, already, and hereafter to be spoken of; concerning the Tutelage of Liberti; of the Estates of Mothers; of the Successions of Sons for the Mothers part, and that Foreign Senators should possess a fourth part in Italy. As for the Mothers Estate, Marcus introduced new Law, That Children should succeed their Mothers which died Intestate; and this he did by that which fometimes is called the Oration of D. Marcus, and fometimes the Senatulconfultum

Orphitianum, because it was made when Orphitus and Ruffus were Cothfuls, as

62. To the Curators of Regions and Ways he gave Power, either to punish, or fend to the Prafett of the City to be punished, such as exacted any thing from any man befides the Vettigalia. He rather restored Old Law, than introduced New. He had his Præfetts with him by the Authority and Præscripts of whom he di-Crated always his Laws. Especially he made Use of Scavola the Lawyer. This chiefest Advi- was Cervidius Scavola who flourished at this time, and in all his Answers used extraordinary Caution to accommodate Law to the condition and quality of the Fact, and therefore was wont to use this Clause, According as Matters are propounded. Modestinus reckons him amongst the Lawyers of the highest Form. But to return to our Historian, he adds, That Marcus treated the People no otherwise than it was wont to be used in the Commonwealth. He was in all things most Moderate, in deterring men from what was ill, in alluring them to goodness, in rewarding and indulging; and he made good of bad; and ot good, exceeding good; and bore with Moderation the Reproaches of fome Perions. He was of to compassionate a Nature, that upon occasion of the Fall of a Dancer on the Ropes, he commanded Mattrelles to be laid under them when they Danced; whence it came to pass, that in the time of Capitolinus, Nets were wont to be hung under the Ropes, to keep them from falling to the Ground. While the Par-His War with thian War was carrying on, another arose with the Marcomanni, which the Officers. the Marcoman upon the Borders for some time kept off, till the former could be made an end of.

This War of the Marcomanni struck them at Rome with so great terror, that he fent for Priests from every place (by reason of Sacrifices, Casaubon thinks) of which he procured fo great a Number, that he was jeered by the People upon that account; as in case he returned Victor, Oxen would fail and be all destroyed. He filled up strange Rites, he lustrated or purged Rome all manner of (Superstitious) ways; and being kept back from going to the War, he celebrated the Lestisternia, according to the Roman Rite, for sevendays. So great a Pestilence happened, that dead Bodies were carried out in common Carriages. Then were the most fevere Laws of the Antonini made, of Burying and Sepulchres; for they ordained, That every one that would should not build a Sepulchre, as faith the Historian, is observed at this very day; possibly not with much Cost and Labour.

He was so kind, that such as died poor, he commanded to be Buried at the Pub-

Justinian tells us in his Institutions, This year of their Consulthip was the Twentieth from that of the Consultano of Pl. Tertyllus, in which was made the Senatus-her Children, whereas by the Laws of the Twelve Tables, neither of these could be. Now this concerning the Succession of Children, is attributed to Marcus, because the Emperors were wont to fend their Epistles or Orations, as they are termed, to the Senate, concerning such or such a matter; which being reads the

Senatufconfulta passed, and thereby it came to pass, that the same things were ascribed both to the Orations and Senatusconsulta. At length the Emperors Va-lentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius called the Grandchildren asso succeed their Grandmothers; yet so as they should receive one third part less than their Fathers or Mothers should have received; but Jukinian made them; sequal in Right who succeeded to one dying Intestate. As for Senators have a fourth part of their Estates in Italy, there was something of it before, as appears from

Pliny Junior, who speaks of a third part; that They which stood for Honours might take Rome and Italy for their Country, and not like Strangers for an Inh

63. The Marcomanni and Victorali making great diffurbance, both Emperors Both Emperors undertake went out in their Coat-Armour; and time it was; for fuch Barbarians as were an Expedition driver out by others, except they were received, made also War. And this their against them. Expedition did not a little Good; for being come as far as Aquilcia where they purposed to Winter, most of the Kings retired with their People, and killed the Authors of the Infurrection. And the Quadi having loft their King, faid they would not confirm him that was chosen in his room, without the consent of the Emperors. But Lucius went unwillingly in this Expedition, most of the Mutineers fending and begging Pardon for their Defection; and when Furius Villorinus and Part of the Army was lost, he was of opinion that they should return home. On the other fide, Marcus imagining that the Barbarians did but Counterfeit, pretending to fly, that they might decline fo great a War as they faw was coming upon them, was for going forward and pushing on the Affair. Therefore paffing over the Alps they proceeded further, and fetled all Matters that tended to the Defence of Italy and Illyricum. Lucius however urged, that having fent Letters before to the Senate, he might return to Rome, and in the way as he was fitting with his Brother in the Chariot, he died of an Apoplexy. Capitolinus ascribes their Return to the desire Lucius had to be at Rome, it seems to enjoy the Pleasures of the City; but he urged it more after the loss of the Præfestus Prætorio, and part of the Army. But Galen who was fent for to Aquileia, gives another account of their Return, That it was by reason of the Plague mentioned by Capitolinus, which raged exceedingly both in Countrey and Army. It is written of Lucius, That he had always Learned and Eloquent Men about him, and that he loved his Matters, and was beloved of them. He demeaned himself toward Marcus his Benefactor with indifferent respect till his Expedition into Asia, but living Vide Capitalsthere in a Luxurious manner, after his return he carried himself with no great num in oite agreeableness, and gave himself up to all manner of Debaucheries, spending his time in continual Feafting, and other forts of voluptuousness, and ordering himfelf according to the Government of his debauched and infamous Freedmen. Some fuspected he died by Poison; but he lay Speechless three days, and being carried to Altinum died there. Marcus having made him Emperor with equal Power, gave him the Name of Verus, transferring upon him his own; whereas before, he was called Commodus. But Valefius observeth against Joseph Scaliger, that of in Aunat. these two Brothers who first of all governed the Roman Empire with equal Right, Amm. 1.344 him whom the Latine Writers name Marcus, the Greeks call Verus; and him whom the former call Verus, they ordinarily fignifie by the Name of Lucius.

64. But of fuch Sanctity was Marcus the Surviver, that he concealed what he could, and if he could not, excused the Vices of Verus, though they exceedingly displeased him; and being dead, he conferred on him the title of Divus, with the Honours usually given to such, and both honoured and provided for his Relations. Now Capitolinus tells us, That there is no Prince, but is flruck at by evil Tongues, infomuch that it was reported, That Marcus took Verus away either by Poisoning one side of his Knife, and giving him a piece of Meat which touched that fide, keeping to himself the other, or by the help of Polidippus his Physitian, who Let him Blood unseasonably. But Dion Cassius relates, that Verus laid in wait totake away the life of Marcus, and was himself taken off to prevent it: and not only Dion, but Philostratus also hints as much, as is observed by Salmafius, writing that Herodes was also suspected by Marcus, as being of the Conspiracy, and that Marcus made choice of some of his Athenians to bring Complaints to him of his Tyrannical carriage; and therefore Herodes complained that this he had got by having Lucius for his Guest. However, Marcus after the death of Verus, being delivered from the trouble of fo uneafie a Partner, with more freedom and vigour applied himself to the course of Virtue and Philosophy, being of the Stoick Proleffion, which he fo much was Mafter of, that he never changed his Countenance either for Joy or Sorrow; with great Moderation and Benignity ke governed the Provinces. He warred profeeroufly againft the Gar-mass. In particular he himfelf dispatched the War againft the Marcomanni in fuch a manner as had not been known, both in respect of Valour and Felicity, and at fuch a time when the Pestilence destroyed many Thousands both of the Provincials and the Soldiers. By this means he delivered the Pannonia's from the Marcomanni, Sarmatæ, Wandalls and Quadi, and returned to Rome, with his Son Commodus, whom he had made Cafar, and triumphed with him. Now in reference to this War with the Marcomanni, though Capitolinus relates feveral things betwixt the Death of Lucius, and it; as if Marcus had dispatched it some large time intervening, Salmafius blameth him for fo doing; especially for mentioning that Commodus did partake with his Father in his Triumph, before he fpeaks of the finishing of this War. For from Galen he observes that Lucius dying, Marcus returned to Rome with his Reliques, which being Buried, and he made a Divus; The War a- he presently undertook again the Expedition against the Marcomanni which had sains the Mar-been interrupted by his Death. This War was of extraordinary consequence, both in respect of the loss of the Romans, and the great things performed by Marcus; which if they of this time were to be believed, in an Inscription in a Stone erected to his Memory after his victorious return, advanced his glory above all the Performances of the greatest Emperors. But what these Performances were we know not. Ammianus Marcellinus toucheth at them; but the place of his Book is so corrupted, that though Casaubon and Salmasius both have indea-voured to amend it; yet Valefius complains of their ill Success, and plainly tells Lib.31.p. 445. us, That as Hippocrates forbids Remedies to be applied to those that are desperately Sick, so he is of opinion, that one ought to abitain from the desperate places

65. But this we know from Capitolinus, That having exhausted his Treasury in this War against the Marcomanni, and not being inclined to lay any extraordinary Impositions upon the People, he set to Sale in the Forum of Trajan, abundance of rich Furniture, Clothes, and Vessels of Gold, Silver and other precious Materials which belonged to the Imperial Houses. The Sale continued for two Months, and so much Gold he raised as to dispatch the remainders of the War according to his defire, and afterwards he gave leave to the Buyers, to bring in what they had bought, and to receive their Money again if they pleafed; neither did he trouble any that brought the things again, or refused to do it. But as we faid, fo great a shock he found coming upon him and the Empire, as put him upon very extraordinary Courses, especially a great Pestilence raging at the same time. This made him call Slaves to take Arms as had been practiced in the Punick War, whom he named Voluntarii, after the example of Volones. He armed also the Gladiators, whom as we said, he called Obsequentes. Nay, he made Soldiers of the Robbers of Dalmatia and Dardania. He armed also the Diocmitæ, or those that pursued Robbers, the Romans having such disposed in all quarters where the case required. He purchased the Affistance of Germans against Germans, besides the Legions, which he furnished out with all Diligence. For all Nations from the limit of Illyricum as far as Gall, had conspired, of whom Capitolinus reckons up Fifteen hard Names, befides the Marcomanni, whom Marcus overthrew in the Paifage of the Danube, and restored the Plunder they had taken from the Provincials. But so with his great labour he overcame most fierce Nations, the Soldiers imitating him, the Legati and Præfelli Prætorio leading the Army; and the Marcomanni vielded themselves to him, of whom he translated many into Italy. He always was wont with the Senators and Great Men to Confult, not only concerning Military but Civil Affairs, faying, That it was more fit that he should follow the advice of so many and such Friends, than that so many and such should follow his Will and Pleasure. Many Noble Persons were lost in the War, to all whom he Erected Statues in the Forum of Trajan. His Friends often perswaded him to defift from Wars, and return to Rome, but he refused to comply with them, and staid till he had finished all. So that to those that carped at him as by reason of his Philosophy, and being a Scholar, not pliable enough to the labours of War and Government, he might eafily answer by letters, or word of mouth, when as by his very Actions they were confuted.

66. Of the Provinces, some he changed from Proconsular to Consular, Me changeth 60. Of the Provinces, ionic he changed from Proconjular to Conjular, the way of the others if Conjular, he made Proconjular or Prætorian according to the Networks ceffity of War. This had been, and continued to be, the Cufform of all ceffity of War. This had been, and continued to be, the Custom of all Princes after Augustus, who taking to himself at the Division, the unquiet Provinces, made fome Confular by his Confular Legates fent into them, and gave the quiet to the People, fome of which were called Proconfular, because Confuls after the going out of their Offices during the Commonwealth, took the Provinces by lot, and then governed them as Proconfuls. Therefore the Emperors having the Power over the Armies, if Provinces happened to be unquiet, they took them from the People, and from being Proconfular, made them Confular, and in room of them gave them others, which then from Confular were changed to be Proconfular. And though at first, as Salmasius observes, in the Division of the Provinces, there were but two amongst those which fell to the share of the People that were Proconsular, and ten that were Prætorian, into which Prætors were fent, yet afterwards those Pratores and Pratorii were called Proconfuls, and governed them with Proconfular Authority; whereupon it happened, that so frequent mention is made of Proconfuls, who never had been Confuls indeed. Now as the People had for their Governors Proconfuls and Prætors, so the Prince had for his, Consulares and Prators, which were all properly called his Legati, but the Provinces were still styled Consular and Prætorian, and so Capitolinus is to be under-Many Nations stood in this place. But Marcus had need to make some Consular and Pratorian, and thereby to take care of them by what the Historian further tells us, that the Moors wasted almost all Spain, though by his Legati he restrained them; and that in Ægypt the Soldiers he calls Milites Bucolici did great mischief, till they were vanquished by Avidius Cassius. There was also disturbance amongst the Sequani > in Gall, which by featonable severity and his Authority he repressed. To his Son Commodus, having fent for him to the Limit of Germany, he prefented the Toga Virilis, thereupon gave a Congiary to the People, and defigned him Conful before the time. If any one was profcribed by the Frefett of the City, he did not willingly receive him. He was most sparing in giving away publick Mcney, (to his praise rather than reprehension) but yet he was bountiful to good Men, and to decaying Towns, and even remitted Tributes and Cultoms, though the Commonwealth itood in need of them. 67. When he was absent from the City, he took especial care that the publick

Shows and Divertilements should not be presented but by the richest fort of Men. When he took away the Gladiators to the Wars, there was a Talk went amongst the People, as if he would take away their Recreations, and compell them to apply them lives to Philosophy; for on the Market-Days, he had commanded that Pantominus should not act till it was late, lest Trade should be hindered. And a report there was, That as in all times there are many who for firains the Ex- Gain and Interest apply themselves to such courses as they find Princes to be in-travagance of clined to, so now there were many that under pretence of being Philosophers, percended the were burthen omto the State, and were trouble lom to private Men; possibly by Intruding themselves into their Houses, and requiring Meat and Drink, and other Conveniences, which if they could not obtain, they loaded them with Reproaches, carrying themselves big because of the Palliam they wore, and it might be without the Tunica, as they of the Cynical Seat were wont to go. But Capitolinus faith, That Marcus removed this Inconvenience, which poffibly, as to the Commonwealth, might have extended it felf to freedom from being Tutors and Guardians, and other Burthens in the State, to which true Philosophers might plead some Title. It was his custom to punish all forts of Crimes, more mildly than the Laws ordained, though fometimes against Perfons notoriously guilty, and of grievous Crimes he was inexorable. The Capital Causes of Men of Reputation he heard himself, and that with all fairness imaginable; insomuch that he reprehended a Prator who quickly dispatched Trials, and bad him hear them over again, faying, That the Dignity of the Persons was concerned that they should be heard by him who judged for the Pcople: The Fretors were wont to delegate their Jurisdiction to Decemberi or others, to take Cognizance of the Caules of Men of Note, which Marcus here his Mildness, reforms; truly affirming. That it concerned their Dignity that they should be judged by them who judged for the People. and not by fuch Delegates. But shewed himself mild and civil towards such Enemies as were taken; and of the subdued Nations, he planted an infinite number in the Roman Soil. To this Capitolinus subjoyns, that he extorted I hunder from Heaven by his Prayers against the Device of his Enemies, obtaining Rain for his Men when they were oppressed with thirs. But we are told by Christian Writers, that this was procured by the Soldiers of the Legion called Melitina, being Christians, who fell Christian Sol upon their knees in presence of their fellow Soldiers, and in the Name of vide Enfib. in Chritian son upon their knees in presence of their sellow somers, and in the realise of their business that the first personal Christ, so far prevailed with Almighty God, that presently abundance of Rain Corons & Historical Presents obtain Christ, so fell, and the Enemy was defeated by Thunder and Lightning. This Legion Tatal. Applicacy. was thence called Fulminatrix, or Thundering, and obtained by this an honourable Edict in behalf of the Christian Religion, although the Letters which go under Name of this Emperor in reference to this thing, be either counterfeit or interpolated. But what Capitolinus ascribes to the Prayers of the Emperor, that do Dio and Claudian to the Magi.

68. Marcus intended to have made Marcomannia and Sarmatia both Provinces; but that he was hindered by the Rebellion of Avidius Caffius, who to k upon him the Imperial title in the East, some said at the suggestion of Faustina the Empress, who despaired of her Husband's life, as others believed, because he thought he would perish, or had already, in the Marcomannian War, But Marcus was not much moved with the News of his Revolt, neither did he rage against his Relations; but he was declared an Enemy by the Senate, and his Estate was seised by the Publick Ærarium. Leaving then the pursuit of the War with the Marcomanni, he went against Cassius, and at Rome there were Tumults, out of fear that the Rebels would come thither in his Absence. But Cassus was presently Slain, and his Head brought to the Emperor, who commanded it to be Buried, not rejoycing at his Death. And Mecianus the Son of Cassius, to whose care Alexandria had been committed, was killed by the Army.

The Roman Empire. M. Antoninus Philosophus. Book IV.

But Marcus forbad the Senate to proceed against any in Extremity, that were confcious to the Defection; and he defired, That in his Reign no Senator might be put to Death, left thereby it should be polluted: Those that were Condemned to Islands, or Deportation he commanded also to be recalled, only a very few Centurions being put to Death. He pardoned the Cities that had fided with Caffins, nay, he forgave the Antiochians, who prated much against him in Caffins his behalf, from whom he had taken the Spectacula, publick Meetings, and all forts of publick Orations, and against whom he had lent a most heavy Edict. Though he had refused to see Antioch when he went into Syria, as he did Cyrrus, the place where Cassius was born; yet having been at Alexandria, he went thither. He transacted many things with Kings, and established Peace all the Kings and the Ambassadors of the Persian meeting him. He was most dear to all the Eastern Provinces, with many of which he left footsteps of his Philosophy, amongst the Egyptians in particular, he carried himself like a Citizen and a Philolopher in all their Temples and publick Places; and whereas they of Alexandria had wished well in several respects to Cassius, yet he pardoned them all, and to shew that he was reconciled, left one of his Daughters The Clemency with them. As for his carrying himself like a Philosopher, others write, that of Marcai. when he was there, he proposed his Questions to the Philosophers, and answered theirs, as it was the custom for Learned Men to meet in publick Places to confer concerning learned Points, and discuss Questions. But well might he pardon them for fiding with Caffins, when he bore a mind full of Clemency even to him and his Relations. He suffered him to be killed, that is, did not revenge his Death, but commanded it not. Heliodorus his Son was Banished into an Island, and others went away into fore Ban shment with part of their Eltates. Other Sons of Cassius received more than one half of their Father's Patrimony, and were affifted with Gold and Silver; moreover, were the Women with Ornaments. Nay, he grieved that Caffins was Slain, faying, That he would have had his Reign paffed over without the blood of a Senator.

69. In his Winter Quarters, at the foot of the Mountain Taurus, and a Vil-Wife Familina. lage called Halala, he leit Familina his Wife, who there died fuddenly; he had had her with him in Summer too, and had given her the Title of Mater Caftrorum. From Dio it appears, also from Coines, that after his Victory over the Quadi he was himself saluted the seventh time Imperator, and she by this Title of Mater Caltrorum; for Livia having that given her of Parens Patrie, afterward this flutery was drawn into Example. And it feems Marcus approved it. for Capitolinus tells us further, That having praised her, he defired of the Senate that they would decree her Honours and a Temple, and took it kindly that they made her a Diva; and that he instituted a New Company of Girls, called Faustiniana, in honour of her. He made the Village where she died, a Colony (called thence Fauftinopolis) and built her a Temple; and this he did, though the had the fame of an unchast Woman, of which he was either ignorant, or diffembled it. Indeed the was accounted unchafte, and Commodus was thought begotten by some other Man than Marcus, to whom Julian his Ape in his Tale of the Cafar's objects both his reckoning his Wife amongst the Heroina, and preferring so bad a Son; but he makes him excuse the first by Custom, and the second both by Custom, and the Natural Affection which Fathers (such it feems he thought him, however he did of himfelf) bear to their Sons. He makes him alleadge, That he was not the first that honoured his Wife. To have began such a thing would have been unreasonable, but to deprive ones nearest Reations of what is usual, would come nearest to Injustice. But to return to our Story , having settled the Affairs of the East, he came to Athens, and there was initiated in the Temple of Ceres, to prove himself Innocent, and above entered the Sacrarium. For it was the Cuftom for the Pagan Priefts when they celebrated their Mysteries, to command all that found not themselves Innocent, even as far as Purpofes and Intentions, to get them gone. And they were wont it feems, as Cafaubon observes from Lucian, to drive away three sorts of Persons, In Pseudomanti. Atheists, Christians, and Epicureans.

70. Returning into Italy, he came by Sea to Brundusium in a grievous Tempeft. There he took the Gown, and commanded his Soldiers to do the fame; neither ever under him were they seen to be without them (or Legati) in Italy. Having Triumphed at Rome, he made his Son Commodus his Colleague in the Tribunitial Power, gave a Congiary to the People, and presented them with Extraordinary

Extraordinary Shows. Many things then in the State he corrected. He moderated the Expence of the Shows of the Gladiators. That Saying of Plato was always in his mouth, That States would flourish if either Philosophers Reigned, or Princes would be Philosophers. He Married his Son to the Daughter of Brutius Prælens, Solemnized the Wedding no otherwise than as private Persons were wone to do, but gave a Congiary to the People. Having formerly fpent three years in the Wars against the Marcomanni, he undertook now another Expedition against these Northern Nations, and in it died at Sirmium. At the beginning of his Sickness, despairing it seems of Recovery, he advised his Son to stay and dispatch the remainders of the War, which he was unwilling to do, pretending fear of the raging Pestilence. He abstained from Meat and Drink, desiring to die, and increased his Disease. On the fixth day he called his Friends to him, and laughing at the things of this life, and contemning Death, he asked them why they wept for him, and did not rather think of the Pestulence and Common Death? and when they would be gone, he figh'd and faid, If you leave me, I bid you farewel, as going before you. The Army hearing he was Sick, grieved excessively, for they dearly loved him. On the seventh day he grew worse, and only admitted his Son; whom again he presently dismissed less the should catch the Difeafe. And yet we are told that in his Sickness he grieved that he should leave fuch a Son behind him, as should be pernicious to the Empire, and that he wished him dead. It feems his Natural Affection prevailed, as Julian makes him fpeak for himself. His Son being gone, he covered his head as going to sleep, but that Night he died; of the Plague it should appear, by what Capitolinus writes, of fending away his Son, left he should be infected; yet Dion faith, that he died not of that Epidemical Sickness. Being asked by his Friends, to whom he would commend his Son, He answered, to them, if he should deserve it, and to the Immortal Gods. Taing object- 71. As for his Faults, it was objected against him, That he promoted those that

edagainst him abused his Bed; namely, Tertullus, Villius, Orphitus, and Moderatus, to various Honours; and asfor Tertullus, he found him dining with his Wife, which the I vere gravity of the Court would not permit, and for this Indulgence he was jeered upon the Stage by a Mimick, and various talks being raifed, the People Lismed him for his Easiness. But he dreaded nothing more than to be accounted Covetous, which caused him by many Epistles to purge himself of this Vice. And yet he needed not have done it, if rath and centorious Persons, who think all men as bad as themselves, or would have them so; had considered that he did not enrich himself by the Estates of proscribed Persons, as bad Princes were wont to do; yet they took occasion to rail against him, possibly from a Law he first made, that the Lex Julia Majestatis should extend also to dead Persons. And he was very sparing in Largesses, and giving away the publick Money, which opened the mouths of those that were Indigent. But let what Dio writes be considered in his behalf, to stop the mouths of debauched Persons, who think none are virtuous, as impure Men and Women believe none are Chast. He tells us (as Xiphilin hath Epitomized him) that when he was at Athens, he there hired with Annual stipends, Professors of all forts to read for the benefit of all Nations. Being returned to Rome when he spake to the People, he used this Expression, That he had been absent many years, at which the People cried out Eight, and lift up their Hands to attest it, their meaning being that they were to receive so many Aurei to Feast with. At this he smiled, and said also Eight, and afterwards gave so many to every man, so great a Sum as they never had before received. This done, he forgave to all what was due to the Fiscus or Publick Ærarium withird

Forty and fix years, the Sixteen of Hadrian excepted, and all Bills and Obligations relating to them, he commanded to be Burnt in the Forum. To many Cities he gave Money, and in particular to Smyrna, which had been diffressed with a great Earthquake, and committed it to the Care of a Person of Senatorian Quality, who had been Prator, to fee it repaired. Wherefore, faith he, I wonder at those who reprehend Marcus, and deny that he was of a generous Mind. For though he was very frugal, yet he was never wanting to lay out Money when it was requifite, and in Exacting Money, he was never troublefom to any, and was at vail Expence in other things, though not in what related to his own Family. 72. But there were those also that gave out that he dissembled, and was not biffigulation. 72. But there were those and that gave on Verus. But Dion Cassiu on the conto plain and clear spirited as were Plus or Verus. But Dion Cassiu on the contrary affirms, That he did nothing by defign, but from the Prescript of Virtue, as appeared, in that though he lived Fifty and eight years, ten Months, and two and twenty Days, and was long a Prince with Antoninus his Father, and reigned him-Allo answered felf Nineteen Years and eleven Days; yet in all his life he was of an equal and constant tenor; neither ever in any thing was he changed. He was truly a good Man therefore, there being nothing feigned or counterfeit in him. To what Dio writes, we can more eafily affent, because in the Book he wrote concerning himfelf, containing his Philosophical Exercises and Meditations, he presses still this virtue of Truth, Candor, and Sincerity. But there was another thing still laid to his Charge, and that was. That he confirmed the Arrogancy of the Court, by Airogancy at removing his Friends from his common Society, and from his Feafts. Indeed he writes in that Book now mentioned, that amongst other things, he observed in, and learns from his Father, a Moderate condescending to other mens occasions, as an Lib. 1. c. 13. ordinary man (so Casaubonthe Son translates that word into English, which Casaubon the Father, faith is proper to Marcus) neither absolutely requiring of his Friends that they should wait upon him at ordinary Meals, nor that they should of necessity accompany him in his Journies. And this is thought by worthy Men to have been only his fault: He did not require Attendance at his private Repasts, both giving ease thereby to himself, and those who were to Eat with him. For Salmafius observes, that besides at Publick Feasts, there were those who were compelled to be present at this Prince his private Meats, because he could not well be without Company. And this Attendance Marcus remitted, as Galen writes of him, that he remitted him his Attendance, and following of him to the Ger- Kenselv of inman War, which he attributes to his kindness and love to Mankind, agreeable to The policy the other word which the Emperor uses in expressing his Fathers humanity. As he loved to be true himself, so, Capitolinus tells us, That he would not easily believe fuch as moved him in bufineffes, but always was long in fearching out the truth. Accordingly he himself tells us, That this also he observed in his Father, an Accurate Examination of things in Confultations, and patient hearing of others: that he would not hastily give over the fearch of the matter, as one easie

to be fatisfied with fudden Notions, and Apprehenfions. He fubjoyns his care

them with disdainful Neglect, and grow weary of them; nor yet at any time be much fond of them. 73. So good an Husband Marcus was, what wife foever Faustina proved; that the being dead, Fabia (the Sifter of Verus) indeavoured to succeed her in his Bed; but Capitalinus tells us at parting, that he took for his Concubine the Daughter of his Wives Procurator, left he should bring a Mother in-law upon so many Children. Thus was it usual we see for the Emperors to have Concubines, not only mention being made of this of Marcus, but also of the Concubine of Antoninus Pius. However his Wife Faultina deserved it, yet when he wrote that Golden Book of his Meditations still extant, it appears that he had a good opinion of her, for amongst other things which he ascribes to the Gods, as having received them Lib. 1. 6. 14. from them, this is one, That he had fuch a Wife, fo Obedient, fo Loving, foingenuous. These other things were, That he had good Grandfathers and Parents, a good Sifter, good Mafters, good Domesticks, loving Kinfmen almost all he had, and that he never through haft and rashness transgressed against any of them. That he was not long brought up by the Concubine of his father, and that he preserved the slower of his Youth. That he took not upon him to be a man before his time, but rather put it off longer than he needed. That he lived under the Government of his Lord and Father, who would take away from him all Pride and Vain-glory, and reduce him to that conceit and opinion, that it was not impossible for a Prince to live in the Court without a Troop of Guards and Followers, extraordinary Apparel; such and such Torches and Statues, and other like particulars of State and Magnificence; but that one might reduce and contract himself almost to the state of a private Man, and yet not become the more base and remiss in publick Matters and Affairs, wherein Power and Authority are requifite. But he had fuch a Brother, who, by his own Example, might flir him up to think of himfelf, and by his respect and love, delight and please him. That he had ingenuous Children, not born difforted, nor with any other Natural nor Bodily Infirmity. That he was no great Proficient in the Study of Rhetorick and Poetry, nor of other Faculties, which perchance he might have dwelt upon, if he had found himfelf to proceed in them with Success

74. Morcover, He accounts it a gift of the Gods, that he should have the Gratitude to prefer by times those by whom he was brought up, to fuch Places and Dignities as they feemed to him most to defire; and that he did not put them off with Hope and Expectation. That he ever knew Apollonius Rusticus, and Maximus. That he had occasion often and effectually to consider and meditate with himfelf concerning that life which is according to Nature; what the Nature and manner of it is. That his Body in fuch a life had been able to hold out fo long. That he never had to do with Benedicta and Theodotus, and afterwards when he fell into some fits of Love, was soon cured. That having been often displeased with Rusticus, he never did any thing to him for which atterwards he had reason to repent. That it being so, that his Mother was to die young, yet the lived with him all her later years. That as often as he had occasion to relieve any that were poor or faln into some present necessity, he never was anfwered by his Officers, that there was not ready Money enough to do it, and that he himself never had occasion to require the like succour from any others. That he had choice of fit and able Men, to whom he might commit the bringing up of his Children. That by Dreams he had received help, as for other things so in particular, how he might stay his Casting of Blood, and Cure his Dizziness. That when he first applied himself to Philosophy, he did not fall into the hands of some Sophists, nor spent his time either in reading the manifold Volumes of ordinary Philosophers, nor practifing himself in the Solution of Arguments and Fallacies, nor dwelt upon the Studies of the Meteors, and other Natural Curiofities. All these things, he saith, without the Assistance of the Gods and Fortune, could not have been. As for the three Persons he mentions here, he tells us also, for what he was beholding to them, all of them having Contributed to the forming of that excellent Virtuous life, whereby he was fo Exemplary; but amongst all the Persons he mentions to have assisted him, he seems chiefly obliged to Rusticus, by whose indeavours amongst other things; He first, he saith. the was chiefly entred into the apprehension that his life wanted some redress of Cure. This was a good step to the Cure, that he was convinced of his Want of it, and necessary to

amendment it was. That he should know himself to be out of order. 75. As a Direction to arrive at this amendment and recovery, he propounded to himself not to do any even of the least things without Relation unto the end : Lib. 2.6. Le and the end of reasonable Creatures he affirms to be this, to follow and obey him, who is the Reason, as it were, and the Law of this great City the World: Lib. 10. 6. 34 Or as he faith in another place, the Providence of Almighty God is the Law, who over-rules all things in the World, and of his infinite Wissom disperseth all parti-cular Events, to the general Good, and preservation of the Universe. That he might have no Letts or Rubbs in his way to this Recovery, he had a true Sense and Estimation of Sublumary things, and of Humane Affairs, though not to deride them; as Capitolinus writes. He was convinced of the Vanity of earthly Enjoyments, and thence came to know that the Happinels of a Man must be in something higher than in gratifying the sensual appetite. For he writes, That The time of Man's life is a point; the substance of it ever flowing, the sense obscure, Lib. 2.6.13; and the whole Composition of the Body tending to Corruption. His Soul is restless. Fortune uncertain, and Fame doubtful; to be brief, as a Current, (or Stream) fo are all things belonging to the Body; as a dream or smoak, so are all that (here) belong to the Soul. Our life is a Warfare, and a meer Pilgrimage. Fame after life is no better than Oblivion. What is it then that will adhere and follow? One only thing, Philosophy. And pity it was that he was not acquainted with the true and only Philosophy indeed, or the Christian, which would have afforded him both better directions and Helps for to attain doing of Good, and shunning of Evil, and that without Vain glory, the usual attendant or Shadow of Pagan virtue; as to which, however Marcus, by the goodness of his Temper or his Indeavours. might be affected, one who succeeded him both in the Empire, and in pretence to Philosophy, was guilty of it to a Prodigy.

76. But, to Lucius, rather than unto him, is to be imputed the fourth Persecution of Christian Religion, which in their time, raged throughout the Provinces. Herein suffered Polycarpy that famous Bishop of Smyrna, as is testified in the Epiftle written by his Church to the Brethren in Pontus. He was ordained Bishop by St. Folia, and other Apostles with whom he conversed, and his Scholar he was as Tertullian, Irenaus; and several of the Ancients do testifie, and had ferved Christ eighty six years; for he was elder by much than thus, as the most Reverend V/her* hath Evinced. He caused Meat to be set before those that ap-surva comprehended him, and with wonderful Alacrity and Resolution underwent his single pin by the Marryrdom by Fire, on the Seventh of the Calends of April, the Nineth year of frinking the Marryrdom by Fire, and the Seventh of the Calends of April, the Nineth year of frinking the Marryrdom by Fire, and the Marryrdom by this M. Aurelius Antoninus, and the CLXIX. of the ordinary Æra of Chrift, the lenau Esph fame wherein Lucius died, as some Inscriptions of Gruterus do testifie. Now fut 11 de 11.61. fered also Justin Martyr, after he had published his second Apology for Christians, through the Malice of Crescens the Cynick (whom railing against Christianity, he had taxed for his filthy kind of life) as he even foretelleth in his Apology. The Churches of Lugdunum and Vienna in Gall, were especially exercised in this Fiery Trial, as is to be feen in the History of Eufebius. Marcus doth infift upon nothing more in that Book of his new mentioned, than being fociable and ufeful in this World, which he calls a great City, and in contriving how to contribute to the Good of the Whole, which he makes the duty and end of every particular Member. Now the Whole confifts of Parts, an Universal of Individuals; and as to suppose an Universal without Individuals is a conceit, and an act of the Imagination, fo to contrive the Good of the Whole, without that of its feveral Parts is meer fancy; a less considerable part indeed is often in Policy cut off to preserve the Whole; but the Body of Christians was not in those days inconsiderable, which filled the Court, the City, and all the Provinces, fo that a Refolution would have been made to root it out (if it had been possible) and the greatest Persecutors finding still more and more to present themselves to Tortures, were constrained to give over, without hope of Success.

77. But however, as we faid, Marcus infifts in his Book upon nothing more than that the World is one Society, Commonwealth, and City, and that it's the Duty of every man to regard the Good of the Whole, and to be fociable. Now Aurelius Viltor writes, That in his time the Freedom of Rome was promifcuoufly given to all, or that all the Subjects of the Empire were made free Roman Citizens. Others promified circles Freedom of Write, That this was done by an Ordinance of Pius, and some ascribe it to Ha-tas Remana.

the City given drian; but though I put no stress upon it as an Argument, yet it something moves me to be of Opinion, That He might be the Author of this Indulgence. in that these sociable Thoughts so much possessed him; for it's known sufficiently that he squared his Life, and even his Actions relating to Government, by Rules and Principles of Philosophy; affirming, That then States or Cities (Civitates the Historian hath it, as he termed the World, and esteemed the Empire) would flourish, if Philosophers reigned, or Emperors turned Philosophers. Now for better understanding what this freedom of this City anciently was, we are to know, That it was wont to be given either with privilege of Suffrage or without. The first that had it without Suffrage, were the Cærites. We understand, saith Gellius, Lib. 16.cap. 1.5 that the Carites were first made Municipes without the Right of Suffrage : and that it was granted to them, that they should receive the honour of the Roman City, but be freed from business, and burthens, for that they received, and kept the Sacra (or Idols) in the Gallick war. Paterculus also telleth us, that in the Consulfhip of Sp. Posthumius and Veturius Calvinus, Campanis data est civitas partique Samnitium fine Suffragio, and in the same place, M. Curio & Rufino Cornelio Coss. Sabinis fine suffragio data civitas. What Municipium was, and who Municipes, is worthy of confideration. In the time of Gellius it appears from him that those words were much in Use, but nothing understood. For such as were of Colonies would call both themselves and their Countreymen Municipes, which, saith he, is far distant from reason and truth. Even so what Municipia are, and how much they differ from a Colony, we are ignorant, and we think that Colonies are in a better con-

> 78. Of this opinion fofull of error Hadrian the Emperor learnedly discoursed in his Oration, which he made in the Senate concerning the Italicenses, or Inhabitants of Italica in Spain, (as they were called) from whom he himself descended. He wondred that the Italicenses and other antient Municipia (amongst whom he named them of Otica) when they might live according to their own Customs and Laws, were tickled with a defire to be changed into the condition of Colonies. He faid that the Pranestines earnestly defired of Tiberius to be altered from the state of a Colony to that of a Municipium, and that the Emperor granted it, in confideration that under the Walls of their Town he had recovered from a deadly Disease. Municipes therefore (so Gellius concludeth) are Roman Citizens of the Municipia, using their own freedom and Laws, only partakers of honourable imployment (Muneru honorarii) with the Roman people, from undertaking which dition than they.

Chap. V. The Roman Empire. M. Antoninus Philosophus.

no other necessities, nor by any Law of the Roman People, for as much as their Land never belonged to it. Then proceedeth he to diffinguish in the matter of the Carites, betwixt such Municipes as had Right of suffrage, and not, for if there had been no fuch diffinction he would never have faid, The first Municipes we understand to have been made without Right of suffrage were Carities. For a more clear discovery of the relations of other places unto Rome, we shall observe this four-fold distinction of privileges. There was I Jus Civitatis, 2 Jus Municipii, forts of Privi-3 Jus Colonia, 4 Jus Latii. Jus Civitatis was freedom of the City, and we find 3 Jus Colonie, 4 Jus Latit. Ins civitatis was freedom of the City, and we find in Institute in Paterculus that it was cum suffragio of fine suffragio. Jus Municipii we find in Justice. Gellius to have also been freedom of the City; for Municipes were also called Ci-cipii. wes Romani, and were named Municipes, a muneribus capiendis, or capessendis; there was also, as appeareth from Gellius, Jus Municipii cum, & fine fuffragio, Jus Civitatis therefore & Jus Municipii feem to have differed little; the former was larger, respecting single persons sometimes absolutely considered without relation to any place that was related to Rome as a Municipium. For fingle persons (Ambassadors or others) have had the freedom of the City bestowed on them primarily without respect to any place at all, who perhaps could not be called Municipes, because such seem to have been proper, and only Freemen of Municipia, and not otherwise than mediately to have been free of Rome. The power or Right of fuffrage will not fuffer us to imagine that, because Gellius calleth the imployment of the Municipes, munus honor arium, therefore it was but titular. For by the Right of fuffrage they had power to affemble in the Comitia, and Vote in their Tribes, Centuries, and Curia, as the occasion required: and hence doubtless were capable of honourable Offices. And the word it self, though sometimes it may be expounded Titular, as the Confulers. Confulers, as they are called in *Confulers, their Office Confulers, as they are called in *Confulers, their Office Confulers, are * 1is.6. 11.50. termed Confuler Honorarii, being but Titular Confuler; yet it also respective than to-rity and power as well as meer Title, in that the Law of the Prator (whereof we have formerly spoken) is called Jus Honorarium.

79. As for the Tue Colonia, it is so termed by Tacitus also in those words: Atin Italia vetus oppidum Puteoli Jus Colonia & Cognomentum à Nerone adipiscuntur. Gellius distinguisheth it from the Jus Municipii, after this manner. But of Colonies there is another relation or alliance (necessitudo.) For they do come extrinsi Juscolonie cally into the City, neither do they stand on their own roots; but are as it were begotten by the State, and have Laws and Institutions, not of their own, but those of the Roman people. Tet this condition, although it be more obnoxious and less free, is accounted better and more excellent, for the amplitude and Majesty of the Roman people : whereof these Colonies seem to be certain Images and resemblances: and also be-cause the Rights of the Municipia are obscure and obliturated, which by reason of ignorance the owners cannot ufe. From this it appears, That Colonies were free of the Lib.1.c.14.15 City, in which respect Paterculus, giving us account of the several Colonies that were planted till the time of Marius, mixeth with them fuch places as to which freedom was given, making it as it were the same thing. If it had been otherwife, there would not have been any comparison as to privilege betwixt Manicipia and Colonies, and it would have faved Gellius the labour of proving, against the common belief, that the Jus Municipii was greater. Now as for co. 47: the Jus Latit, Suctonius diftinguisheth it from Jus Civitatis, for speaking what Augustus did to several Cities, he hath this expression amongst the rest: Latinitate vel civitate donavit. Spartianus in the life of Hadrian faith, Latium multis civitatibus dedit. And Tacitus (coming up to our Term) faith of Nero: Annal. 1.15 Eodem anno Calar nationes Alpium maritimarum in Jus Latii transtulit. The Jus Latif. Latines were ever counted of the kindred of Rome, the Romans having descended from them; and upon this account there was a stricter League and Alliance with them, than any other people, which injoyed not the freedom of the City.

80. The Latines envying the riling fortune of Rome their Colony; laboured to suppress it, but still were worsted, and ever forced to submit. Servius Tullius the fixth King of Rome breathing after glory in future times, in imitation of the Council of the Amphyetiones in Greece, and other publick conventions (as we have formerly faid) perswaded both Nations to build at Rome a Temple or Asslum out of the common expence, where the Cities meeting yearly, Should fa Diony, Hallicrifice, hold a fair at certain times, and if any contention hapned amongst them, it care libes,

Chap. V.

mans and La-

might be composed in a religious manner by their fellow Cities. Gathering Money he built the Temple of Diana in the Aventine Mount (the most eminent in the City) and wrote down the conditions of the League, with the manner of obferving the Feast and Mart. And that they might not be abolished by the injury of Time, he ingraved the Decrees of the Council in a Pillar of Brais; and the Cities which were partakers of this Society, which Pillar continueth till our Age, faith Dionysius, dedicated in the Temple of Diana, inscribed with such Characters as Greece anciently used, which is no light Argument that Rome was not built by Barbarians. Tarquinius the last King, and Successor of Servius, renewed this League, and taking in the Hernisi and Volfei, appointed another place in the midft of all those Nations, viz. a Mount near to the Albanians, called also Mons Albanus, where yearly Feria (or a Festival) were to be celebrated, and for that time, in respect of the Religion of the place, and the Law made for that purpose, they were all to abstain from all manner of violence, and, in common, facrifice to Jupiter Latialis, and Feaft together; it being appointed how much each people should contribute and receive. Of these Feria, and this Sacrifice were partakers forty feven people, and in our age, faith the Historian, the Romans observe these Feria (called Feria Latina) and some contribute Lambs, some Cheese, some a certain quantity of Milk, and others Cakes or Wafers made up with Milk. The Sacrifice is one Bull for all. of whose inwards a certain portion is given to every people. They sacrifice for all in general, and the Romans preside at the Sacrifice. Those Ferie at first consisted but of one day, which Tarquinius appointed. After his Banishment the people added another. And argumms appointed. After its Daminited the people anded another. And about fix years after, when Peage was compole between Patritians and Plebeians, after the Creation of the pribani Plebis, and Ædiles, a third was added, at what time the League was a new dwith the Laines, because that after the Peace made with them at mind of the War with Tarquinius (whose part they took) they had continued peaceable and faithful to the Romans during their confusions and leditions.

81. * Dionyfius mentioning the Renewing of this League, giveth us the fub-*Lib 6. flance of it, by which description our design is accomplished as to the Jus Latit. The Contents Thele things were contained in the League; Let there be mutual Peace betwint of the League, the Romans and Latines, as long as the Heavens and Earth keep the same Station; and let neither make War upon the other, nor procure others to do it, nor give free passage to such as would, but to the utmost help each other insested by War, and equally divide the Frey and Spoils. Concerning private Contracts, let the controversit be judiciarily decided in the Forum of that People where the Contract was made. Let nothing be added to the conditions of the League, nor taken away, without the confent of the Romans, and all the Latine People. To this purpole a League was established betwixt the parties, and fworn to by all facred things. This near confederacy is to be taken as explanatory of the Jus Latii, including such a strong Alliance as was not made with any, but afterwards according to this Prescript. In process of time the Latines came to have the freedom of the City. When this freedom was given to them, is something obscure. Dionysius so relateth the Story of Cassius (in whose second Consulthip, according to him, this League was > when he would have in his third Consulship the Agrarian to pass, he caused the Latines and Hernici to be present at the Comitia, to carry it by the greater Number of voices. But if any such thing were, it was done rather by his overforwardness to gratifie them, and without the confent of the State, as those Privileges were which he bestowed upon the Hernici. However, it appeareth that they had not the freedom till this time; for Caffins in his flattering speech Dionys. I. 8. to the multitude, concerning the excellent acts performed by them in his three Consulships, faith, That in his third the sedition being appealed, the Commons were reduced home; the Latines Kinimen of the Romans, but emulators for Glory and Empire, were received into friendship, and into the City, that afterwards they might efteem Rome as their Country, and not as an Adversary. Though formerly there was a League with them, yet it feemeth they were not received into the City till now, and that rather by Cassius his flattery, so that neither they nor the Herniti retained this privilege, and we do not find that renewed) as if at the same time was given to them the freedom of the City; for Cassius, to curry favour with the Hernisi, gave them the same league, and they were admitted into any Tribe, or gave thenceforth their suffrages in the Comitia. This confirmeth what we fay, That * Florus declareth the cause of * L. I. C. 14 their Revolt afterwards, to have been an emulation for Empire and Magistrates. and that contemning the Romans after the burning of the City, they required Jus civitatis amongst other things.

82. This they did not now obtain, being subdued and reduced by War to obedience, and punished several ways. However the ancient League seemeth to have been renewed; at least with most of them; who were still called Socia nominis Latini. Often the Jus Civitatis was promifed them, but still deferred and but off by the Fathers, who alone knew the Secret of Empire, till at length they broke out into the Social War, and yet then were they subdued again, and brought under by force, and then was given to them conquered, what they could not obtain by firong hand. After this, the hedge being broken down from about the Roman State, and through the variety of the interests of Roman Citizens parties and factions arising, Freedom came to be given to other places, one after another, though when, to whom, and by whom, we now must not inquire. Augustus was very sparing in the grant thereof; but succeeding Princes spread this privilege far and wide, till at length Antoninus Philosophus communicated it to the whole body of the Empire, it being now nothing material, feeing that the multitude met not together in the Comitia, to give their suffrages, which had by variety of Interests, humours and inclinations confounded all things. But to return to our Matter. Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Philosophus died when he had reigned Nineteen years, on the Seventeenth of March, in the Fifty eighth year of his Age, the Nine hundred thirty third of the City. A. D. CLXXX, Arrius Prasens the second time, and Ælius Gordianus being Consuls.

Commodus his Son(for whose sake Dio maketh the Physicians to have killed him) Horodianus I.z. fucceeded him, having two years before been made a Conful, through a Difpen an. 4. fation with the Lex Annaria, as Lampridius writeth, although it feemeth forme. V. 6. 932-thing strange, that this Law could take place upon those, to whom the title of A. D. 1802 Augustus was not denied. Being owned by the Army, for some time he governed according to the direction of his Father's friends; but being obnoxious to flatterers by reason of his youth, who sought to make their own ends out of him, he shortly after, contrary to the judgment of his best Counsellors, made a dishonourable Peace with the Enemy, and away he went to enjoy the pleasures of Rome. where he was joyfully received for his Father's fake; his Beauty also much commending him to the eye. For a time he here also harkned to his Father's friends. but making one Perennius an old Soldier Captain of his Guards, he being exceffively covetous, allured him at first by pleasures to idleness and neglect of business, then governing all himself, he falsely accused them and others of the richer fort, that he might feize on their Estates. This his design was furthered by Lucilla the Emperor's Sister, who grudging that Crispina, Commodus his wife, should take place of her, entered into a Conspiracy against her Brother, and ingaged one Quadratus a His difficulties young Noble man therein; who perfwaded Quintianus to kill Commodus. But he meeting him, had no power to do the deed, only shewing the Dagger, faid, The Senate Jends thee this, and so was apprehended and put to Death with his Complices. These words concerning the Senate thus foolishly spoken, never went out of the Emperor's mind, but made him suspect all the Fathers, which advantage Perennius took, and perswaded him to kill all the chiefest of them. This being performed, this man affected the Sovereignty, but was in good time discovered, > volt, and received their reward. 84. Commodus, to prevent the too great power of one man, put two into his place, Cleander and Niger, for the time to come; and yet presently after had more Plots laid for his life. There was one Maternus, who practifing the Trade of Robbery, got a great company of Highway men together, and making himself Captain of a considerable Army, wasted Gall and Spain, and thence repelled, resolved to venture for the Sovereignty it self. Having but little hope to obtain it by force, because of the People, and the Pratorian Bands, he betook him to his wits. At that time the Annual folemnity was kept in honour of the Mother of their gods, wherein it was lawful for Soldiers or any other to imitate Magistrates or their Officers. Taking this opportunity, he sent some of his Soldiers privily armed to get amongst the Sergeants and Officers of the Emperor, and so to kill him; but being betrayed by his own Party, he and his Plot both miscarried. After this succeeded a terrible Pestilence, accompanied with a Famine, which Cleander a Phrygian, one who from a Slave came into greatest Power, made an occasion to advance himself. He bought up all the Corn, thinking by a largess thereof to purchase the Empire of the Soldiers and People, but these rising against him, as the cause of the Dearth and Plague too, after that with great difficulty, by reason of his Power, the Matter was revealed to Commodus, he also received his reward. These things caused the Emperor to be jealous of all men, to cast off all care of State-affairs, and giving ear to every back-biter, to kill any Hence also no persons of worth being admitted into his presence, he was ruled by dissolute Companions, and fell more and more into diforder.

85. He turned Chariot driver, and spent his time in killing Beasts with darts, Iden ibid. and other unworthy exercises. He was the best marks man that ever was known, Orofine Lyante. fearcely ever missing any mark he aimed at. He publickly killed multitudes of wild beafts upon the Theatre, amongst the rest a Panther, which just being about to devour a man, he hit and flew in the nick of time, as she was about to seize on him. In flead of Commodus the Son of Marcus, he commanded himself to be called Hercules the Son of Jupiter. Casting off the usual Robe of Princes, incompliance with that name, he would lye on a Lions Skin, and have a Club in his hand; yet he would wear Purple Garments and Cloth of Gold. To his former title he added Amazonian, and Conqueror; Rome he flyled Immortal and Fortunate, and the World His Colony. A great fire happened in the City, which burned that excellent Library gathered by his Predecessors, with the Temple of Peace, and other Buildings, which accident as the People accounted an ill Omen, fo they laid the guilt upon him, knowing well his Practices, which he never strove to conccai. Though his throwing of Darts upon the Theatre much derogated from the Imperial Majesty, they were indifferently pleased with it; but when he came Naked upon the Stage and acted the Common Fencer, it feemed intolerable. At length at the Feast of Janus resolving not to proceed from his Palace as Emperor, but as Fencer from the Fencing-School, attended with fuch like to the view of the People, this occasioned his

86. For, this his refolution being known to his Friends, Martia his beloved Concubine, Lætus his General, and Elettus his Chamberlain, laboured with all introatics to divert him from fo shameful a thing. He herewith extreamly difpleased, betook himself to his Chamber, where in a roll he wrote down the Names of fach as he would have killed, and amongst them those three in that order we mention them had the first places; then followed a great number of Senators, the Goods of whom he intended to distribute amongst the Fencers and Soldiers, to purchase mirth and jollity from them, and desence from these. This writing he land upon his Bed, where he did not suspect that any would come at it. But a little Boy with whom he was wontto play, coming thither, took it up, and went out with it in his hand, whom Martia meeting, and taking up in her arms, fearing it might be fomething of consequence, read it, and thereby distovered Lige Hored, whi the matter, which she presently imparted to the other two. They all conclud- lograing that hafte was to be made, Martia gave him Poifon, and when that fucceeded Entrop. 1.8. not, they hired one Narciffus to strangle him. So Commodus died, who by his one Lieutenants overthrew the Moors and Dacians, and bridled Pannonia, Germany, and Aurel. Vittor. Britain, which would have thrown off the yoak. He died on the last day of the Julian year; the Thirty fecond of his Age, when he had Reigned almost Thirteen years. A.V.C. 945. 87. The Compirators did not make known his death, till they had made means for a Successor; and then gave out that he died of an Apoplexy, which was easily believed, because of his voluptuous life. He upon whom they pitched was Hel Hardian L 2. vius Pertinax, an old Soldier, who had done good Service in Britain, where he was near killing by his Soldiers, but feverely corrected their infolence. He had been thrice Conful, yet being thus delivered from the danger he was in by Commodus, confidering the meanness of his Birth, he would have declined the burthen, but it was put upon him by the Senate, and the Army acknowledged him. He gave great hopes of an excellent Prince, behaving himfelf modeftly and fuitably towards all men. He restrained Promoters, took away divers Tolls and Olymp.242. 42. 88. Now, that we may briefly carry on the feries of Ecclefiastical matters, whence we left them. In the fecond year of M. Aurelius Philosophus died Anicetusthe Bishop of Rome, and Soter being the 13th of this See succeeded him, according to Damasus In his 1cth year Soter died, & was succeeded by Elzutherius. In the 6th of Commodus died Eleutherius, on the Seventh before the Calends of June, Maternus and Bradua being Confuls, in which year Commodus and Cleander to overturn the Power of the Confulfhip created Twenty five Confuls, for which Cleander was afterwards punished, being carried to Rome amongst the worst fort of Slaves. In the following year Eleutherius was succeeded by Victor an African, Commodus the filth time, and Glabrio being Confuls. Touching the purity of the Church of Rome at this time Egestopus thus wrote. (a) When I came to Rome I stayed there till Anicctus was (a) Ensished? chosen Bishop, whose Deacon was Eleutherius, whom Soter succeeded, and after him lib 4.cap.22. Eleutherius. In all their successions, and in every one of their Cities it's no otherwise than the Law and the Prophets, and the Lord himself preached. Irenaus allo wrote: Now (1) Eleutherius was the Twelfth Bishop from the Apostles, after the same order, cap. 6. the same Doctrine and Tradition of the Apollle's truely taught in the Church, at this day continued in our time. From Marcus the first Bulhop of Jerusalem from amongst the Gentiles, some reckon Thirteen Bishops unto Narcissus, of whom are many things reported. He (c) was accused of an heinous crime, and although (c) Idim lib 5. he was innocent, yet left he his Church, and fled into the Wilderneis, where he 6.8,9. continued a long time. In the mean while his Accusers were wonderfully plagued from above, to the example of all perjured persons. Councils.

89. During the Reign of Commodus were several Synodes or Councils held against the Herefie of Montanus, and about the Celebration of Easter. Because before this time Councils were but few, we would not give any account of them in a feattered manner; but now shall briefly recite from the first of all such as happened until the end of Commodus. The (a) Apollles immediately after the Ascension of our (a) Alls 1. Saviour returned from Mount Olivet to Jerusalem, and there assembled together for the election of one to succeed in the room of Judas the Traitor, where they chose Matthias. This is the first Council. The (b) second was summoned of the (b) Alls 61 Apostles and Disciples at Jerusalem, about removing the Tumult risent etwixt the Gracians and Hebrews about their Widows, wherein they chose seven Deacons, as they are called by Ecclefiastical Writers. The (c) third was held by the Apostles, (c) Atts 15. Elders, and Brethren at Jerusalem, concerning Circumcision and Observation of the Law, where it was resolved, That the faithful should abstain from blood, from that which is strangled, and from fornication, the which they published by their Letters unto the Churches of Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. The fourth was held (d) 471, 21. by James Bishop of Jerusalem, Paul, and the Elders at that City also, where for removing of Suspition, and winning of the Brethren, it was decreed, that Paul should clear and purific himself according to the Law, yielding for Some time to the Ceremonies of it. After the death of James, the Apoliles from eve- () Enfio. 1. 2. ry quarter (e) gathered themselves together at Jerusalem for the Election of a Bihop, and choic Simon Cleopas. In an affembly of the Apofles, certain Canons were agreed on, and published by Clemens, as 'tis said. But (f) those that now (f) contil. go for them, are corrupt, the corruption of the Apostolical constitutions, and of Ignatius his Epiftles having proceeded from the fame hand, as Reverend Usher sheweth in his Differtation concerning the faid Epiftles, who as to this matter is therein most worthy to be consulted. About the time of Nerva the Emperor were two (g) Synods furnmoned in Afia, for Reformation of the Churches, and Confectation (e) Hafith 1.3. of Bishops, where St. John the Apossle, being sent for, was present. About the be 6.32, ginning of Marcus Antoninus, was a Synod at (b). Ancyra in Galatia, where the cap 16. Bbbbbb 2

figments of Montanus were confuted by Apollinarius. And there were held in Aha fundry Synods in which Montanns was excommunicated, and his Herefie condemned. The brethren in (i) France also affembled together, and censured the (i) Lib.56.3. opinions of Montanus, writing to Eleutherius Bishop of Rome, thathe would maintain the Peace of the Church there against such Hereticks (k) Serapion also Bishop of (k) Lib 4.6.19 Antioch held a Synod there about the middle of Commodus his Reign, where together with many other Bishops he condemned the Montanists, or their Heresie called the Phrygian Herefie, because Montanus was of that Countrey. Not long after was held a Council at (1) Rome by Victor the Bishop, about the Celebration of Easter; (1) then 1. 5.

in Palæstine also, in Pontus and Gall were Synods called about the same matter. 90. This controversie about Easter, is mentioned by Eusebius not till the last year of the 243 Olympiad, which tell in with the fourth of Severus; but Cappellus thinketh it first arose in the first of the 2.42 Olympiad, and the tenth of Commodus, wherein this Feast was Celebrated by the Jews, and the Churches of Afia Minor, at a wrong time, as Theophilus Bishop of Casara thought, viz. by the Jews on the fifteenth of Nijan, March 20. but by the Christians of Asia on the fourteenth of Nijan, March 19. on the fourth Feria, three days before the Vernal Æquinox. Theophilus supposing that the Equinox happened on March the 25. and that so reds de nature it ever did; and for this cause that the Sun was on that day created, and that retum cap. 28 Christ arole again the same day, as also that the Lord's Supper was instituted on decorated and assessment of March 1981 the 22 of March, contended that it was utterly against reason to prevent the Epoche of the Æquinox so many days, and the day whereon the Lord's Supper was instituted. Wherefore he procured the Fathers of Palestine assembled in a Synod, to make these Canons: 1. That never, except after March 21. 2. That mover but after the fourteenth Moon. 3. That nover after April 24. 4. That nover except on the Lord's Day, Easter should be celebrated; on that day which next followed the fourteenth Moon hapning next after March 21. Hereby he hoped it would come to pas, that Easter would ever be observed within the Month of Aries. In the Synode of Palastine where these Canons were made, the aforesaid Theophilus Bishop of Cafarea, and Narcissus of Jerusalem presided. Of that at Rome, Victor the Bishop was President. In that of Pontus, Palmas, as the most ancient, did govern. In that of the Bilhops of Gall, Irenaus prefided. There was another of the Bishops throughout Oftroena, and the Cities therein contained; and especially held by Bauchillus Bishop of Corinth, with many others; all which, faith Eufebius, with one and the same Sentence and Judgment ordained the same Decree. With those also consented Cassius Bishop of Tyre, and Clarus Bishop of Ptolemais. They affirmed that it was the Apostolick tradition and custom as yet retained, that the falting days should be broken up on no other day than that wherein our Saviour arose from the dead. And the Church of Alexandria celebrated Easter on the self-same day with them.

91. But all the Churches throughout Asia, as of an ancient Tradition thought good to observe the high-seast of Easter in the fourteenth Moon, on which day the Jews were commanded to offer their Paschal Lamb. As much as to say, That upon what day soever in the week that Moon fell, the fasting days were finished and ended. Polycrates of Ephefus, chief of these Bishops, in his Epistle to the Church of Rome, sheweth the custom of Asia observed unto his time, in these words : We observe the unviolated day of Easter, neither adding any thing thereto, neither taking any thing from it. For notable pillars of Christian Religion have rested in Mia, which shall arise at the last day when the Lord shall come home from Heaven with glory, and restore all the Saints to joy. Philip, one of the twelve Apoftles now lying at Hierapolis, and his two daughters, who kept themselves Virgins all the days of their lives, the third also after the end of her holy conversation rested at Ephelus. John also, who lay on the Lord's breast, and wore the Priestly Attire, both a Martyr and a Doctor flept at Ephefus. Moreover, Polycarpus Bifbop of Smyrna, and a Martyr. Thraseas an Eumenian, both a Bishop and a Martyr slept at Smyrna. What shall I speak of Sagaris, both a Bishop and a Martyr lying at Laodicea? Also of bleffed Papirius and Melito an Eunuch, who was led and guided in all things he did by the holy Ghost, and now resteth at Sardis, waiting the message from Heaven when he shall arise from the dead. All these celebrated the Feast of Easter, according to the Gospel, in the fourteenth Moon, Swerving no where, but observing the rule of faith. To be short, and I Polycrates the meanest of you all do retain the tradition of my forefathers, of which also I have imitated some. For there were seven Bishops before me, and I am the Eighth which always have celebrated the Feast of Easter on that day in which the people remove the leaven from amongst them. I therefore (my brethren) who now have lived fixty five years in the Lord, have conferred with the brethren throughout the World, and have read, and over-read the holy Scriptures, yet will not be moved at all with those things which are made to terrisse us. For my Ancestors and Elders have said, That we ought rather to obey God than men. Afterwards he speaketh of the Bishops that consented, and subscribed to his Epistle, after this manner: I could repeat the Bishops that were present, whom you requested me to affemble, whom also I have affembled together, whose names if I should write would grow unto a great number; they have visited me a simple Soul, and a man of small account, and have consented to this Letter. They also know that I bear not these gray hairs in vain, but always have bad my conversation in Christ Jefus.

92. Immediately upon this, Villor Bilhop of Rome went about to fever from the unity in the Communion all the Churches of Afia, together with the adjoyning Congregations, as favoring not aright, and inveyed against them in his Epiftles, and pronounced flatly all the Brethren there for excommunicated Persons. But this not pleafing all the Bishops, they exhorted him to seek after those things which concerned Peace, Unity, and Love between Frethren. Their words are at Villar Billoop this day extant (auth Eufebius) that sharply reprehended Villar. Of which numof Rom sharp ber Ireneus in the name of all the Brethren in Gall that were under his charge, by reprehend wrote, and sillowed the form Sections and The March Color of wrote, and allowed the same Sentence, viz. The Mystery of the resurrection of our Saviour to be celebrated on the Sunday only. Yet as it was very meet he put him in mind at large of his Duty, that he should not estrange, or cut off all the Churches of God, which retained the Tradition of old Custom. He told him, That there was not only a controversie about the day, but also the kind or manner of Fasting, that this variety began long before their time; yet for all this they were at Unity one with another, for this variety of fasting, faith he, commendeth the unity of Faith. He told him, That his Predecessors in the See of Rome; Anticetus, Dius, Hyginus, Telesphorus, and Xistus, neither did so observe it themselves. neither left any such Commandment unto Posterity, and yet they were at unity with them which reforted to them from other Churches, and did observe the fame. Polycarpus being at Rome in the time of Anicetus, they varied between themselves about trifling matters, yet were they soon reconciled, and not a word of this matter. Neither was Anicetus able to perswade Polycarpus that he should not retain that which he had always observed with John the Disciple of our Lord. and the rest of the Apostles with whom he had been conversant: fieither did Polycarpus perswade Anicetus toobserve it, but told him he ought to keep the Antient Custom of the Elders whom he succeeded. These things being at this point, they communicated one with another. And in the Church Anicetus granted the Eucharift unto Polycarpus (or as Ruffinus understandeth it, granted the Ministration of the Communion to him) for the reverence he owed him, and in the end they parted in peace; and all fuch as retained contrary observations throughout the whole universal Church held fast the bond of Love and Unity. Thus Irenaus, not degenerating from the Etymology of his name, and passing all others in the gift of reconciling the Brethren, practifed for Ecclefiastical Peace. He wrote not only to Victor, but also to fundry Governours of divers other Churches, in feveral Epistles concerning the faid Controversie.

93. Thus do we see the first controversies about this Feast of Easter. Although the Hypotheses of Theophilus concerning the Aquinottial will not abide tryal, yet doubtless, those had more reason on their fide, who intending to celebrate the Refurrection of Christ, refused to do it, but on that day he rose from the dead ! the other practice feeming to have rifen from a Custom of keeping the Passeover at that time, by such as were originally of the Jewish Nation. Notwithstanding they differed about time and manner, yet before the Government of Villor, we fee they agreed in Brotherly love. And it appeareth that the Custom of observing this Feast, was most ancient, even in the Apostles days, as appeareth from what is faid by Polycrates, and by Irenaus, in behalf of Polycarpus. Though they differed in the manner about keeping it, yet we do not find that any denied it was to be kept at all, although they were also for the true and spiritual observation of it, and against Abuses, as all good Christians have reason to be. But (that we may conclude this Controversie) in process of Time, both they of Asia, and others, leaving their own Customs, admitted of the Palchal Canons, made by the Orientals, especially by those of Palæstine and Alexandria. At length few DissenBook IV.

ters remaining, a necessity of Obedience was imposed by Constantine, who herein followed the Judgment of two Synods, viz. that of Arelatum or Arles, A.D. 314, and the other of Nice, A.D. 325. But (that we may note thus much by way of Anticipation) The ancient British Church, as it seemeth submitted, not to those Decrees, observing Easter from the fourteenth to the twentieth Moon, which computation, faith (a) Beda, is contained within the Circle of Eighty four years. (4) Eccliship. And for this, when they would not comply with Augustine the Monk (who had Angl. 1, 20.2). been fent from Gregory the Great Bishop of Rome to convert the Saxons, and was made by him the first Arch-Bishop of Canterbury) who sought to draw them to Uniformity, twelve hundred Monks of Bangor were put to the Sword (whether through procurement of Augustine or no, I shall not now determine) by King Ethelfrid, A.D. 603, the Scots also then inhabiting Ireland observed Easter at the same time as the Britans did, to whom therefore Laurentius the Successor of Augustine in the See of Canterbury wrote, to drive them from their fingularities. But how much he hereby profited, the present times do yet declare, saith (b) Beda, who (b) ubi sand lived A. D. 700.

94. And being thus occasionally brought to Britain, we must observe in be-When Britain half of our Native Country, that the thick mifts of Superfition being feattered, in the Reign of Commodus (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus, as Beda writeth) when Eleutherus was Bishop of Rome, the heavenly light and brightness of Chriflianity, by the means of King Lucius, shone upon this Island. This Prince admiring the holy life of Christians, made Petition unto Eleutherus by mediation of Elvan and Meduan, Britans, that both himfelf and his Subjects might be instructed in the Christian Religion. He sent forthwith Fugatius and Donaitanus, two holy Men, with Letters, which at this day, faith Cambden, be extant, and, as very many be perfwaded, not forged, but Authentical, as bearing date when L. Aurelius Commodus the second time, and Vespronius were Consuls. This Vespronius was Vespronius Candidus, whom Onuphrius and Baronius make the Collegue of Commodus in the first year of his Father's Reign, though an Inscription of Gruterus mentions Aurelius Verus; so that, to the very first beginning of Commodus, the Preaching of these Men is to be ascribed. These holy Men intructed the King and others in the mysteries of Christian Religion. Hereupon Ninnius writeth: King Lucius is sirnamed Lever Maur, that is, a Prince of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now fuch as call the Being of this King into question, for that they think there was at this time no King in Britain, which was wholly and fully reduced into a Province before; Cambden witheth to remember, That the Ro mans had by ancient Custom in their Provinces, Kings, as the Instruments of their Bondage, that the Britans even then refused to obey Commodus, and that they themselves possessed and held freely those Parts of the Island, which were beyond the aforeiaid wall, and had there Kings of their own, and that Antoninas Pius a few years before, having put an end to War, permitted Kingdoms to be ruled by their own Kings, and Provinces by their own Comites. He citeth Tertullian, who much about this time wrote, That those places among it the Britains which yielded the Romans no access, are now subdued unto Christ. Britain is inclosed within the compass of the Ocean. The Nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are befet by the Romans, for fear they might pass beyond the limits of their Countries. What should I speak of the Romans, who with barrifons of their Legions fortific their Empire? neither are they able to extend the power of their Dominion beyond these very Nations. But the Kingdom and Name of Christ reacheth further skill, it is believed in every place, and is worshipped of all those People above named, &c.

95. But our Ecclefiastical Writers (thus Cambden proceedeth) who have imployed both time and diligence in the confideration of this point, endeavour and Jabour to prove, and that out of ancient Fathers of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and Infancy of the Church, Britain had received Christian Religion: and namely, that Joseph of Arimathea, a Noble Senator, failed out of Gall into Britain, and that Claudia Rufina the Wife of Aulus Pudens (which woman, as is credibly thought, St. Paul nameth in his latter Epistle to Timothy) and whom the Poet Martial to highly commendeth, was a Britain born. They cite the testimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Bishop of Tyre, who in his Synopsis hath recorded, That Simon Zelotes having travelled through Mauritiana, was at last slain and buried in Britain, as also that Aristobulus, whom St. Paul mentioneth in his Epistle to the Romans, was made Bishop of Britain Britain (to which Nicephorus inclineth) notwithstanding he speaketh of Britiana, and not of Britania. They report likewife upon the authority of Simeon, that great Metaphrast, and of the Menology of the Greeks, that St. Peter came hither and great Metaphrait, and of the memory of the orders, that spread abroad the Light of God's Word: out of Sophronius also and Theodorer, that St. Paul after his fecond Imprisonment in Rome, visited this our Country. Where the football of this Poof them, it was in the football of this Poof them; it was in the football of this Poof them; it was in the football of this Poof them; it was in the football of this Poof them; it was in the football of this Poof them; it was in the football of the Poof them; it was in the football of the Poof them. upon * Venantius Fortunatus wrote of him, (except he speaketh of his Doctrine) if "Trassiti otc." he may be believed as a Poet. But to this purpose, saith our Author; maketh sit sinfia porespecially that which ere while I alleged out of Tertullian, as also that which pusque Bri-Origen recordeth, how, The Britains with one consent imbraced the Faith, and made tannus habit way themselves to God by means of the Druidæ, who did always beat upon this Article urras, quasque of Belief, That there is but one God. And verily of great moment is that with me, Which Gildas writeth, after he had mentioned the Rebellion of Boodicia, and treated of the revenge thereof. In the mean while, faith he, Christ that true Sun shining with his most glittering brightness upon the universal World, not from the temporal skie and firmament, but even from the highest cope of Heaven, exceeding all times, vouchfafed first his beams, that is to fay, his Precepts and Doctrine, in the time, as we know, of Tiberius Cæsar, unto this frozen Island full of ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the visible Sun. Chrysostome likewise, to note so much by the way, writeth of the Christian Religion in this Island as followeth. The British Islands seated without this Sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the power of the Word (for even there also be Churches founded, and Altars erected) of that Word I say, which is planted in the Souls, and now also in the Lips of all People. And the same Chrysostome in another place: How often have People in Britain fed of man's flesh: but now with fasting they refresh the Soul. Likewise St. Hierome: The Britain divided from our World, if he proceed in Religion, leaving the Western Parts. towards the Suns fetting, will feek Jerusalem, a City known to him by form only, and relation of Scriptures. 96. As for Hereticks which lived in the time with the forementioned Bilhops, and the Reigns of Marcus and Commodus: There were the Secundians, called fo from Secundus, who together with Epiphanes and Isidorus taught the same with Valentinus. In life they were beastly, all Women among them were common: they denied the Resurrection of the Flesh. Ptolomæus of whom were named the Ptolomai, taught the Heretical Opinions of the Gnosticks, and of Valentinus, ad Epiphon A ding thereunto of his own, certain Heathenish doctrines out of Homer. Marcus of but Eufli whom the Marcofiii, Colorbasus of whom the Colorbasti, and Heracleon of whom the Hereticks were called Heracleonites, facrificed with Witchcraft; to amaze their Auditory they pronounced Hebrew words. Many Women coming to Church, under colour of receiving the Power of Prophecy from them, confessed they were abused by them. Marcus ran away with another man's Wife. They poured oyl and water upon the head of the deceased, hoping so to redeem them. They said, that the life and generation of man confifted in seven Stars: that Christ suffered not indeed, and that there was no refurrection of the flesh. Alcibiades refraining the Use of God's Creatures, was reformed by Attalus the Martyr. Archonitici, Hereticks in Paleline, referred all things unto man's Powers. They faid, the Enth 15.65 Sabbath was the God of the Jews, and the Devil the Son of the Sabbath. (b) Tatia (b) Lacat nus the Scholar of Julin Martyr gave original to the Encratite, fo called from Continency. For they abhorred Marriage, forbad the Use of living Creatures, offered Water instead of Wine in the Sacrament, and denied that Adam was saved. Severus, of whom were named the Severians, added to the opinions of Tatianus, reviling Paul, rejecting his Epiftles, and the Acts of the Apostles. He said, That a Woman was of the Devil, that Man from the middle upwards was of God, and beneath of the Devil. Apelles, Pontinus, and other Marcionites; about this time also disturbed the Peace of the Church.

There were also certain Hereticks of Galatia and Cappadocta called Pepu triphan zians, as also Quintiliani and Priscilliani, because they said, that Christ in form areof a Woman being the Bed fellow of Quintilla or Prifeilla, revealed unto her Divine Niysteries. Women were Priests amongst them, and their facrifices were alike to the Montanists, of which Sect they seem to have been, seeing also his Prophetesses were of the Town Pepuza. Artotyritæ were Hereticks which offered Bread and Cheese in the Sacrament. Alogi denied Christ to be the Word, condemned John's Gospel, and said, that Cerinthus the Heretick wrote the Revelstions. CHAP. VI.

From the Death of Pertinax, and the exposing of the Empire to sale; the Death of Maximinus the first elected Emperor without Confent of the Senate; the space of 45 years.

THE Soldiers having murdered Pertinax, got them to their Camp, and fet the Empire to Sale, Proclaiming, That they would prefer Harodian.l.d. him that should offer most. Two there were found who bade Money for it: First Sulpicianus, a man of Consular Dignity, Governor of the City, and Father in Law to Pertinax, and Didius Julianus of the same Degree, a great Lawyer, and exceeding rich. The Soldiers being jealous left the former should have an intention to punish them for the Murther of Pertinax, accepted the offer of Julianus, who promifed what they would ask, having, as he faid, Didia Julia treasures of Silver and Gold. Being by a Ladder received up to the Wall, and man purchateth so into the Camp, he promised to restore the Honours and Statues of Commodus, to grant them what Liberty they enjoyed under that Prince, and to give them more than they could ask or expect; he was carried into the Palace, the people by the way curfing and upbraiding him with his purchase. Having thus invaded the Empire, he gave himself up to all Luxury, but being unable to perform his promise to the Soldiers, lost their favour, and fell into the contempt of all men. the People defiring another Prince. At this time Pescenninus Niger was Governor of Syria, who as well for the greamers of his Place (his Province containing all from Phanicia unto Euphrates) as for his Popularity, was most eminent: him did the People extol, and they implored his affistance.

He being glad of this opportunity, eafily perswaded his Soldiers to accept of him for their Emperor, and entertained Ambassadors which now had recourse to him as the lawful Prince. But then giving himself up to idleness, he neglected to settle and confirm his Estate by going to Rome, and (what was more) by drawing the Army in Illyricum to his fide.

> 2. At this time governed both the Pannoniaes L. Septimius Severus, an African born, a man forward and crafty, who feeing the Roman Empire thus obnoxious to every man's Catch, refolved to venture for it amongst the rest, especially in regard that of those two who had seized on it, the one was negligent and secure. the other hated and despised. Being also incouraged by some dreams, he first of all inveighed against the Prætorian Bandswhich had killed Pertinax, whom knowing to be much beloved by his Soldiers, he highly extolled him, and eafily perfwaded them to revenge his Death, who once was Lieutenant of the Forces in Illyricum. Then prefently (though he pretended he fought it not) was he faluted Emperor, and took upon him the name of Pertinax, which he knew was acceptable to all. After this he marched with great speed to Rome, the Italians (who ever fince the days of Augustus had not been used to War) receiving him in all places, and Julianus his Soldiers very flowly providing for refistance, though he had now distributed to them all the Money he could by any means compass. Severus conveyed his Soldiers in a difguifed manner into the City, which was full of them, privily armed, e're Julianus or the People were aware; whereupon Julianus, wrote to him, to fignifie he was willing to receive him, into participation of the Empire, and afterwards defired he might refign it. For the Senate feeing him to timorous, and the other now at hand, being called together according to the ancient Cuftom by the Confuls, decreed death to him, and the Empire to Severus ... Julianus held the Dignity leven Months, having purchased death at an exceffive rate.

Severas ob-

1/38 Severus having thus obtained the Empire, that he might not at first crack his credit by falfifying his word, got those Soldiers into his Power that had slain Restitus; and making them be strapped of their Military Cloaths, banished them a hundred Miles from the City. Then entring the Court, he promided great of the slain great of the Soldiers than got the Senate, professing his intention was to govern after the Prescript of the Senate, professing his intention was to govern after the Prescript of the Senate, professing his intention was to govern after the Prescript of the Senate, professing his intention was to govern after the Prescript of the Senate profession and the Senate pro Marcus, and not only to take the name, I ut also disposition of Pertinax, although v. c. 946. there were some who so well knew him, that they could not be deceived. After A. D. 193. this-he prepared for an Expedition against Niger, but fearing to leave an Æmulafor at his back, he endeavoured to prevent him. This was Clodius Albinus, who at this time governed Britain, was of Patrician rank, and had a strong Army at his Command. He flattered him with the title of Cafar, befeeching him, as the fittest person, to take care of the Empire, for that he himself grew old, and lais Children were Infants. Albinus overjoyed that he should obtain what he had defired, without any trouble, fooled himself in his vain confidence, especially for that Severus had written to the Senate in the fame strain, had ordered Money to be stamped with his Image, erested him some Statues, and did him Honour other-

Severus therefore directed not his course to-Horem. wards Byzantium, but marched for Cyzicus, where Amilianus General to Niger ne. met him, and either for that he was over-matched, or defirous to fave his Chil- Orofitm libit. dren (whom Severus, as also others of his Adversaries had got into his hands) be eq. 17trayed his truft, and loft his Army. Then did Severus invade Bithynia, wherein they of Nicomedia revolted to him; but the Inhabitants of Nice stuck close to Niger : thence he proceeded into Galatia, and so into Cappadocia to pass over Taurus. The passage was so fortified and defended, that no hope there was of breaking through, till abundance of Rain-waterfalling down from the Mountains broke down the Wall, whereupon the Defendants fled. Then 'came Niger with an Army very numerous, but not to be compared with the Legions of Illyricum for Skill and Valour, and they met at Iffus, where Darius was overthrown by Alexander. Here Niger had the same fortune in a great and bloody Battel, after which going back to Antioch, and being pursued by a Party of Horse, his Head was cut off, having brought himself to this end by his delay and idleness. Severus having thus removed him, now cast his Thoughts towards his friend in Britain. 5. He now consulted how he might secure the Empire to his Family, which could not be done as long as Albinus continuing Cafar had some title to it, and to whom in his absence the great ones had demonstrated their affections, as to a man of great Nobility, and far more worthy of the Sovereignty than he who at present possessed it . He therefore resolved to remove him out of the way. By open War he thought it not convenient to do it, and therefore at first attempted his Defign by Treachery fending fome, who under colour of bringing Letters, should make him away. Albinus having warning to beware of him, this fucceeded not. so that he betook himself to force, and with incredible expedition returned into the West. Albinus terrified at his hasty retreat, made all possible Provision for refistance, and passed over into Gual, where after many Skirmishes they joyned in a pitcht Battel near Lugdunum. Then returned Severus to Rome with all his Army, which to reward, he not only bestowed Money upon them, but also such Privileges, which though to him they might procure respect and service, yet proved the bane of the Commonwealth.

For the Soldiers having formerly through the loofness and neglect of some Emperors, contracted floth and covetouinels, were thence more animated to violate the Sovereignty, to depose, and set up whom they pleased. Now he adding more fuel to this flame increased their allowance of Corn, gave them license to wear Rings of Gold as Knights, and to Marry and maintain Wives, which broke in pieces the Reliques of the ancient Discipline, and effected, that we shall hear more of them upon very sad occasions.

6. He made another expedition into the East, to be revenged upon such as had affisted Niger. Piercing into Arabia he besieged Atra the Metropolis of the Atrevi, but found such entertainment as glad he was to retreat without any thing performed, and only by chance, as fome lay, faved his Reputation. For in his return being driven by Tempelts into Parihia, he was conftrained to Land near Cteliphon, the chief City where Artabanus the King then relided. Artabanus firuck with the fuddenness of the thing, fled amain, and Severise taking the City with case, got great Treasures, with multitudes of Caprives, and returned to Rome in a Triumphant manner, having more by good fortune than policy atchieved this Enterprize. When he had done these great things abroad, and (confidering the Princes by him defeated, and the wonderful Expedition he used at all times) had approached near unto the greatest Military glory of the most famous Captains, he lay idle at home, or, spending his time in judicial affairs, he let fall the vizard of goodness, which in the beginning he had put on. His extraordinary coverousness increased his innate cruelty, so that under pretence of taking off his Enemies, he put to death unheard forty three Perfons of chiefest Rank. In despite of the Senate, he Canonized Commodus for a God, cast Na:ciffus, who firangled him (as he had deserved) to the Lions, called himself his Brother, and to his Son Baffianus, whom he made Partner with him in the Empire, Early, Early he gave the Sirname of Antoninus. His cruelty was also extended to the Church, Hill, 16, 6, 14

Severus after the overthrow of Albinus, fent first Heraclianus to feize upon Britain, and to rule it: then Virius Lupus as Proprætor and Lieutenant (whom Ulpian the Lawyer calleth Prefident of Britain) who being wearied with the Inrodes and infolences of the Masta, fent for the Emperor himfelf over. He was glad of this occasion, not only for defire of glory, but also to draw away with him his two Sons from the City, where they gave up themselves to licentious riotting, and exercised irreconcileable enmity betwixt themselves. The Britains sent Ambassadors to him to beg Peace, but he detained them till he had made sufficient Provision for War, and then dismissed them without granting their requests. Leaving his Son Geta (whom at his arrival he also created Augustus) in the hithermost part of the Province (which continued in obedience) for the civil Jurisdiction and Administration of affairs there; he himself with Antoninus went into the further parts, where being busied in cutting down Woods, making Bridges, and drying up the Meers, he fought no Battel, but what with the Enemies Ambuscadoes, and with Sickness, lost Fifty thousand Men, according to Dio. Herodian writeth, That the Britans found him work enough, being able to retreat where the Romans could not follow by reason of the Fens, which the Natives eafily paffed, being naked, very nimble and skilful in the places, fo that by Ambufcadoes laid in the Caledonian Forest, and through the unwholfomness of the Meerish Grounds he lost many Thousands of his Men , but he forced them to Peace with delivery of a good part of their Countrey and their Arms. For these Victories he stamped certain pieces of Money with this Inscription, Victoria Britanica, affumed the Sirname of Britanicus Maximus, and his Son Geta was also Sirnamed Britanicus, as appeareth by his Coins, faith Cambden. But shortly after they revolted, whereupon he brake out into fuch a rage, that he gave his Soldiers charge to make a general Massacre of them all, and returning, though much tormented with the Gout, against them raifed a Wall a hundred and thirty miles in length crofs the Island, to separate betwixt the Barbarians and Romans, which Baffianus afterwards increased. When he had in some fort repressed the Rebels, he sickned, not so much out of any bodily Diftemper, as for grief, and forrow of mind, by reason of the desperate and unreclaimable demeanour of his Son Autoniaus, who once or twice A troubled State of the Commonwealth I found in every place, but I leave it in funeral fire, and honoured with a folemn Justing and Running at Tilt, performed by his Sons and Soldiers. He was also Canonized a god after the ordinary manner of the Apotheofis of the Roman Emperors, which being not formerly touched, it's convenient in this place to describe, as we have it from Herodian. A custom Lib 4. ad inifaith he, the Romans have to confecrate those Emperors that die, their Sons or Suc-time tessors surviving. And who soever are thus honoured, be canonized, and registred in the Roll of their Divi, or gods. During this Complement they hold a general mourning through the whole City, and the fame mixed with a festival Solemnity. For The manner the dead Body they Bury with a Sumptions Fineral, according to the manner of other doubte men. But they frame an Image of wax, refembling in all points the Party deceafed, of the Re. ogis of the Ro-man Emperors, and lay the same openly at the Entry of the Palace, upon a most ample and stately bed of Ivory erected on high, and covered with Cloth of Gold. And verily that Image leth with a Pale colour like unto a fick man. About the Bedth re fits a good pirt of the day the whole Body of the Senate, on the left hand, arrayed in their Blacks : and on the right hand certain Matrones honorable by the Dignity of their Husbands or Parents. And there is not one of them feen to wear any Gold about them, nor to be adorned with Jewels, but clad in white and flender Garments, they represent Mourners. Thu they do for seven days together: during which time the I hysicians resort daily to him to feel his pulse, and consider of his Disease, and thereupon as of their Patient judicially pronounce that he groweth worfe and worfe. Then when he feemeth to be dead, certain of the noblest, and most choice young men, as well of Senatorian as Equestrian Rank, take up the Bed, and carry it through the Via Sacra into the old Forum, where the Roman Magistrates were wont to lay down their Offices. Here on both fides are certain Steps raifed in manner of stairs; upon which on the one hand are placed a quire of Boys of noblest birth and Patritian dignity, and on the other a Company of Women of noble Parentage, Singing in commendation of the deceased

Prince Hymns and Sonnets turned to a solemn and mournful Note.

9. These things done, they take up the Bed or Herse again, and carry it out of the City into the Campus Martius, where in the broadest place thereof a frame or turret four square, with equal sides, is raised, and made in manner of a Tabernacle, of no other matter than great pieces of Timber. Now this within is all filled with dry fuel: but without, adorned with rich Hangings interwoven with Gold-wire, with divers Ivory Portraitts of Imagery, and fundry curious Pittures. Over this frame flood another somewhat less; but in form and furniture like unto the former, with Windows and Doors standing open. And so a third, and fourth Turret, smaller every one than that next beneath it, and others like it still one after another, till you come to the last, which is the least of all the rest. The manner of this Building you may compare to those Lanthorns, or light Towers standing by Haven-lides, and commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct Ships as Sea in their course to safe Harbours. The Herse then being mounted up into the second Tabernacie, they get together Spices, and Odours of all sorts, as also all the weet smelling Fruits, Herbs, Juyces, and Liquors, that the whole World will afford, and thereon pour them by heaps. For there is no Nation, City, or State, nor any Person of Rank and Quality, but strive every one to bestow in honour of the Prince, the last Gifts and Presents. Now when there's a mighty heap of Spices raised, and the whole Room is therewith filled, then all of Knight's degree first ride about the adifice, marching in a certain measure : and therewith in their courses and recourses observe a Warlike kind of motion round, in just measure and number. Chariots are also driven about by such, as sitting in them are cloathed in Purple, and represent all the famous Roman Captains and Emperors. These things thus performed, be that succeedeth in the Empire takes a Torch, and sets it to the Tabernacle: then all the rest on every side put fire under, and every place being filled with the dry fuel and Odours, instantly are taken with a vehement fire. Then presently from the last and least Tabernacle, as from some high Turret, when the fire is put underneath, an Eagle is let fly, which is believed to carry the Princes Soul up into Heaven. And so from that time forward the Emperor is adored among st the rest of the gods.

They then betook themselves to secret Conspiracies, which succeeding not, Antoninus resolved, though it were by open force, to kill his Brother, whom he perceived to be far better beloved than himself, and either breaking into his Brother's Chamber, or getting in by his Mothers means, under pretence of Reconciliation to be made, killed him in her bosom. This done, he secured the Empire to him by bribing the Soldiers, to whom he was so profuse, that in one day he bestowed on them, whac his Father had been unjultly Graping together for Eighteen years. Then falling like a lavage Beaft into cruel couries, he cut off all Geta's Friends and Acquaintance, all the Senators of any confiderable rank or wealth, the Lieutenants and Governors of Provinces, with the Vestal Nuns, and set the Soldiers to kill the People beholding the Circenfian Games. After this, going into Germany, to please his Army he lived an hard and laborious life; and thence passing

11. Being naturally given to much Tatling, they had formerly railed against him for his Cruelty towards his Brother, and delpifed him, for that being a man of so contemptible stature, he compared himself to their Alexander. Refolving then to be revenged on them, he first entertained them very plausibly, but afterwards drawing forth all the youth by a wile, he compassed them in with his Army, and killed them all. After this, defirous to become famous by fome great Exploit, he sent to the Parthian for his Daughter, and pretended that he himself would come and Marry her, whereby that King being perswaded to meet him with a great number of People, he fell upon them and made a great flaughter, for that they thought it needless to come armed to a Wedding; and Artabanus himself with difficulty escaped. Getting here much booty, and as he thought much glory, he returned into Mesopotamia, where he received punishment from above, for his manifold cruelty. There was one Opilius Macrinus an African born, and one of his Captains, whom he unworthily used. This Macrinus receiving a Letter from Maternianus, directed to the Emperor (who had commanded him to call together the Magicians, and confult them about his end, and whether any lay in wait for the Empire) wherein Antoninus was advised to cut him off, as aiming at the Sovereignty, when he had ventured to open it, perceived that either he or his Mafter must die, and therefore procured one Martialis to kill him. This man being inraged against the Emperor, for that he had condemned his Brother without sufficient Hearing, slew him as he was making water, on the fixth of the Ides of April, after he had reigned fix years, and two months, in the first year of the 249 Olympiad, A. 13. Now upon this occasion of mentioning Papinian, it's convenient here and altogether to observe further, That out of his School proceeded a little Army of excellent Lawyers; as Paulus, and Ulpian, Antoninus Gordianus, both an Emperor and Emperor's Son, Claudius Venatus, Catilius Severus; Ælius Serenianus, Quintilius Marcellus, and the two Fabii Sabeni, Father and Son. Paulus and Ulpian were the Affesfors of Papinian when Prafect, and according to the Advice of Pescennius Niger, were afterward Presets themselves. For Niger was of so great Authority, That he wrote first to Marcus Antoninus; and afterward to Commodus, when he saw that Provinces were ruined by frequent change of Governors, That a Succeffor should not be sent to any President of a Province, a Legatus or Proconful before five years; because they left their Imployment, before they knew how to manage them. In the next place, That no Upstarts should be imployed, except in Military Commands. And headvised that Assessor should govern in such Provinces as they had been Assessor in peternie in, which was afterwards observed by Severse, and many others, as, faith Spartian, Niero the Prafect/bips of Paulus and Ulpian do prove, who were of Council to Papinian: and afterwards, when one had served in the Serinium Memoria, and the other as Libellorum Magister, they were both presently made Prafects. He procured alfo, That noneshould be Assessor in his own Province; but at Rome, that none should govern but one whose Parents were anciently (or before Antoninus his Law) Roman Citizens. Besides, he added Salaries to Councellors, lest they should be burthensom to them to whom they were Assessors, saying, That a Judge ought neither to give nor receive. This it was convenient to do. because Augustus who first appointed Salaries to the Presidents of Provinces, provided nothing for their Councellors or Affesfors. These things though a little out of the way, it's not inconvenient to mention, because relating to the Profession of the Persons of whom we write.

14. Julius Paulus, the Affessor of Papinian, and of Council to Alexander Severus the Emperor, wrote more Books concerning Law, than any other , of which five of Sentences or Aphorisms written to his Son, or rather the Epitome of them, are yet extant. As for Ulpian, the other Affessor, Alexander Severus (that we may a little anticipate, to speak altogether) calls him in a certain Constitution both his Prefectus Pratorio, and his Parent. For as Lampridiss writes, he took him for his Tutor or Guardian forely against the will of his Mother, though afterwards he gave him Thanks for so doing, and the grateful Prince often defended him from the rage of the Soldiers, by covering him with his Purple Robe. He was born at Syria Phanice, a famous Colony of the Syrians, as he faith himself, and having mended some things which Heliogabalus had put out of order, was flain by the Pratorian Guards, which fet upon him in the Night, although he fled for refuge to the Emperor and his Mother. There was another great Lawyer, Africanus, whom some think to have been a Scholar also of Papinian. But they were deceived by a corrupt Place of Lampridius the Historian, which reckons up many other Lawyers amongst the Councellors of Alexander, though they died before that Emperor was born, at least e're the Purple came upon his Shoulders. These were Pomponius Alphans, Macianus, Triphonius, Celfus, Proculus, and others. Indeed there were two Lawvers who had the Name of Africanus, viz. Sextus Cacilius Africanus, commonly called Sextus Cacilius, and another simply to called, both who lived before the time of Alexander. As for Pomponius, he reached (when ever he lived) the Seventy eighth year of his Age, and spent all his time in the study of the Law, and other Parts of good Literature, being much pleafed with that Saying, That although he had one foot in the Grave, yet did he desire still to Learn.

15. These and many more mentioned in the Pandetts, were the great and ey of the Wri- Reverend Sages of the Law, out of the Writings of whom were Collected such tings of them Books as are come to our Hands, and have the force and efficacy of Law from and others, out of which the Imperial framp and Authority.

good literature, and what ever could relider them accomplished their workings were not only words, nor only matter, but words and matter both; being folid fine rebus Ersf. and judicious in respect of the one, and elegant, ingenious, rhetorical, and co-may, Ris fact pious in reference to the other. They did not circumscribe the Law within within within lateria. the narrow bounds of Formes and Cautions; but as their business was to discern ba carelostabetwixt Just and Unjust, Equitable and not Equitable, Lawful and Unlawful, they dias. took in all manner of knowledg whatfoever, conducing to that great and difficult Design, and thought it a point of Dishonesty as well as Ignorance, to be unseen in any thing which tended to the Safety of Men, and the Profit of the Commonwealth. For the Elegancy of the Writings of those who were more ancient, we have Cicero a Competent Judge; who usually Joyns the Commendation of Eloquence, with that of the Knowledg of the Law. And as for these of later times, the Writings of whom Compole the Pandetts, or Digefts, Laurentius Valla, one as able to pass his Censure in point of Elegancy and good Latine as any other, thus expresseth himself in their behalf. 'I lately read over and over Fifty Books of Digefts, taken out of most of the Writings of Lawyers, and I did it both willingly, and with great Admiration. First, Because it's hard to say, whether they excel in Diligence or Gravity, Prudence or Equity, various Knowledg, or excellency of Language; In the next place, every one of these Perfections do so abound in all of them, that it's hard to fay in whom they most prevail. And this increaseth the Wonder, that they lived some of them some Ages distant, although all of them after Cicero. and therefore in some words they differ from him, as all do who wrote after "Virgil and Livy. Of S. Sulpitius, and Mutius Scavola, nothing is extant, although of a later Scavola there be something. As for the most ancient Lawyers, therefore, how Eloquent they were, we cannot judge, having nothing left us to read of all they wrote. But to speak of those Writings which are come to our Hands, in mine Opinion, nothing can be added or taken from them, not only in respect of Eloquence, which yet that Subject doth not greatly bear but also of the Purity and Elegancy of the Latin style, without which, all Cearning is blind and Illiberal, especially in the Civil Law. Thus much doth Sine quarter walls with the result of their Language, as for their Matter, and the excellence of the villetaof that reason contained in their Writings, the Practice of the Christian World is bears witness to it, almost all Kingdoms and States receiving them for Law at Just Civillithis very day.

16. In the first year of Severus (that we may continue our method concern? ing Ecclesiastical matters) died Victor Bishop of Rome, on the fifth of the Calends of August, and Zepherinus succeeded; the fifteenth Bishop of that See, according to Damasus. In the last of Antoninus Bassianus, Zepherinus died, on the feventh before the Calends of September. The See was vacant five days. Then fucceeded Callifus, who therefore was elected the day before the Calends of September, on the first feria. After Dios Bishop of Jerusalem, whom the Bishops of the neighbouring Churches had ordained after the departure of Narciffus, Eulib. Ecolof. Germanion succeeded; and after him Gordius, in whose time Narcissus shewed Hist. 16. 610. himself again, as if he had been risen from the dead, and was intreated by the Brethren to enjoy his Bishoprick, being much marvelled at for his departure. for his Philosophical course of life, and especially for the Vengeance and Plagues of God poured upon his accusers. And because for his great age he was not able to supply the place, Alexander Bishop of Cappadocia was joyned with

des was Bilhop after Serapion, about the first year of Caracalla, and was succeeded by Philetus about the last of that Prince's Reign.

17. Upon Zegherinas Bishop of Rome falleth very foul Tertullian a Presbyter or Priest of Carthage in Africk, for that he was more severe against such, as through fear had facrificed to Idols, than against Whoremongers and Adulterers; wherein pot without cause truly (saith Cappellus) but yet without measure he blameth Zepherinus, and the whole Roman Clergy, the manners of whom were even now very corrupt, if we may believe Tertullian. But really not fo much out of hatred to their Vices, as out of prejudice to the truth he calleth the Roman Clergy Psychicus, as well in his Book de pudicitia, as in that de monogamia, which he thus beginneth, Haretici nuptias auferunt, Psychici ingerunt. He pretendeth therein only to condemn fecond Marriages, but indeed most of his Arguments respect both sirst and second, although he himself had Married a Wife, and retain-+ ed her in his Presbytery. But Marriage which he had learnt of the Orthodox to approve, he learnt of Montanus to despue, to whom he would have more revealed than to the Apolles, because they as yet (or for certain the Church) could not bear the yeak of Fastings and collabate which Montanus brought in, and he as a Montanist would inculcate. This humour at length so possessed him, that neither content with the title of Christian, nor that of Presbyter, he put on the Philosophick Pallium, as a token of a more austere life, wherein he would be eminent, not only amongst Christians, but also Montanists. The Africans either being amazed on laughing at this Novelty, he wrote an elegant but most obscure Book de pallio, which before being miferably lacerated, hath been of late days restored by the most learned Salmasius. He wrote his Book De præscriptionibus about the eighth year of Commodus, as Cappellus gathereth, because in the end thereof making a Catalogue of Hereticks, he mentioneth Theodotus (who was censured by Vittor Bishop of Rome, for holding Christ to have been a meer man) but not Artemon the Heretick who appeared thortly after. 18. His Book De corona Militia acquainteth us with the occasion of the Perse cuffon of the Christians, in the Reign of Severus. The Emperor e're he marched into the East (in that Expedition wherein he overthrew the Parthians) made his elder Son his Partner in the Tribunitial Power, and by his liberality pleafed the People formerly integed by the many Punishments he inflicted. By occasion of this liberality, as it feemeth, a Christian Soldier holding a certain Garland or Crown in his hand, as if it were wickedness for him to let it on his head as the rest did, was asked why he did so, and answered, That be was a Christian. This was the occasion of the imperor's rage. About the sifteenth of Severus, he wrote against the Marcionites, whom he so impugneth, as yet underhand he inculcateth his Montanism. For saith he: Amongst in Spiritual reason derived from the Comforter, per-Swadeth in the Faith fingle Matrimony. But we must not forget, that about the fourth of Severy, he wrote a most excellent Apology for the Christian Faith. At the fame time with Tertullian flourished Clemens, called Alexandrinus, because a Philosopher of Alexandria, the Scholar of Pantenus, and Master of Origen. Eusebius mentioneth him, and Pantanus in the second of Severus, at which time it's probable he wrote his Stromata; for not intending his Chronology beyond the time of Commodus, he feemeth not long after his death to have begun that Work. At this time also lived Minutius Felix an eminent Lawyer, and the Author of clare how fit an affertor of the truth he might have been , had be applied himself.

19. The first thing that the Heathers cavilled at in Christianity (besides what occasion was given by Hereticks whom the Church abominated) was the Newness of it. (a) St. Paul seemed to them to be a setter forth of new gods. And. there was an ancient Law at (b) Rome which forbad introducing new Ceremonies (a) 481 17,18. into Religion, as worshipping strange Deities, unless approved by the Senate, and appl. 6.5. this was an inviolable Law, which binding Emperors as well as others., Tibertus could not, as he defired, receive Jefus Christ amongst their gods; for the Senate would not approve of a God they did not know. This prejudice (which yet in Idolatry often effected nothing amongst the Romans) was increased by a misapprehenfion of our Lord and Saviour's Sufferings; his being Crucified, made thein despise both him and his. Hence (c) Tacitus telling the original of the Christians? (c) Annal.1.15. will let the World know, that Christ from whom they derived their name, was 444

Tiberio imperitante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio affectus. And hence Trajan (d) in his discourse with Ignatius; when he would mean Christ, cat [d) Alla 1gled him Crucifixus, the Crucified, in way of contempt. This contempt was in hatii creafed into difdain, by reason that Christ would have no other Gods (as they accounted them) fharers with him in worship, and this distlain was heightned in The reason of to rage, when Christians preaching this saving Doctrine, declaming against Idols; proving the Heathen gods to be devils, and striking at the root of Paganishi, endeavoured to draw even the whole World from Superstition and Idolatry fo ancient and universal: Tou fay, we do not worship the Gods, saith (e) Tertullian. This (e) Apol. c.10. was accounted a Crime of Sacrilege, and worthy of death; much more than to diffwade others from doing it. And as for their feafting tis known fufficiently, all speak of it in all places; the Oration also of our Certensis doth witness it: They meet together 'to eat on a fet day with all their Children, Sifters, Mothers, Persons of every Sex, 'and every age. There, after much eating, when the feast is now grown hot, and 'the heat of incestuous lust is kindled by drunkenness, the Dog that is tied to the Candleflick is provoked, by cafting a piece of meat beyond the length of the firing by which he is bound, to a violent leap. men, and after meat the lights being put out, use wicked and promiscuous Copula-(d) Pag. 119. tion? Lastly, Theophylus Patriarch of Antioch in his third book (d) to Antolycus (d) Pag. 119. against Calumniators of Christian Religion, summeth up what we have already faid, in these words: 'They say that our Wives are common, and accuse us that we use promiscuous Copulation. Besides, they lay to our charge that we do not abstain from our own Sitters, but rashly dare to violate those with incestuous lust. But this is most cruel and brutish of the Crimes they object against us, when with an impious mouth they prate, that we eat man's flesh : neither do they cease to traduce our 'Religion or Doctrine as of yesterday, and destitute of all truth, which neither we our felves, if a controversie arise, are able to desend with clear demonstrations. 'Further, they say that our Doctrine is nothing but folly, and meer toys. 21. That malice which invented these impious adjuncts of Christian Religion.

found out a fuitable object of worship; for the Romans had so far forgotten their own ancient Custom of serving their Gods without Images, or resemblances (for Numa, as Plutarch telleth us, and the ancient Romans for many years admitted no Images in their Temples, because the Deity cannot be made out by any external refemblance) that they thought it impossible for any Religion not to be guilty of Idolatry towards some visible thing. Hence came that Fable related by (a) Tacitus (an Author guilty of malice against both Jews and Christians) (a) History 'That the Jews consecrated the Image of an Ass, because (forsooth) being pressed like ' forely with thirst in the Deferts of Arabia, certain wild Asses shewed them the ' Fountains where they were wont to drink; although this Author, who faith he ' lies not, writeth, that Pompey having taken Jerusalem, and entred into the Temple to fee the mysteries of the Jewish Religion, saw there no Image at all. (b) Ter (b) Apoll cap. tullian conceiveth, that from this tale fprung that conceit that the Christians (the Religion of whom was drawn from that of the Jews, and succeeded it) worshipped the Effigies of an Ass. 'I hear, (faith Cecilius) that they worship a Consecrated And the object ' head of an As, the most filthy of all forts of Cattel, I know not out of what foolish perswasion; a Religion worthy of, and descended from, such manners. But he goeth further, and relateth a Report, that the very object of their worthip was also obscene. (c) Tertullian further writethy that some were of opinion (c) wid. they worshipped the Cross, and Cecilius, from the ignominious Death of our Lord, and this inffrument of it, argueth to the Infamy of Christian Religion in an abominable manner. Tertullian in the same place telleth us, 'That some with more apparent reason believed the Sun to be their God, and sent them to the Religion of the Persian, herein suspecting them for so doing, because when they prayed, they turned themselves toward the East. [And after an answer to this lye he addeth:] 'The Calumnies invented to cry down our Religion arose to such excess of implety, that not long ago in this City, a Picture of our God was shewed by a certain infamous Person that got his living by exposing to the fight of the 'people, wild beafts: who by a strange faculty gotten by him to avoid their bi-'tings, making Use of his craft, shewed also the aforesaid Picture to all Comers, with this Inscription thereon, This is Onochoetes the God of Christians. This 'supposed God of the Christians pretended by him, had the Ears of an Ass, an hoof on one of his feet; carried a Book, and was clothed with a Gown: we laugh at 'the barbarousness of this name, and the extravagancy of this figure. Such were the Blasphemies of Pagans against Christian worship, and as an Argument for them, they produced the secrecy of Christian meetings, which their own cruelty and rage had made necessary. 'They (d) talked of nothing more than the excess (d) notal. a. of the Tables of the Christians. And after all this they (e) objected, that they (e) Identities. ' were not any way profitable in the commerce of the World.

22. As to their outward demeanour, they accused them of Sedition as well as Atheism. Let (a) Tertullian speak upon what frivolous grounds: 'You say, we wor. (a) Apol. 6.16. ' ship not the Gods; nor for the welfare of the Emperors, offer facrifices to them.

'The one of these two Crimes whereof you accuse us, must necessarily follow upon the neck, or in confequence of the other: for, being refolved to render no manener of worthip to your Deities, we must necessarily in like manner be resolved 'not to facrifice at their Altars, whether for our felves, or for what perfon foever 'it be. Hereupon you conclude us guilty of Sacrilege and High Treason. Pliny was wont, as appeareth from his Epistle to Trajan, to try Christians by Supplications made to the Images of the Gods, and amongst these to the Emperor's Picture by Frankincense and Wine. This burning Incense was an ordinary tryal in all ages. They were also counted fingular and factious, for that they would not fwear by the Fortune or Genius of the Emperors. This the holy Martyr (b) Polycarp was (b) Epift. Ecbidden to do by the Proconful a little before his Suffering. These prejudices and des. The Roman Empire.

23. 'Is it not strange (faith (a) Tertullian) that the hatred wherewith this (a) Apol. 63. 'name is purfued, in fuch manner blinds the minds of most men, that when they 'witness the probity of a Christian, they mix in their discourse as a reproach, That 'he hath imbraced this Religion. One faith, truly, he of whom you speak is an 'honeit man, if he were not a Christian, and his life would be free from blame. Another, Do you know fuch a one, who had the reputation of a wife and difcreet man? he is lately turned Christian. [Again] "These People by an extream blindness of hatred speak to the advantage of the name Christian, when they itrive to render it odious. For, fay they, How pleasant, and of what a good humour was that woman? How fociable and jovial was that man? Tis pity they should be Christians. So they impute the amendment of their lives to the Protestion of Christianity. Some of them also purchase the aversion they 'carry against the name Christian, which we bear, with the price of what is 'most precious to them, rather defiring to lose the sweetness of life, tranquillity of mind, and all forts of Commodities, than to fee in their houses that which they hate. A man who heretofore had his mind full of jealousie, can no longer endure the company of his wife, what affurance foever he hath of her chaftity, 'after once he perceives her to be turned Christian, and parts from her now when her actions full of modesty have extinguished all suspitions wherewith he was heretofore moved. A Father who of a long time time endured the difobe-'dience of his heathenish Son, resolves to take from him the hope of succeeding him in his inheritance for turning Christian, when at the same time executing his commands without murmuring. A Master that used his Slave gently when his carriage gave him some cause of distrust, now puts him far from him for being 'a Christian, when he bath most assurance of his ridelity. 'Tis committing of a Crime to correct the diforders of a man's life by the motions of an holy Conver-' fron to the Christian faith, and the good which is produced by so happy a change works not fo powerfully in the minds of men, as the hatred they have conceived 'against us. Indeed this hatred is strange; and when I consider that the name of 'Christian only makes it to be so, I would willingly know how a name can be

'Criminal, and how a simple word can be accused? Thus much (and enough I

24. And the fruits of hatred abundantly manifested themselves. In fasting Christians to Crosses and pieces of Wood. 2. Hanging them up as publick spechacles unto all men upon Gibbets. 3. Piercing their Bodies with Irons. 4. Cutting off their heads. 5. Exposing them to the rage of wild Beasts. 6. Throwing them into flames. 7. Condemning them to work in Mines; and 8. Confining them to Islands; "All which forts are expressed in one (a) Chapter of Tertullian's (a) cap. 122 Apology. In another (b) place he thus writeth, "How often do those people be. (b) cap. 37. 'ing our Enemies, of their own accord, without your Authority, affault us with 'stones, or burn us? They are verily so inraged against us, that during the furies of the Bacchanales, they spare not even Christians that are dead, but trouble the Rest of their Graves, they violate their Sepulchres which are as Sanctuaries of the dead, they draw forth their Bodies not to be known whose Bodies they 'are, after mangled by them, which with extreme inhumanity they tear, and 'drag in the streets. (c)[Elsewhere:] "How many are there among you, O ye Peo (c) cap. 9: ' ple, that are this way greedy of the blood of Christians? and also among you, OyeMagistrates, after you appear such Justiciers by the severity you treat us with, whose Consciences I would strike with true reproaches of having procured ' the death of your own Children? Yet if you did but fimply put them to death, 'it were fomething; but by a strange excess of cruelty you throw them into the water, you expole them to the rigour of cold and hunger, and the rage of Dogs; you will not take their lives away with the fword, because too gentle a death,

25. But, when the time of Perfecution drew towards an end, then especially did the Devil rage with variety of torments against the Primitive Saints. For (d) Entitle befides those formerly mentioned, (d) Serapion was thrown down, and had his the Gapati

neck broken. Some having their flesh rent in pieces with the lash of the whip; fome were broyled upon Gridirons; others having their skins razed, and fcorched being tied by one leg were hanged on Trees with the head downwards. They pulled out the right eyes of others, fearing the empty place, and fawing off the left legs of others, feared their hams, and condemned them to the mines, which usage was accounted Clemency. Some they scourged to death, cut out their tongues, and strangled them. One Apphianus, being all disfigured with stripes, had his feet wrapped in flax oyled all over, which being fet on fire, it ran over his flesh and confumed it, and pierced into the marrow within the bones, so that his whole body distilled like to melting wax. Three days he was suffered to remain in Prison after this torture, and when by reason of his wounds he was ready to yield up the ghoft, then was he thrown into the Sea. Others were forced by buckling, justing, and buffeting, to kill one another. Others of mens estate were gelded and condemned to the quarries. Others were tormented grievoufly and chaftifed with imprisonment and fetters, of which number was Pamphilus, of all my familiars my dearest friend, a man who among all the Martyrs of our time, faith Eusebius, excelled in every kind of virtue. He had his fides mangled with tharp razors, and then was ordered to be kept in the notiom stench of the close Prison, where the rest of the Consessors remained, till at length he was put to death, being a Presbyter of the Church of Cæfarea, concerning whose life Eusebius wrote three books, and for his familiarity with, and affection to him, had the firname of Pamphilus. This variety of the torments of Christians, appeareth from feveral passages in the seventh and eighth Books of his Ecclesiastical History, which fo far exceedeth all inferiour Punishments, or (that I may speak in the phrase of Lawyers) the diminutiones capitis, that we need not mention how Christians were denied the title of (b) Roman Citizens. But one kind of punishment far more (b) Total. grievous than the rest there yet was, which more tormented Christians than all other tortures put together: and that was the loss of their chastity. This Engine battered the fort of Origen's constancy, who chose rather to sacrifice to Idols, than be abused by an Ethiopian, as Suidas writeth. (c) Tertullian giveth us another (c) Apol. c. ulf. instance, that we may enquire no further. "And indeed a few days since, (saith 'he) you condemned a Christian maid to be rather prostituted to an infamous corrupter of her chastity, than to be exposed to the rage of a Lyon ; you acknowledg there is no punishment nor kind of death, which is fo intolerable to Chri-

' flians, as the loss of their chaffity. 26. Such was the entertainment Christians found in this World; now let us fee

how far they deferved it, as to their demeanour, and carriage; for there is no need to fpeak here to the two first objections. "The Heathens (a) believe a man (a) Tertal, which could not make profession of Christianity, without being tainted with all forts ford 6.2. of Crimes, without being an Enemy to the gods, to Princes, to the Laws, to good Manners, and to Nature; and that a Christian could not be acquitted, unless he denied himself to be such an one. But their carriage was so quite contrary to all these surmises, except that concerning the worship of Heathenish vanities, or Devils, under the name of gods, that they only were the Servants of the true God, they only were free from all forts of Crimes, were the best friends and Subjects of Princes, of the Laws, good Manners, and Nature, and truly affirm ing themselves Christians, might justly in this respect have been acquitted from these accusations. "They (b) assembled together by troops in their Prayers to (b) Idem shift, to God, as if thereby they would carry by force the grant of whatfoever Prayers were presented to him, this being a violence agreeable to him; they prayed to him for the Emperors, their Ministers the Magistrates that had the exercise of their Power, for the State, the tranquillity of the Empire; and the retarding of The unblame the general diffolution that must put an end to all things. They affembled to all the general diffolution that must put an end to all things. the general diffolium nat mun put an end of an anong which are defined and they read them according to the conditions that gether to read the Holy Scriptures, and they read them according to the conditions that are defined to filians in their section of the times; what ferved either to admonish or confirm the faithful. In 'effect, the Scriptures nourished their faith, lifted up, and affured the confidence they had in God, nevertheless they ceased not to confirm their discipline by the 'firength of Precepts they continually repeated. In these Assemblies, (faith Ter-'tullian, for the former are also his words) we make exhortations and threatnings;

'and exercise Divine censure, which banisheth Sinners, and excludes them from our Communion: we judge them with very much circumspection, because we know that God is in the midst of us, and sees what we do; and certainly against the wicked, when the Church moved with the enormity of their Crimes, 'darts out upon wilful Sinners the Thunderbolts of Excommunication, and de-'prives them of the participation of it's Prayers, it's Society, and all forts of holy 'Commerce with it.

The Roman Empire.

27. 'In our Assemblies there are Bilhops that preside, and have Authority over ' all the faithful committed to their charge; they are approved by the Suffrages of them whom they ought to Conduct, and it is not Bribes that acquire them this 'honour, but Teitimonies of their good life. For in the Church of God nothing 'is done by the allurement of Gifts; if there be among us any kind of Treasure, 'the Money laid up makes our Religion not ashamed. And every one contributes 'a little Sum at the end of the Month, or when he will; but it is if he will and 'can; for none are constrained to give. If we get any Alms it is of good will: ' riches gathered in this manner, are as the pledges of Piety; we do not confound 'them in eating and drinking with excess; we make not Use of them for the foul and loathfom exercise of Gluttony: but we employ them in feeding the poor. burying them, in comforting poor Orphans, in helping old men who have fpent 'their best days in the service of the Faithful, in helping the poor that have lost 'by Shipwrack what they had, and in affifting them that ferve in the Mines, are ' Banished into Islands, or shut up in Prisons, because they profess the Religion of 'the true God, that during the time they fuffer for the Confession of his Name, ' they may be nourished by the stock of the Church. But it's a strange thing, that this charity among us gives occasion to some to blame us. See, fay they, how 'they love one another; this aftonisheth them, because they hate one another. ' See fay they, how they are ready to die one for another; but as for them they 'are ready to kill one another. [A little after :] As we live with the fame intelligence, as if we had all but one Spirit and one Soul; we have nothing in parti-' cular but our Wives, of all things in the World there is nothing but Wives, whereof we reject Community; and on the contrary, among them of their Wives 'only there is a Community with other men. [Again .] Now feeing we live to-'gether with so much Charity, that all our Goods are common, why should they 'wonder if we make good chear? for it's one of the excesses you reproach us with: 'befides the infamous Crimes whereof you accuse our Repasts, you charge it with ' Prodigality.

28. In the same place: "But you need but consider the name given to our 'And any Repails, to know the quality thereof. They express themselves with the same 'word that fignifies Love with the Greeks; whatfoever the cost is that is made, it 'is profitable, for they gain always in this expence, because it hath Piety for its 'foundation. It's a sweetness wherewith we comfort the want of the poor, but 'we do not treat them as you those infamous Gluttons, who glory in selling you their liberty for the price of their good bits, wherewith they fill their Bellies in the midft of a thousand indignaties. But we will have the least served with our 'goods, because they we know, amongst all men, are the most acceptable unto 'God. Then feeing our Feasts have so honest an end, consider what our Discipline ' should be in the rest of our Actions, even those which more concern the Duties of Religion; it permits nothing that is dishonourable, nor far from Modestv. 'Before we go to Table we are fed with Heavenly Meat, which is the Prayer we ' make to God; we cat as much as is necessary to fatisfie one's appetite, we drink 'as much as is permitted to persons that have a care of their Purity. They that fit there, take their refection with fo much Temperance, as they may remember they are obliged to worship God even at night. They entertain one another as 'People that know God hears what they say. After the Repast done, they have walhed their hands, and lighted the Candles, they are invited to praife God, and ' fing Pfalms taken out of the holy Scripture, or Hymns every one composeth according to the capacity of his mind. By this it may be known, if they have 'committed any excess at Table; as the Repast began with Prayer, so it ends; they go forth not in divers Troops to defile their hands with the Blood of Men. 'not in feveral Bands running in the Streets, not to do infolencies; but with the fame care they had in coming in, preserve their Modesty and Chastity.

29. 'Finally, Christians retire with so much staidness, that we may very well 'fee they are not fed so much with corporal Meats, as the substance of Heavenly and Holy Discipline. Certainly, it were but reason that this Society of the 'Christians should be reputed unlawful, if it were like to that the Laws forbid; it "were but good reason it should be condemned, if it were not different to that which deferves to be condemned; if one would reproach it with the fame 'things wherewith they accule factious Societies. But tell me, Did we ever 'affemble to procure the hurt of any one? we are the fame in a body, as when 'separated; as we are in particular, so we are in general; that is to say, in 'whatloever estate we are found, we injure no body; when any Virtuous or Godly People are affociated, when any Pious or Chaft Persons assemble toge-ther, their Union should not be called a Faction, but a lawful Society. Thus Tertullian, to whole words, as to the harmless carriage of the Christians in their Assemblies, Apostates witnessed, as appeareth from what Pliny the younger wrote to Trajan. As for the Crimes supposed to be committed by them, they ever challenged any witness to be produced of them, and fufficiently confute the wain reports in their Apologies. They laughed at the fiction of the Affes head, and such like stuff, and as for worshiping Crosses, Octavius in his answer to Cecilius faith, Cruces etiam nec colimus nec optamus. Croffes we neither worfbip nor will for. Neither did they meet for Seditious ends, as for the alteration of Governments, destruction of Princes, or changing of Magistrates. Though they, rather than any of late time, might pretend to Saintship, yet did they not They were they, rather than any of late time, might pretend to Saintship, yet did they not good and to make it an advantage to raise themselves; whereby they laid no claim to the also spices. Riches, Power, or Dominion of the World; they did not hold, That remporal Dominion was founded in Grace, nor that the true and spiritual Kingdom of Jefus Christ destroyed the Right and Interest of earthly Princes. They made no Infurrections, covered on Rebellious Defigns with the name of Religion, neither did by violence attempt a Reformation; although they were fo many Thoulands, as in all probability they might have born down all before them; though they filled all Places, conflited of all Degrees, and hereby shared in all Interests, in Power and Intelligence, and by their Combinations might have taken their Opportunities, and eafily by force of Arms made way for their Designs, yet obedience to their Princes, they ever held most inviolable by the Principles of their Religion, and made Use of no other weapons than Prayers and Tears, though for their own Safety and Prefervation. Hear to this purpose what Challenges Tertullian makes to fuch, as if he had not had truth on his fide, would have been sufficiently ready to instance wherein the Christians offended, which they yet never adventured to do.

30. 'In the midft of all these outrages have you observed that these People, 'who (as you think) have framed so strange a Conspiracy; and on the other fide might beanimated enough for revenge, by the Punishment wherewith you take away their lives, endeavoured any thing against you to resent the evil treating they have received? Think you that they want an Occasion? Tertul. Apolog. when in one Night only a small number of Torches would be enough to satis- c. 37. ' fie their Revenge, if with us it were permitted to render evil for evil; but God forbid we should do so. A Religion that is all divine, ought not to revenge by the Instigation of Men, and must not think it strange to suffer that which is made Use of to prove them. If we would declare against you as open. rather than pursue you as secret Enemies, might we not have Forces and Troops enough? It may be the Moors and Marcomanns, the Parthians, or whatfoever People they are shut up in the bounds of the Country they Inhabit, make a greater number of Men, than they that are spread throughout all the Universe, and have no other Limits than that of the World. Our Religion is but of late, and we fill already all that your Power acknowledgeth, Cities, Fortreffes, Illes, Provinces, the Assemblies of the People, the Armies also, the 'Wards and Tenths of Rome, the Palace, the Senate, and the Publick places 'Finally, we leave you but the Temples. What Wars were we not able to undertake? with what readiness might we not arm our selves, although we should be the weaker? we that suffer our selves so willingly to be killed, if in our Religion it were not rather lawful to let our felves be killed, than to kill others; we could also make War against you without taking up Arms, by casting our 'selves into a revolt; it were enough not to live with you, and to separate our 'selves, our Divorce would print Shame in your foreheads. For, if Christians, who make fo great a multitude of all forts of Perfons, frould abandon you, to ' retire unto some Country of the World dispersed from all Society; truly the 6 loss of so many Citizens, of what condition soever, would disparage your Government, and also our retreat would be a rude Punishment to you; without 'doubt this solitude that would remain with you, this silence of all things, this general aftonishment of Nature, even as if all the world were dead, would frighten you, you might go feek Subjects to Command, there would remain to you more Enemies than Citizens: now you have more Citi-'zens than Enemies, because there are a greater number of Christians

· 31. Thus we see their peaceable demeanour; how their minds stood affected towards their Princes, let Tertullian also inform us: 'As for us, in the Prayers apol. 6.30, we make for the Emperors, we call upon the Eternal God, the true God, the 'living God, &c. [In the same place :] It is to him to whom we Christians addrefs our Prayers, make them with hands opened and lifted up, because Inno-'cent ; the head bare, because no cause to be ashamed when we pray to God : 'There is none telleth us the words we are to fay, because it is our heart that cacteth, rather than our Tongue. We Pray for all the Emperors, and ask of God that he would give them a long Life, that their Empire enjoy a profound Peace, their House happy Concord, their Armies be innumerable, themselves 'affisted with good Councils, the People remain in their Duties, no trouble 'arile in the World against their Authority. In Conclusion, we forget nothing 'the Prince can wish for, either as a Man, or as an Emperor. [A little after:] 'Whil'it we implore the Grace of God for the Emperors with our hands lifted 'up, and stretched towards Heaven, let Irons pierce us, let us be put on Gibbets and Crosses, Fires consume us, Knives cut our Throats, Beasts devour us: A Christian while in Prayer lifting up his hands to God, is in a condition fit to receive all forts of Punishment; and therefore continue, O Magistrates, so 'affected to Justice; ravish our Souls whil'st they are in Prayers for the welfare of the Emperors, and make a Crime of Truth and the Service of God. '[In the following Chapter:] We intreat them who believe our Religion takes no care of the preservation of the Emperors, to examine the Laws of our 'God, to read our Books which we hide not, and which by divers accidents 'fall into other hands than ours. They will learn there, that it is commanded by a superabundant Charity, to pray to God for our Enemies, and to wish Good chap. 21. to them that perfecute us. Now, have we greater Enemies, and ruder Perfecutors, than those who make offended Majesty the ground of the Crime they 'impute unto us? Holy Scriptures content not themselves with this Commandment, they have another more precise and clearer. Pray, say they, for 'Kings, Princes, and Powers, that you may live in Peace in the midft of Publick 'Tranquillity. [In another place:] But why should I stay longer in making known 'with what sense of Religion and Piety Christians honour Emperors? It sufficeth to fay, we are obliged to render them our Duties, as to whom our Mafter chap. 324 ' hath commanded us fo to do.

32. As these Primitive Saints were good Christians in the exercise of their Religion, and dutiful Subjects towards their Princes, so also good Men, free from vice, and adorned with Virtues, or if any were noted to be of contrary practice they were diffouned, and the Censures of the Church cut them off from the 44; its Society. "We speak as boldly (faith Tertullian) of the Christians you put to Death, for we have an unreproveable Testimony of their Integrity, which we take also from your Registers. You who are imployed every day in judging those that are kept in Prisons, and who terminate their Processes by the Sentences you give against them, of all the Malefactors accused before you of fo many forts of Crimes, is there any of them charged with Murther, Robbery, Sacrilege, and other faults, to whom they impute also that he is a 'Christian? either, when Christians are presented to be punished as Criminals, because they are Christians, is there any amongst them whose life is like that of other Prisoners? all the Malefactors wherewith your Prisons are so filled, "that they are overcharged, are of your Religion, they are also of your Religion that make the Mines grone under the weight of their stroaks, they are the wretched Creatures of the same Religion you are, wherewith the wild Beasts 'fill their Bellies. All those poor Criminals which your Citizens keep to make them cruelly kill one another before a bloody People, have the same opinion you have of the Deity. Finally, among all those wretched Creatures there's not one Christian, unless he be charged by justice, because of his name Christian. 'fian: Or if there be a Christian found attainted of the same Crime, he hath 'no more the name Christian, because he hath lost that divine quality in losing his Innocency. [Elfewhere:] But fome will fay, even among us there are a chap. 46. • People

'a People that give themselves the liberty of doing evil, that free themselves from ' subjection to our Laws, from any whatever exact observation of what is legally commanded by us. It is true there are fome fuch, but fo foon as they fall into this diforder, we hold them no more for Christians. The tear of God, and purity of his Precepts constrained them to this holy demeanour; for opinion of Men and their Rules, as this our Author observeth, cannot reach the heart, not procure that Virtue which is truly good. "The admirable fruits their Doctrine produced (the knowledg whereof became Publick by the Commerce they had in the 'World) made fo down-right a Conflict with rude Incredulity, that to defend her felf the was forced to fay, That their Profession had no Divine matter in it, but was only a Sectof Philosophy, that obliged Christians to rank themselves there in the exercise of Moral Virtues.

fliewed before, they maintained mutual Love; and that herein they were highly eininent as to all Pious Effects, is already evident. Origen in his Work against They were E. Cellus (wherein he especially answereth to Cavils raised against the Author and minent for Doctrine of Christian Religion) takes off that prejudice that might arise from dilove and unity versity of Opinions, by a Comparison of this difference with the numerous (or of Affection. rather innumerous) Sects of Heathen Philosophers. Tertullian layeth the great guilt of Herefie upon fuch, who being animated with the Spirit of Philosophy, infected the Purity of the Gospel with the corruption of their own Opinions. In the same place he acquainteth us what was the Primitive touch-stone of Doctrines most worthy now to be considered. "These People (faith he) that are separated from us, have violated the Faith of Jesus Christ, and we beat down their errors by this only exception, That the true rule of Truth is, that which hath been spole 4.47 taught by our Master, and transmitted to us by those holy Persons who had the happinels to hear his Word, and receive his Divine Institutions; we shall shew in another place, that all which is not conformable to this rule, hath been invented by new Doctors, who came not till after the bleffed Companions of the Son of God.

33. Though there was some diversity of Opinions amongst them, yet as we

They forced

34. All these excellent qualities in those Holy Persons, might have sufficed to Devision of stop the mouths of Calumniators, and had weight sufficient to have moved the Bodies, and to mainds of all Mento the Truth. But that Victory which Christians obtained over Devils, might much more have convinced them of the Power which was Superiour to that of their false Gods. "Christians were wont to drive away these Devils from the Bodies of Men, forced them to confess that they were no other than Devils, and that Jefus Christ was the Son of God, and his way the true Religion. [As to the former, first hear Tertullian :] But if we were not near Apolog. c. 37you, who would fnatch you away from these secret Enemies, whose Malignant Operations make so strange a confusion in your Minds, and so horrible an alteration of your Healths? I have heard speak of the possession of Devils, wherewith you are tormented, from whence we deliver you freely, and without reward; if we had the Spirit of Revenge, it were enough to fatisfie us, that thefe corrupted Spirits might at all times feize on your Bodies, and that entrance therein were always open to them. But as you do not think of that you ought, wiz. fo dear a Protection, you cease not to declare a People to be your Enemies, who do you no hurt, whose affistance is so absolutely necessary for you. It is true, we are Enemies, yet not of Men, but of their Errors. [In another place :] chip: 31. As for Devils or Genies, we are wont to conjure them, to drive them away from the Bodies of Men, whereof they are feized, and render them not the Honours due to God only, by fwearing by them. [Juftin Martyr in his first * Apology: * Pag. 45 ' Aaipopio Antilis நி காலக், கே: For many possessed with Devils throughout the totius opinion 'World, and this your City, whom many Exorcifts, Inchanters, and Conjurers, ' could not cure, Many of our Men through the Name of Jefus Christ crucified under Pomius Pilate have healed, and now also do heal, disarming and driving out Fag. 311, of Menthose Devils that had possessed them. [In his Dialogue with Tryphon the Jaw:] Karn of To orougiles, &c. For in the Name of this the Son of God, the first-born of every Creature, and born of a Virgin, and made a Man subject to Suffering, and crucified by your People under Pontius Pilate, who died, arofe, from Pag. 302; the dead, and ascended into Heaven every Devil adjured, is overcome and subdued. 'Eln another place of this Apology: And now we who believe in Jesus Christ our 'Lord crucified under Pontius Pilate, adjuring all Devils and Malignant Spirits, have them subject under our Power. He affirmeth the same thing in other places.

35. That Christians constrained Devils to confess themselves such, and to acknowledg the Truth of the Gospel, in this matter hear also Tertullian: "If a man ' should bring before your Tribunals one that were truly possess'd of a Devil, if a · Christian should command him to speak, this wicked Spirit will confess that he 'is a Devil, with as much Truth as he faith falfely at another time he is a god. 4pd 149 23 'let them present any one of these they believe to be wrought upon within by a Deity; that in the Ceremony of the Sacrafices they offer on the Altars have the 'Virtue of a God, in scenting the smell which goes out of the Sacrifices; who with force belch out words out of their stomachs; within breathing declare Oracles; if this Heavenly Virgin that promifeth rain; if this Asculapius who teacheth the Secrets of Phylick, who preserves the Lives of them that must lose the same soon after, confess not by the mouths of these Impostors, the seigned 'Inspirations of whom deceive the World that they are but but Devils, if the pre-' sence of a Christian takes not from them the boldness of lying, we are willing, ' that in the same place you shed the Blood of this Christian, and punish him as 'a wicked Person. [In the same Chapter:] Now seeing by our means your gods ' discover to you that they are no gods, and that all the other to whom Men erect ' Altars, are none in like manner; but this at the same time they make you know. 'who the true God is, if it be this only God whom we that are Christians wor-'fhip, if we must believe of him what the Christians believe, if he must be serv-'ed as their Laws ordain. When you conjure your gods in the Name of Jefus 'Christ, Do they ask who is that Jesus Christ? Do they call the History of his Life a Fable? Do they fay he is a Man of the fame Education as 'other Men? That he was a Magician? That after he was dead, his Disciples 'took away his Body privately from the Sepulchre? And that he is now in 'Hell? Say they not rather, he is in Heaven? That he must descend to the ter-'ror of all the World? with horror to the Universe? with the Lamentation of all 'Men but Christians? and that he shall come down on the Earth full of Majesty, 'as the Virtue of God, the Spirit of God, the Word, Wisdom, Reason, and the Son 'of God?

The Roman Empire.

36. Whence Christians came to be so strong, as to wrest these Confessions from them, hear him in the same place. "Now all the Power we have of them, is the Name of Jesus Christ who gives it us, it is the threatning we give them of the evils God is ready to pour on their heads, and which one day Jefus Chrift must declare unto them. As they fear Jesus Christ in God, and God in Jesus 'Christ, they are under the Government of the Servants of God and of Jesus 'Christ: so by the only touch of our hands, and breath of our mouths, the De-'vils feized with fear at the fight of the Flames that environ them are forced to obey us, to come out of the Bodies they posses, in despite of them, and with murmuring to suffer this shame in our presence. You that are wont to believe them when they lie, believe them when they speak of themselves. None will tella lie to get shame by it, but rather to gain honour; one will sooner believe ' them that confess against their own Interest, than those that deny to their Ad-'vantage. These Testimonies which we have of your gods make Men to be 'Christians; for we cannot give a full Belief to what they say, without believ-'ing in Jefus Christ our Master. Your gods kindle in our hearts the Faith which 'the Holy Scripture teacheth us, they strengthen our Hope, and confirm us in the affurance we have of our Salvation. As for you, to honour them, you offer them also the Blood of Christians; and if it were permitted them to lie 'when Christians interrogate them, and labour to make you know the Truth by 'their Confession, they would take good heed of discovering your Errors to you, 'as well for keeping the Profit they have of them, and the Honours you render 'them, as for the tear they might have, that in becomming your felves Chri-'ftians, you drive them away as we do, from the Bodies they torment with fo ' much rage. [In the beginning of the following Chapter:] "We need nothing but the acknowledgment we have from your gods, when we make them confels they are no gods, and when they answer us, there is no other God than the only God we ferve, to purge us from the Crimes of High-Treason and Impiety to the Roman Religion.

37. No wonder then that these impure Spirits inraged at Christians, sought all manner of ways to destroy them. But yet in their Deaths they overcame them, and in all forts of Indignities and Tortures triumphed over their implacable Adversaries; for, The Blood of the Martyrs was the Seed of the Church. That this was so indeed, Tertullian also informeth us, the veracity of whom, as to these things alleged is unquestionable, because appealing to his Adversaries, he must needs in behalf of his cause produce such things as were most certain: the contrary whereof would have Apologized fufficiently for what he laboured to confute. We shall with the last words of his excellent Apology conclude this most delightful Subject. "But do what you please, all Inventions the most 'exquisite Cruelty can advise you unto, are to no purpose, so far are they from Profitting you, that contravily they draw all the World to our Religion. The

They tri-umphed over offener you make an Harvest of the Christians, the offener their Enemies 'creaseth: their Blood is a Seed which dies not on the earth, but puts forther 'prosperously. Many among you have laboured to perswade men to suffer conftantly Pain and Death, (as Cicero in his Tufculans, Seneca in his Treatile 'against casual things, Diogenes, Pyrrbon, and Callinicus) but Christians have better taught Constancy, by the Examples they have given, in supporting patiently fo many Evils, than all the Philosophers with all their Discourses. This same obstinacy, wherewith you reproach us, is an excellent Mistress of Truth, which we believe: for who is there not that friveth with Conteme plation to feek what it is, who, after his fearch made, comes not on our fide? who having imbraced the Faith of Jesus Christ, delires not to suffer for him. that by his lufferings he may get the Infinite Treasures of the grace of God, And that in the price of his Blood, they may obtain the Pardon of their Faults? for the Remission of all our Sins, is the affured recompence of our Punishments. This is the reason that when they read your Sentences of Death unto us, we render you thanks, because by an happy Emulation that meets between the Judgments of God, and the judgment of Men, at the same instant when you condemn us here below, God pronounceth our Absolution in ' Heaven.

38. The Soldiers being at a Stand after the Murther of Antoninus Baffianus were without an Emperor for two days. Then hearing that Artabanus, the Parthian, was coming to revenge the injury offered to him, they made choice of Ardentius one of their Principal Officers, but he excused himself by his Age, and the Dignity was conferred on Macrinus, by the especial indeavour of the Ligt Heredist. 39. Mafa a Phanician, Sifter to Julia the Wife of Severas, had two Daughters. Soamis and Mammaa. The former had a Son named Baffianus fourteen years old, and the later one called Alexianus two years younger. Both these Boys were Priests of the Sun, in the Phanician Language called Heliogabalus. and the elder being the Chief, was also a Youth of an excellent Beauty, and for it was very much admired by the Roman Soldiers. Their Grandmother Mala hereat took occasion to affirm (whether truly or otherwise) that they were both the Sons of Antoninus, who had been familiar with both her Daughters, dwelling with her under the same roof. Having got great store of Wealth by living at Court in her Sifter's time, the promifed large Sums to the Soldiers, in case the Empire could be devolved upon one of them. The Soldiers, gladly closing with her Offer, received them into their Camp, which Macrinus hearing of, neglected it, only he fent Julianus with a Party against the Revolters but this Party allured with the fight of the Boy and Money together, cut off their Captain's Head, and fending it back to Macrinia, were also received into the Camp. After this a Battel was fought in the Confines of Syria and Phanicia. wherein Macrinus having the worft, fled towards Italy, but was taken at Chalcedon, where he fell Sick of his Journey, and his Head was ftruck off after he had Reigned about fourteen Months. He was more sharp towards his Soldiers than was fuitable to his condition, being otherwise also very severe, so as he burnt Adulterers quick, with their Bodies joyned together. He was stain in the Fifty fourth year of his Age, together with his Son Diadumenianus, to whom he had given the title of Cafar.

Heliogabalus.

- 40. Antoninus Heliogabalus succeeding Maerinus, continued still in his Office of Priest, wearing the Ornaments belonging to it, and Dancing continually in that Antick Habit. He gave up himself to all filthiness, luxury, and uncleanness, and killed many that talked against his courses. He Married the Image of Pallas (which never had feen light, except when the City was burnt, fince its bringing from Troy) unto his god, as also that of Urania (by which the Africans meant the Moon) reported to be brought out of Phanicia by Dido. He built a fumptuous Temple for his god, who was brought into it in a Chariot adorned with Gold and Precious Stones, the Priest himself leading the Horses, and going backward all the way. He painted his Face though he had much Natural Beauty, wore Pearls in his Shooes, never Supped under the rate of Thirty pounds, was drawn by Dogs in a Chariot up and down the Palace, always fate either amongst Flowers or sweet Odours, and when he Journeyed had no less than Six hundred Carriages in his Train. Being told by the Syrian Priests that he should die a violent Death, he provided Silken Halters, Golden Knives, and a Turret floored with Gold and Pearl, faying, his Death should be costly and luxurious, that it might be said, No man died in such a fort. Of his Mother he was fo fond, that he would do nothing without her, and carried her with him into the Senate-house. But these courses occasioned the Ruine of them both.
- 41. His Grand-mother fearing these courses would bring him into contempt with the Soldiers, prevailed with him, though otherwise heady enough, to adopt Alexianus his Coufin German, that all might not miscarry together with him. She perfwaded him to it, by flewing how thereby he might provide for his Pleasures and attendance on his god, the other taking care of State-Affairs. He fought to train up Alexianus, now called Alexander, in his own way, and Mammea having provided him Tutors, able Men to bring him up in good literature, he either put to Death or Banished the chief of them, as corrupting his Son. He preferred none but Players to Publick Dignities, and gave the Governments of Provinces to the filthieft amongst his Slaves. By these things he drew more and more upon him the hatred of the Soldiers, who all inclined to Alexander as a youth of good hope, who also had Money from his Mother for a bait, without which all had been nothing. Antoninus knowing this, endeavoured all ways to Poison him, and this succeeding not, he gave out he was dead, to see how the Soldiers would take it, who hereupon mutined. To appeale them, he took him along with him in a Chariot beautified with Pearl and Gold to the Camp. Here was Alexander faluted and honoured alone, no respect being given to Heliogabalus, who being incensed thereat, went about to animadvert upon such as made acclamations, but the Soldiers catching at this advantage, flew him, together with his Mother, and those that accompanied him; their two Bodies being tumbled up and down the Streets were at length cast into Tiber. He thus died, having lived Eighteen years, and reigned Five;

Thence arose distatisfaction, contempt, and harred amongst the Subjects of Artabanus; the iffue whereof was, that Artaxares or Artaxerxes stirred up the Persians to the recovery of their ancient Honour, and translated the Kingdom from Artabanus, and the Parthians, upon himself, in the fourth year of this Alexander, Five hundred thirty eight years after Alexander the Great, or rather in the Five hundred thirty eighth year of the Seleucidæ. Not content herewith, he fent to Alexander to demand whatfoever the Romans had taken from the Persians, and having a great ambition to recover what ever had belonged to that Empire, invaded Mejopotamia, giving out he would reduce all Afia unto his Power. Alexander was constrained to march against him, and so repelled and weakned him, though with great lofs of his own Men, that for divers years no more was heard of him. By his Lieutenants he prospered in the Wars of Mauritiana, Illyricum, and Armenia, but being called for against the Germans who wasted Gall, either because he was despised for want of Success in this Expedition, for his Severity, or rather for that the Soldiers loved to fifh in troubled waters, he was Traiteroully Murdered, together with his Mother, and Maximinus was fet up in his ftead. Mammea his Mother, was first instructed in Christian Religion by Origen, whom the called to her at Antioch, but afterwards learnt of the Gnoflicks, 1. Ulpian the great Lawyer was his chief Justice, and was slain by the Soldiers. Paulus also, Pomponius, and Modestinus flourished in his time, which abounded with able Men of this Profession. This occasion of revolt from him was first given in Africk, by his Officer at Carthage, whose rapacity so far incensed certain young Men. that they killed him, and compelled Gordianus the Proconful to take upon him the Purple, who being of the Age of Eighty years, was joyfully owned both by Senate and People. But he going about to revenge private Injuries, destroyed himself, by constraining Capellianus who governed Mauritiana to come upon him with an Army, wherewith being worsted he hanged himself, his Son having perished in the Fight at the Age of Forty fix. The Senate, that they might have some to oppose against Maximinus, chose two Emperors, Maximus and Balbinus; but the People not being satisfied therewith, and being defirous to have a Prince out of the stock of Gordianus, they gave the Title of Cafar to Gordianus his Grandson by his Daugh ter, a Boy of Thirteen years of Age. A little after it happened that two old Soldiers who had belonged to Maximinus, going to the Senate-house to heatken for News, were flain by two Senators, which thing raifing a great Tumult, the Soldiers in Town fet the City on fire, whereby a great part of it was burnt down, and got them to their Camp., Balbinus was appointed to take care of Rome, and Maximus went into Italy to raife Forces against Maximinus, who now marched for Rome. Finding no refulance at the Alps, he accounted himself most sure of Victory, but found so much at Aquileia, as stopped his Journey; for the Inhabitants furnished by the commodiousness of the place with all forts of Provisions most stoutly defended themselves. They threw down so much scalding Pitch and Sulphur upon his Soldiers, that they were not able to continue the Storms, and the Women, 'tis faid, cut the hair from their licads to make Provision for Bow-strings. This unexpected Opposition drove him to such a rage, that having no Power to torment the Edenity.

he exercised his fury upon divers of his Captains whom he put to Death, as if through their laziness and neglect the Town stood out. This Cruelty, together with the fcarcity of Victuals in the Camp (for the Befiegers were to Belieged that all Provisions were cut off from them) induced such of the Soldiers, as had their Wives and Children at Rome, to conspire against him. Together with him fell his Son, fuch an one as himfelf, whom he had named Cæfar, the Soldiers crying out, That of an ill Litter not a Whelp was to be preferved. He also persecuted the Church by the fixth Persecution, commanding

45. Now to our continuation of Ecclefiaftical matters. In the first year of Alexander, or the last of Heliogabalus, the day preceding the Ides of October, Calliftus Bishop of Rome was crowned with Martyrdom. The See was vacant fix days, and then succeeded Orbanus the Seventeenth Bishop, according to Damafus, on the Twentieth of October, and first Feria. In the Tenth of Alexander, on the Eighth before the Calends of Inne died Urbanus. The See was vacant Thirty days, and then Pontianus succeeded on the Eighth before the Calends of July, the fixth Feria. In the first of Maxi. The Seat was vacant Thirteen days. and then was Fabianus elected, on the Seventeenth of January, and the first Feria, being the Twentieth Bishop of Rome, according to Damasus. From the Death of Maximinus the first created Emperor without Consent of the Senate, to the Monarchy of Constantine the first Christian Emperor, who reformed Religion, and translated the Imperial Seat to Byzantium, the space of Eighty fix years.

THE news of Maximinus his Death being brought to Rome, filled the City with extraordinary joy, having taken Maximus as he was Lifting Men in Italy, who thereupon went to Aquileia, and received the Army, to which he pardoned all things past. Then returned he to Rome, where he and his Collegue managed Matters with Difcre-Hand. The Prætorian Bands hated them both, as created by the Senate, and refolved, for the removal of fuch an Indignity offered to the Army, to make them away, which Maximus understanding, would have sent for the Guard of Germans, which he knew both to be faithful to him, and able to relift the Power of the other; but Balbinus suspecting that he intended something against himself, would not suffer it; and so the Soldiers entering the Palace haled them out, and after all forts of Indignities offered to their Persons, upon report that the Germans were coming, flew them both. Now knowing no fit Person whom they might prefer, and being affured it would be very acceptable to the People, they made choice of Gordianus, who had been formerly made Cæsar. At his beginning so great an Eclipse of the Sun happened (April 2. on the second Feria, as Cappellus agreeth with Mulierus) that the Day feemed to be turned into Night, and nothing

By the good Conduct of Mistheus his Father-in-Law he prospered very well, but he being flain or made away, the Soldiers not enduring the rawness of Gordianus, transferred the Sovereignty unto Philip, and killed him, after he had Reigned fix years. It's observed, that all those Nine that slew him perished by their own hands, their own Swords, and the very fame with which they destroyed him.

M. Julius

2. M. Julius Philippus was by Birth an Arabian of Trackonitis, his Father being a notable Captain of Thieves in that Country. He made his Son partaker with him in the Imperial Dignity. In his fourth year fell out the 1000th of Rome, Eutrop. 1. 9. which was celebrated with great Pomp, and all manner of Games, from April 21 Pillar, to April 21 of the following year. English reports of him, that he was the first English Hill. The Martyrologies will have him and his Son converted by occasion of the Solemnity of the roooth year, and being Baptized by Fabianus Bishop of Rome, after consession of his Sins, to have been admitted to the Communion. But faith Cappellus, if any of this had been true, would the Senate that was so set against the Christians have reckoned him amongst the gods At least would not Decius have objected this as a Crime against him? The Scythians, in his time infefting the Empire, he repelled by his Lieutenants. Marinus raifing a Commotion in Fannonia, he fent Decius to quiet the Soldiers, who put the Purpleupon him. Philip then led an Army against this Usurper, and they met at Verona, where the old Emperor was deteated and slain, which News coming to Rome, his Son a Child of Twelve years of Age was Murdered by the Prætorian Bands, after they had reigned about five years.

At the defire of the Senate, to which he com-Letur. mended the Commonwealth in his absence, he marched against and overthrew them in feveral Battels (notwithstanding that he lost his Son, and Prifeus Governor of Philippi revolted) and had perfected his Victory, but that he was betrayed by Gallus Hostillianus Governor of the lower Mæsia. He perswaded him to sight in a Fenny Ground, and then revealed his intention to the Enemy, by whom he was beset, and was swallowed up in a Bog, so as his Body could never be found. He was courteous enough to all but Christians, and gave satisfaction to Senate and People. He reigned two years and an half.

Gallut,

4. Vibius Gallus Holtilianus succeeded him, both in his Empire, his malice towards Christians, and his punishment. He clapped up an ignominious Peace with the Gothes; unto whom he promifed Money, a thing scarcely heard of before amongst the Romans; and this not being long kept, the Gothes and Scythians made Eutrop. Many other Nations after their example rebelled, and made Victors havock of the Provinces: the Parthians also pierced into Armenia, and thence expelled Tiridates the King. The Scythians proceeded fo furiously, that they feemed to carry all before them, till that Emilianus a Moor, and who commanded the Legions in Pannonia, by promifes drew on his Soldiers against them, and so repelled them, that he invaded their Country, for which Service he was faluted Emperor by this Army. Gallus hearing of this, went presently against him, but was flain, together with Volufian his Son and Partner in the Empire. Such was the end of him who perfecuted the Church of God, and chafed away fuch holy Men as prayed for his peaceable and prosperous Estate.

But God avenged the cause of his Saints upon him; for going against Sapores the King of the Persians, he was taken Prisoner, and could not be released, notwithstanding the intercession of the Persian's Confederates, who alleged, that the Romans the more they were overcome, the more vehemently they ever refitted. Sapores kept and used him as a stool to tread on when he got on Horse-back, and at length pulling his skin over his ears, tortured him to death. Gallienus orofus 1.7. his Son, who all this time had reigned with him, terrified hereat, stopped the Per c. 22. fecution of the Christians; but many of the Romans who had been the instruments of the Emperor's Cruelty, being to be punished as well as he, many Nations fell like a flood upon the Roman Empire, Gallienus giving up himself to all wantonnels and luxury. The Germans over-running Rhætia and part of Italy, came as far as Ravenna, the Allemans also wasting Gall pierced into Italy. Greece, Macedonia, Pontus, and Alia, were overwhelmed with an Inundation of the Gothes and Scythians. Dacia beyond Danubius was perpetually lost, the Quadi and Sarmatæ

Then reigned Valerius Aurelianus, born either at Syrmium or some place in Dacia, of mean Parentage. Being by Claudius appointed to drive the Gothes out of Thrace, he was after his death faluted Emperor. He was an excellent Soldier, and restored the Empire well nigh to its former bounds. In his first year, Hormisda the third Persian King began his Reign, which lasted but one year. Him succeeded Varane, and Reigned three years, and him followed Narses, who continued twenty eight. In his first year also died Plotinus the Flatonist, who deriding all Religion, perished through the just Judgment of God by a filthy and painful Disease, although he had chosen a pleasant and wholesom place wherein to live in Campania. Now also flourished Porphyrius his Scho-Firmicus lib. 1. lar, who of a Christian became a great Enemy to Christianity, and wrote Fifteen Books against it, to which Eusebius answered in thirty,

For Saturninus was faluted Emperor in Egypt, who was overthrown alfo, and killed alfo against his mind, and the same success he had against Proculus in Gall and Bonofus a Britain born. He overthrew the Sarmatians, subdued several barbarous Nations about Thrace, by the terror of his name only, quieted all Alia, and forced the Parthian King to defire Peace, which he granted. Carus

Of his two Sons, Numerianus was with him, and Carinus was left behind to look to Gall. Nume- Vorifous rianus returning out of the East as Conqueror, and lying Sick in his Litter, was killed by Arius Aper his Father-in-Law, who gaped after the Empire. Scarcely after some days was this wickedness detected by the stench of the Carcals, and then the Author of it being also discovered, Valerius Diocle-tianus, who governed the Family of Carus, was chosen Emperor, and rewarded Aper as he had deserved. On the Fifteenth before the Calends of December, and ten days after, he entred Nicomedia in Purple. From the beginning of this Diocletian the Egyptians began a new Ara tetching its Rife from the new Moon of Thoth the preceding Month (August 29.) which they called the Ara of Grace, for some reason or other. Cappellus observeth, that the fluctuating and vitious Chronology of Baronius henceforth beginneth to be right. For thinking, faith he, that he exhibited the years both of the true, and received Æra of Christ, in truth, he exhibited neither the one fort nor the other. Beginning the Ara of Diocletian from the 284 year of our Lord, it's true, and right, to that it be understood of the received, not of the true Are of Christ: and the same is to be said concerning the years of the following Emperors. But after this, Carinus and Diocletian fought for the Sovereignty, and Carinus after

to. Diocletian then enjoyed the Dignity alone; but great stirs arising in Gall, Caraufius alto, who was fet to defend the Sea-Coasts from the Invasion of the Franks and Saxons, rather taking part with them than otherwise, he was the Franks and Saxons, rather taking part with their than otherwise, he was organ shifts constrained to create Cafar, Maximianus Herculeus. He suppressed the motions paice 25, in Gall, but commanding Caranssus to be killed, this man put on the Purple, attempting. in Gall, but commanding Caranfins to be killed, this man put on the Purple, Eu though a man of mean condition, and leized upon Britain. Achilleus rebelled Fiftat Rufuse in Egypt, Africk was in trouble, and Narses King of Persia invaded the Eastern parts. Diocletian, awakened with these dangers, promoted Maximianus to be Augustus, and they two adopted for Cofars Maximianus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus, who Married Theodorathe Wive's Daughter of Herculeus, and by her had fix Sons, as the other, the Daughter of Diocletian. Caraufius valiantly held Britain for seven years, and then was flain by Allettus, who having kept possession of the Island three years, was overthrown by Afelepiodorus. Constantius fighting against the Allemans in Gall, at first was worsted, but afterwards got a great Victory, wherein Sixty thousand of them are said to have been slain. Maximianus Herculeus reduced Africk. Diocletian himself besieging Achilleus in Alexandria eight Months, at length flew him therein, gave up the City to be plundred by the Soldiers, and vexed all Egypt with Profcriptions and Slaughters. Galerius was overthrown by the Persian King, and fled to Diocletian, who received him with great disdain, and made him run in his Purple Robe for some miles before his Chariot. Galerius much moved by this difgrace, recruited his Army throughout Illyricum and Masia, and returning against Narses, routed his Army, took his Camp, his Wives, Sifters, and Children, many of his Nobles, and great Treasure, wherewith returning into Melopotamia unto Diocletian. he was then received most honourably; for he had taken Cresiphon, subdued Affria, and recovered those five Provinces beyond Tigris, which revolted from Trajan.

11. After this were the Carpi, Bastarna, and Sarmatians overthrown, and divers other Nations quieted. Diocletian now fuffered himself to be called Lord, and worshipped as a God. He in the East, and his Collegue in the West, raised against the Christians the most heavy Persecution that ever yet had hapned, both for length and cruelty. The Soldiers were first begun with, whereof all such as would not facrifice to Devils, were cashiered; but the Persecutors proceeded to fuch cruelty and rage that some were Crucified, others Burnt alive, others Orofias at fixroafted with flow Fires; and others pulled in pieces by having their Limbs Eufth. Ecclef. made fast to boughs of Trees, which being brought together for that pur-Histibas. 6-3, pole, were afterwards suffered to return to their natural Polition. Some were flarved to death, many flain with the fword, and many devoured of wild Beasts. Some were flea'd alive, others beaten to death by hot burning Iron Rods, and some returned to Prison after their Torments, there to languish away. Women were hung naked by one foot, and fome had their Breasts seared: no Sex, no Age, no condition was spared. A terrible Earthquake followed in Syria, which destroyed many Thousands about Tyre and Sidon. But in the second year of this Persecution Diocletian perswaded his Collegue, though unwilling, That they both might resign the Empire to the two Casars; so that he being seized with a foul Disease, after he had almost reigned twenty years, put off the Purple at Nicomedia, and Maximianus Herculius the same day at Milain.

12. Diocletian was still busied and perplexed with Wars during his Reign, and well might be wearied and content to refign the Empire; and yet he was also extraordinarily taken up with making Laws, being consulted and Petitioned by multitudes of Persons upon occasion, whose Names are set to his Answers. still extant in Justinian's Code. And his Rescripts are rather more numerous than those of any Prince mentioned and recorded for Laws in that Code, except it be those of Justinian himself. To Constantius fell Gall, Britain, Spain, Italy, Entropius I. to. and Africk; to the other Illyricum, with Greece, and Afra. Galerius created Cafarsi his Sifter's two Sons, Galerius Maximinus and Severus. The East he appointed to Maximinus, and intended Italy for Severus, if he could but take it from Constantius. For this purpose he kept at Rome, as an Hostage, Constantine the Son of Constantius by Helena a British Woman, as some say, which he put away when he Married the Daughter of Maximianus. 14. The Image of Constantine was exhibited at Rome, according to the Custom. But Maxentius the Son of Maximianus Herculius, as Zosimus writes, thinking it intolerable that he who was born of a Concubine should have his zofamu lib 2:

Emperor.

Matters fucceed according to his Defire, and he the Son of an Emperor should lye neglected, and his Father's Dominion go to others, with the affiftance of Marcellianus and Marcellus Tribunes of the Army, and Lucianus who provided Hog's Flesh, allowed by the Treasury to the Roman People, and of the Prætorian Soldiers, whom he obliged by great Promises, took the Title of Emperor upon him. Abyllius Præfett of the City endeavoured to hinder their Proceedings, but was killed by them. Against him did Maximianus Galerius, send his Nephew Severus; but Maxentius corrupted most of his Men, and drew to his fide Anullinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, and thereby eafily overthrew him, and forced him to fly to Ravenna. These things coming to the ears of Maximianus Herculius, he was concerned for Maxentius his Son, and leaving Lucania came to Ravenna, whence perceiving that Severus could not be driven out, the place was fo strong and fo well victualled, he circumvented him by Oaths, and perswaded him to go to Rome; in the way whither, when he came to the Tres Taberne, he was feized by fome whom Maxentius had fent to intrap him, & strangled. Now was Maximianus Galerius as much concerned in behalf of his Nephew, as Maximianus Herculius was for his Son, and he refolved to move from the Eaft, and revenge his Death upon Maxentius, but coming to the Coasts of Italy, and finding his Soldiers not firm unto him, he returned into the East without a Battel. Maximianus Herculius being disturbed with these disorders, repaired to his old Collegue Diocletian, who then lay at Carnutum a Town of Gall, faith Zosimus, for which Sigonius writes; Carnuntum a place of Illyricum, and endeavoured to perswade him to resume the Empire, and not suffer that which they with so great labours had preferved, to be exposed to the youth and madness of those Disclusian re- who had feized it. But Discletian would not confent, preferring his Quiet fusion to re-fusion the Pur-ple. before business, and perhaps, Zosimus tells you, foreseeing how things would be disordered; as he was a man most observant of Religion. 15. Herculius

15. Herculius this way frustrated, went toward the Alpes, having taken Maximianus Ravenna in his way, to meet with Constantine: And being naturally unquiet and unfaithful; thought to cheat him by giving him his Daughter in Marriage. Thereby he ingaged him to purfue Maximianus Gallerius, now quitting Italy, and to circumvent even Maxentius his own Son. Finding that he would obey him, he departed, and indeavoured to recover the Imperial Power, hoping to beget a quarrel betwixt his Son in law, and his Son. While he was indeavouring to bring this about, Maximianus Gallerius being much acquainted with one Licinius, created him Emperor, purposing by him to make War against Maxentius; but died in the mean time of a Wound which was incurable, and then Licinius managed his own Matters. All this while was Herculius imployed in drawing off the Soldiers from his own Son, and when by Largeffes and miferable requests he had got them over to himself, then began to deal in the same manner with his Son in law, and tampered also with his Soldiers. But he was prevented by his Daughter Faustina, who revealed all to Constantine her Husband; at which Discovery, falling into despair, he died at Tarsus of Sickness, as Zosmus writes, but as Sigonius hath it from others, was strangled at Marfeilles by Command of Constantine: Maxentius by his Death freed from former Inconveniences thought himself secure, and sent some into Africk, and to Carthage to carry about his Pictures. The Soldiers in those Parts out of love to the memory of Gallerius, would not permit this to be done, and afterward hearing that he was about to undertake an Expedition to chaftize them, departed for Alexandria, but meeting with such Forces as they were not able to over-power, returned to Carthage. Now did Maxentius resolve to go into Africk, and be revenged on them, but the Haruspices discouraging him from what they saw by their Birds, and he fearing that Alexander, who in Africk exercised the Office of Præfectus Prætorio might withfland him, thought it fafest to deal first with him, and demand of him his Son for an Hostage. Alexander suspecting that he would deal perfidiously, denied to fend his Son, whereupon Maxentius imployed fome to take an advantage Altrander II. and make him away. This being discovered, the Soldiers were glad of the oc-

16. This Alexander was a Phrygian by descent, a Coward, slow to all Business, and befides, an old Man. At this time a Fire happened in Rome, it's uncertain, Zosimus saith, whether from the Air or the Earth, and the Temple of Fortune was burnt. Great Concourse being made to quench it, a certain Soldier spake some Blathemous words (Thus Writers term them) against the Divinity, and was indequal killed by the multitude, out of Piety to it. Hereupon the Soldiers fell into a Mu. tiny, and were hardly kept from destroying the City, their fury being appealed section as by Maxentius. Now did he look for some pretence to make War upon Constan- Tis denistine, and pretending to grieve for the Death of his Father, of which he was the Cause, purposed to take the way leading to Rhatia, as nearest to Gall and the Illy-rican Regions; for he Dream't that he should seize upon Dalmatia and Illyricum, by the allifance of the Military Officers of those quarters, and of the Forces of Licinius. But he resolved first to settle matters in Africk, and for this purpose he fent over Rusius Velusianus his Præfectus Prætorio, with whom he joyned Zenas, a Man most famous for his Skill in War, and his gentleness of disposition. Is taken and By them Alexander was eafily mastered, taken, and put to Death. The War pat to Death being in this manner composed, a large opportunity was afforded to Calumniators; and all in a manner who were in Africk, confiderable for Birth or Wealth, were accused as having sided with him, and none were spared, some being killed, and others deprived of their Estates. And a Triumph there was at Rome, for those mischiefs that were done at Carthage; and Maxentius in Italy, and in the City carried all things on, as fuited with his Lust and Cruelty. 17. Constantine having the man formerly suspected, now found more reason to beware of him, and prepared to make War against him. At this time he had his Abode in Gallia Belgica, at Collein, where in his fecond Confulship, and that of Licinius, he composed matters about the Tributes of Gall, and granted Indulgence as to Arrears, particularly through Lugdunenfis Prima (for now there were Vide Chron.

two Lugdunenses, though afterwards sour) amongst the Cities, of which was Total ad Augustodumum, an Inhabitant whereof Eumenius an Orator, gave him thanks in a A.D. CCC XID Panegyrick still extant. Having arrived at the seventh year of his Reign, he moved against Maxentius, who was in his fixth, from Gall into Italy, in the Months of August and September, at the later end of which he there arrived.

Chap. VII. The Roman Empire. Constantine. Licinius.

> From this Month, the eighth before the Calends of October, and his arrival and making War against Maxentius is the Original of the Indictions to be reckoned, of which mention is made in the Code of Theodofius. The first Law of this Code concerning Tribute, and directed to Antonius Marcellinus, the Prefident of the L. s. Sin cas-Province of Luzdunensis Prima, was made this year also, by Constantine, and 12 cod. Th. lib. dated at Colein on the first of July, as Gothofred thewes. Zosimus writes, That having raifed Forces out of fuch barbarous People as he had fubdued, as also from amongst the Germans, other Celtick Nations, and the Britans, to the number of Ninety thousand Foot, and Eight thousand Horse, he moved from the Alpes into Italy, where, such Towns as yielded he hurt not at all, but such as stood out he reduced by force. With Maxentius who was furnishing himself with far more numerous Forces, Eighty thousand Romans and Italians joyned, and as many of the Tyrrhenians as inhabited the Sea-Coast. The Carthaginians also sent him an Army of Forty thousand, and the Sicilians furnished him with Men; so that all his Forces confifted of an Hundred and feventy thousand Foot, and Eighteen thoufand Horfe.

18. Such were the Forces on both fides, when Maxentius, the more to provide for his Security, caused a Bridge to be laid over the River Tiber, so divided in the middle that it might be drawn afunder, and the fides parted upon occasion; and he commanded the Workmen, that when they should see the Army of Constantine upon the Joynt of the Bridge, they should draw back those Irons that held it together, and diffolve it, that as many as were thereon might fall and be Drowned. In the mean time, Constantine comes before Rome, and incamps himfelf in a large plain, very convenient for Horse. Maxentius being Besieged, sacrificeth to his Gods, confults the Extifpices concerning the Event of the War. and fearcheth the Sybilline Books, wherein he finds an Oracle, That he who should design things tending to the detriment of the Roman People should perish by a miferable Death. This he applied to himfelf, as fighting against those who attempted to take Rome; and the Event shewed the truth. For when he had led his Forces out of the City, and paffed the Bridge which he had Built, an infinite number of Owles flew and filled the Walls, which being feen by Constantine, he Commands his Men to be drawn out. The Armies facing each other, he fent his Horse to Engage the Cavalry of the Enemy, and then gave the Sign to his Footmen. A Bloody Engagement following, the Romans and Italians their Affociates. were flow in venturing their lives, hoping to be freed from a Cruel Tyranny; but of the rest fell an innumerable Multitude, as well trodden down by the Horse as killed by the Foot of Constantine. As long as the Horse made resistance, some hope remained to Maxentius; but it being beaten, he with the rest thought it best to fly over the Bridge into the City. With the weight of them that fled the Bridge was forced afunder, and Maxentius falling down with the rest of the Multitude, perished in the River. The noise of the Victory being brought into the City, none of the Inhabitants durst rejoyce, for fear it should prove falle; but when the Head of Maxentius was carried in upon a Pole, they changed their folly for gladness. Constantine after this Success, punished a few of those that had been most familiar with Maxentius, but took off the Prætorian Soldiers, and demolished the Holds where they were wont to lye. And when he had fetled matters of the City, removed to the Celtæ and Galles. Thus writes

19. Others confirm, that in the fixth year of his Tyranny, the very day whereon he had Usurped; the third after he had parted from Rome, he was overthrown near the Bridge called Pons Milnius, by Constantine, and by the fall of it was precipitated and drown'd. The day following Constantine entered Rome, where he Stand about two Months, viz. the later part of Odlober; all November, and the better part of December. As for what he did while in the City, he restored Aradius Rufinus to be Præfect, who upon Maxentius his quitting it, had been put out, and Annius Anulleanus placed in his stead. And Maxentius being now subdued, as L. i. de pitit. the Custom had been of other good Princes his Predecessors, he took care for Sup cod to libits. preffion of Informers, by Penalties inflicted on them which he had formerly or in 10. dained, which allo he inforced the following year, according as Victor the Hiftorian tellifies of him, That he filenced Calumnies by most severe Laws. Having Licinius Mar- letted matters at Rome, he went to Milan, where he Married to Licinius, his Si-ries the Sifter fier Conftantia, having formerly promifed her to him when he had a mind to ingage ham against Maxentius. The year following, we find Constantine also at Ffffff 2

Milan in the Month of March. This year he took care for the Affairs of Africk, both as to Religion by giving Incouragement, and granting Immunities to Chrithan Clerks and Churches, and also by tetling the Country after the great disorder there raifed, by means of Maxentius. Having fetled matters in Africk and Italy, . he departed from Milan, and went into the Lower Germany, where, returning to Triers, he represed the Franks, and other Barbarians, who would have passed the Rhine, and continued there in the Months of November and December, making teveral Laws for Reformation of Abufes.

20, In the mean time Diforder arose betwixt Licinius and Maximianus. or Maximinus Casfar, the Son of Maximianus Gallerius his Benefactor, and it grew foligh, that it proceeded to a War, wherein at first Licinius had the worst, but prefently again he recruited, and ingaging in another Battel, put Maximinus to flight, who taking his way for Ægypt, came to Tarfus, and there died. By this means came the Empire to be devolved on Licinius and Constantine, who also after a little time fell out, not for that Licinius, you must know, gave any just Caufe, but because Constantine seemed, according to his Custom, to have observed Agreements with little Truth and Fidelity. So Zosimus is pleased to write, and Legan his Game of Calumnies against Constantine, with what Success we shall see largely hereafter. But befides this feeming or appearing to fobreak Covenants, he adds, That he would also have drawn some Nations subject to Licinius, from their Obedience. Therefore their Difcord increasing, they both provided to decide the Controversie by the Sword. Licinius gathered his Forces together at Cibalis, a Town of Pannonia, feated on an Hill, to which lay a way up of the breadth of five Furlongs, but at the end of this passage was a vast Plain, where he incamped himself, near to which adjoyned a deep Fenn. Licinius drew out his Forces in length under the Hill, for the strength of his Wings; and Constantine ordered his Battel at the Mountain, and placed his Horse in the Front, lest the Enemy should fall on a sudden on his Foot, which was flow in motion. Having this Advantage, he fell with violence upon Licinius his Men; and a Fight was fought, Zolimus had almost said, sharper than any other. Both having spent their Missile Weapons, for a long time they disputed it with their Swords and Pikes. When the Battel had continued from Morning to Night, the Right Wing wherein Constantine Commanded, had the better. Therefore Licinius his Legions feeing him leaping on Horfeback, and prepared for Flight, durst not stay any longer in that place, nor Sup, but leaving their Sheep and Cattle, and all their Baggage; and taking only fo much Meal along with them, as would ferve to drive away hunger that Night, in all halt they came with him to Sirmium, a City of Pannonia, washed on both Sides by a River, which empties it felf into Ister. Licinius staid not here, but broke down the Bridge, and made all the haft he could to get into Thrace, and there to Reinforce his Troops.

Tract, which Licinius had forfaken, fent to purfue him Five thousand Legionary Soldiers; but they not know ig the ways through which he fled, could not reach him. He repaired then one Bridge over Savus, which Licinius had broken, and marched after him, and coming into Thrace, found him again incamped on a Plain. The fame Night he arrived, he put his Men into order of Battel, and gave Orders they should be ready against the Morning; and Licinius then drew out his Men also, being affished by Valens, to whom he had given the Title of Cafar, after his Flight from Cibalis. The Armies upon facing each other, plied it with their Arrows, and those and other Missile Weapons being spent, ingaged with their Pikes and Swords, which while they were doing, that Party which Conflantine had fent to pursue Licinius, appeared from an Hill, and were now ready to joyn with their Companions, and incompass their Enemies. But Licinius his Men valiantly received them, and bore up against them all, and after an innumerable Company was Slain on both Sides, and they were on equal They make an terms, the Sign was given, and the Armies parted afunder. The day following. they agreed to enter into a Mutual League and Society, the terms of which were, That Constantine should hold Illyricum, and other Nations thereabouts; as, Pannonia, Dacia, Mæsia, Macedonia, all the Tract of the Danube, and Greece or Achaia. To Licinius were to remain Thrace, and the East, and other Provinces; as, Mæsia Minor, Scythia, Asia, and the rest. It was agreed that Valens, the lately created Cafar being accounted Author of these Mischiefs,

21. Constantine having taken in Cibalis, Sirmium, and all other places in that fhould be removed. This done, and the Agreement confirmed by Oaths, Constantine conferred the Dignity of Cafar on Crispus his Son, by Minervina his Concubine, who was grown up to be a youth, and on another called Constantinus, born not many days before at Arles; and to Licinianus also, the Son of Licinius, was given the fame Dignity.

22. This War and League following upon it, happened in the CCCXIIII year of our Lord, and the Confulship of Volusianus, and Anianus, as Gothofred proves from a certain Law, dated on the beginning of March at Thessalonica, where Constantine then resided, and therefore those Parts must then have been in his Power, and the Division been made. Having staid here, and at Heraclea some time, he removed from Macedonia into Mylia, Dacia, and the Upper Pannonia, as appears by various Constitutions he made for the Advantage of Christian Religion, and removing of Grievances and Abuses. After this he Travelled into

Constantine vi-

Italy, being found by a certain Law to have been at Aquileia, in the middle of July. From Aquileia he removed to Rome, where, how he imployed himself; is to be shown in another place; and thence he went to Milan, this being in the fourth Confulship of himself, and the fourth also of Licinius. Into the following, wherein Sabinus and Rufinus were Confuls, fell the Celebration of his Decennalia, it being the Tenth year of his Reign. At the beginning of it he had his Abode in Gall, at the City of Triers, and thence removed to Vienna, and Arles, where was born to him of his Wife Fansta another Son called Constantine, who thortly after was also created Casfar. This City of Arles being Demolished, he Repaired, and some think that he gave to it the Name of Constantina. But now he removed out of Gall, whither he never returned, being found at the beginning of December at Serdica, in Dacia. He had much augmented his Diftrict, which at first contained but Gall, Spain, and Britain; and now his Affairs called him Eastward. This year died Diocletian, at the beginning of December; at Salona. The next year in the Confulship of Gallicanus, and Bassus, Crispus, young Con-Cantine his Brother, and Licinianus were made Cafars on the first of March; and in this year, in the month of August, Constantius, another Son of Constantine feems to have been born. The Father lay fome time at Serdica, and at Sirmium, as appears by fome Laws.

23. For the year next following, being of our Lord the CCCXVIII. Crifpus Cæfar was Conful, together with Licinius, who bore that Title now the fifth time; and Constantine is found to have been at Sirmium. And for the four following years, he was either in Pannonia, at Sirmium, and Sebaria; or in Dacia at Serdica, and Naissus, except he pleased to make an Incursion to Aquilera, which was near to Pannonia. For he was ingaged in War with the Sarmatæ for four years, at Camposa, Margus, and Bononia. For this War he called the Sons of L. D. fills Veterane Soldiers into the Field, of whom many throughout Italy declined the Service. Zosimus writes, That hearing how the Sarmatæ, who lived upon the Fen of Mæotis, passed over Ister; and harassed his Dominions, he led his Forces against them, and the Barbarians met him under Conduct of Rausimodus their King. In their way they fell upon a certain Town which was defended by a Garrison strong enough, and had Walls made of Stone at the botom, and Wood at the top. They thought they should easily become Masters of the place, if they could but burn what was at the top, and they cast fire on it, and plied with Arrows those that came to make defence. But they within by tumbling down Stones, and otherwise improving the advantage which the higher place afforded, killed many of them, and Constantine now came in View, tell upon their backs. the overshrows killed many, took more, and put to flight the rest. Rausimodus having lost the greatest part of his Forces, took Boat, and passed the Ister, with a resolution again to invade the Roman Pale, which Constantine understanding, passed the River after him, and fell upon the Barbarians, who had fled to an Hill that was full of Wood, where he flew many, and amongst the rest, Rausmodus himself. Many he took alive, and received to mercy the Multitude which yielded to him i which done, he returned to his Quarters, with a great number of Captives. Those he distributed into the Cities, and came to Thessalonica. Here he made an Haven, where formerly none had been, and again prepared to make War against Licinius.

Thus Zofimus writes of him. 24 All this while he indeavoured to reform the Manners of the Roman People, and reduce them to Piery, Humanity, Peace, and Concord, as well by Edicts directed to the People, as by Constitutions sent to Bassus' and Maximus, Præsects of the City. He moderated the power of Masters over their Slaves, made Posfessors secure against violent Intruders, and prevented fraudulent Donations. He restrained the levity of Divorces, and gave strength to lawful Contracts and Marriages, and was agreeable to the Sanctity of that Religion which he Profeffed. He cut off from the Laws many Ambages, and Snares thereby, from the Necks of the Subject, by another most merciful Edict directed to the People, and Takes care for exposed to the View of all men at Rome. He published Laws against the ravishing of Virgins, against the levity and temerity of Accusations, and against the Use of Concubines, all which proceeding from his Zeal to propagate that Sancity which Christian Religion requireth, are to be treated of in that Part of this Work, which is folely appropriate to Ecclefiastical Affairs. But his green care for the Incouragement of Physitians, Grammarians, and other Protessors of Learning, we cannot in this place omit, whereby is made evident what Villor writeth concerning him, That he nourished good Arts, and especially the Studies of Learning, as on the contrary, it is written of Licinius, that he was an Enemy to Learning, which through his Ignorance he termed Poison, and the publick Plague, especially the Industry of the Law; and no wonder it was when Constanting was very Learned himself as Sext. Aurelius Victor published by Schottus doth teflifie; if now it be lawful to commend him, or fay with that Author, that for this, and other Virtues, he was extolled. And as he was Learned himself, he took care that his Children should be well seen in good Letters, for which purpose he provided them of the best Masters that were to

25. Now he that loveth Learning, loveth also the Learned, and such as would have either themselves or others instructed, will study to incourage and He is very fa- reward them that are to do, or have already done it. Constantine shewed himvourable to felf of this mind by three feveral Constitutions made in favour of fuch Perfons. He confirmed whatfoever Privileges had been granted by his Predeceifors. For, Velpalian had first of all others allotted Salaries to Professors, and gave them Immunity from Quarter and Personal Services, which Hadrian confirmed ; But these were but Personal Services. Constantine now made them free L. 1. de Middies not only from Perfonal, but Patrimonial; so as their Possessing should not be & reasonable to Charges in Cities where they inhabited, and yet if they pleased they cathibits in the please of the control of the property of t should obtain the Honours thereof, as to be Dunnviri, Ædiles, Refenfores, Gyraflarcha, Priests, Flamines, Legati; but so as to take or refuse them, whether they pleased. More than this, he prohibits that they be incurred by any, or forced to appear by violence in Courts of Judicature, under a Penalty of an Hundred thousand Nummi to be levied for the Treasury by the Magistrates (as the Decembiri) and Quinquennales of the Municipia, or Cities, who upon default were to forfeit the like Sum. In case a Slave do them any Injury, he commands that he be whipped by his Lord, before him whom he injured; and if the Lord was confenting, he shall Pay Twenty thousand Nummi, and his Slave be left for a pledge till it be paid to the Treasury. Afterwards he granted to the Archiatri, or the Physicians of the Palace, and the Exarchiatri, That they and their Sons should be free from all Duties belonging to the Cu. L. 2. Ejuffait. pilles, Senatores, Comités, and Perfectissimi; so as not to be forced to the Payment of Gold or Silver, Finding of Horses, or other Services incumbent on these Persons. And other Immunities he granted to Physitians and Profellors after the Founding of Constantinople; of which at that time we shall

26. After the Finishing of the War with the Sarmata, for joy thereof Games were Celebrated, called Ludi Sarmatici, in the later end of November, and beginning of December following of the fourth year. At the beginning of the next, Constantine was at Theffalonica in Macedonia. When there he lay, the Goths, breaking through the Limits which were neglected, wasted Thrace, and Massa, but for fear of him again retreated, having obtained Pardon by restoring Captives; and such of them as were taken Prisoners, were distributed throughout the Cities .. : After this he returned to Theffalonica, and in February following were Games Celebrated at Rome; called Ludi Gothici But taking notice how by the Negligence of the Soldiers upon the Limits, those of Thrace and Miesta had been broken through by the Barbarians; to provide against their Incursions and Depredations, he sent out a severe Constitution in the Month of April, whereof we are hereafter to speak. Now this War against the Goths,

Goths, gave occasion to another War against Licinius. Thrace and Mysia had been wasted by them, and they had been repressed by Constantine. This Licinius complained of, as against the Agreement that the Quarters that were Subject to him should be medled with by another Person: And sometimes sending submissive Letters, but otherwhiles proud and haughty, he excited the Indignation of Constantine, who was also angry with him, for having lately Banilhed all Christians out of his Palace, as an Anonymous Author writes, formerly published by Sirmondus, and fince by Valefius, together with his Edition of Ammianus Marcellinus. He adds, That in the mean time while both prepared for another Civil War, Licinius raged in his District against his Subjects with Confinius and Wickedness, Covetousness, Cruelty, and Lust; Killing many for their Wealth, prepare for and corrupting their Wives. Zohmus still making Constantine the Aggressor, Wa tells us, That he provided two hundred Gallies, which carried thirty Oars apiece; and of Ships of Burthen above two thousand; of Foot-Soldiers an hundred and twenty thousand, and of Horse and other Forces belonging to his Navy, ten thousand more. 27. Licinias hearing of his Preparations, fent Messengers about to divers Nations, to provide both a fufficient Navy and Land-Forces. Accordingly were sent him without delay from Ægypt, eighty Triremes, as many by the Phanicians; by the Jenians, and the Aliatick Dorienses sixty; thirty by the Cyprians, twenty by the Carians, thirty by the Bithynians; and the Africans furnished him with fifty. He had of foot almost an hundred and fifty thousand, and of Horse fifteen thousand, sent out of Phrygia and Cappadocia. The Navy of Constantine lay in the Piraus, and that of Licinius in the Hellespont. Licinius lay at Hadrianople in Thrace. Constantine sent away for his Fleet, which had been for the most part raised out of Greece, and marched with his Land-Army from Thessalonical and incamped himself on the Banks of the River Hebrus, which on the left hand watereth Hadrianople. The Author lately mentioned writes, That he fent his Son Crifpus with a great Fleet to feize on Afia, against whom Amandus was imployed by Licinius. That Licinius had feized the Roots of an high Mountain about Hadrianople, with a vast Army, and that thither marched Constantine with all his Forces. Zofimus makes this Mountain two hundred Furlongs from Hadrianople, where the River Tonus joyns with Hebrus, and then for many days, he faith, the Armies faced each other. But Constantine, taking notice where the River was the narrowest, had this Device : He commanded his Soldiers to cut Wood from the adjoyning Mountain, and joyned them with Ropes together, as if he intended to make a Bridge, and by it to pass over his Forces. Having thus amused the Enemy, he ascended the Mountain, and in the thick Woods where they could not be discovered, placed five thousand Archers, with Eighty Horsemen. This done, he took with him twelve Horse, and passing over Hebrus where it was narrowest, fell suddainly upon his Enemies. Some now were tonflantine ob- Slain, fome ran with all fpeed, and others gaped and flared at this fo unexpected Longitude Of the Horse, and the victory whole Army had passed the River. Thirty and four thousand Men were Slain, and at Evening Constantine took the Camp; Licinius being fled with as many as he could get together toward his Fleet. The next Morning, fuch as had betaken themselves into the Mountain, or Valleys, yielded to Constantine, together with fuch as Licinius had left behind. Such an account Zofimus gives of Constantine his Victory, fornething odd. The other Writer faith in thort, That the War being drawn on, though his Men were put to difficulties, by his Military Discipline and Felicity; he overthrew the confused and disordered Army of Licknius, receiving a flight Wound in his Thigh.

28. Licinius betook himself to Byzantium; and thither Constantine pursued him, and Befreged the City. He fent for his Fleet, which from the Piraus was come into Macedonia; of which his Officers advised to ingage in Fight only Eighty of the Swiftest, which carried Thirty Oars apiece, because of the straitnels of the Hellespont. This small number was despited by the Admiral of Licinius, whom Zosimus calls Abantus, and Sigonius Abas; and he doubted not but eafily to Maiter it with his Two hundred Galleys. But coming to Fight, the Commanders of Constantine joyntly let upon their Enemies, whereas he fell on without Order, and by reason of their multitude, his Ships fell foul one of another, and were exposed to be easily Sunk and Destroyed by the Enemy. Many men being loft, the Fight was broken off by the intervening of Night and the one Party took in to the Port of Elaus in Thrace, and the other into that of Ajax. The day following, when a vehement Wind blew from the North, Abantus got his Ships out of the Port of Ajax, and prepared himfelf for another Ingagement. But the other Galleys of thirty Oars which staid behind, being now come to Elieus, he began to be afraid of the great number of Constantine's Ships, and to doubt whether he should set upon them. Now about Noon did the Wind turn about into the South, and so great a Tempest arose, that it drove the Fleet of Licinius, lying on the Asiatick Coast, upon the Shoar, or upon Rocks, and with an hundred and thirty Veffels perished five thousand Men, Licinius in the Vessels having Transported part of his Soldiers into Asia; Lecause Byzantium was crowded with People. Abantus now being fled with four Ships into Asia, and the Sea-Fight thus ended; when also the Vessels were come into the Hellespont; which brought Provisions for Constantine's Army, they all departed with the Fleet to Byzantium, to joyn with those that Besieged the City, to compass it in both by Sea and Land! As for the Forces of Licinius, they not daring fo much as to look upon them, got Vellets, and departed to Elæus.

from By-Chalcedon.

29. Constantine prepared Mounts and Turrets, and all things requisite for inforcing the Siege; at which Licinius being affrighted, refolved to quit the place, and with the best resolved of his Men to go to Chalcedon, a City of Bithynia, where he hoped to raise more Forces, and renew the War. Going this ther by Boat; he created Cafar Martinian his Magister Officiorum, to have a Companion of his Fortune, and fent him to Lampfacus to hinder the Enemy from passing from Thrace to the Hellesport; he himself bestowing his Men iff the Hills and Straits about Chalcedon. In the Hiesai time, confuntive having a multitude of Ships of all sorts, but searing that those of Shirthest would not Le able to come near the Shoar of Bithynia, prepared light Vessels and Boars, and passed over his Army to the Sacred Promontory, as it was called, at the Entrance of Pontus, and two hundred Furlongs distant from Chalcedon. There on certain Hills he incamped himself, whom though Licinius perceived to be Master of Bithynia, yet being a man exercised in all Dangers, he sent for Martinian away from Lampfacus, and incouraging his Soldiers, drew out of There receives the Town to give Battel. A cruel Battel was fought betwixt the Town and another great the Fanum, wherein Constantine had by far the better, who falling with violence on the Enemy, made fuch Slaughter, that of an hundred and thirty thousand Men, scarcely thirty thousand escaped. This being done, they of Byzantium opened their Gates, and received him; which also did the Citizens of Chalcedon. Licinius thus beaten, with the remainders of his Horse, and a few Foot fled to Nicomedia. .

30. At this time a Persian, Hormisda by Name, of the Royal Family, fled over to Constantine upon this occasion: When the Persian King his Father, was Celebrating his Birth-day, this Hormifda came to Court, bringing along with him great store of Venison. But it so happened, that such as were entertained at the Feast, neither rose up to do him Reverence, nor shew'd him any other respect, at which being Angry, he threatned them with the Death of Marlyas. Most of them understood not that Speech, as foreign, but a certain Persian, who had lived in Phrygia, and had heard the Story of Marsyas, told the rest what it was that Hormifda meant. They remembring his Threats, when his Father died, made his younger Brother King, contrary to the Law, and putting Chains upon Hormifda, kept 1 in Prisoner on a Hill near the City, till by the Invention of his Wife he was delivered. She opened the Belly of a large Fish. and therein put a File, and fowing up the Belly again, gave the Fish to a Trufty Eunuch, and bad him charge her Husband not to eat the Fish when any one was by, that he might make use of what he should find in it. This done, she loaded some Camels with Wine and Provisions, and therewith Feasted those that kept him. While they were busic at making Merry, Hormisda opening the Fifh, found the File, wherewith he filed off his Fetters, and putting on the Habit of an Eunuch, paffed through the middle of them being Drunk, and taking one of the Eunuchs along with him, escaped away to the King of the Armenians, his Friend, and by his affiftance got fafe to Constantine, who received him with all Honour and Respect imaginable.

31. But Constantine pursued Licinius to Nicomedia, and there also Besieged him. He now knowing he had not firength to grapple with him, despaired of any Success in Arms, and coming out of the City, presented himself as a Supplicant to Constantine, and offering him the Purple, called him Emperor and Lord, and begged his Pardon for what had paffed. For he had promited his Life to his Siflor the Wife of Lining, and that by Oath. As for Martinian, he delivered him to those of his Guard to be flain. Thus much writeth Zofmus, toncerning this War betwixt Conflantine and Licinius. The Anonymous Author, lately named, writes, That the day following the Victory at Chalcedon, the Wife of Licinius came to ther Brother's Camp, and begged her Husband's Pardon, which was granted: What Litinius, now a private Man, was admitted to Constantine's Table; and that Mintinian had his life granted him at this time, though afterwards he was put to Death! But so became Constantine Monarch of the Roman Empire, in (or toward) the Nineteenth year of his Reign, wherein his two Sons, Cripus and Contantius 2 2 3 3 3 week Confuls; the third Confulhip of whom fell into the CCCXXIIII year of her y the top of heme brokenes

23 20 In the ferond year of Decius, was Fabianus Bishop of Rome crowned with Martyrdom, on the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The See was vacant for one year, and then was chosen Cornelius, whose election displeasing some, Nowatus ordained against him Novatianus. The year following Cornelius was Martyred, on the eighneenth before the Calends of Ottober; and Lucius succeeded hims who shortly after was banished. In the second of Gallienus was he Beheaded, and after a vacancy of thirty five days, Stephen succeeded on the Ninth of April the first Feria, who interceding for Bastlides condemned by the Spaniards, they defended their Right against him, and condemned his Usurparion against the Africone, rassappeareth from Cyprian's Epiftles, as also that the boldness of the Roman Seen Was now sheeked by all the Provinces After three years Stephen was Beheaded by the command of Valerian, and Sixtas succeeded him, who being Beheaded when Lourence the Deacon was Fryed to death by the command of Valeright, Dionyfus succeeded ... After him came Filix , and then Eutychianus, who being martyred in the first of Carus; after Nine day's Carus succeeded, December 16. Caius was crowned with Martyrdom in the twelfth of Dioclerian, and after eleven days Marcellinis succeeded, whathrough fear offering incense to Idols, when he denied it, was overborn by the reflimony of a multitude of witnesses, confessed his faults, and afterwards redeemed his credit by fuffering Martyrdom. Marcellus flucreeded him After Marsellus fucceeded Eufebius, and then Militades, then Syl velter, who was Bishop at the time of the Council of Nice, in the twentieth year of Constantine odl flattiogave of and a

33. After Alexander, Mandhanes was Billiop of Jerufalem until the reign of Gallus and Volusianus, after him helymeheus till the time of Aurelian. Then followed Zambdas and Vdermon, according to (a) Eufebius, who writeth, That the See of (a) Lib.74.19. Terusalem was always honoured, and the Succession continued unto his own days. After Hermon Macarius was Bishop and was present at the Council of Nice. In the scholast. 1. 1. Church of Antioch after Philerus succeeded Zebinus, and then Babylas; who died cap 9, 13. in Prison, in the Persecution under Decius. Him followed Fabius, him Demetrianus, and him Paulus Samofatenus the Heretick, who denying the Divinity of the Son of God, was excommunicated, and deprived by the second Synod held against Son of God, was excommunicated, and deprived by the recond symbol neuragannt (c) Eught, s, him at Antioch in the days of (c) Aurelianus. And when he would neither depart (c) 29, 300 the Church, nor avoid the house, the Emperor was belought (the first application to the Prince in this Nature by the Christians) to interpose and command by Edict, that fuch should have the house as agreed in Doctrine with the followers of the Bishop of Rome and Italy. Domnus was by the Synod appointed to succeed him, after whom followed Timeus, Cyrillus, Dorotheus, Tyrannus, Vitalis, Philogonus a Martyr, and (d) Eustathius, whio was at the Council of Nice. He fell into the Herefie of 6.9.23. Sabellius, who being the Scholar of Noetus, taught that the three Persons of the Trinity were but one; but they differed, in that Sabellius faid not the Father to have fuffered. He was deposed by a Council held at Antioch. Eusebius Pamphilius Bishop of Casarea consuted him. After his deposition the See was vacant eight years. In the See of Alexandria after Heraclas, Dionyfius the Scholar of Origen was Bishop, in the third year of Philip. He reporteth in (e) Eusebius the Peril he stood in, and the Persecution he suffered under Decius. He wrote of the Alexandrian Local values. Martyrs to Fabius Bilhop of Antioch; and to Novatus the Heretick, who being a Priest of Rome, fell from his Order, and calling his Sect Cathari, would not admit unto the Church fuch as fell after Repentance, and he abhorred fecond Marriage. Dionysius also wrote to Hermanion, to Steven, and Xistus Bishops of Rome, unto tuence and comfort.

Philemon a Minister of Rome, and unto Dionysius Bishop of Rome. He consuted the Book of Nepos the Chiliast, and confounded in open Disputation Coracion his Disciple. Hitherto this error of the Millinaries propagated by Papias, had many of the Fathers that adhered to it, who yet held, That Christ when he came was to do his own work, without any prejudice to Earthly Princes in the mean time. Some observe, That Dionysius striking at this error, traduceth the Apocalypse, as also defending the diffinction of Persons against Sabellius, seemeth to make three Essences Many betook themselves to Dionysius Bishop of Rome, that he would reclaim him, and obtained it. After he had governed the Church seventeen years he died, and Maximinus succeeded him, whom followed Theonas, and him Peter, who was martyred under Diocletian. Him fucceeded Achillas and then came Alexander who was at the Council of Nice. He by preaching of the Trinity somewhat curiously, gave occasion to Arius one of his Clergy to fall from the Faith, as * Socrates informeth us. * L. 1. 5. 2 34. In the fifth year of Philip whil'st Fabianus was Bishop of Rome, Donaras the Bishop of Carthage died, and Cyprian succeeded him by consent of all men except Felicissimus, who, whil'st the Heathens invaded his Patrimony, endeavoured to deprive him of his Bishoprick. Felicissimus was ordained Bishop by Novarus; who also ordained Novatianus against Cornelius Bishop of Rome. Yet Cornelius fa Vica & miles voured Felicissimus against Cyprian, and would have taken Cognizance of their bu-la coming finess, whereupon Cyprian vehemently rebuketh him, and denies that any one benness, whereupon cypran veneziently required in any Matters concerning Aprick.

And a little after, the Pride of the Roman See was reprehended by all those of the

complained to Stephen the Bilhop of Rome. Cyprian was feveral times driven into Exile. (a) Bufebius maketh him to have erred in Rebaptizing Hereticks. In the (a) Lib. 7, 24. fourth of Valerian died Origen seventy years old, a man of admirable Parts, most austere life, indefatigable industry, and stupendious Learning, but of impure Do Ctrine. Jerome sheweth how full of portentous Errors his Book meet apparis (b) Augustin faith, he held the Devil at length should be delivered from Hell, and (b) Que con. affociated with the Holy Angels, and for this, and other things, especially for the de crosses holding alternate or successive blessedness and misery for ever, the Church did reject him. Pamphilus wrote an Apology for him. But his works are to be read with effecial care, and especially his Commentaries upon the Scripture, concerning fome of which Theodore (c) Beza passeth this censure: Certe bot aufum dicere ft has (c) in tail. Sunt Origenis cujus titulum præferunt, bunc hominem fuisse seletlum. Diaboli brganum Apostolica Doctrina evertenda destinatum; for he evaporateth the folid and subflantial Doctrine of the Gospel, into Allegorical, and acry Notions. 35. But, God having exercifed his People by many a flery trial, was plea-fed to preferve the bulh unburned, and at length to grant them Peace by Con-flanting, who proved a nursing Father to the Church, taking away all Penal Laws.
